Venetians containing three hundred men at armes, manie light horsemen, & foure thousand footmen, to winne the passage of Paw, and so to ioynt with the Popes armie, were encamped before Fiqueroles, which is a litle & weake borough vpon Paw, but of great renowme, both for the long time that Robert of S. Senerm was before it in the warre which the Venetians had with Hercules Duke of Ferrara, and also for the defence made by Federike Duke of Verbin, capitaines of great valour in that time. The Venetians tooke it by composition, and afterwards forced the towne of Stellate which is vpon the shore opposite: and commaunding in that sort the passage of Paw, there rested no more to march ouer but to cast the bridge, which Alfonso after the losse of Stellate being come with his armie to Bondin, hindred with his artillerie, which he had planted vpon a point of the land from whence he beat easily that place, and besides that skowred the whole riuer of Paw with two gallies, which retired immediatly, for the Venetian flecte, who in the beginning could not enter Paw, the mouthes of the riuer being garded by the ordinance of the Duke, found entring now, being come vp by Adice against the streame, inso much as the countrey of Ferrara suffered many damages by the presence of two flectes of the Venetians. But those harmes ceased forthwith together with the feares of the peoples, for that the Duke issuing out of Ferrara, set vpon that flecte which was entred by Primaro & come vp to Adria, with two gallies, two foystes, and many small barks: and hauing repulsd them with an easie fortune and no great hazard, he came to the other, which being compounded but of foystes and other small vessels, was entred by Fornacei and come vp to Puisella: and as they would haue entred within Adice by a riuer neare it, they found impediment by the shallownesse of the water: in so much as standing open to perill without any apparance of succors, and being continually beaten with the artilleries of the enemy, they left their vessels abandoned, seeking their safetie in those meanes which their present fortune provided for them.

In these stirres of temporall armes, the spirituall thunderbolts began to make noise on all parts: for the Pope loyning authoritie to his furie, excommunicated Alfonso d'Este, and all such as either were come or would come to his succors, but particularly Monsieur Chaumont with all the principals of the French armie: and in Fraunce the assembly of Prelates that had bene transported from Orleans to Tours, had consented (notwithstanding more not to oppose against the will of their king assisting oftentimes their assembly, then of their proper will or iudgement, to many articles propounded against the Pope, with this onely modification, that before they went from his obedience, there should be Embassadors addressed to him, both to communicate such articles as were agreed vpon by the clergie of Fraunce, and also to admonish him that hereafter he should obserue them, and in case of impugning or resisting he should be cited to the Councell, wherein request solemne should be made to all Princes of Christendome to be concourant in the action. There was also agreed to leaue a great impost of money vpon the Churches of Fraunce. And a litle after in an other session of the xxvij. of September, they published the Councell to begin at Lyon in the beginning of March next. The same day the Bishop of Gurce entred into Tours, where he was receiued with so rare and incredible honor, that vpon the excessive pompes that were vsed to him, was sufficiently exprest with what long and great desire his coming had bene expected: besides, now began to be disclosed the diuision of the Cardinals against the Pope, for that the Cardinals of S. Crosse and Coseno, Spanish, and the Cardinals of Baieux and S. Mallo, French, together with the Cardinall S. Senerm, leaving the Pope going to Bologna by the way of Romagnia, and visiting in his iourney the temple of our Lady of Loretta, very notable by many miracles, they tooke with his leaue their way through Tuskane: but being come to Florence, and obtaining of the Florentines safe conduit, not for any time determined, but vntill they reuoked it, and fiftene dayes after the reuocation should be signified to them, they delayed with many excuses to passe further. Their long abyding gaue cause of suspicion to the Pope, who after many generall requests to haue them to go to Bologna, wrote privately to the Cardinales of S. Mallo, Baieux, and S. Senerm to come to the Court vpon payne of his indignation: and proceeding more gently with the Cardinals Coseno and S. Crosse, a Cardinall of marke, both for his nobilitie, his knowledge, and his other merites, and also very notable for the great and weightie embassages which he had managed for the sea Apostolike, he dealt with them by perswasions & inducements of friendship to returne to the court. But they not disposed to obey him whom they did not loue, tooke the way to

Millan by Lunigiana, after they had in vaine solicited the Florentines, to giue not onely to them, but also to all the Cardinals that would come thither, an assured safeconduit for a long time.

In this meane while Chaumont deuising to recouer Carpy, which had bene taken before by the souldiers of the Church, sent thither Albert Pio and Monsieur Palisso with foure hundred launces and foure thousand footmen, Albert Pio going before with a trumpet, and accompanied with a small troupe of horsemen, the towne that loued well his name, hearing of his coming, began to tumult: for feare of which perill the Ecclesiastikes lying there in garrison to a number of xl. light horsemen, and fiue hundred footmen, forooke their charge and tooke the way to Modena: but being pursued by the French which came soone after, they were broke & put to flight in the medow of Cartille, which is almost in the halfe way betweene Carpy and Modena. The horsemen found safetie in the swiftnesse of their horses, but most part of their footemen fell into the last calamities of warre, which was slaughter & imprisonment. Chaumont esteemed it the best policie, and to better purpose for the present warre, to set vpon the enimie afore the arriual of the Spanish launces, whom to aduance and hasten the more, the Pope had deliuered into the hands of Cardinall Regine the bull of inuestiture: He iudged it also very conuenient to go to the charge afore the Venetian companies ioyned with them, who hauing raysed certaine rampiers against the artilleries of Alonso, hoped speedily to haue cast downe their bridge. In this minde, he drewe neare to Modena, where after was spent a long time in skirmishing betweene both partes, the Ecclesiastiks looking into their weaknesse, would neuer issue out with all their forces, not seeking perill by separation, where they were assured of safetie keeping together in one strength. This hope being lost, he determined to put in execution that wherunto many of his brauest captaines, & namely the Bentiuoleis, did perswade him with sundry offers: they aduised him not to consume time vnprofitably about matters of so small respect, that the difficulties were farre greater then the profites: but raising his minde equall to the offers of his fortune: that they wold him to set vpon the body of the warre, and the principal head from whom proceeded so many perilles and troubles: They alleaged that he had nowe a good occasion, for that within Bologna were very fewe forraine souldiers, and amongst the people many mindes that fauoured the Bentiuoleis, the most parte of the residue being inclined rather to expect the issue of things, then to take armes to sowe the seedes of newe dangers, and reape the fruite of newe hatreds and harmes: That if the attempt were not nowe giuen, the present occasion passing, fortune would also vanish and make vaine the exploit hereafter: for that comming the bandes of the Venetians and Spaniards that were expected, there was no hope to do that with an armie mighty, which now the occasion and time made easie with farre lesse forces.

Thus the whole armie being assembled which the Bentiuoleis followed with certain horsemen and a thousand footmen of their owne pay, tooke the way betweene the mountaine and the high way, and assaulted Spilimberto, which is a borough of the Counts Rangons, wherein was a garrison of foure hundred footmen sent thither by the Pope. They had no sooner begun to batter it, then they had it by composition, the valour of the souldiers doing nothing to helpe the weake situation and plot of the place. The next day Frankcastle rendred vpon conditions more easie then honorable, sauing that the fortune of the victors did somewhat defend their dishonour: And from thence they marched and incamped at Cresplano a village tenne miles from Bologna, with intention to present them selues the day after afore the gates of the Citie, wherein, what by the comming of the armie, and what by the report that the Bentiuoleis were in it, all things were full of confusion and tumult, and the Nobles no lesse then the Commons expressed an vniuersall disposition to change, the one parte fearing, and the other parte desiring the retorne of the familie of Bentiuoley. But greater confusions and feares occupied the mindes of the Prelates and Courtiers, better acquainted with the delights of Rome, then accustomed to the dangers of warre: The Cardinals full of timorous passions ranne to the Pope, complaining that he had put himselfe the se a Apostolike, and them in so great perill: their timorous condition tooke away the reason that in cases of daunger is wont to rule wise men, & the same feare that moued their confusion, suppressed in them all respect and reuerence to the dignitie of the place and person, but pushed on with those passions which they were not able to moderate, they besought him with great importunities, either to make some sufficient provision for their defence (which in such a shortnesse of time they held impossible) or at least to seeme to appease and reasssure things by composition vnder such conditions as the necessitie of their estate required, whereunto they supposed the enemy would incline, or at least that he would make his departure out of Bologna together with them, and to consider, that if his particular daunger touched him not, of what importance it would be for the Séa Apostolike, and for all Christian religion, if there happened any inconuenience to his person. His dearest fauorites and most acceptable ministers and seruants did communicate in these complaints, and hauing all one feare they followed all one sute, like men that neuer feeling but securitie, had least rule ouer their passions when they saw perill and danger at hand. But he onely, amidst so great a tumult and disorder of things, no lesse vncertaine of the fidelitie of the people, then ill contented with the slow comming on of the Venetians, made obstinate resistance against all these aduersities, neither amased with the perils that he sawe, nor once moued with the perplexities of his Cardinales, and ioyning to these afflictions the maladie that had much weakened his bodie, they had all no abilitie to bend the greatnesse of his minde. At the beginning he had caused to come thither M. Authon. Colonno with one part of the soldiers that were within Modona, and likewise had sent for Ierome d' Onato Embassadour to the Venetians, to whome he complained with bitter exclamations, that for the long delaying of the aides which had bene so many times promised him, his person and his estate were in manifest daunger, not onely with an ingratitude abhominable towards him that had begun the warre chiefly for their safetie, and who with his great expences and dangers hauing brought the whole empire and the French king to be his enemies, had bene the cause of the preseruacion of their libertie till that day, but also with an incredible indiscretion for the regard of themselves, seeing if he should either be vanquished, or constrained to yeeld to any composition, there could be no hope of their safetie, and lesse expectation of good degree for their common weale: he lastly protested with wordes and action full of furie and resolution, that he would fall to agreement with the French if the next daie past ouer and no succours of their people which lay at Stellata entred into Bologna; hauing this difficultie to build a bridge and to passe the riuer vpon barkes and other vessels. He assembled the gouernment and Colledges of Bologna, with whom he occupied perswasions of great grauitie, that remembring the miseries of their tyrannie past, and how hurtfull and daungerous would be the returne of tyrants after they were expulsed, they would lift vp them selues to the defence of the iurisdiction of the Church, which they had found so easie and tractable: and to induce them to a more readinesse, besides the fauours he had graunted them before, he gaue them exemption of the moytie of all the impostes exacted vpon the victuals that entred into Bologna for the vse of man, with promise to gratifie them hereafter in greater benefites: he caused to publish these fauours by proclamation, the better to moue the people to take armes for the defence of the estate Ecclesiastike: but as his purpose was corrupt, so his labour was without fruite, for that not one body stirred, not one hand was holden vp, nor any signe made in his fauour. These cold affections of the people considered, with other causes and shewes, brought him at last to looke into the daunger wherein he stood, and pitying withall the importunities and plaints of so many peoples, ioyned to the perpetuall intercession and labour of the Embassadors of Cesar, the king Catholike, and the king of England set on by the Cardinals, he consented to send to Monsieur Chaumont, to suffer Iohn Fran. Piqua Count of Mirandola to go to him in safetie in the Popes name. And not manie houres after he dispatched to him one of his chamber, to require him to send to him Alberi de Carpy, not knowing but that he was in the armie. And in the action of these things, to the end that in all aduentures the most precious Reliques of the Pontificacie might be in safetie, he sent Laur. Pucci his Datario with the Regno (so they call the principall Myter) wonderfully garnished with precious stones, to be kept in the famous Monasterie of the Murato of Florence. Chaumont by consideration of the requestes that were made to him, hoped that the Pope would incline to peace, which he did so much the more desire, by how much he knewe it was agreeable to the intencion and minde of the king: and therefore, not to trouble such a disposition, the day following he retained the armie in their lodgings, suffering notwithstanding the Bentinioles with manie horsemen of their friends and followers, to runne euen to the walles of Bologna, hauing marching a good space after them an hundred and fiftie French launces: at whose coming notwithstanding Harmer, one of the brothers both youngest and most resolute, presented himselfe on that side of the gate, yet there was no mutinie made within, the expectation of peace that was then in action preuailing more to containe the people, then any affection or obedience they bare to the Pope. Chaimont gave gracious audience to Frau. de Mirandola, and returned him the same day to Bologna, to signify to the Pope the conditions wherein he was content to accord: that the Pope should absolue Alfonso d'Este of all accursings and paines, together with all those whose euer, which for any occasion were parties to the defending or offending of the estate Ecclesiastike: and likewise he should acquite the Bentiuoleis of all paines and censures; and make them repossessed of the goods which manifestly appertained to them; referring to arbitration and iudgement such as they were possessed of afore their exile: that it should be lawfull for them to dwell in what place they would, so farre forth as they came not neare to Bologna by fourescore miles: that touching the Venetians there should be nothing done contrarie to that which had bene agreed vpon in the confederation of Cambray: that betwene the Pope and Alfonso d'Este should be a surceasing of armes at the least for fixe months, euerie one retaining all that hee possessed: in which respite of time their controuersies should be decided by Iudges assigned by common accord, reseruing to Cesar the order of the things of Modona, which Citie should be incontinent depoled into his hands: that Cotignole should be restored to the French king: that the Cardinall of Acha should be deliuered: that the Cardinales that were absent should be pardoned: and that the collation of benefices through all the dominions of the French king should be disposed according to his nomination. With this answer Mirandola returned to the Pope, not without hope that Monsieur Chaumont would not continue so seuerely in all those conditions. The Pope contrarie to his custome heard the report with patience, together with the petitions of the Cardinals, who besought him with an incredible affection that he would haue regard to the estate of the time and their vniuersall calamities, not refusing the composition that was offered; if he could obtaine no better: they tolde him that he stood in condition to accept, and not to expect more then was offered; his owne fortune and the felicitie of his enemy struing against him. But on the other part, he complained of the too bitter conditions that were offered, and mingling all his speeches with complaints against the Venetians, he consumed all that day without expressing what was his resolution, not shewing so much doubt of the perill he was in, as hauing regard to the sorowes of the Cardinals & others that stood before him: at the last he tooke hope for that Chappin Vitelly in the euening entred into Bologna with sixe hundred light horsemen Venetians, and an esquadron of Turkes payed by them: he departed by night from Stellato, and coming vpon the spurre all the way, arriued at Bologna in the euening, being charged by the Governour of Venice to omit no diligence to reskue the Popes dangers. The morning following Chaumont encamped with his whole armie at the bridge of Renay, which is three miles from Bologna, where the Secretories of the Embassadours of the king of Romains, the king of Aragon, and the king of England went to him, and soone after the Embassadours themselves: who, together with Albert Pio, which now was come from Carpy, returned many times that day betwene the Pope and Monsieur Chaumont: but the disposition of both the one and other partie was greatly chaunged: for Monsieur Chaumont hauing now no hope by the experience of the day before to be able to raise the people of Bologna by meane of the Bentiuoleis, and beginning withall to fall into necessitie of victualles which would continually increase vpon him, had great distrust of the victorie: and the Pope taking courage by the affection of the people disclosed in the fauour of the Church, reentred estoones into armes the same day; and because they looked for at Bologna before night two hundred other Venetian Estradiots, two hundred light horsemen vnder Fabricio Colonna, and one part of the Spanish men at armes, hee did not onely discern that hee was deliuered of daunger, but also returning to his accustomed glorie, hee threatened to assaile the enemies as soone as the Spanish bandes were come, which were not now farre off. This confidence made him giue answer all that day, that hee bare no inclination to peace, vntlesse the French king would be bound to abandon whollie the defence and protection of Ferrara.

The day after were propounded new conditions, and during the negotiation, the Embassadors made many goings and returnings to Chaumont, but such and so many were the difficulties that their labour remained vaine: inasmuch as Chaumont distrusting to be able to profit much either by armes or by practising of peace, together that it was hard for him to remain there, both for the want of victuals, and distemperance of the time, winter approaching, he turned the same day to Franckcastle, and the day after to Rubiera, making shew that what he did, was done at the request of the Embassadors, both to giue time to the Pope to consider of the offers that had bene made, and leasure to himselfe to expect the further will & direction of his king: at that time many accused the resolution of M. Chaumont to be vndiscreet, and the execution negligent: for that not hauing forces sufficient to take Bologna (in his armie there were but three thousand foot men) it was a counsell ill debated to stirre and moue at the perswasions of men banished, whose hopes being measured more by desire then with reasons, become for the most part fallible and vaine: at the least, if he desired to embrace this enterprize, he ought first to haue restored and repaired the weaknesse of his forces: but of the contrarie they vrged that he had abused and corrupted the oportunitie by his too much tarying, for that since the commoditie he had to depart from Pesquero, he had vnprofitably lost three or foure dayes, and in the meane while considering the weaknesse of his armie, he was in doubt whether he should assay any thing of himselfe, or expect the bands of the Duke of Ferrara and the Lord Chastillon with the French launces: and be it that that might be defended, yet what excuse can be made that Franckcastle being takē, he made not sodaine approches to the gates of Bologna, and not to giue leasure to a citie to take breath, wherein not one succour was yet entred, the people hanging in suspence, and as it hapneth in sodeine things, all disposed into feares and confusion? a singular meane (if there be any at all) to make him obtaine either the victorie, or some honorable composition: but perhaps the authoritie of such as reprehend things that haue ill succeeded would be lesse, if at the same time might be knowne what would haue hapned if they had proceeded otherwayes.

After the retiring of Chaumont, the Pope bearing a mind inflamed against the French king, began to make his complaints to all Princes Christian, that the French king vsing vniustly & against truth the title and name of right Christian, & despising the confederation solemnly made at Cambray; and lastly, no lesse moued with ambition to vsurpe all Italie, then wickedly thirsting after the bloud of the Popes of Rome, had sent out his army to besiege him with all the Colledge of Cardinals, and the whole estate of Prelats within Bologna: and in this disposition of mind, returning eftsoones with a courage redoubled to the thoughts & studies of the warre, he refused to heare speake the Embassadors, who following the solicitation begun by Chaumont, offered him the means of peace, if first Ferrara were not deliuered to him: yea, such was the violence and furie of the spirit that gouerned him, that notwithstanding by the trauels he had suffered in so great an accident both in body & mind, his malady was made much worse, yet he began to make new leauiues of souldiers, & to stir vp the Venetians (who at last had cast a bridge betweene Ficquero & Stellato) to send vnder the Marquisse of Manua, one part of their armie to Modena to ioyne with his, and with the other part to vex and molest Ferrara, assuring them that within few daies he should haue Reggio, Rubiere, & Ferrara. The ambition of his mind made him apt to hope for all things, and to despaire in nothing; and what seemed vnpossible in reason, art or pollicie, he made no doubt to bring to passe by the benefit of his fortune, which he supposed was of power to remove all the difficulties that could be objected against him. The Venetian bands deferred to passe the riuer for the perill they had run into, if the death of the Pope had hapned (as was doubted:) but being in the end compelled to yeeld to his wils, after they had left the other bands vpon the shoare beyond Pau; they sent towards Modena 500 men at armes, 1600 light horsemen, and 3000 footmen, but not vnder the conduction of the Marquisse of Manua, who staying at Sermudy to leaue horsemen and footmen to the end to march afterwards to the armie (as he said) notwithstanding the Venetians were already entred into suspicion of his long abiding, went to S. Felix, a borough belonging to Modena: there he receiued aduertisement that the French that were within Verona, were entred into the countrie of Manua to pillage it, and therefore alleaging the necessitie to go to defend his estate, he returned from thence to Manua, hauing the Popes leaue, but not without great complaints of the Venetians: for that notwithstanding his promise to make present returne, being already entred into suspicion of his faith, they they beleueed (all Italy almost was partaking in that opinion) that Chaumont, to giue him an excuse not to go to the armie, had suffered certaine French bands to make incursions vpon his countrey. This suspicion was increased by a letter which he wrote from Mantua to the Pope, that he was not able to march for a sicknesse that was newly befallen him, desiring that his good will might be holden for recommended, hauing his body subiected to his infirmitie. After the bands of the Pope, the Venetians, and the Spanish launces were reassembled and vnited into one armie about the confines of Modena; if they had ioyned diligence to the oportunitie, & marched, it was thought that Chaumont had abandoned the citie of Reggio and retained the Citadell, hauing vpon his disamping from Bologna dismissed all his Italian footmen for auoiding of expences: but taking aduantage of their slownesse, and making their negligence a helpe to his fortune, he began of new to leauy bands of footmen, determining only to looke to the gard of Sassuola, Rubiera, Reggio and Parma: but as the armie lay vpon the marches of Modena, without direction whether they should passe further or turne against Ferrara, certaine troupes of the Church which ran vp towards Reggio, being put to flight by the French, lost an hundred horses, and Count de Mateligne taken prisoner: at which time the Duke of Ferrara, together with the Lord of Chastillon with the French bands lay encamped vpon the riuer of Paw, betweene the hospitall & Bondin, on the opposite to the Venetian regiments which were beyond Paw: whose nauie seeking to retire for the sharpnesse of the season, and for the ill prouision that came from Venice, being charged by many Barks of Ferrara whose artilleries sunke eight vessels to the bottome, retired with great paine by Newcastle vpon Paw, into the ditch that falleth into Tanare and Adice; and there is separate. Immediately after, the Pope gaue order that the army (gouerned by Fabricio Colonna for that the Marquisse of Mantua was not come) should draw straight to Ferrara, leauing the Duke of Urbino for the garde of Modena: and albeit most of the Captaines blamed this counsell, being both preiudiciall & dangerous, yet he eftsouones reassured them with a hope almost certaine that the people wold draw into tumult, so violent was his desire aboue all reason, aboue all counsell, aboue all pollicy, & aboue all experience; but the minds of men gouerned by desire, are full of variations & subiect to mutability & change; for the same day they departed, they were eftsouones returned by his commandemēt, keeping from the knowledge of euery one the occasion that moued him so sodainly to alter his determination: and leauing there his first deuises & plots, the armie marched and encamped afore the towne of Sassuola, whither Chaumont had sent 500 Gascons footmen: after they had battered it two dayes to the great pleasure and contentment of the Pope, who heard in the same chamber the noise of the artilleries that battred Sassuola, wherein not many dayes before he had hard to his great disliking the thüdering of the enemies shot that were about Spilimberto: they gaue the assault, which with smal ado succeeded happily to them, for that the footmen that were within fell into disorder: and after, the artillerie being immediately presented before the castle whither they were retired, they yeelded almost without any cōposition, with the same infamie & infelicity of Iohn Casalo that was their Captaine, which he had felt and suffered at the sametime that Duke Valentino tooke the castle of Furly: hee was a man of verie low & base place, but for that in the flower of his age he had bin cōformable to Lodowike Sforce, he was now risen to some honorable degree, his fortune and not his vertues preferring him, and the fauor of others more then his proper merits making him able to the opinion & credit that he had. After the taking of Sassuola, the armie tooke also Formingo: and the Pope appointing by his direction that they should go & take Montechio, which is a place of strength & importance, standing betweene the high way and the mountaine, vpon the frontiers of Parma and Reggio, & part of the territorie of Parma, notwithstanding it is holden by the Duke of Ferrara: Fabricio Colonna refused to execute the direction, alleaging that his king had forbidden him to molest any thing that was vnder the iurisdiction of the Empire. M. Chaumont prouided not for these disorders, who hauing left within Reggio M. d' Aubigny with fise hundred launces and two thousand Gascons vnder Captaine Molard, was gone himselfe into Parma, the king hauing sent him word to abstaine as much as he could frō expences; for, the king perseuering in his deuise to temporize vntill the spring, made no purueyance for the affaires on this side the mounts; by meane wherof his reputation declined in Italy, & the courage of his enemies augmented more & more: and the Pope impatient that his armie aduanced no more, not admitting any longer the excuses which his Captaines made vpon the season of the yeare with other difficulties, he assembled them all together at Bologna and told them he would march to encampe afore Ferrara: a resolution which was allowed onely by the Embassadors of Venice, either not to offend him in gainsaying his deuises, or that by that occasion their souldiers should retorne more neare their frontiers: it was blamed of all the residue of Captaines & nations in the armie, but in vaine, for that he did not consult but command, his authoritie making him tractable to nothing that was not conformable to his liking and will: it was then determined that the armie should march to Ferrara, but with this condition, that to let the French for succoring it, they should attempt to take Mirandola, if the difficulties were not greater then the aduenture: this Citie together with the towne of Concorda, inherited by the sonnes of the Count Lod. Piccina, and by Franncis their mother and tutor, was kept vnder the deuotion of the French king, following the authoritie of Ioh. 1a. Triunco naturall father to Franncis, by whose meane his Nephewes obtained the inuestiture of Cesar: the Pope had receiued them long time before into his protection as appeared by writing: but now he excused him, that by the conditions of the present times he was constrained so to deale, that those townes should not be holden by persons suspected, offering, if they would willingly put them into his hands, to redeliuer them immediatly after the conquest of Ferrara. From that time it was doubted (and the doubt increased much more afterwards) that the Cardinal of Pania, who was already suspected to entertaine secret intelligence with the French king, was artificially the author of this counsell: wherein he meant by the enterprise of Mirandola, to hinder the besieging of Ferrara, the which citie at that time was neither well fortified, nor sufficiently manned: besides, the Frenchmen were made wearie aswell in bodie as mind by their paines and trauels passed, the Duke in great weaknesse, and the king altered to make any more prouisions there.

Whilest the Pope with so great care and diligence managed the expedition of the warre, the French king who was more inclined to practises then to armes, recontinued with the Bishop of Gurei the negotiation of things which had bene begun: & they carying in the beginning a shew of great facilitie, proceeded now with greater delays, both for the slownesse of the answers of Cesar, and also for the doubt that was conceiued of the king of Aragon, Cesar and the French king iudged it necessarie to make him ascertained of their intention, aswell in regard of the continuation of the league of Cambray, as for the action that was to be done with the Pope, if he still perseuered in the amitie of the Venetians, & rested possessed of his ancient ambition & couetousnesse, to get immediatly to the Church the territories of Ferrara. The cause of this doubt against the king of Aragon was, that besides his other actions, he had newly called home to the kingdome of Naples his regiments that were within Verona, expressing this colour, that towards Otranto the nauie of the Turke was discovered comming with a mind preiudiciall to him & his realme. The king Catholike after certaine daies answered to the demands of Cesar & the French king, taking in the same time occasion to purge himselfe of many things wherein Cesar and the French king complained against him: that hee had sent the band of 300 launces to the Pope according to the obligation of the inuestiture, respecting only the defence of the state of the Church, and to recouer the things that were the ancient demaines of the same: that he had called backe his men at armes from Verona, for that the tearme was expired for the which he had promised them to Cesar, and yet he wold not haue reuoked them, had not the feare of the Turke bene greater then other occasion: that at Bologna his Embassadour interposed with others to worke the peace with M. Chaumont, not to giue time to the succors of the Pope, but to quench and put out so great a fire in Christendome, knowing withall that to entertaine warre with the Church was gneuous to the king: that he continued still in one settled purpose to accomplish all that had bene promised in the league of Cambray, and that he would do more hereafter aiding Cesar against the Venetians with fife hundred launces and two thousand footmen: that this was not his intention to bind himselfe to new bands, nor to be restrained to new capitulations; both for that he saw no vrgent occasion, and also, desiring to keepe himselfe free, the better to make warre vpon the Infidels of Africa, he would not increase the dangers and calamities of Christendome, which had need of tranquillity and rest: that he liked well of the counsell and reformation of the Church, if it were vniuersall, and that times did not repugne against it, of which disposition he asked no better a witness then the French king in the speeches they had together at Saunona; but now the state of times were much contrarie, seeing that as peace & concord betweene Christians were the foundations of Counsels, and that there could be nothing agreed vpon to the vniuersall uniuersall benefite without the vnion and consent of wis: so it could not but be vnworthy to begin the Councell at such a time & in such sort, that it might seeme to take beginning more by disdain and desire of reuenge, then for the honour of God, or zeale to the estate of the Christian common weale: he said lastly, but apart to the Embassadour of Cesar; that it seemed somewhat intolerable that he should aide him to preferue & keepe his townes, since he disposed them afterwards to the French king for money, meaning expressly Venona. Thus the intention of the king Catholike being knowne by this answer, the Bishop of Gurci on the one part, in the name of Cesar and the French king on the other part in person, delayed no longer to make a new confederation, reseruing place to the Pope to enter into it within two moneths next, and to the king Catholike and the king of Hungaria, within foure. And for a necessarie foundation of the couenants that were made, the king bound himselfe to pay to Cesar an hundred thousand duckets, part in hand, and the residue at times limited: Cesar promised to passe into Italie in the spring with three thousand horsemen and ten thousand footemen, against the Venetians: In which action the king was bound to send him at his proper charges two hundred Launces, & eight thousand footmen with sufficient prouision of artilleries; and to rigge out by sea, two light gallies, and foure bastard gallies: That they should obserue the league made at Gambray, and in both their names require obseruation of the Pope and king Catholike: Whereunto if the Pope were heard to be induced for the regard of Ferrara, that the king should be bound to hold himselfe contented with that that should be reasonable, but if the Pope would proue obstinate, & refuse to consent to their request, that then they should prosecute the Councell, & for that cause Cesar should assemble the Prelates of Germanie, as the French king had done the Clergie of Fraunce, to the end to proceede further as they should after be aduised. As soone as these capitulations were published, the Bishop of Gurci receiuing many honors and rich gratifications of the king, returned to his Prince: and the king, with whom the five Cardinals that were parties to the calling of a Councell, had presently contracted that neither he without them, nor they without his consent, should capitulate any thing with the Pope, expressed with vehement demonstration in wordes, the forward desire he had to descend into Italie in person, leading such a power as should be able for long time afterwarde to assure his affaires: And to the end that afore his marching they fell into no aduersitie or declination, he sent to Chau-mont to minister speedie succours to the Duke of Ferrara. and at the same instant he added eight hundred Launceknights to the company of two hundred Launces which he had afore sent to the Duke vnder the leading of the Lord of Chastillon.

On the other side, the Popes armie, after they had made with great delays, necessarie prouisions, and left Marke Ansh. Colonna for the gard of Modona, with an hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horsemen and two thousand five hundred footemen, went and incamped before Concorda, which they forced the same day the artillerie was planted: and taking immediatly afterwarde the castell by composition, they approched neare to Mirandola: it drew now towards the end of September, and haply the season of that yeare was much more sharpe then ordinarily it had wont to be. In which respectes, and that the towne was strong, and being also beleued that the French would not leaue a place so conuenient, the Captaines began to distrust of the victorie, not hauing regard to the felicity of the Pope which made all things fall out well to him, but iudged according to experience & pollicie, which in matters of enterprise ought principally to guide men of warre. Neuerthelesse the Pope promising to himselfe so assuredly the victorie of the whole warre, that sending Cardinall Smagale a new Legate into the armie, for the discord that was betweene the Duke of Urbino and the Cardinall of Pauia, he charged him in the presence of many, that aboue all things whē the armie should enter into Ferrara they should looke to the keeping of that Citie. The fourth day after the annie approched neare Mirandola, the artillerie began to execute, Mirandola besieged. notwithstanding with no lesse trauell then discommoditie, as well for regard of the present season, as for want of victuals which came very sparingly from Modona: the reason of this restraint of victuals grew by the impediments that the French gaue, who hauing bestowed fiftie Launces within Gualtallo, as many within Corregia, and two hundred and fiftie in Carpie, & hauing with all cast downe all the bridges and occupied all the passages by the which reliefe might come from Mantua, they kept the armie no lesse distressed with want of foode, then the hardnesse of the season hindred their other actions. But as necessitie is mightie to make men resolute, so their extremitie stirred the vp to a deuise that diminished their scarcities, for that deliuering out a false brute that the armie would come and assaile Campio, such as were within being fearefull for that they were not furnished with artillerie, did presently dislodge from the place, leaving the place abandoned, not by compulsion but by feare.

About the end of this yeare there fell upon the person of the Pope some imputation and infamy, as though it was conspired by his private, and consenting that by the means of Caracul de Medicis, there was practise with Maſſe Amb. Colonne and certaine young Gentlemen of Florance, to kill Re. Soderin Gonſalonner, by whose working it was supposed that the Florentines followed the French faction. This suspicion was aggravated by this coniecture, that the Pope notwithstanding he laboured by all his means & authoritie to winne that common weale, yet he was neuer able to bring that to passe by practise, by pollicie, nor by compulsion, which they refused for want of affection, opinion, and liking. Besides, a little before at the French kings request, and to the Popes discontentment, they were broken off from the truce with the people of Sienna, although they had refused to move armes untill six moneths after: a thing which the king desired, to hold the people in feare. And lastly, they had sent to the king two hundred men at armes for the gard of the Duchie of Aquillan, a matter demanded by the king by vertue of their confederation, not so much for the importance and necessitie of such a succour, as for desire to make them enemies with the Pope. In this estate of affaires did end the yeare a thousand five hundred and ten.

1511. But the beginning of the new yeare was made notable by a matter not expected according to the time present, nor neuer read of in any the actions or examples of ages past: The Pope was iealous that there was not vsed that diligence in the seruice of Mirandola that was either necessarie to such an enterprise, or able to satisfie his desire, wherein taking occasion of their slow proceedings, he interpreted to the ignorance and infidelitie of his Captaines; but chiefly to his Nephew, that which reasonable proceeded of many difficulties. For these respectes together with his ambition which held him altogether subiect, he determined to go thither and aduance things by his presence, preferring the importunitie and violence of his minde afore altogether regards: he considered not how dangerous and vnworthy it was for the maiestie of such a degree, that a Pope of Rome should in person leade armies against towncs of Christians, and much lesse was he carefull of the opinion and iudgement that the world would make of him, to giue an apparant colour and almost a manifest iustification to those factions as were in practise, to call a Councell and stirre vp Princes against him, making their suggestion that his gouernement was hurtfull to the Church, and his vices infamous and incorrigible. Such speeches ranne through the Court: such coniectures were made; some marvelled at his furie: some blamed his intemperance: some feared the thing they durst not viter: and euery one comparing his actions with the importance of his place and calling, accused his indiscretion, wherein the Venetian Embassadors were no lesse forward then the residue: the Cardinals besought him with great instance: his fauorites made reasons to perswade, but durst not displease him: and his whole Court objected against the vnworthinesse of the iourney, but his obstinate resolution made vayne all their labours and deuises: his singular passion was inuincible against all reason: in which disposition he parted from Bologna the second of Ianuarie, accompanied with three Cardinals, and being come to the campe, the necessitie of the place compelled him to be lodged in a little countrey cottage subiect and open to the artilleries of the enemies, for that it was no further from the wals of Mirandola then a common crosbow will shoot at twise: There he dispensed with no trauell of his body nor forbore any care or studie of minde, there he was no lesse prodigall of his authoritie, then of his presence, and riding continually through and about the campe, he had almost finished the planting of the artillerie, whereof till that day the lesser part could not be employed for the impediments which the vnseasonable time and snowes gaue to all actions of war. Besides, the pioners and labourers could not do their office, who the more they were vrged and put forward, the more they shrunke and gaue backe, the daunger of the shot that came out of the towne being greater then their vertue. And for this reason being thought necessarie to raise new rampiers in the places where the artilleries were to be planted, and to refurbish the campe with new pioners, the Pope, in that respite of time, withdrew himself to Concorda, somewhat to eschue the incommodities of the armie. At this place Chaumont addressed vnto him Albert Pio to make many offers and means of accord, which, (notwithstanding the many labours and meetings of the one and other side) grew to no resolution or effect, either for his accustomed hardnesse and obliobstinacie, or else for the infidelitie of Albert, who was more and more suspected not to negotiate with that sinceritie that appertained. The Pope remained not long at Córdoba, the same impaciencie & violence of mind causing him to returne, which first procured him to come to the campe: neither was his furie any thing abated by the hurtfull howes that continually fell from heauē whilest he was in the field, nor his rigour the more restrained by the sharpe cold, whose bitternesse the souldiers could not endure but with great paine: he was lodged in a little Church neare to his artilleries, but somewhat nearer the wals then was his former lodging: and being discontented with all things that either were already done, or stood to be done, he complained with bitter wordes against all his Captaines, except onely Mark Anth. Colonne who he had newly sent for from Modona: he trauelled with great impaciencie about the armie, enforcing him to perswade a diligence in the men in whose slownesse he tooke grieffe, he accomplished both in words & action the office of a Captaine, promising the souldiers for the reward of their valours the spoile of Mirandola, which he sayd he would not take to composition, but leaue it to their libertie to rā sack or ransome to their owne profit. In this action he forbore nothing which he thought might aduaunce his desire, not sparing to make that lawfull to the souldiers by his graunt and proper administration, which of itself was iniurious, impious, & of example hatefull. This proueth that there is nothing more unworthy then to adde to a naturall crueltie, a great authoritie, and that which we call choller in priuate men, deserueth the name of furie in him that exerciseth publike charge. Truly it was a thing notable, and to the eyes of men straunge and new, that a French king, a Prince secular, in an age and disposition flourishing, trayned from his first yeares in warres, should take his rest in his Court and Chamber at home, and administer by Captaines a warre that was made against his abroad: and on the other side to see a soueraigne Bishop, a supreme Pastour, a Vicar of Christ in earth bearing a body diseased, aged and delected, and nourished in a calling contrary to armes and war, to go in person to a warre stirred vp by himself against Christian Princes, and to lye in campe afore a place of little name, where submitting himselfe as a leader of souldiers to paines and daungers, he retained no other thing of the Pope then the habite & the name. By his extreame diligēce and labour, by his complaints and threats, and by his offers and promises all things were more aduaunced then otherwise they would haue bene: and yet, for the resistance of many difficulties, they had but slow proceeding, both for the small numbers of pyoners, and also for that the campe bare no great proportion of artilleries, and withall the wetnesse of the season was an impediment to the powder to do his office. They that were within, made a valiant defence, hauing for their gouernour Alexander Triunlce with foure hundred footemen forreiners: and they supported all daungers with so much the more valour and resolution, by how much they had hope in the succours promised by M. Chaumont, who, being commaunded from his king not to suffer the Pope to take that towne, had sent for all the bands of Spanish footmen that were at Verona, and making continuall leaues of men from all parts, wherein was concurrant with him the Duke of Ferrara, he promised to set vpō the enemies in their campe before the twentieth day of Ianuary. But these difficulties made that promise both hard and daungerous, the little time he had to make so great provisions, the leasure giuen to the enemies to fortifie their campe, the much ado to conuey the artilleries, munitions, and victuals in a season so hurtfull, by wayes so troublesome, and through so great snowes as had not bene seene of long time: lastly, by him were augmented the difficulties, in who was expectation to diminish them by recompēcing the time lost with a new diligence: for, Chaumont vpō the suddē made a posting journey to Milla, promising that the cause of his going thither was to make prouision of money & other things necessarie for the warre: but it was beleueed that some amorous passion towards a Lady of Milla caried him more then any other regard. This halty journey (notwithstanding his returne was speedy) abated greatly the courages of the souldiers, & no lesse diminished the hopes of such as defended Mirandola: amongst whom as their opiniōs were diuerse touching the delayes he vsed, so some were bold to vse this libertie of iudgemēt, that no lesse did hurt the negligence of Chaumont then the hate he bare to John Iacques Triunlce, in which regard, inclining more to his proper passion, then to the profit of his king, they supposed it was not disagreeable to him that the Nephewes of Triunlce should be deprived of Mirandola.

And on the other side the Pope dispenced with nothing that might be made a furtherer of his victorie, wherein his furie was so much the more renewed, by how much the Cannon from within the towne slue two of his men in his kitchen: for which daunger forsaking that lodging, and effsoones returning thither againe being crierd with his intemperances, he was likewise constrained by new perils to take the lodging of the Cardinall of Regina, against the which, they within the towne (haply suspecting that he was there arrived) braked a great peece not without the danger of his life. At the last, the defendants standing desperate to be succoured on all sides, and seeing what great execution the artillerie of the enemy had made, and fearing withall that by the hard frozen ditch being able to beare the souldiers, they should not be able to resist the assault that was to be giuen within two dayes, sent, the selfe same day that Chauumont had promised to succour them, Embassadours to the Pope, to yeeld themselues, their goods and liues saued. To whom albeit the Pope made answer in the beginning that he would not be bound to saue the liues of the souldiers, yet in the end he suffered himselfe to be wonne by the petitions of his Court, and accepted the towne vnder such conditions as were offered, sauing that Alexander Trunice with certaine other Captaines of footemen, should remaine his prisoners, and the towne to pay a certaine rate of money, to redeeme the spoyle which he had promised to the souldiers: and yet the souldiers seeming to vrge that as due which was promised, and which by their valour they had won, the Pope had much to do to satisfie the souldiers and keepe the towne from sacking. By the example of the towne, the castell also yelded, with this permission to suffer the Countesse to depart with all her goods, one fortune at one instant subiecting both the towne and the castell, as the glorie of one man reuerfed with one kinde of calamitie a whole estate and familie of great antiquitie. The Pope restored Mirandola to Count Iohn Francisquo, and indued him with all the rights of the sonnes of Count Lodowike, as gotten by him in iust warres: he receiued of him bond, and for performance the person of his sonne, to pay within a certaine time for all defrayments, twentie thousand duckets: and, not to lose that by negligence, which had bin won with so great paine and perill, but chiefly to keepe the French from reconquering it after the armie was retired, he left within it a strength of five hundred footemen Spaniards, and three hundred Italians: from Mirandola he went to Sermidie, a borough vpon the limites of Mantua standing neare the riuer of Pan, and being by the victorie of Mirandola puffed vp into assured hopes to haue Ferrara, he gaue resolute answer to Albert Pio, that he would heare no more of any offers or speeches of peace, if, for the first condition, he were not made possessed of Ferrara.

A new deliberation of the French according to the kings direction.

But those thoughts were chaunged by a new deliberation of the French: for, the king considering how much the losse of Mirandola had diminished his reputation, and now fully displaying that the minde of the Pope would be raunged to counsels payfible, addressed present direction to Monsieur Chauumont not onely to looke well to the defending of Ferrara, but also not to forbear vpon conuenient occasion, to offend the state of the Church. According to which commission, he made present leauies of men from all partes, and so really entred into the action, that the Pope by the counsell of his Captaines, retired to Bologna, and abiding there but very few dayes, either for feare, or to aduance (as he sayd) more speedily the battring of the bastillion of Geniuola, against the which he determined to send certaine bands of souldiers which he had in Romania, he came to Lugo, and from thence lastly to Rauenna, thinking perhaps that so small an expedition was not worthy his presence. The Venetia armie, who, for the nearenesse of the enemies, could not well be employed in the siege of Ferrara, were stayed at Bondin, as the Spanish & Ecclesiastikes remained distributed betweene Cento and Fmalo: They, notwithstanding the terme of three moneths was past, surceassed at the request of the Pope.

On the other side, Monsieur Chauumont, hauing assembled his armie which was aboute his enemies in footemen, and farre aboute them as touching the valour of the horsemen, but inferiour in numbers & multitudes, tookē counsel with his Captaines what were best to be done. The French Captaines perswaded that the companies of the Duke of Ferrara being ioyned to the armie, it were best to march directly to seeke the enemies, who notwithstanding were lodged in places strong and sure, yet there was hope that with the vertue of armes and importunitie of the artilleries, they would be driuen to dislodge & retire: a matter that would not onely make Ferrara deliuered and acquired of daunger, but also in this expedition would be won againe the reputation that had bin lost till that day. They alleaged also for the same opinion, that the army passing by the marches of Mantua, they should take from the Marquis all the excuses and impediments for the which he professed to be retained to take armes as Feodater of Caesar, and souldier to the king, and that it was a thing profitable for the suretie of Ferrara, that he should come in and declare lastly, lastly, that he being declared, the enimie would find many discommodities in this warre, both for restraint of victuals, and annoyances of bridges and passages of riuers which thereby should be taken away from the Venetian armies, and also the Marquise should reuoke immediatly the souldiers which he had in the campe of the Church. But Trinulco being returned out of France about the same time that Mirandola was lost, gaue counsell to the contrarie: he declared what danger it were to go seeke the enemies and set vpon them in their campe, and how hurtfull it would be to be referred and gouerned by necessitie, to proceed day by day according to the proceedings and doings of the enimie: that it was far more profitable and better assured, to turne the armie to Modona or to Bologna, for that, if the enemies remoued for feare to lose the one of those two townes, then were wonne the way that was sought to deliuer Ferrara from the war: and if they did not stirre, there was yet this benefite in the counsell, that the one or the other of those two townes would be easily caried: in which case as a great necessitie would draw them out to defend their owne, so in leauing their place of strength, the armie should be subiect to many occasions to obtaine an honorable victorie. This was the perswasion of Trinulco, and these were the reasons he occupied, such, as for their grauitie expressed his great wisdome, but for secret enuie and partiality, were neither embraced nor followed: for, the other opinion was allowed. Chaumont and the other French Captaines bearing an inclination to diminish his authoritie; Alfonso d'Este being also concurrant for hope that the enemies would be constrained to dissolue, or at least retire from his estate, which being so afflicted and consumed, he said was vnable any longer to susteine so heauie burthens: he feared, that if the Frenchmen went away, the enemies would make entrie vpon Polisena de Ferrara, a thing which would so much haue increased the calamities of that citie deprived of all hope and spirit, that there remained no more comfort nor remedie: so the French armie marched by the way of Lusero and Gonsagno, to encampe at Rassonla and at Moia, where they remained three dayes for the ill weather that fell, reiecting the counsell of such as perswaded to go assaile Mirandola, both for the incommodity to incampe in the fields, and also that at the Popes going away, the suburbs were burnt and all the houses about: they supposed it in like sort neither conuenient nor honorable to charge vpon Concorda five miles from them, holding it but lost time to entertaine action in a matter of so small importance: the armie therefore came to Quistello, and making passage ouer the riuer of Secchia vpon a bridge of boates, they lodged the day after at Rouera vpon the riuer of Paw: the same being the cause that Andre Gritti, who hauing afore, recouered Polisena Rouigno, and left one part of the Venetian souldiers at Montagnana vnder Bernardin Montono, to make resistance against the garrisons that kept Verona, was withdrawne to Montagnana with three hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsmen, & a thousand footmen: these were already drawne neare the riuer of Paw to ioine with the armie of the Church, hauing afore sacked the towne of Guaftallo: from Rouera the Frenchmen went to Sermidy, and dispersed themselues in good order in the vilages thereabouts: from thence M. Chaumont accompanied with certaine Captaines (but not with Trinulco) went to the towne of Stellata, being there expected by Alfonso d'Este, to take counsell in what maner they were to proceed against their enemies, who were now lodged altogether at Finalo: it was there agreed that the bands of Alfonso should be ioined with the French army about Bondin, and so to march altogether and encampe in certaine vilages three miles from Finalo, to proceed afterwards according to the nature of places, and occasions offered by the enemies: but as Chaumont was returned to Sermidy, it was told him how hard it was to go to that place, both for the impediment of waters, whereof the country was full about Finalo, and also that by necessity, he was to take the high way along the risings of the canall, which the enemy had cut off in many places, and bestowed gard to hinder passage: a matter also which seemed so much the more hard and troublesome, by how much the ill weather and season was ioined to the other impediments: the consideration of these perils bringing Chaumont into no small doubt, Alfonso that had about him certaine discouersers and men knowing the country, and by the well informed of the situation and disposition of places, laboured to perswade the contrarie, assuring him that with the force of artillerie, such as manned the passages that were cut off, would be compelled to them abandoned, by which meane it would be verie easie to cast bridges for passage in any place where it should be necessarie. These reasons being brought by Chaumont into counsel & debated, the opinion of Alfonso was approued, to whom Trinulco was rather not contrary the consenting, his silence leauing to the companie a more occasion of murmure, then if he had directly impugned the deuise: for, what with the greatnesse of the difficulties, which still augmented, and authoritie of that capitaine carying long experience, and had alwayes reproued that expedition, it was thought that the harmes and inconueniences hapning, the king would lay the blame vpon the authors of that opinion: in which respect M. Chaumont assembling another day the Councell for the same matter, desired Triulce, that not with silence as he did before, but frankly and simply as appertained to him, he would expresse his opinion, which he deliuered in this sort, hauing no lesse regard to the grauitie and importāce of such a Councell, then to the great desire and expectation of the assistants so well disposed to heare him.

I vsed silence yesterday, not bearing a mind preiudiciall to the present businesse, and much lesse to arrogate to my selfe any singularity of counsell; and yet if my opinion had found imitation in the beginning, we had not now stood possessed with doubts, nor this gallant armie had spent so many dayes in vaine, which might haue bene employed with more profit: and I could yet continue in silence, if, suppressing all other respects, I were not spurred on with the importance of the matter, being now vpon termes to set vpon one incertaine cast of a die, both this flourishing armie, the state of Ferrara, and the Duchie of Millan, matters too great to be put all to aduventure without retaining some part from chaunce and fortune. Besides, one reason that moues me to speake, is an opinion I haue that M. Chaumont desireth that I may be he that in this action shall giue the first counsell: a matter which as he beginneth now to find good by reason, so it is no new thing to me, for that heretofore I haue proued by experience that my counsels haue bin lesse reiected when was question to retract any thing not sufficiently deliberated, then when the first deliberations were debated: & as true counsell consisteth not only in telling what must be done, but also what will be the end & successe of things; so, for my part, I make bold thus far to enable my selfe, that the man of obseruation by the experiences he hath made, giues oftentimes better counsell then the man of learning by all the rules he hath read: we debate to go seeke the enemy to fight with him, & I haue alwayes seene great capitaines hold this as a firme principle, not to attempt the fortune of a battel, vnlesse there be offer of speciall aduantage, or compulsion by great necessity: the lawes & rules of warre giue it to the enemies that be the invaders, & haue taken the field to conquer Ferrara, to seeke to assaile & charge vs: but to vs to whom it is sufficient to defend our selues, it cannot but be impertinent to obtrude into the action, contrarie to all directions & disciplines of warre. Such as resist iniuries and fight for their owne safeties, are of more merit & valour then they that enter into armes to oppresse others: but let vs examine the aduantages and necessities that may draw vs: I am of opinion, which hope is confirmed by euident reason, that there is no possibility to execute the deuise of the Duke of Ferrara, but to our great harmes and disadvantage, since we cannot go to their campe, but by a hill side, a straight & narrow way, where all our forces cannot be employed, and yet they with small numbers may make resistance, hauing the oportunity of the place fauourable to their vertues: we must march by the rising of the hill, one horse after another, neither haue we anie other way to draw our artilleries, our baggage, our carts, and bridges, but by the strait of the hill: and who doubteth that in a way so narrow and comberous, euerie artillerie, euerie cart, or euerie wheele that shall breake, will not stay a whole armie for an houre at the least, by which impediments euerie contrarie accident may easily put vs into disorder. The enemies are lodged in cosfert, provided of victuals and forrages: and we must encampe all bare and naked, not carrying with vs that should serue for our necessities, but must expect the things to come after, which in reason ought to go with vs. It belongeth not to vs to be credulous in brutes, and much lesse to be caried with the reports and opinions of the countrey men that know the countrey, since warres are managed with the weapons of souldiers, & with the counsels of Capitaines; they are determined by the execution of the sword, and not by such plots as are presented in paper by people ignorant in warre, bearing no other knowledge then according to the instruction of their rude nature. To attempt new enterprises whereof the victorie is lesse certaine then the perill, is contrarie to the grauitie and reputation of a leader: and in actions of warre, those enterprises are put to aduventure, that are done by will and not by reason. For my part I neither suppose our enemies too weake, nor their campe in such disorder: and much lesse that in their incamping they haue bene so negligent to take the oportunity of the waters and other situations, that it can be in our power to assaile them, though though our fortune bring vs in safety to the place where we seeme so desirous to expresse our valours. Many difficulties may cōpel vs to make our abode there two or three dayes;lea the snowes and raines ioynd to the crabbedness of the season may suffice to detaine vs: how shall we then do for victuals and forrages? what shall we be able to do in the warre, wanting the things that should giue vs strength and sustenance? In warre no lesse needful is food & forrage, then the weapon to strike: & be it, we should haue them in our power to assaile them, what is he that can promise anie surety of the victorie, which seldom followeth the multitude of the souldiers that fight, but hath regard to the innocēcie of the cause that is followed? what is he that cōsidereth not how dangerous it is to go seeke the enemy in a strong campe, and to be driuen at one time to fight against them, and against the incommodities of the situation of the place? If we compell them not to abandon their campe, we cannot but be enforced to retire: a matter of verie hard action in a countrey so wholly against vs, and where euerie little disfauour will turne to our great disadvantage. I see no necessitie to put the kings whole estate in a danger so present, since (as I take it) we are entred into armes for no other occasion then to succour the citie of Ferrara, which if we do eftsoones refurbish with new garrisons, we may hold our selues in suretie, though we should dissolue our whole armie: and be it that that Citie is so much consumed, that it is impossible that in short time it wil not fall of it self, the enemies remaining at the backe of it, yet we haue meanes to diuert them, which in warre is a most mightie remedie, and with the which we may inforce them to draw backe from Ferrara without putting one horse in danger. I haue alwayes perswaded, and stand still firme in this counsell, that we turne either to Modona or to Bologna, taking the high way, and leauing Ferrara well furnished onely for those few dayes it shall be necessarie. This is no flying from the enemy, and yet in warre it is no shame to flie, when the flying profiteth in giuing place to the aduersarie. I hold it best according to the time, that we go to Modona, whither also we are called by the Cardinall of Este, a personage of name and merite not vnknowne, and by whom we are assured of intelligences able to put it into our hands: & conquering a place of that importance, there resteth no other safetie to the enemies then to retire towards Bologna, like as also if our fortune make vs faile of our expectation of Modona, yet the feare that the enemies will haue as well of it as of the estate of Bologna, will drue them to abandon: a thing which no doubt they had done many dayes since, if this counsell had bene executed from the beginning.

Now did the whole assistance, by the reasons of this graue Captaine, discern the difficulties that were present, which he had found and scene when they were farre off: in which regard his opinion was allowed of euerie one. And Chaumont leauing to the Duke of Ferrara for his better suretie a greater strength of men, he drew towards Carpi by the same way, hauing not yet obtained that the Marquise of Mantua should come in, which was one of the principallest reasons that had bene alleaged by thole that gaue counsell against the opinion of Trinulco: for the Marquise desiring to stand indifferent, & as a person neuter during the troubles, when the time drew on wherein he had giuen hope to declare himselfe, he solicited with many excuses to be yet deferred for certaine dayes, debating with the Pope the danger of the French armie that threatned him, & beseeching M. Chaumont not to take from him the hope he had that the Pope would restore to him his sonnes within a very short time. But the deuise to take Modona tooke no good successe, the futtle and secret counsels of the king of Aragon giuing greater impediments then the armies of the Pope.

Cesar shewed himselfe ill contented that the Pope vsurped Modona, a citie esteemed in all times of the iurisdiction of the Empire, & holden by long continuance by the family of Este with priuiledges and inuestitures from the Emperours: and albeit he had made request with many complaints to haue it deliuered to him, yet the Pope, nourishing another opinion touching the rights of that citie, had alwayes refused it, but principally so long as he hoped to be able to take Ferrara. But as soone as the French armies began to discouer more manifestly in fauour of them of Este: and that he had no abilitie to defend Modona without making great expences & defrayments: he began to taste the counsell of the king of Aragon, who encouraged him to redeliuer it, both to auoid so many present troubles, and to appease the mind of Cesar, and also by that action to kindele some alteration betweene him and the French king: he induced him besides with this comfort, that if he desired to haue it againe in another time more conuenient, it would be a matter of no great difficulty, contenting Cesar with a reasonable summe of money. This debating was prolonged for many dayes, for that, according to the diuersitie of hopes, the deliberation of the Pope chaunged; onely they stucke alwayes vpon this one difficultie, that Cesar refused to receiue it, vnlesse in the instrument of assignation it were clearly expressed, that that Citie appertained to the Empire: a matter whereunto albeit the Pope would not consent at the first, yet seeing after the taking of Mirandola that M. Chaumont was the strongest in the field, and that the wonted expences and difficulties for the defence of Modona returned vpon him againe, he left the disputation of words, & consented to haue it set downe in writing, that Modona should be restored to Cesar, of whose iurisdiction it was. And as Vitfruch the Embassador of Cesar resident with the Pope had receiued the possession of it, and that he might remaine there in surety by the authoritie of Cesar, he dismissed Mark Anth. Colonne with the other bands with whom he had it afore in the name of the Church, aduertising Monsieur Chaumont that Modona was no more the Popes, but was iustly reuerted to the iurisdiction of Cesar. This was not beleueed of Chaumont, who still continued to worke the Cardinal of Este to put in execution the conspiracie and intelligence which he entertained with that Citie: in so much that according to direction, the French bands which Chaumont had left in garrison within Rubiero, were made out one night, but notwithstanding they marched with as little brute as they could within a mile of Modona, they returned the same night to Rubiero, either for that the order of their faction within was not correspondent, or else the Frenchmen had presented their time and were come too soone: neuertheless they gaue no place to this ill successe, but made another sallie out of Rubiero to come to Modona, falling notwithstanding into the same impediments they did before, aggravated now by the depth & rage of the waters to passe the river of Beckhie which runneth before Rubiero. At last Vitfruch became suspicious, and committing to imprisonment certaine of the city, vpon who he imposed an intelligence with the Cardinal of Este, he obtained of the Pope that Mark Anth. Colonne should estoons returne thither with the garrison that was there before: a matter which had not stayed M. Chaumont (being now come to Carpy) to march and encampe before it, if the quality & season of the time had not taken from him the drawing of his artillerie along the way betweene Ruolo & Carpy, a way not more then ten miles from thence, but euen the worst of all the wayes in Lombardy, notwithstanding their overflowing with waters and marish natures. Besides all this, Chaumont was euery day more & more aduertised, that Modona was redelivered to Cesar simply & absolutely, which made him make this covenant with Vitfruch, not to offend Modona nor his territories, receiuing reciprocally his promise, that in the actions betweene the Pope & his king, he should not fauor the one nor the other partie. But such is the destiny and end of all flesh, that all men borne in humane nature, must within time appointed resigne to the earth the life they had of the earth: it hapned not manie dayes after that Chaumont fell into a grieuous maladie, & being caried to Correge, ended his life within 15 dayes, expressing deuoutly somewhat afore his death, how greatly he was repented and remorded of the vexations he had done to the Church, & besought the Pope by a publike instrument to giue him pardon & absolution, which being granted while he yet liued, could not come to his knowledge by reason of the sodainnesse of his death. He was a captain that in his life bare great authority in Italy, both by the singular credit of the Cardinal Amboise, & also for that he managed almost absolutely the duchy of Moden & all the armies of the king: but touching his ability or valour, it was far interior to so great a burthen, the greatnes of his place carying him into such singularity of mind & weening, that not knowing of himselfe the arte and order of warre, he would not giue faith to such as were able to instruct him: by which it hapned that after the death of his vncke, his insufficiencie being no more supported by countenance and fauour, he fell in his latter dayes almost into the disdaigne of the souldiers, notwithstanding he suffered in them wonderfull insolencies and licentious behaviours to stop them from ill reporting him to the king: in so much as Triunice, a Capitaine trained in ancient discipline, would oftentimes protest by oath, that he would neuer go more into the French armies, vnlesse the king marched in person, or at least himselfe commaunded as chiefe. Neuertheless the king was determined afore to send for his successor, Monsieur Longueville, descended of the blood royall, but a bastard borne, and not so much esteemed for his vertue, as for his descending and riches. By the death of Chaumont, John la. Triunice remained gouernor of the army by the prerogative that he was one of the 4 Marshalls of Fraunce, to whom, the Generall being dead, the rule of the armie appertaineth by the statutes of Fraunce vntill the king do otherwise dispose of it. And albeit, not knowing how long he should be continued in that gouernement, he durst not attempt any matter of consequence: yet he returned with the armie to Sarmidi to go to the succors of Genuola, afore the which the Pope had not onely sent his bands that were in Romagnia, but also had procured the Venetian fleet, to approach at the same instant, which came thither with thirteen light gallies, and many other vessels of meaner burthen: but he had no necessitie to passe further, for whilest the land-men incamped about it with very litle obedience and order, there was discovered vpon a sudden the Duke of Ferrara and the Lord of Chastillon with the French souldiers that were ledde out of Ferrara in greater numbers then were the enemies: and marching along the brinke of the riuer of Pan, and being come vp as farre as the riuer of Santerno, they cast the bridge which they had brought with them, and in one moment charged and confused the enemies, who, by reason of their disorder being not able to make resistance, fell into one generall and voluntarie flying, sauing three hundred Spanish footemen which garded the artillerie. In which confusion they lost their ensignes and artilleries, many chieftaines of the horsemen finding more safetie in the fortune and swiftnesse of their horses, then in their proper valours. By reason of this aduersitie the Venetian fleet, to auoide the danger that threatned, hoysed saile into the winde, and so retired into the ryuer of Pan.

The affayres of the warres had these diuerse proceedings, not expressing any assured token to iudge what would be the issue of it: The thoughts also of Princes were no lesse diuerse, and no lesse incertaine specially the cogitation of Cesar, who contrarie to all expectation, determined to send the Bishop of Gurci to Mantua to negotiate a peace.

It is set downe before that by the working of the Bishop of Gurci, it was resolved between Cesar and the French king, to make strong warre vpon the Venetians in the spring time, and withall, to call a Councell, if the Pope consented not to the obseruation of the league of Cambray. To this Cesar bearing a very vehement inclination, had since the returning of the Bishop of Gurci, sent to all his prelates of his estates patrimoniall to debate in what maner and in what place the Councell should be celebrated. But as he was of naturall condicion variable and inconstant, and an enuier of the greatnesse and name of the French, so making no lesse vaine his proper promises then the expectation that others had of him, he declined afterwards to inconstancie, and listned to the perswasions of the king of Aragon, who considering that what by the vnite of Cesar with the French king, and the embasing of the Venetians by their common armies, and withall the ruine of the Pope by meane of the Councell, the French might rise into a greatnes too ielouse and suspected, laboured to perswade him that an vniuersall peace would fall out better for his purposes, so farreforth as by it he obtained either the whole or the greatest part of those peeces which the Venetians vsurped vpon him: he aduised him to send to this effect, some notable personage to Mantua with full power, and labouring to induce the French king to do the like, he promised that he would also send thither, by which examples he alleaged that the Pope could not refuse to ioyne in the action, and lastly that he would not go against the will of so many great Princes: he told him that vpon the resolution of the Pope, depended all the deliberations of the Venetians, in whom was a necessitie, to followe his authoritie, as not being able to stand alone: for which reasons it was to be hoped, that Cesar without difficultie, without armes, & without increasing the reputation & might of the French king, should to his perpetuall praise, reobtaine his estate, together with an vniuersall peace. And be it that it brought not forth that successe which reasonably may be expected, yet he should not be deprived of meanes to moue the warre at the time appointed, & with the same comodities & hopes: But being chiefe of all Christian Princes, & protector of the Church, his iustificacions would be the more augmented, as also by such a Councell would come the exaltation of his glory, for that it would appeare to euery one, that as he principally had sought and desired the peace & vnite of Christians, so by the obstinacie & wicked counsels of others he was constrained to make warre. These reasons no lesse by the grauitie of matter they expressed, then by the authoritie of the personage from whom they came, were right acceptable to Cesar, who at the same instant addressed letters to the Pope & to the French king: to the Pope, that he had determined to send the bishop of Gurci into Italie, for that (as appertained to a Prince religious, being protector of the Church, and chiefe aboute Princes Christian) he was resolved in all that he might, to procure the tranquillitie of the sea Apostolike, and the vniuersall peace of Christendome: summoning him, bearing the office of the high vicar of Christ, to ioyne and proceede with him in the same intention, and to do that which belonged to the place & name of Pope, to the end he were not constrained to haue recourse to other remedies, to establish the peace of Christendome. That he did not allow the practise that was made to depriue the Cardinals that were absent, of their holy dignitie, for that being absent not to any euill ende, nor for hatred they bare to him, neither could they deserue so great a paine, neither was the authoritie of the Pope onely able to impose it vpon them: He told him besides, that it was a matter very vnworthy and vnprofitable, in so great troubles to make creation of new Cardinals, since he was specially forbidden by the capitulations which the Cardinals made with him when he was elected Pope: He desired him to reserue that office till times of better tranquillitie, when he should either haue no necessitie or no cause, to preferre to so great dignities none but persons well allowed of for their discretion, their doctrine, and good life. To the French king he wrote, that according to his vertuous disposition alwayes inclined to embrace a good and assured peace, he was resolved to send to Alantua the Bishop of Gurci to sollicite a peace vniuersall, wherunto he beleueed (with reasons and foundations nor light nor vaine) that the Pope (whose authoritie the Venetians were constrained to follow) would readily incline, the Embassadors of the king of Aragon concurring in the action, and promising the like on the behalfe of their king: Therefore he desired him to send thither likewise his Embassadors with full power, and in the generall assembly, the Bishop of Gurci should beseech the Pope to do the like, wherunto if he made refusal, the Bishop should denounce the Councell in the names of them all, hauing also giuen order that to make their proceedings more iustificable, and to put ende to all controuersies, the Bishop of Gurci should indifferently vnderstand the reasons of euery one: onely in all accidents, that he should hold this for certaine, neuer to make any agreement with the Venetians, if at the same time were not resolved the controuersies which he had with the Pope. This solicitation pleased well the Pope, not for any desire he had to peace and concord, but for that he perswaded him selfe to be able to dispose the Senate of Venice to compound with Cesar, and so deliuering him from necessitie to remaine vnited with the French king: he supposed to separate him from him, and the same easily to be made a cause of confederation of many Princes against him. But the French king stood not a little discontented with these resolutions both new and vnexpected, for that nothing hoping that an vniuersall peace would proceede of them, he iudged that the least euill that might happen, would be a protracting and delaying of the execution of those things which he had agreed with Cesar, he feared also that the Pope, promising to help Cesar to reconquer the Duchie of Millin, & to indue the Bishop of Gurci with the dignitie of Cardinall and other graces ecclesiastike, would separate him from him: or at least being the worker of the composition with the Venetians to the aduantage of Cesar, he might be put into necessitie to accept the peace with conditions dishonest: wherein one thing also that encreased his suspicion, was, that Cesar was newly confedered with the Swissers, notwithstanding for defence onely. Besides, he occupied in himselfe this perswasion, that the king Catholike had bene the author of this new counsell, of whose intention he doubted much for many reasons: for he was not ignorant that his Embassador resident with Cesar, made open trauell and solicitation to establish an accord betweene Cesar and the Venetians: he beleueed that he gaue secrete encouragement to the Pope, in whose armie his companies and bands of souldiers had remained a longer time then he was bound vnto by the capitulations made touching the inuestiture of the kingdome of Naples: he was not ignorant that to giue impediment to his actions, he objected himselfe manifestly against the conuocation of the Councell, and vnder colour of modestie he blamed apparantly that with armed hand & in a time when Italie burned with an vniuersal fire of warre, there should be such negociation of a matter, which without the concord and consent of all Princes, could not bring forth but fruites full of venime and infection. Lastly, he was well aduertised that he prepared a strong armie by sea, with the which, albeit he published a bruite, that he would passe in person into Affrike, yet it could not be decided, whether he leauied that force for other ends: wherein he was so much the more suspicious, by how much his words were alwaies full of sweetnesse and affabilitie: for he alwaies besought the king (as it were with a brotherly affection) to make peace with the Pope,

forfaking (if otherwife it could not be wrought) ſome piece of his owne rights, both, not to ſhew himſelfe a perfecutor of the Church, contrarie to the auuncient pietie and deuotion of the houſe of Fraunce: and alſo not to turne him from the warre which he had determined to make vpon the Turkes in Affrike for the exaltation of the name of Chriſt. He added laſtly, that albeit it had bene a perpetuall cuſtome amongſt Chriſtian Princes, when they prepared armies againſt infidels to demaund ſuccors of others in a cauſe ſo holy and honorable, yet for his part it ſufficed him not to be hindred, and was content to require no other aide, but that Italie might remaine in peace: which words, notwithstanding they were caried to the French king by his Embaſſador, and pronounced by his owne mouth to the French Embaſſador reſident with him, & that with great demonſtration of amitie: yet it ſeemed that they contained a ſecrete proteſtation to take armes in fauor of the Pope: a matter which ſeemed not likely to the king that he durſt do without hope to be able to induce Ceſar to the ſame. Theſe things troubled much the kings minde, and filled him full of many ſuſpitions, fearing that to worke the peace by the meane of the Biſhop of Gurci, would be a thing no leſſe vaine then preiudiciall vnto him: and yet, not to ſtirre vp Ceſar, he determined to ſend to Mantua the Biſhop of Paris, a Prelate of great authoritie and deepe knowledge in the ſcience of the Lawes. Theſe were the doubts of the one king & the deſeits of the other, the one full of deuifes, and the other not void of diſtruſt: they both open in words, & yet kept both their intentions diſſembled: a matter of familiar cuſtome with Princes to entertaine one another with vaine hopes and artificiall feares.

All this while Iohn Iacques Trinuſce remained with the armie at Sermidi diſperſed into many places thereabouts for the better commoditie of lodging and victuals. And in this time he receiued ſignification from the king, that it was his will that the warre ſhould be adminiſtered by him, with this limitation, that expecting the comming of the Biſhop of Gurci, he ſhould abſtaine from all violent action vpon the ſtate Eccleſiaſtike, the hardneſſe of the ſeaſon being alſo againſt it, by reaſon whereof it was impoſſible to incampe in the field, notwithstanding March was now begun. Therefore Trinuſce, both for that he had no occaſion to attempt any other enterpriſe; & for that he was in places ſo verie neare, determined to deuife how he might offend the armie of the enemies, who being diſperſed abroad when Al. Chaumont returned from Sermidi to Curpy, moſt part of their footemen were lodged at Bondin, & the horſemen in the townes neare about Finale. But aſſoone as he had receiued his commiſſion from the king, he marched the day after to Stellata, and the day following ſomewhat further, where he beſtowed the armie abroad in the villages thereabouts, and raiſed a bridge of boates vpon the riuer of Paw betweene Stellata and Ficquerolla, hauing giuen direction to the Duke of Ferrara, to make another a mile lower, at the place which is called the point, being that breach or branch of Paw which goeth to Ferrara, and that alſo he ſhould march with the artillerie to the hoſpitall, a place right ouer againſt Bondin. In this meane while Trinuſce was aduertised by his eſpials, that many troupes of light horſemen of that part of the Venetian armie which lay on the other ſide Paw, were the next night to approach Mirandola to dreſſe ſome ambuſh: againſt whome he ſent out ſecretly certaine horſemen, who being come vp to Belar, a plaine houſe in the countrey of Mirandola, found within it Leonard Napolitain captaine of the Venetian light horſemen, and a man of great place and reputation in the armie: he nothing doubting that his enemies would deſcend ſo farre as to that place, was withdrawne thither onely with fiftie horſe, and there expecting a greater ſtrength that was to follow, he with many, of his were ſlaine, their valour not being able to reſiſt the malice of their fortune, Alfonſo d' Eſte came to the Hoſpitall according to his direction, beginning the night following to employ his artillerie againſt Bondin: and at the ſame time, not omitting the oportunitie of their felicitie, Trinuſce ſent Guaſton lord of Foix the kings ſiſters ſonne, a man very young and newly come to the armie the yeare before, to runne vp euen to the barres of the enemies campe, with an hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horſemen, and ſiue hundred footmen, with whome he put to flight ſiue hundred footmen appointed to gard that front or part of the campe. By this example, bringing diſtruſt of greater perill, all the reſidue leauing Bondin vnder good gard, retired into places of ſtrength on the other ſide the Canall. The counſels of warre & enterpriſe carrie with them for the moſt part a ſuccesse variable & differing from expectation, for that no more in thoſe actions, then in any other mortall cauſes, the deuifes of man can not be ſeparate from their imperfections: not one of the plots of Trinuſce succeeded as was looked for, for that the artillerie planted against Bondin made little exploit, both for the distance of the place (Paw being betwene them) and also the riuier being swelled, and the rising part cut off by them of Bondin, it drowned the countrey, that there was no possibilitie of passage from the front of the French campe to Bondin but vpon Barkes. In to much as the Captaine despairing estoones to vse the commoditie of that way to distresse the lodging of the enemies, called from Verona two thousand Launceknights, giuing also direction to leaue threethousand Grisons, the better to draw neare them by the waies of Saint Felix, in case the peace proceeded not by the working of the Bishop of Gurci, whose comming had bene made somewhat the more slowe and delitorie, for that at Sale vpon the lake of Garde he had in vaine expected aunswere from the Pope, whome he had prayed by letters to send Embassadors to negotiate. At last he came to Mantua accompanied with Dom Peter de Free ordinarily resident with Cesar for the king of Aragon: not many daies after arriued there the Bishop of Paris, the French king (who to be more neare the solicitations of peace, and the better to furnish his prouisions for the warre, was now come to Lyon) perswading him selfe that the Pope would also send thither and ioyne frankly in the action. But such was his obstinacie against the deuout willes of all these great Princes, that he made great instance to haue the Bishop of Gurci to come to him: not so much that he thought it answered the expectation of his dignitie Pontificall, as for that he hoped, that in loading him with honors, ceremonies, and promises, ioyned to the efficacie and authoritie of his presence, he might raunge him, and make him conformable to his will, being now more estranged then euer from peace and agreement; wherein to make the labour more easie, and the successe agreable to his desire, he solicited Hierome Vich which was of Valence and Embassadour resident for the king Catholike, to go on his behalfe to the Bishop of Gurci. The Bishop of Gurci refused not to condescend to the Popes will, but he objected, that it were good he would first take order for that that was to be done afterwards, assuring that the difficulties would be more easily dissolued and decided, if the negotiation were first managed at Mantua, with intention to go afterwards to the Pope with matters well debated, and almost resolved. He alleaged that this course he was bound to take, no lesse for the necessitie then for the facilitie of things: For, as it could not be conuenient for him to leaue alone the Bishop of Paris, whome the French king had sent to Mantua at the instance of Cesar, so there was no hope he should debate in the affaires of his king, and no lesse inconuenient to require him to go with him to the Pope, seeing that neither it answered his commission, nor the dignitie of his king, to go to the house of the enimie afore their coutrouersies were accorded, or at least verie neare to be resolved. Of the contrarie, the two Embassadors of Aragon, declared that the whole hope of peace making, depended vpon the agreement & composing of the affaires of Ferrara, for that they being determined, and no more cause remaining to the Pope to sustaine the Venetians; they should be constrained to yeeld to peace with such lawes and conditions as Cesar would: That the Pope pretended that the sea Apostolike had great & strong rights ouer the ciitie of Ferrara, & did esteeme Alfonso to haue vsed towards him a great ingratitude, & had done him many vnworthie iniuries: that to abate & qualifie the rigor of his mind which was now full of displeasure, it was more conuenient that the subiect or vassall should implore the clemencie of his Lord, then to come & dispute of his iustice. For which reasons they perswaded that it was not only comly & honest, but also conuenient & necessarie, to go to him, in which iust humilitie and submission they doubted not but he would diminish a great part of his rigour. They thought it not profitable that that diligence, that industrie, that authoritie which was to be employed to dispose the Pope to peace, should be consumed in perswasions tending to endes doubtfull: Lastly, they added with very sweete words, that neither could matters haue their full disputation, nor the quarrels sufficiently searched into, vnlesse all the parties were together in full assistance. And that within Mantua was onely but one part, for that Cesar, the French king, and the king Catholike, were in such vnitie of leagues, parentages, & amities, that in this action they were to be reputed as brethren, the interests of euery particular being common to them all. What by these perswasions and other respectes more speciall and priuate, the Bishop of Gurci suffered himselfe to be wonne to goe thither, with intention that the Bishop of Paris should expect at Parma, what would be the successe of his voyage. During these actions, the Pope notwithstanding all solicitation made appertaining to the peace, had not yet altered his thoughts from the

the warre, entertaning the one with shewes dissembled, and embracing the other with desires burning and importunate: he supposed to surprize of new the bastillion of Geninola, recommending the charge of that enterprize to Iohn Vitells: But as well for the small and slow payments that were made, the numbers of footemen were farre inferiour to the appointment, as also that all the countrey thereabouts stood ouerflowed both by the plentie of raynes that fell, and by the cutting of the risings of the riuer of Paw, there was nothing aduanced. Besides, Alphonso d'Este was the stronger by water, who, with an armie of gallies and brigantines so charged the Venetian fleet neare S. Albert, that what with the furie of that encounter, and with the feare of another fleet of lesser vessels which they discerned sayling from Comaccho, they retired to the port of Rauenna with the losse of two fustes, two barbots, & more then fourtie smaller vessels. This accident disappointed the Popes hope to take the bastillion, and therefore he returned those companies to the campe which lodged at Finale, very much weakened of the strength of footemen for that the pay was so small. About this time the Pope created eight Cardinals, partly to allure to him the mindes of Princes, and partly to arme him against the threatnings of the Councell. Such as he created were Prelates learned and experienced, & as they bare in the Court of Rome a great authoritie, so they were personages of speciall election, such as he reposed most suretie in: of the number of this creation was the Archbishop of Yorke Embassadour for the king of England, and the Bishop of Syon, the one being a man of importance to stirre vp the Swissers, and the other being gracious with his king, whom he hoped to kindle against the Frenchmen. And to draw on the Bishop of Gurci as it were with an earnest penny certaine of the same dignitie, & with that hope to make him the more tractable to his desire, he reserued to himselfe with the consent of the Consistorie, a power to name another, such a one as he had fashioned already in his minde. After he vnderstood that the Bishop of Gurci had consented to come to him, he determined to receiue him with great honour, whereinto expresse more office then the estate of a Bishop of Gurci could challenge, and lesse respect then appertained to so supreme a dignitie as a high Bishop of Rome, he went from Rauenna to Bologna, to the end to ioyne the magnificence of the place to the residue of honours he pretended. There he receiued him with pompes and ceremonies equall to the estate and dignitie of any king, the glory of his demonstrations and shewes giuing great detection of his dissembled minde. The Bishop also for his part expressed no lesse pompe and magnificence, for that descending into Italie with the title of Casars Lieutenant, he came accompanied with a very great trayne of nobilitie, all their bands and followers being sumptuously apparelled. The Embassadour of Venice resident with the Pope came to meete him at the gate of the towne, making signes of very great submision: but he, with a wonderfull pride and arrogancie both in his gestures & wordes, shewed himselfe not a litle discontented, that he that represented the enemies of Cesar, could not so much bridle his impudencie and boldnesse, as to forbear to come in his presence. With this pompe he went vp to the publike Consistorie, where the person of the Pope attended him with all the Cardinals: there he expressed in short speech, but with very hawtie and proud wordes, that as Cesar had sent him into Italie, in a desire to obtaine that that appertained to him, more by the way of peace then by the rigour of warre: so neuerthelesse, there was no place or possibilitie for peace, if the Venetians made not franke restitution of those things that belonged to him in any sort sooner. After he had declared thus much in publike audience, he deliuered no lesse in priuate to the Pope, nothing abating his hawtinesse: and the day following he accompanied these seuere beginnings with actions no lesse proud & arrogant: for the Pope hauing by his consent appointed three Cardinals to negotiate with him, the Cardinall S. George, Cardinall Regina, & Cardinall de Medicis, who attended him at the houre assigned to meete together: he sent three of his Gentlemen to negotiate with them, excusing himselfe to haue other businesse, holding it indeede a matter of great indignitie to debate with any other then the Pope. This indignitie with many others the Pope swallowed sweetly, the incredible hatred which he bare to the French, surmounting the disposition of his nature. But in the accord betweene Cesar and the Venetians which began first to be drawne into disputation, there were many difficulties: for albeit the Cardinall of Gurci who in the beginning had demanded all the townes, consented in the end that Padoa and Trenisa should remaine to them with all their partes and apertenances, yet he stucke to haue them giue to Cesar in recompence a very great quantitie of money, and that they should hold them of him in chiefe, & resigne to him the rights of the other townes. Matters which could neuer be agreed vnto by the Senate of Venice, wherein it was vniuersally concluded, that it was better for their common weale, hauing already so fortified Padoa and Trenisa that they feared not to loose them, to preserue and keepe their money, for that if euer that tempest passed ouer, there might fall out some occasion to recouer easily all the residue of their dominion. On the other side the Pope nourished an importunate desire to haue them agreed with Cesar, hoping to make that an occasion to estrange him from the French king, in which regard he pressed them partly by requestes, and partly by threatens, to accept the conditions that were offered them: but his authoritie was no more so great with them, not so much for that they were not ignorant from whence proceeded so great a desire, as for that they knew that their association and companie was so necessary to him if he were not reconciled with the French king, that they made assured reckonings that he would neuer abandon them. Neuerthelesse, after the trauell of many dayes and much disputation made, the Bishop of Gurci abating somewhat of the hard conditions which he offered, and the Venetians yielding more to the vehement instance of the Pope then they had determined, and withall the Embassadours of the king of Aragon interposing in the action, it seemed they came at last to accord, the Venetians (the better to retaine Padou and Trenisa by the consent of Cesar) paying huge summes of money, but referred to long termes. There rested onely a meane to reconcile the Pope and the French king, betweene whom appeared no other difference then for the quarrels of the Duke of Ferrara: and to resolute them with the residue of the controuersies (for without that Cesar was determined to establish nothing) the Bishop of Gurci went to speake with the Pope (to whom he went but seldome) being perswaded by the hopes which the Cardinall of Pania and the Catholike kings Embassadours had put him in, that it would be a matter of very easie action: and on the other side he knew, that the French king hauing lesse regard to dignitie then to tranquillitie, was disposed to consent to many things, which bare but little preiudice to the Duke of Ferrara. But the Pope on the contrary cutting him off at the first, began to exhort him, that agreeing with the Venetians, he should leaue at libertie the matters of Ferrara, seeming to be sorie that Cesar knew not the occasion that offered, to be reuenged with the forces and money of another; of so many great iniuries done against him by the French: and withall that he tarried to be required in a matter wherein reasonably he should beseech others with great instance. To which things when the Bishop of Gurci had replied with many reasons, seeing he was not able to turne him from his opinion, he told him he would depart without giuing other perfection to the peace with the Venetians: and at the instant, hauing according to the custome, kissed his feet, he departed the same day (being the fifteenth after his arriual at Bologna) to Modona, the Pope sending after him in vayne to call him againe, as soone as he was departed the Citie: fro Modona he tooke his way towards Millā, complaining of the Pope for many things, but specially for that whilest by his comming into Italy there was almost a generall surceasing fro armes, the Pope had sent secretly the Bishop of Vintemille, sonne to the late Cardinall Fregosa, to trouble the state of Genes: neuerthelesse the Frenchmen set such good espiall of his iourney, that they tooke him in the countrey of Monisferat all disguised and vnknownen as he was, and from thence carried him to Millan, where he made manifest detection of the cause of his going, and the whole enterprise: his present perill driuing him to seeke his safetie more by disclosing then by excusing. When the Bishop of Gurci departed from Bologna, he required the Embassadours of Aragon (seeming not a litle discontented with the Popes obstinacie) to see returned to the realme of Naples the three hundred Spanish Launces: whereunto they condescended readily: a matter which made me to maruell the more, for that at the same time that the general Councell was in negociation, with expectation that the armies of Fraunce & Germanie accompanied with the presence of their Princes, should be most mighty in Italy, the Pope, besides the ill will of the French king, separated Cesar from him, and stood deprived of the succours of the king Catholike. Some doubted that in this action (as almost in all others) the counsels of the king of Aragon were different fro his demonstrations, & that his Embassadours had practised one thing in publike, & another thing in secret with the Pope: for that hauing prouoked the French king by new offences, & in the same giuen a new memory to ancient wrongs, it seemed he ought to feare least the peace with all others came not to be the cause of great perils against him, the Venetians remaining weakened of estate, of money, & reputation, & Cesar no more mighty in Italy, & more variable & prodigall then euer. Others that discouered more suttelly and deeply of things, made this interpretation, that notwithstanding all protestations that the king Catholike made to abandon the Pope, yea though he reuoked his bands; yet the Pope dwelt firmly in this confidence, that he would alwayes support and defend him in his greateft necessities, considering that the embracing of him could not but be preiudiciall to the king.

Within foure dayes after the departing of the Bishop of Guroi, the Pope sent after him the Scottish Embassadour to debate of the peace with the French king, wherein the effect was no lesse frustrate, then the deuise and hope of the Pope were vayne. And as by his departing the hopes of the peace were left troubled, and lesse expectation of agreement in so great a discord of wils: so by his going away also did cease the causes that had so long lingred Iohn Iacques Triunlice, who thirsted in an honest ambition to do something worthy his vertue and auncient glorie, and by the which he might induce the king to know, how hurtfull it is to recommede the gouernement of warres (a matter aboue all other humane actions most painefull and hard, and most requiring discretion and experience) not to Captaines able and trayned, but to young men vnexperienced, and of whose vertue there is none other thing to giue testimonie then fauour and countenance. Therefore continuing in his first resolutions, notwithstanding the soft bands of the Grisons were not yet arriued (for the Generall of Normandie, vpon whom depended the expeditions, had deferred to send men to leaue them, both hoping that the peace would go forward, and also seeking to auoyd expences to the king) he brought the campe afore Concorda in the beginning of May, containing a thousand two hundred Launces and seuen thousand footemen: he tooke it the same day he presented his campe afore it, wherein the securitie of the townesmen helped no lesse then his owne valour, for that being made fearefull with the first execution of the artillerie, whilest they sent Embassadours to make their composition with him, the footemen of his armie entred the towne and sacked it, the townesmen being negligent in their gard, by the hope they had in their Embassadours that were sent out to capitulate for their safeties. After the taking of Concorda, to the end to giue no occasion to such as enuied him to charge him with partialitie, as respecting more his proper profite; then the kings seruice, he left Mirandola behind him, and drew towards Bonport (a village vpon the riuer of Panaro) to approach so neare the enemy, as either to constrain them to dislodge, or to fight out of their strength, and by the same meane to cut off their victuals and prouisions. As he was entred into the countrey of Modona and lodged in the Village of Causeffe, he sent Gaston de Foix with three hundred footemen and fiue hundred horsemen, to do an enterprise vpon Iohn Paule Mansfron, that lay at Massa neare to Finale with three hundred light horsemen of the Venetians, who hearing of their coming put himselfe in battell array vpon a bridge: but the valour of his souldiers not answering his vertue and courage, he was made prisoner, being abandoned both of his fortune and faith of his people. After this the armie drawing neare to Bonport, Triunlice had an intention to cast a bridge there where the channell which is drawne from aboue Modona out of the riuer of Panaro, entred into the riuer: but the enemy, to giue impediment to his passage ouer the riuer, was already incamped in a place so neare, that they distressed him with their artilleries, where with Captaine Perault a Spaniard & commaunder within the Church army, was killed, as he walked along the rising of the riuer. In that place the banke is very high, by which helpe as it was easie to the enemy to distress him: so Triunlice, meeting with these impediments by a new counsell, cast his bridge somewhat higher, a myle onely aboue the channell: and hauing passed the channell he drew towards Modona, marching along the rising of Panaro, and seeking out a place where he might more easly cast his bridge. But because he saw alwayes afore him, bands of horsemen & footmen of his enemies, who were incamped neare to Frankcastell vpon the way of Romagnia (but their lodgings all enuironed with bankes and waters) he came by the same way to the bridge of Fossalto two myles neare to Modona, and there turning on the left hand towards the mountaine, he passed without impediment the foord of Panaro, which in that place hath his channell very large & without banks: fro thence he encamped in a place called the beach of Panaro three myles from the army Ecclesiastike. The day after he drew towards Plumacce, being refurnished with victuals fro them of Modona by the consent of Vitfuch. And likewise the same day the army Ecclesiastike, which durst not present theselues in plaine field, supposing it very necessary to draw neare to Bologna, the better to preuent all mutinies & stirres in that citie, the rather for that the family of the Beriuoleis followed the French army, went & incaped at the bridge of Casalecquo three myles aboue Bologna, a place very strong & sure, hauing his situation betweene the riuer of Rene and the chanell & by the commoditie of the mountaine at his backe, it defendes Bologna frō all priuation of the reliefe of the channell, which cōming from the riuer, passeth into that Citie: this is that place wherein in the dayes of our auncestours Iohn Galeas Viscount the mightie Duke of Mislan, obtained a most great victorie against the Florētines, the Bolognians and other states confedered, his numbers farre exceeding the enemies. The day following Frankcastell was rendred to Triunlce, who, after he had remained three dayes in the lodging of Plumatce, both for the impediment of the raines that fell, and also to reuictuall his people being then in great necessitie, he came to incampe vpon the high way betweene Samoggia and Frankcastell, where he stood in great doubt what he were best to do for many difficulties that appeared to him in all deliberations: for, he knew well enough that it would be to no purpose to execute any thing against Bologna, if the people made no tumult within: and if he should draw neare to it vnder hope of popular emōtiōs, he feared he should be compelled to retire as Chaumont did, not without diminution of his reputation: and he knew that it would be a matter of greater perill and indiscretion, to go fight with the enemies incamped in places of strength and of aduantage: and to make his approach to Bologna on that side below, there was no other hope, sauing that haply the enemies might remoue for feare least he assailed Romagnia, in which might be offered some occasiō, either to him to fight, or to the people of Bologna to make some tumult. Neuerthelesse in the end after he had resolved to make triall, if either the vniuersall disposition of the Citie, or the particular intelligēces of the Bentinoleis, would stand him in any steed, he led the armie, the vaungard guided by Theodore Triunlce, the maine battell by himselfe, and the rearegard by Gaston de Foix, to incampe at the bridge of Laine, which is a place vpon the high way fīue myles from Bologna, and bearing a perpetuall renoume for the memorie of the enteriuew of Lepidus, Marke Ant. & Octauius, who, by the testimonie of histories, vnder the name of Triumvirat, established in that place the tyrannie of Rome, together with that proscription which can neuer be blamed and detested enough. The Pope was now at this time at Bologna; but since the departure of the Bishop of Curci being perplexed in varietie of thoughts and counsels; sometimes courage and sometimes feare bearing dominion in him, as soone as he heard Triunlce began to march (notwithstanding the Spanish Launces were gone) he went from Bologna to the armie, to the end by his presence to encourage the Captaines to giue battell to the enemies, to the which he could neuer dispose them, either by his letters, or labour of his Embassadors: he departed with intētiō to lodge the first day at Cente, but he was compelled to lodge within the towne of Pienna, for that a thousand of his footemen which were entred within Cente, refused to depart till they were satisfied of their payes: whereupon, being either made angry with this contempt, or haply looking more deeply into the present daunger, he altered his resolution, returning estloones to Bologna, where his feares so redoubled vpon him by the approaching of Triunlce, that being determined to go to Rauenna, he sent for the Magistrates, to whom he occupied these perswasions: That by the benefite of the sea Apostolike, & by his meane & labour, they had shaken off a yoke of most grieuous tyrannie, and had obtained libertie with many exemptiōs, besides many graces both publike & priuate which they had receiued & were to receiue of him in particular: by which meane, in place where before they were holden oppressed with most hard seruitude, & so embased and troden down by tyrants, that in other parts of Italy there was no reputation of them, now they were raised into honour & riches, their Citie replenished with all sortes of trades & marchandises, & some of the established in right worthy & high dignities. In so much as now, their fortune being changed; they bare an vniuersall reputation in euery place, they stood free of themselves, absolute Lords of Bologna, & the whole territorie, the offices & honors being in their hands, & the publike reuenues of their citie, in their free distributiō: onely the Church hath but the name, & keepeth there for signe of superioritie a Legat or gouernour, who much lesse than without the can deliberate of any matter of importance, seeing that for such causes as are referred to his arbitration, he comunicateth ordinarily with them, subjecting himselfe to their aduise and wils: That if for these benefites & prosperities, there remained in them any desire to defend their proper libertie, they should receiue of him no worse succour, comfort, and protection, then he would minister to the Citie of Rome, standing in the like necessitie: That though the importāce of the present affaires cōtrained him to go to Rome, yet, he neither did nor would forget to prouide for the suretie & safetie of Bologna: That for that regard, he had giue direction, that the Venetian bands which lay on the other side Pau with Andrew Gruti, & to that that end cast the bridge at Sermida, should come to ioyne with the armie : That albeit his prouisions were very able and sufficient to defend them, yet he could not rest contented, nor satisfied, if withall he left them not deliuered from the troubles of the warre. In which respect, to driue the Frenchmen into necessitie to defend their owne things, there were already leauied ten thousand Swissers to descend vpon the Duchie of Millan : and for their better prouision and expedition, he had sent twenty thousand ducats to Venice, the Venetians preparing the like summe. Neuerthelesse if they had rather returne vnder the seruitude of the Bentiuoleis, then to enioy the sweetenesse of the libertie of the Church, he desired them to expresse frankly what minds they bare, for that he would make himselfe conformable to their likings : onely he told them that if they had any resolution to defend themselves, the time now was very conuenient not onely to expresse their vertue, but also to make bound to them for euer, the sea Apostolike, himselfe, and all the succession of Popes that should come after him. To this forme of perswasion pronounced (according to his custome) with more seruency then eloquence, after they had debated amongst themselves in counsell, the President of the gouernement made answer in the name of the whole, not forgetting with words of great boasting to magnifie their faith, their thankfulness to benefits, and their perpetuall and infinit deuotion of his holinesse and name: That they were not ignorant of the happy estate wherein they stood, and how much, since the expulsising of Tyrants, their wealth had bene augmented, together with the worship of their city: That where before their liues and hauiors were miserably subiected to the commandement of others, now by the benefit of peace and tranquillitie they liue in suretie, their liues without feare, and their goods without perill of execution, their persons pertaking in the gouernement and in the reuenues: That there was not one amongst them who had not particularly receiued of him many graces & honors: That they sawe renewed in their citie the dignity of Cardinalship, and many of their Citizens furnished with the principall officer of the Court of Rome. In recompence of which singular benefits, they bare minds disposed to consume all their goods, to weare and wast their proper liues, and to put in perill the honor & safety of their wiues & children, rather then to fall any iote from the deuotion of the sea Apostolike. Therefore they desired him to depart, no lesse happy then glad, nourishing neither feare nor ielousie touching the things of Bologna, for that he should sooner heare that all the channell should swim with the bloud of the people of Bologna, then that city should call vpon other name or obey other Lord then Pope Iulio. The man, that aspireth is credulous in all things that are conformable to his hope, yea sometimes his ambition makes him belecue contrary to reason or wisdom. These words protested more in glory, then with good meaning, gaue to the Pope a greater hope then was conuenient : and leauing there the Cardinall of Pania, he went to Rauenna, not by the high way, although he was accompanied with the Spanish lances which returned to the realme of Naples, but for feare of the Duke of Ferrara, he tooke the way of Furly, which further about, he went from Bologna better satisfied then well assured, and could not but expect of them fidelitie and confidence whom he had vndiscretely left to their liberty and discretion. After Trinulce was come to the bridge of Laine, the city of Bologna began to declare an vniuersall murmure, the minds of men being replenished with diuerse impressions and thoughts : some accustomed to the liberty of tyrannie, and to liue of the goods of the states of others, desired vehemently the returne of Bentiuoleis, hating already the gouernement Ecclesiastike: some, at well for the harmes they had already receiued, as for the feare of further hurts, seeing two such armies vpon their lands and ready to cut downe their haruest, desired all things by the which they might be deliuered from such ruines: others, affore whose eyes stood yet the memory of the french insolencies, executed in their city vnder Monsieur Chammont, and fearing now least by their well speeding, the city drawing into tumult, might come to be sacked, seemed not to care into what gouernement or iurisdiction they fell, so that in it they might be assured to be deliuered from such daungers. There were very few that affore had declared themselves enemies to the familie of Bentiuoleis, which now fauored the iurisdiction of the Church, and that more in shew then in good meaning. In so much that the whole being drawne into armes, some for desire of innouation and change, and some for their proper surety; all things were full of feare and confusion: the Cardinall of Pania and Legat resident in Bologna, had neither courage nor counsell sufficient for such a daunger. Besides, in a city so great and populous, he haying no more but two hundred light horsemen and a thousand footemen, and being at that time more then euer at variance with the Duke of Vrbryn, who lay with the army at

Casalecqua, he had either at aduerture or by destinie leauyed and payed fifteene Captaines of the Citizens, to whom, together with their companies and with the people, he had committed the gard of the towne: it seemed he vsed no great regard in the election of these Captaines, for that the most part of them were of the faction of the Bentinoleis, but principally Lawrence Ariosto, who, being first imprisoned and racked at Rome for suspition of conspiracie with the familie of Bentinoleis, suffered afterwards a long imprisonment in the castle of S. Ange. The people after they had once their weapons in their hands, began to draw to assemblies, & make secret conuenticles, spreading through the towne new slanders: Their manifest rebellion began to make the Legat see too late into his owne indiscretion, and to auoide the perill whereunto he had brought himselfe, he appointed that the new Captaines with their bands should go to the army, sayning too late that the Duke of Vrbino would it so: but they answering that it was not reasonable they should abandon the gard of their towne, he proued to bring in Captaine Ramassore with a thousand footmen, which the people would not suffer. These manifest contempts made the Cardinal both a coward & desperate, being vnable by perswasion & pollicie to releue the perill which he had put vpon himselfe, not by fortune, but by negligence. Therefore remembring how hateful his gouernement was to the people, and himselfe no lesse detested of the Nobles, for that not long afore vnder the Popes comandement, & power royall as he sayd, he had cut off the heads of three honourable Citizens: he stole out of the pallace by a secret way and in disguised habits, and so suddenly withdrew himselfe into the Citadell, that he forgot to cary with him his Jewels & monney, which he sent for in haste after, and so went out by the gate towards Ymola, accompanied with a band of horsmen led by Guido Vaine who had married his sister, and was Captaine of the horsmen appointed for his gard. A litle after him went out of the Citadell Olla Fregosa without other company then a guide, they both suffering one fortune as they were both followers of one cause. The flying of the Legat was no sooner knowne in the towne, then throughout the whole city the name of the people was cried and called vpon with great tumult and emotion: an occasion which Ariosto not willing to lose, together with Frauncis Riucci one of the fifteene Captaines, & affected to the Bentinoleis, they tooke many of their followers and faction, and ran to the gates of S. Felix and Lama most conuenient for the campe of the Frenchmen, which they brake open with barres and hatchets, and being possessed of them they sent inmediately to call the Bentinoleis: and they receiuing of Trinulce, many French horsmen to auoid the high way of the bridge of Rene which was garded by Raphaell de Passi one of the Captaines of the Church, they passed the riuier more low, and approching the gate of Lama were let in, their gladnesse being nothing inferior to their fortune. To this rebellion of Bologna was added the breaking & flying away of the army: for, about three of the clocke in the night, the Duke of Vrbino whose bands of souldiers stretched out from the bridge of Casalecqua vntill the gate of Saragosse, hearing of the flying of the Legat and mutinies of the people, left the most part of his tents and pavilions pitched, and in great hast went away with the whole armie, except those that being appointed for the gard of the campe, were on that side the riuier towards the Frenchmen, to whom his haste would not suffer him to giue knowledge of his disamping: it is seldome scene that one aduersity commeth alone, and it is found in all ages and times then when illes begin to fall, they thunder all at once. For, the Bentinoleis being now entred the towne, hearing of the breaking vp of the campe, gaue present aduertisement to Trinulce, & sent out of the towne a part of the people to distresse them: by whom and by the multitudes of paynants which descended on all parts with rude cries and brutes, their campe that passed along the wals was assailed, their artilleries & munitions taken from them, and the most part of their baggage spoyled: notwithstanding the French that by this time were come to the medley tooke from the people & paynants by force & violence, the things they had rauished from others with the perill of their liues. By this time also Theoder Trinulce with the vaunt guard was arriued at the bridge of Rene, where Raphaell Passi with singular valour made head long time against his enemies, but being ouercharged both with numbers and fortune, he was at last taken prisoner, hauing giuen by the resistance he made, a notable oportunitie to the Church souldiers to saue themselves. But the Venetian companies & the bands of Rassore which lay vpo the hill aboue S. Luke, hauing but very late knowledge of the flying of the Duke of Vrbino, sought their safeties by the waies of the mountaines, by the which notwithstanding they receiued great harmes, they got at last into Romagna. In this victory won without fighting, were taken 15 peeces of great artillery, & many of lesser sort, belonging both to the Pope and to the Venetians: certaine men at armes of the Church spoiled and stripped together with an hundred and fiftie of the Venetians, and almost all the footemen of both the one & the other armie disperſed. There remained priſoners Vrſin de Mugnano, Iulia Manfron, with many other Captaines of meane condition: within Bologna there was not a man ſlaine, nor any violence done either to the Nobles or to the Commons, onely there were made priſoners, the Biſhop of Cluſo together with many other Prelats, Secretaries, and officers which were about the Cardinall and remained ſtill in his paſſage, for that he had kept from them his departing. The ſame night and the day following the people fell vpon an image of braſſe being the Popes picture, which they trailed along the market place in great ſcorne and mockery, vſing no more reuerence to the Image, then they bare affectiō to the perſon that it represented: the cauſe of this inſolencie was referred either to the ſouldiers of Bentiuole who could not be gouerned, or elſe to the humour of the people, who bearing a nature vnthankfull & deſirous of new things, and no leſſe weary with the trauels and harmes of the warre, bare hatred to the name and memorie of him that had bene the cauſe of the libertie and felicitie of their countrey. The day after which was the xxij of May Trynulce ſtayed in his lodging, and the day following, leauing Bologna behind him, he drew to the riuer of Adice, & afterward ſtayed at the borough of S. Peter which is a frontier vpon the territories of Bologna, expecting before he marched further, what would be the intention of the French king, whether he would execute any further action vpon the ſtate of the Pope, or elſe contenting him ſelfe to haue reſſured Ferrara, and taken from the Church the citie of Bologna which he had gotten by his meanes, he would eſtabliſh there the courſe of this victorie. By reaſon of this temporizing, although Saffatella the Popes Captaine, and who hauing chaſed out of Ymola the faction Gibeline, commaunded that citie as chiefe of the Guelfes, made him ſecret offers to put into his hands the citie of Ymola, yet he reſuſed to accept it till he had the kings aunſwere. There reſted onely the Citadell of Bologna, wherein was the Biſhop of Vitella, a Citadell large and ſtrong, but manned and furniſhed according to the cuſtome of the fortrefſes of the Church, containing but a verie ſlender ſtrength of footmen, verie ſmall prouiſion of victuals, and almoſt no munitions at all. Whileſt it was holden beſieged, Uitruch, being certified of the ſucceſſe of Bologna, was come from Modona by night to perſwade the Biſhop with great promiſes and offers to deliuer it to Ceſar: but the Biſhop, hauing the ſix day compounded with them of Bologna, that the liues and goods of ſuch as were within ſhould be ſaued, and receiued obligation that within a time certaine they ſhould pay him three thouſand duckets, deliuered it vp into their hands: and they were no ſooner poſſeſſed of it, then they ranne by heapes to diſmantle and reuerſe it, the Bentiuoleis ſtirring them to the action, not ſo much to winne fauour with the citizens, as for feare leaſt the French king would withhold it, ſome of his Captaines being already of a counſell to demaund it: but Trynulce would neuer giue his conſent, for that he thought it would be a thing contrarie to the kings profit to giue occaſion to thinke that he had deſire to make him ſelfe Lord of Bologna. By the occaſion of this victorie, the Duke of Ferrara recouered beſides Cento and Piena, Cotignuola, Lugo and the other townes of Romagnia, expulſing at the ſame time Albert Pie who poſſeſſed them in common with him.

It was reaſonable, that the Pope ſhould receiue great diſcontentments for the loſſe of Bologna, not onely for that the Citie of moſt importance through the whole ſtate Eccleſiaſtike next to Rome, was taken from him, wherein he ſuffered priuation of that glorie which he had gotten in conquering it, which was no leſſe great towards men, then moſt principall and great in his owne conceit: but alſo for feare leaſt the ſame fortune & felicitie which in that action had made his enimie happie, would not eſtſoones allure him to purſue his victorie further: ſuch be the variations of mindes poſſeſſed with doubts and feare, and ſuch the motions and ſuggeſtions of a conſcience troubled and infected. He knew if the armie ſhould proſecute the courſe of their victorie, there was in him no abilitie of reſiſtance: and ſeeking to remoue all occaſions that might prouoke them to paſſe further, he ſolicited that the remainders of the Venetian ſouldiers already reuoked by the Senat, ſhould embarke at the port of Ceſena, and for the ſame cauſe he ſent to haue reſtored to him the xx. thouſand duckets, which remained yet in Venice, being ſent thither afore to ſtirre vp the Swiſſers. Moreouer he gaue order, that the Cardinall of Nants a Britton by nation, ſhould as it were of him ſelf, ſolicite Trynulce to peace, perſwading that the time was then conuenient to worke it: but the Cardinall made aunswere that it was not conuenient to proceede in that generalitie, but rather to come expressely to particularities: he told him that when the king desired peace, he did offer the conditions, and that it was now no lesse necessary for the Pope to do the like, the estate of the affaires so requiring, and his present fortune nothing impugning. The Pope vsed this maner of proceeding, more to auoid the present danger, then for any desire he had to haue peace, struiuing in him at one time feare, obstinacy, hatred, and disdain: and with these passions was concurrant at the same time another accident that hapned, redoubling in him his sorrowes, and making him suspect and feare further: there were brought to him many accusations against the Cardinall of Pavia, some charged him with infidelity, some imposed vpon him cowardise, and some blamed him of negligence, euery one thinking to make his fault the greater by the varietie of their imputations: he came to Rauenna to make his owne iustification, and sent to the Pope to signifie his comming, and to haue assignation for audience: to whom the Pope, whose gladnesse for his comming, was nothing inferior to the affection he bare him, made answer that he should come to dine with him. But as he was going to the Popes palace, being accompanied Guido Vaine & the gard of his horsemen, the Duke of Vrbjn, both for an auncient hatred he bare him, and also for a suspition that the reuolt of Bologna hapned through his fault, by which occasion followed the flying of the army, followed him with a small traine, and thrusting in amongst his gard of horsemen who for reuerence sake made him place, he slue the Cardinall with his owne hands: he might haply seeme worthy for the degree he held, vpo whō violent hands should not be layed, but touching his infinit vices, he deserued most cruell punishment, his faults being farre greater then the opinion that went on them, & his vertues farre lesse then were conuenient for such a profession. As soone as the report of his death was brought to the Pope, he began to lament with miserable cries and complaynings, being not a little moued for the losse of a Cardinall so deare to him, but much more touched that such a hoiey dignity fell into violation almost euen afore his eyes, by the hands of his owne Nephew, & with an example not vsed: a matter so much the more greuous to him, by how much he made profession to preserue & exalt the authority Ecclesiastike. These sorrowes he was not able to beare, and much lesse to temper his furie, in which respect, as also with the presence of the place to pretermitt the memory of the fact, he departed the same day from Rauenna to returne to Rome: and, to the end that at one time he were enuironed on all parts with infinit calamities, he was no sooner arriued at Rimini, then he had aduertisement that within Modona, within Bologna, and in many other cities, there were fixed and set vp many placards in publike places, by the which was denounced to him the conuocation of the Councill, with citation to go thither in person.

For, as the Bishop of Gurcy, after he was gone from Modona, had trauelled certaine dayes by easie iorneis, expecting the answer of the Scottish Embassador, who went from him to Bologna for affayres which the Pope himselfe had propounded: so, he being eftsoones returned with answers very vncertaine, the Bishop of Gurcy dispatched immediatly to Millan in the name of Cesar three Proctors, who, ioyning with the Cardinals and with the Proctors of the French king, published the councill to be celebrated the first day of September next in the city of Pisa. The Cardinals made choise of Pisa, as a place no lesse conuenient for the oportunity of the sea, for those that were there to assemble, then of speciall surety for the confidence the french king had in the Florentins: And withall, for that many other places, which though they might haue bin capable of such an assembly, yet they were either inconuenient or suspected, or at least the Pope might refuse them with iust colour: There had bene no conueniencie to assenble it in Fraunce or in other place of the kings obedience, and Cōstance one of the free townes of Germany recommended by Cesar, seemed for this action to beare no indifferencie, notwithstanding it had bene made, notable by that worthy Councel, wherein three Popes were deposed, & the schisme confounded that had continued for fortie yeares in the Church: And in Thurin was more matter of suspition to both parties, for the neighbourhood of the Swissers and the estates of Fraunce: Bologna affore it was out of the obedience of the Church was not sure for the Cardinals: and, now it stands in the like case for the regard of the Pope. Moreouer in the election of the towne of Pisa was partly respected the felicitie of an example past touching the memorie of two Councils which had beene there right happily celebrated: the one, when almost all the Cardinals who abandoned Gregorie the twelfth, and Benet the thirteenth, quarelling together for the Pope.

Popedome, chole Pope Alexander the fift, celebrating the Councell in that Citie : and the other which was long time before celebrated in the same place about the yere 1136, by Innocent the second, at such time as Peter Leon Antipape of Rome was condemned, who making himself be called Anacletus the second, with such a schisme had not only much troubled Innocent, but also all the regions of Christendome. The Florentins had afore accorded Pysa to the French king, who required it of them, giuing them to vnderstand that Cesar, no lesse then he, was the author of the conuocation of the Councell, the king of Aragon also consenting and concurring in it. In this action the Florentins deserue to be praised, more perhaps for their silence, then for their wisdom or constancie : for, either not hauing the courage to denie the king the thing that was grievous to them, or not considering how many difficulties and dangers might grow vpon them by a Coucell which was celebrated against the Popes wil, they held so secret that deliberatio that was made in an assemblee or Councell of more then an hundred and fiftie Citizens, that the Cardinals to whom the French king gaue hope of their conformitie, were neuer assured that they had accorded, neither had the Pope any knowledge of it. The Cardinals pretended that the Councell might be iudicially called by them, without the authority of the Pope, for the present necessity (as they said) that the Church had, to be reformed, not only in her members, but also in her head, meaning the person of the Pope : they published him to be so hardned in Simony, and corrupted with maners infamous and damnable, both vnfit to gouerne the Papacie ; and author of so many vniust warres, that he was incorrigible, to the vniuersall slaunder of all Christendome, for the safetie and preseruacion of whom, there was no other medicine sufficient, then the conuocation of a Councell : whereof seeing the Pope made no care, they alleaged that the full and legitimate power of conuocation was diuolued to them, specially the authority of the elect Emperour being adioyned, and the consent of the right Christian king, together with the Clergie of Germanie and Fraunce concurring : they perswaded, that to vse often this medicine, was a meane not only profitable but necessarie for the diseased bodie of the Church, both to roote out the old errors, and to resist such others as would of new bud vp : to explaine and interpret the doubts which dayly happened, and to correct things which though in the beginning were found and well ordered, yet in that triall they appeared pernicious by experience : that for these reasons the ancient Fathers in the Councell of Constance had wholsomly enacted and provided, that for alwayes afterwards the Councell should be celebrated from ten yeares to ten yeares : the Popes had no other bridle then this, to hold them from going out of the right way : and without this, weighing with the naturall frailtie of men, the manie entisements which nature breeds in vs to do euill during our life, what surety could remaine to kingdoms and regions, if he that tooke to himselfe all libertie and licence, might stand exempted from all authoritie, and were assured that he should neuer come to giue a reckening of himselfe. On the other side, many occupied these reasons, partaking more with the doctrine of the Diuines, then of the Canonists, that the authoritie to call Councels was inuested only in the person of the Pope : yea, though he were infected with all vices, if onely he were not suspected of heresies : that if the holie authoritie were otherwise interpreted, it would rest in the power of a few, either for ambition or for particular hatreds, couering their wicked intentions with false colours, to alter and change daylie the peaceable estate of the Church : a matter which ought not to be consented, no lesse for the preiudice, then for the ill example it brought : they alleaged that be it that all medicines were wholsome, yet if they were not ministred with due proportions, & in times conuenient, they bare more of poison then of medicine : by which reasons condemning all those that had other opinions, they called this assemblee not a Councell, but matter to deuide and separate the vnitie of the Sea Apostolike, a beginning of schisme in the Church of God and a counselling of diuels.

THE NINTH BOOKE OF THE historic and discourse of Guicciardin.

THE ARGUMENT.

After the taking of Bologna, the French armie returneth to the Duchy of Millan. The Councell that was to be holden at Pisa against the Pope, is transferred to Millan, where many stirs happen. The Popes armie besiegeth Bologna. The Frenchmen take Bressia. The battell is giuen at Rauenna. The Pope publisheth the Councell at Rome. And afterwards the affaires of the French begin to decline.

THE successe of the victorie hapning vpon the French king, drew all Christendome, but principally the vniuersall regions of Italy, to expect (in great doubt of mind) what he wold further deliberate of his fortunes: for, euerie one gaue this iudgemēt, that it was in his power to make himselfe Lord of Rome and the whole state Ecclesiastlike, both for that all the Popes regiments together with the Venetians were dispersed and almost dissolued, and also there remained not in Italy other armies able to make resistance against the furie of the victor: & as for the Pope, seeming only to be defended with the name and maiesty of the place, he stood in all other regards reduced to the discretion of fortune, his resolution of mind only remaining to support the aduersitie of his estate: neuerthelesse the French king, either the reuerence which he bare to religion retaining him, or the feare to stirre vp other Princes against him driuing him to vse a moderation in his fortune, determined not to vse the occasion of his victory, but with a counsell perhaps more religious then profitable, he addressed his commandements to Ioh. Iac. Triunlce, to returne with the armie to the Duchy of Millan, leauing Bologna to the Bentiuoleis, and making restitution of all other peeces which he occupied of the Church. To these actions so gracious and affable, he added words and demonstrations no lesse acceptable and full of pietie: for, he forbad throughout his realmes to make any publike signes of gladnesse; and protested oftentimes in the ptesence of manie, that notwithstanding he had nothing committed against the Sea Apostolike, nor against the person of the Pope, and muchlesse done any thing but by prouocation and constraint: yet, he would come to humilitie with the Pope, and for the reuerence and deuotion he bare to that Sea, he would sue for pardon where he had done no offence: he perswaded himselfe that the Pope, knowing by experience what were the difficulties of his conceits, and being reassured of the suspition which he had of him without occasion, wold with all his hart come to desire peace, the practise & negociation wherof had not bene altogether giuen ouer, seeing the Pope, since he parted from afore Bologna, had for that occasion sent to the king the Embassadour of the king of Scotland, continuing to solicit the same points, which by the same bishop had bene begun to be debated with the Bishop of Gurci. In this disposition to peace ioyned also the family of the Bentiuoleis, who notwithstanding they followed the authoritie of the king, yet they signified to the Pope, that much lesse they would expresse contumacie and rebellion to the Church, seeing they laid themselves downe with ready and franke minds to liue & die in that subiection, wherein their fathers had continued so many yeares: and in token thereof they did not onely set at libertie the Bishop of Cluse, but according to the ancient vsage, they lodged him in the Pallace as Lieutenant to the Sea Apostolike.

*The French
armie returneth to the Duchie of Millan.*

Triunlce departed with the armie and drew neare to Mirandola to recouer it, notwithstanding at the request of Iohan. Fran. Piqua, Vitfruch was entred vnder colour to hold it in the name of Cesar, and by protestation had sent to require Triunlce, that because it was of the iurisdiction of the Empire, he should abstaine from all violent action: but finding in the end that his vaine authority was not sufficient, he went his way, Triuulce giuing him onely certaine promises more honorable for Cesar in shew then in effect: the like did Iohn Fran. after he had safeconduit for goods and life; and Triuulce hauing to follow no other expedition, sent to the gard of Verona five hundred Launces and a thousand three hundred launce-knights vnder Captaine Iacob: and reseruing to himselfe two thousand five hundred Gascoins vnder the regiment of Captaine Molard and Mangiron, which, with the companies of the men at armes, he sent disperfed into the townes of the Duchy of Millan, he gaue leaue and dismissed all the other bands of footmen: but to the desire and hope of the king was nothing agreeable the disposition of the Pope, who rising into a new courage by the reuoking of the armie, and being euerie day made more hard and obstinate by the things that indeed should haue made him more easie and tractable, seeing withall that at Rimini where he yet remained, he lay tormented with the gowt. In the midst of so many perplexities he set downe more in the person of a Victor then one that was vanquished, & that by the meane and working of the same Scottish Embassadour, that the Duke of Ferrara should pay to him hereafter the tributes which he was wont to pay before the diminution which had bene made by Pope Alexander: that the Church should hold a Visedomino in Ferrara, as the Venetians did before: and that there should be rendred to him Lugo, with the other townes which Alonso d'Este possessed in Romagnia. These conditions notwithstanding they seemed to the king no lesse grievous, then to hold too much of iniquitie, yet the desire to haue peace with the Pope preuailing aboue all other respects, he made answer that he was contented to consent to all those demaunds, so farre forth as Cesar might also condescend and concurre in them: but the Pope being now returned to Rome, seemed with the place to chaunge both counsell and will, the perswasions of the king of Aragon helping no lesse then his naturall lightnesse and mutabilitie: for, the king of Aragon, whom the late victorie of the French king had confirmed in verie great suspition, had sodainly laid aside all the great preparations which he had made to passe in person into Affrica, where he maintained continuall warres with the Moors: and hauing called home from thence Peter of Navarre with three thousand Spanish footmen, he sent him to the realme of Naples, both to the end to assure at one time his owne estates, and to giue courage to the Pope to be so much the more estranged from the peace: in so much that by these encouragements conformable to his owne variable disposition, the Pope made answer that he would not heare of peace, vnlesse the Venetians might be accorded with Cesar: vnlesse Alonso d'Este ouer and besides the first demaunds, made him satisfied of all the expences which he had defrayed in the warre: and lastly, vnlesse the king were bound not to hinder him in the recouerie of Bologna: which citie, as a rebell to the Church, he had already put vnder Ecclesiasticall interdiction: and to make a spoile of the corne of their countrey, he had sent into Romagnia Mar. Antho. Colonne and Ramassote, who notwithstanding were easilie chased by the people, being scarcely entred into the frontiers. Notwithstanding this answer, the Pope, what by the petitions of the Cardinals, and for other priuate respects, as soone as he came to Rome, consented to the deliuerie of the Cardinall of Achx, hauing bene till that day kept prisoner within the castle of S. Angelo: but to his libertie he ioyned this condition, that he should not go out of the Pallace of Vatican till all the Prelats and officers that were taken within Bologna were set at libertie, and afterwards that he should depart from Rome vnder paine of fortie thousand duckets, for the which he was to put in sufficient surety: and yet not long after he suffered him to retorne into Fraunce with charge not to be at the Councell, vpon the like paine.

The Popes answer moued so much the more the mind of the king, by how much he was perswaded that he should consent to the conditions which he himselfe had offered: and therefore determining to withstand him in the recouerie of Bologna, he sent thither immediatly a new strength of 400 launces, and not long after he tooke into his protection the citie with all the familie of the Beniuoleis, without receiuing of him any couenant to minister either men or mony: and knowing that the alliance of Cesar was now more necessarie to him then euer, in place where afore he bare some inclination not to giue him those supplies of men which he had promised him in the capitulation made with the Bishop of Gurci, so farre forth as he passed in person into Italie (that being the couenant and condition of his promise,) he gaue present order that from the Duchie of Millan the bands that had bene promised should march thither vnder the gouernement of Monsieur de la Palisse, for that Trunche whom Cesar had required, refused the journey.

By this time Cesar was come to Yspruch, nourishing on the one side a great desire to make warre vpon the Venetians, and on the other side, he found himselfe confused with many thoughts and perplexities: for, considering that all that he should do, would make vp no matter of substance if he tooke not Padoa, and to that enterprise were required so great forces & so mighty preparations, as it was almost impossible to gather together: sometimes he suffered himselfe to be carried with a desire to agree with the Venetians, wherunto the king Catholike vrged him much: and sometimes he stood ouer-ruled with his owne conceits, thinking to march to Rome in person with his armie, to occupie according to his ancient desire all the estate of the Church: wherein he laid his plot to leade thither a mightie armie of Almains, besides the French companies: but what by his disabilities & by disorders, the execution of things was so far inferiour to the imagination, that he consumed the time without putting any to action, sometimes promising to come in person, & sometimes giuing a naked hope to send men. By these vncertainties it seemed grieuous to the king to take vpon him to sustaine alone the whole burthen of the war: a reason, which hauing conformity with his nature, being sparing and holding, could do more in him for the most part, than the wise persuasions that many made to the contrarie, that if Cesar were not mightily succoured by him, he would at last ioyne with his enemies, by which it would happen, that besides his necessity to be at a greater charge, yet his estates in Italie could not but fall into right manifest daungers. Amid these doubts and difficulties, the tumults of the temporal armes began to grow cold, but the fire of the spirituall armes kindled into greater flames, as well on the part of the Cardinals, authors of the Councell, as on the Popes side, who laboured altogether to oppresse such an euill afore it became greater.

The Pope
makes ouerture of a new Coun-cell to breake the Councell, of Pisa.

You haue heard heretofore how the Councell was denounced and signified vnder the authority of the king of Romains and the French king, the voices of the Cardinals of S. Cresse, S. Mallo, Baix, and Coseno being interposed, the Cardinall also of S. Seuerin consenting manifestly, & successiuelly, the Proctors of both the one and other king did assist the counsels and deliberations that were made. Moreouer, and to giue it a greater authoritie, the fiue Cardinals, authors of this pestilence, added by the way of intimation the names of other Cardinals, of whom Cardinall Albert a Frenchman durst not disobey the commandements of his king, being innocent in all things sauing in the compulsion that was vsed to him to subscribe his consent: and for the other Cardinals named by them, Cardinall Adrian and Cardinall Finalo protested openly that the matter was wrought wholly without their priuite and consent: so that more then sixe Cardinals were not manifestly declared of this faction: whom, for that the Pope hoped to draw them to a voluntarie renouncing of the matter, he entertained with them continuall practise, offering to pardon the errors that had bene committed, and that with such suretie that they should not need to feare any violence or displeasure to happen to them: wherunto the Cardinals gaue a dissembled care, beleeuing the Popes promises no further then they saw the confirmed with good means of their safeties: but the Pope could not for all this abstaine from most mighty and extreame remedies, in so much as following the counsell of Antho. du Mont saint Sansouyn, one of the Cardinals of his last creation at Raenna, seeking to purge himself of negligence, assigned an vniuersal Councell in the towne of Rome within the Church of S. Iohn de Latran for the first day of May next comming: by which conuocation he pretended that the Councell called by his aduersaries was broken, and that in that which he had published was iudicially contained the power and authoritie of all, notwithstanding that the Cardinals alleaged, that it was true in the beginning, yet seeing they had preuented it, the Councell that had bene instituted and called by the ought to haue place. The Councell being published, & the Pope reposing more then euer in his right, and with all dispaire to be able to reconcile the Cardinall of S. Cresse who through ambition to be Pope had bin in effect the mouer of this alteration: and likewise doubting to reclaim the Cardinals S. Mallo & Coseno, for touching the others he was not without hope to reduce them to his obedience: he published against those three a threatening monition vnder paine of priuation of the dignitie of Cardinall and all Church rights and benefits, if within threescore and fiue dayes they made not their appearance afore him: and the better to dispose them to the Popes will, the Colledge of Cardinals sent them an Auditor de la Rote to perswade and pray them, that leauing their priuate contentions, they should as soones returne into the vnion of the Church, offering to giue them such forme of securitie as they desired.

In this time also the Pope, either for that he was irresolute, or laboured with some other passion of worse nature, hearkned continually after the practise of peace with the French king, the which was solicited in his owne Court by the kings Embassadours, and in the French Court by the Embassadour of Scotland and the Bishop of Tiuoli the Nuncio Apostolike: and on the other side he laboured to make with the king of Arago and the Venetians a new confederation against the Frenchmen, making all things lawfull & seemely, that he supposed might turne to the aduantage of his affaires. About this time also, the Pope sought to render Montpulcian to the Florentines, not for any good he wished to them, but for feare least the truce which they had with Sienna being expired, they would call into Tuskane the French bands, to the end to haue a greater strength to recouer that towne. And albeit it was grieuous to the Pope that the Florentines should recouer Montpulcian, and that to hinder them he had already sent to Sienna Iohn Vitelli entertained with an hundred men at armes by the Siennesis, and Guido Vaino with an hundred light horsemen leauied and payed by him: yet afterwarde considering better, that by how much the difficultie appeared great, by so much more would the Florentines be induced to call the, he determined, to the end to take from the king all occasiōs to send armed bands into a place so neare Rome, to provide for this daunger by a way contrarie, Pandolfe Petrucci consenting to it, who the Florentines nourished artificially in the same suspicion. The matter was debated many dayes, for that (small things oftentimes haue no lesse difficulties, nor are no lesse hard to be resolved, then such as be of a greater nature) Pādolfe to auoyd the hatred of the people of Sienna, would the proceeding should be such, that it might seeme there was no other remedie to assure him from the war, & not to alienate the Popes mind. Moreouer the Pope and he would that at the same time should be made betweene the Florentines and the Siennesis a confederation for the defence of their estates: and yet they feared on the other side, that they of Montpulcian espying what was meant and practised, would preuent them in rendering themselves voluntarily, winning by that meane the fauour of the Florentines, who atchieuing their intention, might afterwards refuse to make the confederation. For this cause Iohn Vitelli was sent to remaine within Montpulcian, & the Pope sent thither Iames Simonet, Auditor de la Rote, called certaine yeares after to be Cardinall, to the end that by his working, the affaires of Montpulcian might be raunged & brought to conformitie. In the end, there was made at one time, a confederation for fiew and twentie yeares, betweene the Florentines and the Siennesis: & Montpulcian returned into the handes of the Florentines, Simonet interposing for the pardon and confirmation of the auncient exemptions and priuiledges.

For certaine moneths, the war and actions of hostilitie were more easie and tollerable betweene the king of Romaines and the Venetians, then had wont to be: for that the Almaines being neither strong in men, nor provided of money, thought they did a seruice of no small importance, if they kept Verona. And the Venetian armie wanting sufficient forces to take that Citie, were retired betweene Soane and Louigno, from whence they made a sally one night, and burnt both on this side and beyond the riuer of Adice, a great quantitie of the fruits of the inhabitants of Verona, losing notwithstanding in the action three hundred footemen as they retired, the greatnesse of their praying impediments to their valour for the defence of their proper liues. But as soone as they heard that Monsieur Palissa was comming to Verona with twelue hundred Launces & eight thousand footmen, their armie retired betweene Vincenza and Leguaguo into a place of strength, bearing almost the forme and situation of an Iland, by reason of certaine waters and trenches that had bene there cut vp. Neuerthelesse they taried not in this place many dayes, for that Monsieur Palissa arriuing at Verona with a great part of his armie, and without expecting the residue taking the field presently together with the Almaines, they retired almost in flying to Louigno, and afterwarde with the same feare abandoning Vincenza and all the other townes, together with Polisena Ronissne, which sometimes was pillaged by the Venetians, and sometimes prayed by the Duke of Ferrara, they withdrew to Padoa and Trenisa, their feare enforcing them to follow those meanes for safetie and refuge, which were not so conuenient for their honour and reputation. For the better defence of these Cities, many of the youth and nobility of Venice came thither with mindes resolved to share and communicate with the fortunes of those two Cities: holding it a iust office in

Citizens and countrey men to oppose their liues against the perils and iniuries done to their countrey. The armie of the French and Almains sacked Louigne: and Vincenza which was become a miserable pray to those that were the strongest in the field, rendred it selfe. But all these enterprises and conquestes were of small consequence for the substance of the warre, so farforth as the Venetians held Padoa and Trensa: for that by the oportunitie of those Cities, as soone as the French succours were deuied from the Almains, they reconquered without difficultie, the peeces they had lost: by reason whereof, after these proceedings and aduancements, the armie stayed many dayes at the bridge of Barberano, expecting there either the arriuall or the resolution of Cesar, who being come betweene Trent and Roniero, deuising at one time how to follow his pleasures in hunting wild beasts according to his custome, and to send bands of footemen to the armie, promised to come to Montagnana, sometimes pretending to embrace the enterprise of Padoa, sometimes to execute vpon Trensa, and sometimes to go take Rome, casting in his minde those plots and deuises of enterprise, whereunto his naturall mutabilitie would suffer him to giue no action. But besides his disposition frayle and variable, and which had not lesse communitt with any thing then with constancie & resolution, he found difficulties in these actions for his extreme pouertie and want, and no lesse in the attempt of Rome then in the other enterprises: for that to march thither with those forces of the French, seemed to him an action both against his dignitie and suretie: and the feare least in the absence of that armie, the Venetians would assaile Verona, cōpelled him to leaue there a strong garrison. Besides the French king made difficultie to separate his people from the Duchie of Millan by so great a distance and space of countreys, for the small hope he had to haue accord with the Swissers: who besides the inclinations they exprest to the desires of the Pope, spake openly to the Embassadour of the French king, that the peoples of their Nation were not a little grieued with the ruines of the Venetians, for the communitt that their common weales had together. At last the plots, conceptions, and great discourses of Cesar came, according to his custome, to resolute into effects vnworthy his reputation: for that on the one side, hauing increased the armie with three hundred men at armes Almains, and on the other side, giuen familiar audience to the Venetian Embassadours, with whom he debated continually, and had caused Monsieur Palissa to come first to Lungaro neare Vincenza, and afterwarde to S. Croffe, he solicited him to go take Newcastell, which is a passage below Escalo drawing to Friul, within twentie myles of Felire, and all to make his descending more easie on that side: By this direction Monsieur Palissa marched to Mombellono ten myles from Trensa, from whence, hauing sent fife hundred horsemen and two thousand footmen to open the passage of Newcastell, they went to Escalo. About which time the light horsemen of the Venetians, who ouerranne all the countrey without impediment, ouerthrew neare to Morossiqua, about seuen hundred footemen and many horsemen both French and Italian: who, to passe in surety where the armie was, went from Verona to Soane, to ioyne with three hundred French Launces, who being come after Monsieur Palissa, expected in that place his direction. And albeit in the beginning, things succeeded well with the Frenchmen and Almains, and that Count Guido Rangon leader of the Venetians was taken, his fortune being far inferiour to his valour: yet many paylants descending in fauour of the Venetians, & many occasions rising to their aduantage, they remained in the end victorious, foure hundred of the French footemen being left dead, and their Captaines Mangiron and Chemato detained prisoners: Such is the ordinarie variation of war, and such the naturall infirmitie of humaine causes, not certaine in their owne condition, but subiected to those endes whereunto they haue bene ordained from the beginning. The resolutions which before had bene debated and set downe, grew more and more to declining & diminution, both for that the French king seeing the preparations of Cesar answered nothing his promises and offers, to the end he would draw further off from Italie, returned from Dauphine where he had remained many dayes, to Bloys. And also Cesar, being now retired from Trent, with a minde to go no more to the armie, in place to reconquer all the Venetians held in the firme land, or to impatronise himselfe vpon Rome and the whole estate Ecclesiastike, gaue direction that the Almains should enter into Friul, & vpon the peeces of Trensan, not so much to vex the Venetians, as to constraîne the townes of the countrey to giue him money to preserue them from sacke & pillage. And to the end his people should not be hindered, he appointed the French men to passe further, bestowing two hundred Launces within Verona where the plague raged with great daunger. His reason in this appointment was, for that (having an intention to assaile Friull) there could not be assigned to that service other of his bands, then such as were reserved for the gard of the Castels. Palissa consented to all these appointments, with whom being ioyned Monsieur d'Aubigny Captaine of three hundred Launces which were at Sgaue, he went and incamped vpon the riuer of Piava. Besides this, for a greater suretie of Verona, the Almains left two hundred horsemen within Soane, who lying there in great disorder & negligence, vsing neither watch nor ward, suffered a smarting paine of their securitie, being one night almost all slaine or taken by foure hundred light horsemen and foure hundred footmen of the Venetians. During all this yeare there fell diuerse ordinary accidents & stirres in the countrey of Friull, in Istria, and in the quarters of Trieſte and Fiume, sometime by land with incursions & inuasions, & sometimes by sea with little vessels, those wretched countreys enduring afflictions & calamities by both the armies, sometimes ioyntly, & sometimes seuerally. Afterwards the armie of the Almains entred into Friull, & as soone as they made their approches before Vadina the principall place of that prouince, and where the Venetian Magistrates make their residencie: the layd Magistrates preferring feare before honour, fled with that cowardise which makes men of service dishonoured: by whose feares not onely the towne was yeelded, but also Friull taken as by one course of victorie all the countrey of Friull did the like, eury towne being taxed to a gaine by the Almains. proportion of money according to their abilities: there remained onely Gradisqua situated vpon the riuer of Lisance, wherein was Louis Mossenigo treasurer of Friull with three hundred horsemen, and many bands of footemen: this was no sooner visited by the artillerie, and onely made defence against the first assault, but it was yeelded vp by the importunitie of the souldiers, the treasurer remaining prisoner. From Friull the Almains returned to ioine with Monsieur Palissa incamping within fife myles of Trenisfa, to which Citie they made their approches altogether, Cesar making great request that they would assay to take it: but finding it well fortified on all sides, and wanting in themselfes both the service of pyoners, munitions, with other provisions necessarie, they retired, their wants taking away their hope and possibilitie of good successe. A little after, Palissa by the kings direction, departed to returne to the Duchie of Millan, for that feare of new confederations and conspiracies of the Swissers increased continually. In retiring he had alwayes at his backe the Venetian estradiots, who albeit hoped to distresse him at the least at the passage of the riuers of Brent and Adice, yet his valour made his passage assured, and committed to spoyle two hundred horsemen of the Venetians which were incamped without Padoa, of whom Peter de Lungaro their Captaine remained prisoner: his departing left the Almains not a little confused, for that not obtaining that three hundred other Frésh Launces should remaine for the gard of Verona, they were constrained to retire thither, leauing in pray to the enemies all that they had gayned that sommer. By which occasion the Venetian armie whereof John The Venetians Paule Baillon was gouernour by the death of Luke Maluazzo, recovered immediatly Vincenza: recover Friull, and entring afterwards into Friull, they razed Cremonsa, and recovered the whole countrey, except Gradisqua, which they knew they could not take, notwithstanding a few dayes after certaine bands of footmen leauied in the countrey of Tyrol, tooke Codora, and sacked in like sort Bellona.

In this sort, with light effects, were determined (for the present sommer) the actions and enterprises of armes, with lesse profit then ignominie to the name of Cesar, but with speciall reputation to the Venetians, who by the space of two yeares, inuaded by the armies of Cesar & the Frésh king, came at last to retaine their owne forces and their owne iurisdiction: Matters which albeit were directly against Cesar, yet they brought much more harmes to the French king: for, whilst he did not minifter to Cesar such proportions of succours as might make him able to obtaine the victorie desired, either fearing haply the too great prosperitie and greatnesse of Cesar, or being carried with false counsels & foundations, and lesse looking into the daungers that were at hand, or haply wisdom being blinded with couetousnesse, he gaue him occasion, yea he brought him almost into necessitie to open his eares to such as ceased not to perswade him to separation from him, preserving at one time the Venetians in such estate that they were able with greater forces to knit with those that desired to embase his power. In so much that men began euen now to discern, that both in the mind of Cesar, new thoughts began to kindle, specially for the regard of the Councel, and also his plots and deuises were abated, chiefly since the publication of the Councell of Latran: for neither did send thither according to his many promises any Almain Prelates in the name of Germanie, nor any Proctors to assist in his name: neither did he once stirre for the example of the French king, who had giuen order that in the cōmon name of the French Churches, foure and twentie Bishops should go to Pisa, and all the other Prelates of his Realme should either go thither in person, or else returnish the action by assistance and deputation: yet neuertheless, either to excuse these delays, or that such was his desire indeede, he began in that time to make instance, that aswell for a greater commoditie of the Prelates of Germanie, as for that he promised to be there in person, the Councell that had bene denounced at Pisa, might be transferred to Mantua, to Verona, or to Trent. This demaunde was grieuous to all the other for many causes, and onely agreeable to the Cardinall of S. Crosse, who burning in glorious ambition to mount vp to the Popedom (to which end he had sowed all those discords) hoped that with the fauour and countenance of Cesar, he might easily be raised to that seate. Notwithstanding for that the cause of the Councell would stand much weakened, and almost without the authoritie of Cesar, they sent by common consent the Cardinall of S. Seuerin, both to beseech him that he would send away the Prelates and Proctours which he had so often promised, and also to giue him faith on their behalfe, that assoone as they had giuen beginning to the Councell at Pisa, they would transferre it to the place which he should thinke good: which (say they) if we should do afore, it could not but be very preiudiciall to the common cause, specially it importing greatly to preuent the Conuocation which the Pope had published. Galeas the brother of S. Seuerin, whom with a felicitie farre different from the infelicitie of Lodowike Sforce his first Lord, the king had honoured with the office of the Maister of his horse, went also in this expedition to make the same instance to Cesar on the kings behalfe: but the king sent him principally of purpose to confirme with new offers and plots, the minde of Cesar, for whose inconstancie he liued in no little doubt and suspition, notwithstanding at the same time he was not without hope to conclude the peace with the Pope. That peace, being disputed at Rome by the Cardinall of Nants, and by the Cardinall of Strigonia, and prosecuted in Fraunce by the Scottish Bishop and the Bishop of Tinoly, was drawne into such termes, that almost all the conditions being accorded, the Pope had espoues ioyned to the Bishop of Tinoly a further power to giue it full perfectiō: neuertheless there were inserted in this new power, certaine limitations, which gaue no small occasion to men to thinke that his will and intention were farre otherwise then were his wordes and protestations, specially for that it was discerned, that at the same time he had to do with many potēates in matters altogether contrarie to this, not sparing to embrace all occasions and oportunities, though they brought with them matter of ill opinion and murmure.

The Pope holden for dead.

In this great doubt and suspition of things, there lacked not much that an accident falling vpon the Popes person, brake not all the practises and beginnings of euils that lay in preparation: for falling into a new fit of his sicknesse the seuēteenth of August, the fourth day after there tooke him such a qualme; that for certaine houres such as were about him held him for dead: and the brutē being no lesse quicke, then the accident was mortall, many of the Cardinals that were absent put themselves vpon the way to come to Rome, together also with some of those that had conuocated the Councell. Within Rome the people made no lesse stirre and mouings, then they haue bene wont to do at the death of Popes, yea, there appeared signes and tokens of farre greater tumults, for that Pompey Colonna Bishop of Reato, and Anthonye Sanello, young men of the Romaine nobilitie full of sedition and faction, assembling the commons in the Capitoll, perswaded them with words seditious to put themselves in libertie. But during the action, and as they laboured with a very vehement ambition, to stirre vp the people of Rome to publike rebellio, the Pope reuiued from his dangerous qualme: & albeit there was as yet greater feare then hope of his life, yet, the day following, in the presence of the Cardinals which were assembled in forme of a Cōsistorie, he gaue absolution to his nephew of the murder he had committed vpon the Cardinall of Pania, not by ordinarie way of iustice as he had bin aduised before, (the shortnesse of the time impugning) but by grace & Apostolike remission, as to a person penitent. In the same Consistorie he solicited that the election of his successour should be made Canonically: and seeking to barre others from climbing to so high a degree, by the meanes which rayed him to it, he caused to be published a Bull, full of horrible paines against those that should aspire to that election, either by money or by other recompence, both declaring as nothing all election that should be made by symonie, and giuing an entry and meane verie easie to any Cardinall to impugne it. This constitution he had pronounced from the time he was within Bologna, standing then discōrented with with certaine Cardinals who laboured opely to purchase the promises of other Cardinals, to possess the Papacie after his death. He began now to grow better & better, either by his strong and able complexion, or else for that by destinie he was reserved to be the author & principal occasiō of more great & long calamities : for it was not reasonable to attribute the recovery of his health to the vertue or remedy of medicines, for that he obeyed neither rule nor order, eating in the greatest perill of his maladie, raw apples and things contrary to the prescription of Physicke.

The Pope was no sooner deliuered from danger of death, then he returned estloons to his old deuises and cogitations, continuing at one time to sollicite a peace with the French king, and a confederation with the king of Aragon and the Senate of Venice against the Frenchmen : such was his desire to chase out of Italy all dominion and imperie of the French. And albeit his will was more inclined to warre then to peace, yet he seemed oftentimes drawne with variety of fancies, and for manie reasons followed sometimes one opinion, and sometimes another, not being able to settle in mind and iudgement, hauing his thoughts wandring, and reaching to ends farre aboue his power. The thing that caried his inclination to the warre, besides his ancient hatred against the French, and that he was not able to obtaine all the conditions of peace which he desired, were the vehement & importunate perswasions of the king of Aragon, who feared now more then euer, least the French king being once at peace with the Pope, would execute vpon the realme of Naples vpon the first occasion. Wherein to the end his counsels might carie a greater authority, besides the armie at sea which was afore repassed out of Affrica into Italy vnder Peter Nauarre, he had sent newly out of Spaine another sea armie, containing fife hundred men at armes, sixe hundred horsemen mounted vpon Iennets, and three thousand footmen : neuertheless this king proceeding vnderhand with his accustomed suttleties, made shew that he desired more then euer the warre against the Moores, from which his owne profit or particular interest did not draw him, but only a holy deuotion which he had alwayes borne to the Sea Apostolike: only he alleaged, that being not able of himselfe to entertaine his souldiers, it was necessary that the Pope and the estate of Venice should minister to him; whereunto, to the end they might condescend more easily, his bands that were all descended into the Ile of Capri neare to Naples, made shewes as though they prepared to passe into Affrica. But his inmoderate demands much amazing the Pope, and his suttleties pleasing him nothing at all, he entred into many suspitions, well knowing that that king ceased not to giue to the French king hopes all contrarie : he knew the Venetians would not willingly be drawne from his will and purposes: euen so he was not ignorant that for the greatnesse of such a warre wherein they were, they were no longer able to beare out the burthen and charges as before: and that time had brought the Senate now to seeke more to defend their owne, then to take in hand a new warre, which could not be continued without intollerable expences : he hoped that the Swissers, by a common inclination of those countrey men, would declare themselues against the French king, but hauing no certainty thereof, he seemed to hold it vndiscreet to oppose himselfe to so great daungers for a hope so ill assured, not being ignorant, that as yet were not reiected and cut off their practises with the French king, and manie of their Chieftaines and principals, to whom reuerted not small profits by the French amities, labored all they might that in the assembly which was presently to be holden, their alliance might be renewed with the king. Touching the will and intention of Caesar, notwithstanding he had many inclinations by the king Catholike, & of his owne nature a sworne enemy to the French name, yet his hope of him was lesse then his feare, knowing the great offers that were made to him of new aswel against the Venetians, as against him, to the which the French king was able to giue more high state and perfection then to any others that could be made to him : he saw that if Caesar should ioyne with the French king, he had greatly to feare the counsell by reason of his authoritie : and also his owne power ioyned in good faith and meaning with the forces and treasures of the Crowne of Fraunce, and with the oportunitie of the estates of the both the Pope could not in reason haue any hope of the victorie, which he found verie hard to obtaine against the French king alone. But that which gaue him the greatest stomacke, was a hope he had that the king of England would be wonto raise warre against the Crowne of France, both by the counsels and perswasions of the king Catholike his father in law, and for the authoritie of the Sea Apostolike, which was then great in the Ile of England, and in whose name he had with vehement petitions implored his succours against the French king, as against an vsurper and oppressor of the Church : to these inducements was joined also the naturall hatred as well of that king as of the people of Englād to the French nation, much helping in this actiō the forwardnesse of the kings youth and great abundance of treasure left to him by his father, which was supposed to amount to a wonderfull quantitie. These were proper instruments to kinde fire in the mind of this young king, and hauing neuer experienced in his kingdom but fortunes happie and plausible, he was also pushed forward by an honorable desire to renew the glory of his ancestors, who intituling themselues kings of Fraunce, and at sundrie times vexing that kingdom with great warres, had not only holden for many yeares Guienne and Normandie (rich & mightie prouinces of that Crowne) and taken in a battell neare to Poytiers the French king with two of his sons and manie of his Nobility: but also, had occupied together with the most part of the kingdom the cite of Paris the capitall cite of the kingdome: lastly their valours and fortunes haue bin so terrible to the Frenchmen, that if Henrie the fift then king of England had not exchanged this life in the flower of his age and glorious course of his victories, it was beleeued he had made an absolute conquest of the whole realme of Fraunce, and brought subiected to himselfe the Crowne & imperie of that nation. The memorie of these honorable victories working with the youth & disposition of the king, were not of litle force to draw him to action, notwithstanding his father vpon his dying had expressly aduised him about all other things to entertaine peace with the French nation, as the only mean for the kings of Englād to raigne surely & happily. It was not to be doubted, but the war of the English against the French king (being also assailed in other places) was of right great consequence, for that in that action the very intrals of the kingdome were charged, the Frenchmen redoubting much the name of the English, by the memorie of victories and conquests passed. Notwithstanding all these the Pope for the incertainty of the faith of strangers, and for the farre distance of those countries so farre remoued, could not establish or repose his counsels vpon those fauours. These were the hopes of the Pope, and thus were they limited and layd out in condition and proportion.

The thoughts of the French King.

On the other side the French king, to whom nothing was lesse pleasing then to be in warre against the Church, was greatlie desirous to haue peace, by meane whereof as he was to shake off the ill will of the Pope, so also he was to be deliuered of the importunate demaunds and necessities of Cesar: two respects which troubled him not a litle, the one offending his conscience, being too much addicted, and the other consuming his treasures whereof he had made manie prodigalities: he made no difficultie to breake the Councell of Pisa, which he had introduced only to make the Pope condescend to peace by that feare, so farre forth as there might be pardon and remission to the Cardinals and others that had bene partakers either in counsell or in action: but on the contrarie, the demaund for the restoring of Bologna kept him in suspence: a cite by reason of his situation, most conuenient to molest him: he feared the peace was not sincerely accepted by the Pope, nor with a mind disposed to obserue it if occasions returned, but onlie to deliuer himselfe presently from the daunger of the Councell, and from the warre, of whose successe he had no small ieaousie. And yet he hoped to confirme the mind of Cesar, with the greatnesse of his offers, and therefore negotiating of common occurrants as with a confederate, he perswaded him vehemently among other things not to consent that Bologna a Citie of so great importance, should estoones returne vnder the iurisdiction of the Pope: and touching the kings of Aragon and of England, he did not together distrust them, notwithstanding the maner of proceeding of the one was already manifest, and the brute of the intention of the other no lesse publike and generall: and notwithstanding their Embassadors jointly had perswaded him, first with words of modestie, bearing a pretence of office and amitie, and afterwards pressed him with importunities to command that both the Cardinals and Prelates of his kingdom should be at the Councell of Latran, and also to suffer and see that the Church were estoones repossessed of the Citie of Bologna, one of her members not in the least degree. The reason of this confidence touching the English, was, that they made shew to haue desire to perseuer in the confederation which they had with him, and many of his counsell giuing him surtie of the same, he beleeued they wold attēpt nothing against him: & for the king of Aragon, his sleights & suttile apparances were such, that the king gaue a lesse faith to his doings then to his speeches, wherein he alwayes assured him neuer to enter into action of armes against him: with which opinion he suffered himselfe somewhat to be perswaded, that that king would neuer ioyne in armes so manifestly with his enemies, as he professed by his counsels and secret deliberations: he beguiled himself so much in these opinions, that notwithstanding he had hope giuen by those that were of his faction in Switzerland, that he might yet reconcile that nation if he would consent to their demaunds for increasing their pensions, ye he estoons refused it with no lesse obstinacie then before, alleaging that it were no equitie to yeeld himselfe to be taxed by them: and vsing sharpe remedies, where easie meanes had bene more necessarie, he made restraint that they should haue no reliefe of vitualls out of the Duchie of Millan, thinking that by their vniuersall scarcities, redoubled by the sterilitie of their countrey, he should in the end bring them to agree to the renouation of the alliance according to the ancient conditions.

By this time was come the first day of September, which had bene afore set downe for the beginning of the Councell of Pisa, at which day the Proctors of the Cardinals being come to Pisa, celebrated in their names the acts appertaining to the expressing of the same. At this the Pope did not a litle storme, specially against the Florentines, for that they had consented that the Councell of diuels (for so did he alwayes call it) tooke beginning vpon their estates, for which transgression he declared that the cities of Florence and Pisa stood subiect to the interdictio Ecclesiastike, by vertue of the Bull of the Councell which he had caused to be published: wherein it was set downe in an expresse article, that whosoever he were that fauored the diuellish assembly at Pisa, stood excommunicated, interdicted, and subiect to all paines seuerely ordained by the lawes against schismatices and heretikes: and threatning to inuade the with armes, he elected the Cardinall of Medicis, Legate of Perousa: and not long after, the Cardinall Regina Legate of Tologna being dead, he bestowed him in his place, to the end that he who enuied their estate, being vpon their marches with so great authoritie, his presence might make them fall amongst the elues into suspition & confusion: a thing which he hoped might easily succeed for the state & reputatio wherein he stood at that time in that citie: for, besides the affections of certaine particulars desiring the returne of the Medices, discordes and diuisions (the ancient maladie of that citie) raigned amongst the generall number of Citizens of greatest apparace. These diuisions bred at that time by the greatnesse and authority of the Magistrate which they call Gonfalonnier, which some for ambition and enuy could not suffer, & others stood ill contented, for that iudging him to intrude more into the deliberation of things then appertained to his place, they thought he left not to the that part of authoritie which their estates and conditions deserued: they complained, that in the gouernment of the Citie ordained and contained in two extremities, that is to say, the publike Magistrate, and the counsell popular, was manifest error touching the true institution of common weales: for a Senate duly ordained, by the which besides that it should be as a reasonable temperature betweene the one and other extremitie, the principals and best qualified Citizens should obtaine in the common weale a degree more honourable: but the Gonfalonnier did the contrary, either by ambition, or by vaine suspition, being notwithstanding principally chosen for the redresse and order of that. The thing which they desired in this action notwithstanding it was reasonable, and yet not of that importance as to turne their minds to diuisions, for that without it they were both honorably raised and aduanced, and withall there was no forme of disposing of the publike affaires without them, was the verie originall & principall cause of the great calamities which fell afterwards vpon that citie. The factions & diuisions amongst the citizens, being grounded therupon, & the enemies of the Gonfalonnier suspecting him with the Cardinall of Volterre his brother to be at the deuotion of the French king, and to repose altogether in his amitie: opposed as much as they could against the deliberations that were to be made in fauour of that king, desiring that all might be transferred to the Pope. By this also it came to passe, that the name of the family of Medicis began to be lesse hatefull in that citie then before, for that those chiefeft and mightiest Citizens who earst denied their returne, were now no more concurrant to persecute them, & much lesse to hinder the community and conuersation of others with them. The malice they bare to the Gonfalonnier wrought this alteration and change of their affection, and the more to abate his authoritie, they sturke not to expresse by many tokens, how litle that familie was estranged from their fauor and amitie, not forbearing also to giue shadow to others to desire their returne & greatnesse: & of this it hapned that not only those that were their assured and perfect friends (in whom was no great power) entred into hopes of innouation and new things, but also many of the Nobilitie and youth of the Citie, pushed on either by their dicis who af-

great prodigalities and expences, or by certaine particular discaires, or at least by ambitious desires to surpass others in dignities, expected a mutation of that estate by the means of their returning (that disposition having bene nourished and increased many yeares by the Cardinall Medi- cis with great sleight and fittletie) for euer since the death of his brother Peter, whose name was both feared and hated, he had made no shew to entermiddle in the affaires of Florence, nor to haue any desire to aspire to the ancient greatnesse of his familie: and to omit no office which might either make him merit the more, or insinuate further, he forgot not with great humanitie and fauours to welcome & receiue all the seuerall people of Florence that had recourse to Rome, offering himselfe a ready instrument for the dispatch of their affaires, wherein disposing his fauor no lesse to such that had bene manifest enemies against his brother, then to others whom he held indifferent, he vsed in his behauiour and speech to lay all the fault vpon his brother, as though the faults with the memorie and hate thereof, were determined together with his death. This form and maner of behauiour he continued many yeares, which, accompanied with the opinion that went of him in the Court of Rome, to be by disposition liberall, affable and gracious to all men, brought him in the end to be acceptable to manie at Florence: in which respect the Pope that desired not a litle the alteration of that gouernment, preferred him with great foresight to that Legation.

The Florentines appealed from the interdiction, & to commit the lesse offence in the apellation, they called it not the Councell of Pisa, but named it the sacred Councell of the Church vni-uersall: and as though by the appellation the effect of the interdiction had bene suspended, the priests of the foure principall Churches were compelled by commandement of the supreme magistrate to make publike celebration of all diuine offices, the same disclosing more and more the diuision of the Citizens, and left in the discretion of euery one either to obserue or contemne the interdict. For this reason, the Embassadors of the kings of England and Aragon made new instance to the French king, offering him peace with the Pope, so farre forth as he wold see Bologna rendered to the Church, & that the Cardinals might make a presence at the Councell of Latan, whe they offered that the Pope should receiue them all to pardon. But the regard and consideration of Bologna holding him from consenting to the peace, he made answer, that as he did not defend a citie in contumacie and rebellion against the Church, vnder whose iurisdiction and obedience it was gouerned in the same forme & estate of pollicy wherein it had bin ruled many years afore the Pontificacy of Innocent, to who it belonged not to demaund a greater authority then had bin required & practised by his predecessors: so also touching the Councell of Pisa, it had bin introduced in a most honourable & holy purpose, to reforme the notorious and intollerable disorders of the Church, wherunto would be easily reduced her ancient vertue & brightnesse, and that without perill of schisme or diuision, if the Pope would agree to assist that Councell, the reason being no lesse iust, then the action conuenient for him, managing the supreme place: he added lastly, that his vnquietnesse together with his inflamed mind addicted to wars & troubles, had chiefly induced him to bind himselfe to the protection of Bologna, which for his honor he would defend with no lesse care & study, then he would see to the protection of his towne of Paris. The Pope then shaking off all his cogitations & thoughts to the peace, no lesse for his ancient hatreds & couetousnes, then for feare of the Councell & his desire to Bologna, & finally suspecting, that if he deferred any longer to deliberate & resolue, he should be left abandoned of euery one, the Spanish souldiers beginning now to embarke at Carpy, making as though they would passe into Africa: he determined to finish the confederation negotiated with the king Catholike & the Senate of Venice, which was solemnly published the fift of October in the Church of S. Maria de populo, the Pope and all the Cardinals assisting. This confederation bare that they should principally preserue the vnyty of the Church, and the better to defend her from present schisme, to reuerse and dissolue the assembly of Pisa: to recouer the Citie of Bologna appertaining immediatly to the Sea Apostolike, together with all other peeces & places which directly or indirectly beloged to the Church, Ferrara being comprehended vnder that fence: that against all such that should oppose against anie of these things, or labour to throw any impediments (these words signified the French king) they should proceede to chase them out of Italie with a mightie armie, wherein the Pope was to maintaine foure hundred men at armes, fise hundred light horsmen, and sixe thousand footmen: the Senate of Venice should furnish eight hundred men at armes, a thousand light.

light horsemen, and eight thousand footmen: and to the king of Aragon were allotted twelue hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and ten thousand footmen, for the entertainment of whom the Pope should pay during the warre eight thousand duckets euerie mo-neth, and the Venetians as much, furnishing presently a pay for two moneths, within which time they were bound to march into Romagnia or to other place where the confederates should be:
That the king of Aragon should arme twelue gallies, and the Venetians fourteene, which at the same time should make war vpon the French king in Lombardy. That Dom Raimond of Cardona then Viceroy in the realme of Naples, should be Captaine generall of the army: That if in this war there were conquered any townes in Lombardy which had bene the Venetians, that in that case should be obserued the declaration of the Pope, who forthwith in a writing apart and seueral, pronounced that they should be rendred to the Venetians: There was reserued for Cesar liberty to enter into the confederation, and likewise to the king of England, bearing to the one an vncertaine hope to be able in the end to separate him from the French king: and for the other was left a time by the expresse consent of the Cardinall of York, who did alwayes assist & communicate in the treatise of the league. As this confederation was fully resolved & established, Ierome Donato the Venetian Embassador died, who for his singular wisdom and ability being very deare to the Pope, had in this actiō & other affaires during his legatiō, done many great seruices to his cōtreie.

This confederation made by the Pope vnder colour to deliuer Italy from the inpery of strangers, drew the minds of men to diuerse interpretations according to the diuersity of their iudge-ments and passions: for many beguiled with the respect and magnificence of the title, set out with great merites and prayes so diuine and high an enterprise: sayd it was an action right worthy the maiestie of his place, and that the greatnesse of his mind could not haue chosen an enterprise more gracious, nor lesse full of discretion then of magnanimitie, stirring vp by his industry one stranger against another: in such sort that the bloud of forrainers more then of naturall Italians being spilt vpon the Frenchmē, not only the liues of Italians were spared & reserued, but also after one of the parties should be expulsed, it would be easie with the naturall armies of the countreie to chase out the other, being already weakened and out of breath. Others on the other side, in whom perhaps were setled more deepe impressions and considerations of the substance of things, reposing litle in the deluding shewes of a title magnificall, feared that the warres that were begun with intention to deliuer Italy from forreine powers, would grow more to hurt the vitall spirites of that body, then other warres that had bene begun with a manifest profession and resolute intention to subdue it: They sayd, it was no lesse vaine then ill aduised, to hope that the armies of Italy deprivied of vertue, of discipline, of reputation, of Captaines, of authority, and the wils of their Princes not conformed, should be mighty inough to driue out of Italy him that is already possessed of conquest and victory, in whom albeit all other remedies should faile, at least he could neuer faile of the meane to be reunited with those that he had vanquished to the common ruine of all the states and regions of Italy: They foresaw that there was more reason to feare that in these new stirres were not occasion to make pillage of Italy by new nations, then to hope that by the vnion of the Pope and the Venetians, there should be any ability to vanquish the Frenchmen and the Spaniards: They sayd that as it was to be wished that the disagreement and ill dis-gested counsels of their Princes had not opened the way to forraine armies to enter into the maine body of Italy: so notwithstanding, since by their infelicity, two of the most worthy members of that body were occupied by the French and Spanish kings, it was to be esteemed a farre lesse calamity, that they both continued there vntill either the goodnesse of God, whose rule goeth through all, or the fauour of fortune, who ordereth things in time, would minister occasions better grounded, and ayde them with oportunities more conuenient, for that the one king waighing in ballance against the other, their mutuall ieaiousies would defend the liberty of such as were not yet falne into seruitude: then that betweene themselves they should fall into armes, by meane of which, whilst the warre should last, the parts that yet remained sound would be torne in pec-ces by pillages, by fyrings, by bloud, and by other miserable accidents which war draweth with it: And lastly which of them should remaine victor, would assuredly afflict the whole body with a more hard and heauie seruitude.

But the thoughts of the Pope (in whom was another opinion) being become more violent & kindled by the new confederation: as soone as the tearme limited in the admonition published before against those Cardinals that were Authors of the Councell, was passed, he called together the publike Consistory with great solemnity, and sitting in habit pontificall in the hall named the hall of the kings, he declared that the Cardinals of S. Crosse, of S. Mallo, of Cosenze, and of Bayeux, were false from the dignity of Cardinals, and had incurred all those paines, wherunto are subiect heretikes and schismatikes: he published also an admonition of the same forme against the Cardinall S. Senerin, whom he had not molested till that day: and proceeding in the same heate to the deuises for warre, he solicited continually the comming of the Spaniards, hauing an intention afore all other things to bring warre vpon the Florentins, both to draw to the deuotion of the confederats that common-weale, restoring to the gouernement the familie of Medici: and also to satisfie the infinit malice which he bare to Peter Soderin Gonsalonnier, as though it was thorough his authority, that the Florentins would neuer be separated from the French king, giuing also a consent afterwards, that the Councell should be holden at Pisa.

Of this resolution many signes and relations were brought to Florence, where falling into preparations to be able to sustaine the warre, it was propounded amongst other things, that it could not be vnreasonable to resist with the reuenues and goods of the Church, the warre which the Church went about to make vniustly: and therefore it were no offence to equitie or conscience to constrain the Churchmen to contribute some great quantity of money, but vnder these conditions, that they should be bestowed in places of surety, and the money not to be disbursed but in the action of warre, which not hapning, and the feare thereof ceassing, euery portion should be restored to the parties that lent it. To this deuise many of the Citizens spake against, some for feare to incurre the paines imposed by the cannon lawes vpon the defilers of the liberty of the Church: they were the least in number and most inferior in power and authority: but the greater part impugned this proposition, onely to obiect against the will and reasons of the Gonsalonnier, of whose authority it was manifest that this counsell did proceede: in so much as the new law ordained hereupon, being already debated in the Councels priuie, no lesse by the diligence of the Gonsalonnier, then inclination of many others, and nothing wanting now but the approbation of the great and publike Councell which stood assembled for that purpose, the Gonsalonnier reasoned for the law in this maner.

" I hope my Lords, there are none amongst you that reasonably can doubt what haue bene
 " the perpetuall intentions of the Pope against your liberty: wherein if you be not assured by con" sideration of his present dealing subiecting you vniustly to the interdiction, and neither heard
 " your iustifications, which be no lesse true then many in number, nor respected the hope that was
 " giuen him to remoue the Councell from Pisa within few dayes: lay your selues downe at least to " the coparison and iudgement of his other actions, no lesse malicious in their seuerall working, then
 " contrary to the memory and examples of his Predecessors, and yet by him continued in all sea" sons since his Pontificacie. I will not particulate the seuerall tokens and testimonies of his ill mind " towards this estate, and much lesse obiect the sundry effects of his great enuie & malice: such re-" petitions bring no fruit where the harmes be already suffered and passed. And it answereth not " the modestie that this place expecteth to labor in inuectiues, and make men infamous by imputa" tion: yet, for that the memorie of actions passed, serueth sometime as a warning against acci" dents that may happen, I hold it not inconuenient to the present matter to inferre some, hoping
 " I shall not be interpreted to be the inuenter of the thing through malice, which I deliuer but by " relation. None of you can be ignorant, that during our long warres against the Pisans, this com" mon-weale neither by supplications, which brought with them their piety and necessitie, nor by
 " the extremity of our estate which oftentimes we humbled at his secte, could obtaine of him any " fauour either publike or secret, notwithstanding that both the iustice of our cause deserued it, and
 " also it was an action appertaining to the surety of the Church and tranquillitie of all Italy, to seeke
 " to quench such a fire, which not many yeares before had kindled many great calamities and trou" bles: where, of the contrary, as often as they of Pisa had recourse to him (a thing which we cou'd
 " not but suspect and were alwayes made more certaine after our victory) he did not onely receiue
 " the complaint of their afflictions with compassion and pity, but also nourished them in their ob" stinacy with diuerse hopes, which was not a new inclination in him, but begun & continued since
 " he was Cardinall: for, after the Frenchmen had leauied their campe from before Pisa, he wrought
 " what he could with the French king and the Cardinall of Amboise, that Pisa should be receiued into

into protection, and we left excluded and abandoned : he shadowed the enuie he bare to vs, with a dissembled remorse vpon the necessities of the Pisans, and vnder the regard and title of his profession, made vs blind in the property of his disposition : being become Pope, he neuer imparted to our common-weale any one of those graces which the sea Apostolike is wont to minister in great liberality : he would not in so many difficulties and necessities of ours, once consent that we might at any time so much as releue our selues with the reuenues of the Church, contrary to the example of Alexander the sixt, who gaue vs that liberty many times, notwithstanding he was a settled enemy to this common-weale ; yea, expressing one will in things inferior, and in matters of greater nature, he forbad vs to leauy money of the Clergy for the entertaining of Doctors and publike studies, notwithstanding that both the summe was litle, and had continued by licence of many Popes, and also it was conuerted to the instruction of youth and aduancement of learning : a worke of singular piety and vertue . Besides, that which was practised in Rome by Barilemew Aluiano with Cardinall Ascanius, was not debated without his priuity, wherein as the apparances were publike and manifest ; so the effects had also succeeded, if others of greater power had not withdrawne themselves by the sudden death of the Cardinall : and yet the first foundations failing, he would neuer (at our iust requests) consent, to restraine Aluiano to make leauies or waging of souldiers in the territories of Rome : only he forbad the families of Colonna and Sauella, to inuade the lands of such as were prepared to offend vs, by whose helpes we might haue shaken off our dangers with very small charges : That mind cannot be free from suspicion of malice which forbeareth to remedy vniust harmes, forbiddeth all other meanes that are offered, forsaketh the causes of men iustly complaining, and foreseeeth through the deuises of his enuy, the ruines of those whom he is bound to support, though by no other respect of office, yet by the property of his profession and calling. Touching our businesse with Sienna, he maintained alwayes against vs Pandolfe Petrucci, and compelled vs with threatnings to prolong the truce : and for no other cause did he ioyne with vs for the recouering of Montpulcian (for whose defence he had sent men to Sienna) then for feare least the army of the French king should be called by vs into Tuscanie : he ioyned with vs at times when his feare was greater then our perill, and dealt seuerally when he saw he might do vs harme by too much trusting him : he would not sticke to abuse his authority to apply vs to his will, and was alwayes at hand to serue his purposes of our ready disposition : of the contrary, we did neuer offend him, but sought to proceed in all things with respect and reuerence to the Church, and particularly haue gratified him in all those demands which haue lyen in our power, yea euen to send our men at armes to ayde him in the enterprise of Bologna, being neither bound, nor our proper profit respected in the action : but not one of these, not one obedience, not one humilitie, could suffice to appease the seuerity of his minde, whereof, besides many other apparant testimonies and tokens, this is not the least, that he receiued them willingly and gladly that offered to kill me, not for hatred he bare to me that neuer offended him, and in the time of his Cardinalship he had honourably embraced me, but for a burning desire he had to depriue you of your liberty . I am loath to offend the lawes of modestie, and much more to be ouercaried with the memorie of mine owne harmes : but because the thing is true by your proper witnesse and testimony, and in remembering the offence the offender suffreth no iniurie, I hope I shall not be thought too arrogant in speaking, where lesse silence might haue made me suspected of simpleness : he hath alwayes sought to bring this common-weale to cleaue to his immoderate and vniust willes : he hath alwayes wrought to make it a partaker of his expences and dangers : and therefore not hoping but that rash and vndiscreete resolutions might succcede of the moderation and maturity of your counsels, he hath disposed all his deuises to this end, to bring into this City a tyrannie, which depending vpon him, should not be directed and managed according to your profit, but after the importunity of his lustes and couetousnesse, with the which (being drawne from ends excessiue) he thinketh vpon no other thing then to sowe seedes of discord, to bring forth one warre after another, and to nourish and keepe kindled a perpetuall fire in Christendome . And why should we doubt, that at this present he is not possessed of an intention to set vpon vs, hauing two mighty armies ioyned with him, being Lord of Romagnia, and the state of Sienna subiected to his obedience : it is not hard to draw to action the minde that is so addicted to dominion and imperie . And where we are perswaded is emulation of our greatnesse and glorie, there let vs

" looke for the worst that malice and hatred can do : we haue reason to suspect that he will assay to " obtaine that by open force, whereunto he hath so long aspired by secret deuises, his thirst being
 " so much the greater, by how much he seeth vs ill prepared for our defence : a matter which " though no other thing would detect and signifie vnto vs, his thoughts and deuises haue suf" ficiently expressed it, by appointing lately for Legate of Bologna, the Cardinall of Medici in in" tention to preferre him to the army : a Cardinall who had neuer receiued any honourable place of " him, neuer gratified with benefits, neuer acceptable to him for seruice, counsell, opinion, trust
 " or confidence : take your considerations of these things, and what else can you iudge, then that " giuing authority to march vpon your frontiers, and almost to set his foote vpon your neckes,
 " with such a dignity, such a reputation, and such a terror of armes, the man that only aspireth to " be your tyrant, desiring to stirre vp and conspire your Citizens to affect tyrannie more then li" berty, and to draw your subiects to mutinie, to the end to introduce his imperie : It belongs to
 " wise men to foresee a mischiefe afore it happen, and it is the reward of men vnhappy to lament
 " it when it is chaunced : The wise sayler takes his iudgement of the weather by the cloudes and to" kens of the ayre, and men politike turne to their proper warning the signes that are sent from " him whom they both suspect and feare. In regard of these reasons it hath bene iudged necessary
 " by this honourable Councell and many other Citizens of respect and merite, that for the defence
 " and protection of this liberty, there should be leauied the same prouisions as if the warre were
 " certaine. And albeit it is very likely that the French king, at least for his proper interest, will ayde
 " vs mightily : yet, we are neither for that hope to leaue off those remedies which be in our power,
 " nor forget that many impediments may easily chaunce, which in some sort may depriue vs of " his succours. It may be there be some that will object against this counsell, as being neither neces" sary nor profitable : in such men perhaps is more dominion of passion or other particular hu" mor, then of affection or zeale to the common benefite. Some also alleage, that being vn-
 " certaine of the Popes intention to enter into warre, it is a resolution vnprofitable, such as offen-" deth his authority, and by taxing the reuenues of the Church, to giue him iust occasion to be an" gry, and to prouoke him to make warre vpon vs almost by necessitie : as though by so many eu-
 " dent signes and arguments is not manifestly comprehended the substance of his intention, or as " though it appertained to wise gouernours of common-weales to deferre preparations till after
 " the beginning of the assault, and first to receiue the blow of the enemy, afore we couer our bodies
 " with armes necessary for our defence : The medicine that is ministred out of time, workes not " to the benefit of the patient ; the counsell is without fruit that comes after the fact, and it is too " late to apply the remedy after the ill be hapned. Others of vs dwell in this opinion, that not to
 " adde the wrath of God to the anger of the Pope, we must prouide for our safety by some other
 " meane, since we are not yett fallen into that necessitie, without the which secular Princes haue bin
 " alwayes forbidden by the cannon lawes, and that vnder great paines, to impose any charge vpon
 " the persons or goods of the Church. This reason hath bene also considered by vs and others that
 " haue giuen counsell to the publication of this law : but who doubteth that since our publike re-
 " uenues are not sufficient to furnish the expences we must sustaine, and our treasors hauing bene
 " so long time drayned, and our necessities no lesse increasing by the continuation of the warres :
 " who doubteth, I say, that it is not both reasonable and necessary, that the charges we are to su-
 " staine for the defence of a warre vniustly begun by the Church, should not be leauied and sup" ported with the moneyes of the persons of the Church : a matter which many times heretofore
 " hath bene practised by our City, and of no lesse example with other Princes and common-weales :
 " but neuer with greater moderation and respect neither here nor elsewhere, for that there is no
 " intention to employ them in other action, but only to lay them vp in places of suretie, to the end
 " to make repayment to the persons themselves if we find no occasion to feare. So that if the Pope
 " bring not warre vpon vs, as it is reasonable we disburse not the treasors of the Church, and in ef" fect they shall be no way expended : so also if he make no conscience to afflict vs, why should " we be curious by all our wayes and meanes possible to defend vs from the iniuries of a war so vn-
 " iust : where tyrants turne their authority to oppresse innocents, to enter into armes for our own safe" ty can be no breach of obedience nor order : it holds sufficiently of equitie to repulse a violence
 " by the same meanes wherewith it is offered : what occasion of displeasure hath he found in this " common-common weale, which by necessitie and not by will, hath suffered the Councell to be assembled „ at Pisa: shall we for this be interpreted to haue prouoked his anger? faults done by necessitie bring „ with them a sufficient reason of excuse: is it to prouoke his anger, when we refuse to lay downe „ our neckes to him that hath vowed to strike them off? it is farre from the imputation of prouoking „ to prepare and put our selues in order to resist his vniust violence: No, we should the rather pro- „ uoke him, if we sayled to make conuenient prouisions, for that the hope of the facilitie of the en- „ terprise would make his fury the greater, raging already with a burning emulation to destroy your „ libertie euen to the foundations. The feare to offend God neede not retaine you: for, our neces- „ sitie is so great, and our daunger so manifest, not standing subiect to any thing that may more pre- „ iudice vs: that it is suffered not onely to serue our turnes with that part of those reuenues which is „ not conuerted into workes of pietie and charitie, but also it is lawfull to lay hands euen vpon the „ things sacred: for hat according to the law of nature, the defence and resisting of iniuries is com- „ men to all men, allowed of God, and approued of all nations, a perpetuall rule to men, and engen- „ dred together with the world: it will last as long as the world, and is not subiect to derogation by „ any of the lawes ciuill or cannon, grounded vpon the wils and traditions of men, which being not „ otherwise recorded, then in paper or other matter frayle & declining, haue no power to derogate „ a perpetuall law, not made by men or their counsels, but engraued by nature herselfe in the spirits „ and hearts of all mankind: we must not expect and temporise till we be brought into the last ex- „ tremitie, for that being once enuironed with oppressions, our recourse to remedies would be „ too late, and we should stand to lament the harmes which we might haue auoyded: it is too „ late to prouoke to vomit when the poyson hath pierced to the bones: the souldier serueth no turne „ that beginneth to march when the battell is done. Besides all this, how can it be denied, that the „ state and multitude of priuate persons shall suffer great distresse by it, seeing that by the impostes „ that are layd vpon them, the greatest part of the are constrained to cut off some of those expences „ without the which they can not liue but with great incommodity and diminution of things neces- „ sarie to their degree: That is the necessitie which hath bene considered vpon by such as haue made „ the lawes, by which we are forbidden to expect till our Citizens be brought to the daunger of fa- „ mine and no longer able to sustaine their families. On the other part, by this taxation, there is no „ incommodie imposed vpon the Churchmen, for that they do onely disfurnish themselves of that „ part of their reuenues, which, either they keepe vnprofitable in their coffers, or reserue to expend „ in prodigalities superfluous, or perhaps some of them (I speake vnder pardon) would lash out in „ pleasures dishonest. This is a perpetuall resolution of all wise men, that the libertie of Cities and „ common weales is acceptable to God, for that in them, more then in any other sort of gouerne- „ ment is preserved the common benefite, iustice administred without acception of persons, the „ minde of Citizens rayfed more and more to workes of vertue and honour, and more respect & re- „ uerence borne to religion: And yet you beleue it is an action not a little displeasing to God, that „ to defend a thing so precious, for the which who sheds his proper blood winneth greatest merite „ and praise, you employ a little part of the fruits and reuenues of temporall things: which notwith- „ standing they are dedicated to Churches, yet they are all descended vnto them by almes, by dona- „ tions, and by inducements of laymen our elders: They are to be no lesse employed for the prefer- „ uation and safetie of Churches, subiect and exposed in a time of warre, then things secular which „ are layd downe to the crueltie and couetousnesse of souldiers, neither are they more to be respe- „ cted in a war made by the Pope, then if there were a persecution by the Turkes or the greatest „ tyrants of the world. Forbeare not whilst you haue time to prouide for the safetie of your coun- „ trey, be not curious in consciēce to defend your libertie, then the which you can not offer to God „ a temporall sacrifice more acceptable or worthy: Thinke that to chase the war from your houses, „ from your temples, from your Monasteries, and from your possessions, there is no better remedie „ then to make knowne to him that is risen to offend you, that you are determined to forget no- „ thing that may serue to your defence. That force is iust that is rayfed in a necessary cause, & where „ you want secular meanes to warrant your liues, to apply the goods of the Church in this propor- „ tion, can be no breach of equitie nor conscience: nature by prerogatiue makes things lawfull for „ defence, which the law ceremonially reserueth for other respects.

* The discourse of this graue Magistrate, no lesse reasonable in it selfe, then necessarie for their comon safetie, wrought such impressiō in the minds of the hearers, that the law proponed was without any difficultie approued by the great councell. By reason whereof, notwithstanding the displeasure and discontentment of the Pope increased more and more, taking more hot occasion to dispose the confederats to begin war with the Florentins: yet the perswasions of Pandolfo Petrucci had power to turne from that opinion aswell the Pope as the Deputies that solicited in Italie for the king of Aragon: for Pandolfo giuing counsell to assaile Bologna, blamed much all deuises and enterprises to bring the war into Tuskane, alleaging that Bologna being vnab'le for her proper weakenesse, to defend her selfe, should be enforced to call in the forces of the French king, and for the Florentins, what with their owne power, concurring also the proper profit of the king, he would no lesse see to their defence, then to Bologna: That albeit the Florentins bare a certaine inclination of minde to the French king, yet neuertheless they were wise and stood alwayes iealous of the preseruatiō of their estate, neuer hauing at his instance offended any with armes during so great stirs: yea they had not ministred to him in any other sort of seruice, but onely furnished him for the defence of the state of Lombardie with two hundred men at armes, according to the termes of the capitulation made in cōmon betweene him & the king Catholike: he said there could not be done to the French king a thing more agreeable or profitable, then to constrain the Florentins to giue ouer to be Newters, & to ioyn their cause with his: That it would be a matter of great indiscretiō, if his enemies were the cause to make him obtaine that which he could neuer bring to passe by his authoritie, the king hauing in vaine solicited by many prayers & promises to declare them selues for him: That it was discerned of many by many signes, & by him cōprehēded by most certaine knowledge, how grievous it was to the Florentins, that the Councell should be celebrated at Pisa, whereunto they had not consented for other respect, then that they durst not gainsay the French kings demaundes, made immediatly after the rebellion of Bologna: a time when in Italie was not seene any armie to oppose against him. Besides, it was a thing certaine, that the authoritie of Cesar was concurrant in the Councell, accompanied also with the consent of the king Catholike: That likewise he knew that the Florentins were not to suffer the French souldiers to stay vpon their lands: And that it was a matter daungerous to threaten or prouoke them, where, of the contrary it could not be but profitable to deale with the with affabilitie & demonstratiō to admit their excuses: for that proceeding in such maner, either there would be obtained of them with time & occasion, things which the could not be hoped for, or at least, forbearing to constrain the by feare of new resolutions, they might be so entertained that they should do no hurt in times of danger & perill: And in case of victorie & preuailing, it would rest in the power of the confederats to giue to the Florentins such forme of gouernment as they should thinke most expediēt. The matter that in this actiō diminished the authoritie of Pandolfo, was the knowledg that was had that he desired for his profit particular, that a war of that cōsequence should not begin in Tuskane, by meane of which the whole body & parts of the countrey would suffer indifferent destructiō, either by the armies of the enemy, or by the incursiōs of friēds. But what by the efficacie of his reasons, set out so as they resisted all obiectiōs, & by the authoritie of the man, in whō was so small opiniō for matters of counsell, it was easily determined not to assaile the Florentins. This cōcell was the better approued by a contention that a few dayes after began to kindle betweene the Florentins and the Cardinals.

It is set downe before that the presence of the Cardinals was not at the first actes of the Councell: for they taried at the borough of S. Donyn, either to expect the Prelats that were to come out of France, or to be accompanied with those which Cesar had promised to send, or haply lingring for other occasions: and being departed frō thence by sundry wayes, the brute ranne, that the two Spanish Cardinals who had taken the way of Bologna, would be reconciled to the Pope, being knowne to solicit continually to that end the Embassadour of the king of Aragon which lay resident with the Pope. That opinion seemed so much the more credible, by how much they had obtained of the Florentines vnder publike faith and promise, that they might remaine in suretie within Florēce. But by that time they were come vpon the countrey of Mugello, they turned suddenly towards Lucqua, either to ioyn with the others, or perhaps their intentiō had bin alwayes so, or else as touching the Cardinal S. Crosse, his auncient ambition preuailed more then his new feare, or lastly, receiuing aduertisements in that place that they were depriued of the dignitie, and cap of Cardinals, they dispaired to fall to any accord with the Pope. About this time the three French Cardinals, S. Malo, Albert, & Bayeux, passed the Appinyn by the way of Pontresmo, together with the Prelats of France: after whō and at their request, marched out of Lōbardy three hundred French

French launces, commaunded by Odet Foix Lord of Laurich: he was appointed gatd of the Councell by the Cardinals, either to the end that the Councell accompanied with the armes of the French king, should continue with more authoritie, or else (which was more likely) to haue power to suppress whoeuer durst rise against the obedience of their decrees. But so soone as the Florentins came to the discouerie of that resolution, which had bin concealed from them vntill the bands began to march, they determined not to receiue into a Citie of great importance, such a number of souldiers, both considering the ill disposition of the Pisans, & that the last rebellio hapned king Charles being present & suffering it, and also the inclination which the French souldiers bare to the towne of Pisa: In times of perill wise men feare all things, and do hold it necessarie to their suretie to entertaine a suspition of things which in common foresight and coniecture they haue no reason to doubt: for, the Florentins fearing that besides the daungerous accidents that might happen by the insolencie of men of warre, doubted also that the souldiers of the French king entring into Pisa, it fell not out (& perhaps such was the secret desire of the king) that he sought to make Tuskane the seat of his warres. In these feares, they signified at the instant to the French king, that it was hard to harbour so many people for the straitnesse and sterilitie of the countrey, verie vnable to prouide for the nouriture of so many peoples as came from all parts to the Councell: They alleaged also that the place was not necessarie for the safetie of the Cardinals, to whom might be offered some violence, either by strangers, or by the proper inhabitants, their multitudes & numbers exceeding farre the pollicie and gard that they had assigned to containe them. To the Cardinall of S. Mallo, by whose directio the Frenchmen were gouerned in all things, they sent word that they were determined to admit no souldiers into Pisa: who, by the returne of his answers, seeming to consent & be contented, gaue order on the other side, that the bands should aduaunce and march seuerally & without making any semblance, perswading himselfe that being approached neare to Pisa, they would enter either by force or by subtiltie, or at least for feare that the Florentins durst not do such an iniurie to the French king as to let them. But the king hauing clearly answered that they should not march thither at all, the Florentins dispatched Frauncis Vittorio to the Cardinall of S. Mallo with an Embassage equall to his hawtinesse and pride: he told him from the state of Florence, that if the Cardinals entred vpon their lands armed and with bands of souldiers, they would not onely not admit them into Pisa, but also would hold them for enemies, and pursue them for such, and would also do the like, if the men of warre passed the Appennin towards Tuskane, for that they were to presume that they passed not for other purpose, then to steale secretly into Pisa, or to execute some other stratageme. This message wrought so with the Cardinall, that he resolued the bands should esstoones returne againe beyond the Appennin, the Florentins consenting that besides the persons of the Lords of Laurich and Chastillon, he might retaine with him an hundred and fiftie archers. All the Cardinals were together at Lucqua, which Citie, for suffering that assemblie and presence, the Pope pronounced to be fallen into the interdiction: and leauing there verie sicke the Cardinall of Cossensa, who, not long after saw there the last day of his mortall life, the other foure went to Pisa, where they were receiued by the Magistrates with cold shewes, and by the Commons was expressed no great reuerence, both for that their coming was displeasing to the Florentins, and the cause of that Councell not well receiued nor approved by the nations of Christendome: for, notwithstanding the title and pretence to reforme the Church was both very honest & greatly profitable, & also no lesse necessary then agreeable to all the regions of Christendome: yet it was discerned of wise men that the Authors and workers of the same were pushed on with endes ambitious. They were all caried with couetous desires of temporal things, & vnder the shadow of the weale and benefit vniuersall, they respected their particular interests, making holinesse and pietie a couer to their greatnesse and glory: and yet which of them should be raised to the Popedom, stood in no lesse necessitie to be reformed then others that they went about to compell to reformation. Moreouer it was seene of many, that besides the ambition of Priests, the quarels of Princes and questions of estates, had stirred vp and nourished this councell: That respect had moued the French king to procure it, the king of Romains to consent to it, and the king of Aragon to desire it. So that it being clearly discerned that vnder the cause of the Councell, was comprehended the quarell of armes and Empires, the people expressed an vniuersall horrou, that vnder deuout shadowes of spirituall things (instruments of warres and troubles) men should thirst and aspire to matters temporall: and therefore not onely at the entire

of the Cardinals into Pisa, the common disdain and hatred of people was disclosed, but also euen in the actes of the Councell, their grudge and discontentment burst out more manifest: for albeit they summoned the Clergie to be in the Cathedrall Church at the first session, yet much lesse than any of them respected the summons, seeing the verie Priests of the Church refused to lend their ornaments and vestures, when (according to their custome) they meant to haue celebrated the Masse for the imploration of the aide & light of the holy spirit: yea, the Priests iustifying their contempt with actes of greater insolencie, forbore not to shut the doores of their Church & would not suffer them to enter. The Cardinals complained of these contempts at Florence, where was commaunded that neither the vse of Churches, nor the seruice of instrumētts ordained for diuine office, should be denied them, but as touching the Clergie, there was no compulsion either to be at the Church, or to assist the action. These directions almost repugnant in themselves, as they proceeded of the diuision of the Citizens & by meane of them, on the one side the Councell was receiued into their dominion, & on the other side followed with contempt & reiection, brought at one time offence to the Pope, and discontentment to the French king. In regard whereof, the Cardinals seeing how daungerous it was to remaine in Pisa without armes, and no lesse considering that it would bring diminutiō to the authoritie of their Councell, to celebrate it in a citie that obeyed not their decrees, were vpon termes to depart as soone as they should haue accomplished the affaires of the Councell: wherein their resolution was further compelled & hastned by an accident hapning suddenly, which albeit was by chaunce, tooke notwithstanding his foundation of the wicked disposition of mē: for, a French souldier, in a publike place committing some insolencie vpon a frompet, and such as saw it raising a present outcry, many souldiers aswell French as of the Cardinals traine and other Prelats, prepared in armes to the place where the brute was: on the other side likewise many troupes of the people of Pisa & of the Florētine bands flockt thither to behold the accident. And as for the most part popular tumults are full of faction and varietie of affection, so the alarme being sounded, some cried vpon the name of Fraunce, & some vpon the title of Morozocco, (the signe & ensigne of the common weale of Florence) occupying amongst the daungerous fight, wherein their fury made them feare nothing lesse than the hazard of their liues, which at other times they would seeke to preserue with no little care & ielousie. But the Captaines and chieftaines of the French, and commanders of the Florentins, ioyning discretion to valour and authoritie, abated the furie of the fight, their diligence doing much to restraine the intemperance on all sides. In the end the tumult was appeased, many on both parts bearing away no small hurts, amongst whō fell into that fortune the Lord Chastillon and the Lord of Lamtrich, notwithstanding neither the one nor the other bare away any wounds of perill. This accident brought such astonishment to the Cardinals, haply at that houre assembled in the Church of S. Michael which is there ioyning, that they made the day after the second session wherein they ordained that the Councell should be transferred to Millan: not holding the oportunitie of that place conuenient for the actes of the Councell, which gaue no suretie for the safetie of their liues: and therefore before the fifteenth day of their arriual, they departed in great diligence from Pisa, greatly to the reioicing of the Florentins & Pisans, & no lesse to the contentment and liking of the Prelats that followed the Councell, whō it did a little discōtent to be come into a place, which, what for the incōmoditie of lodging, & what for the incōueniencie of other wants, growen by the long wars that were passed, did not minister to them that fulnes of helpes & meanes to liue delicately & prodigally, which the Priests & Frenchmen are wont to finde in the like actions. They murmured also, and being come thither by the kings commaundement & against their wils, they desired chaunge of place, and all other accidents that might bring difficultie, prolongation, or dissolution of the Councell.

But, such was the vniuersall contempt of this Councell, that the hatred & grudging of peoples following the Cardinals to Millan, they found there euen the like despising, and farre greater difficulties: for the Clergie of Millan communicating in the contempts of Pisa, euen in the beginning refused of themselves to celebrate the diuine seruice, as though there were entered into their Citie, not Cardinals of the Church of Rome, who were wōt to be honored & worshipped in euery place, but persons profane and accursed, and carying with them all priuation of honour, reuerence, and respect. And when they had occasion to shew themselves in publike, the commons forbore not to rayle at them, scorning them as well in wordes as gestures: but specially their malice was most expressed vpon the Cardinall of S. Crosse, whō as they supposed to be the author of that stir, so euery one exercised their iudgement most vpon him, being also in the last session of Pisa elected President of the Councell. These were the manifest and common murmures of people, that heretofore Councells were wont to bring to countries benedictions, peace and concord, but in this was bred to countries, kingdomes, and peoples, maledictions, warres, and discords: That other Councells were assembled to reunite the Church that was out of vnitie, but this was assembled to breake her vnitie, when she was in good agreement: That the contagion of such a pestilence infected all such as receiued it, altered all those that obeyed it, abused euen those that fauoured it, defiled such as had conuersation with it, and seduced all those that heard it: There was to be expected of their comming noother thing, then bloud, famine, & pestilence, together with the perdition both of bodies and soules of men: by the originall and cause, they gathered what would be the successe and effect, and reasonably they could expect no fruit or confirmation of vnitie, from such as began to sowe their labours with seedes of diuision. Gaston de Foix, who not many months afore the departing of Monsieur Longueville had bin preferred both to the Duchy of Millā, and to the army, somewhat suppressed those murmures, tending almost to a tumult and manifest sedition: he ioyned to his authority, commandements threatning and penall, contraining the Clergy to celebrate seruice as they were wont, and eniyned the Commons to speake more modestly hereafter.

In regard of these difficulties the beginnings of the Councell were continued with very little successe or issue: the plots that had bin layd with so great deuise and study, brought forth euents quite contrary to the expectation of the authors: things debated by long time and deepe discourse of counsell, drew no resolution according to the weening & coiectures of the parties: Where found meaning goeth not with the wisdom & imaginations of men, there their workings are full offrailety & the whole body of their actions clothed with imperfections. But the thing that most troubled the hopes of the Cardinals, was, that Cesar did not only from day to day deferre to send either Prelats or Proctors, notwithstanding the consent he had giue, & that often times reassured by perpetuall promises to the French king & the Cardinall of S. Seuerin: but also, he alleaged for his excuse (being haply induced & counselled by others) that it was not agreeable to his dignity, to send to the Councell of Pisa, the Prelats of his proper estates & territories, if both the example and name of all Germany were not concurrant in the actiō. And for that cause he sayd he had called a conuocation of the Prelats of Germany at Auspurge, to deliberate of some ioynt & vniuerfall forme of proceeding to be vsed touching the Councell: assuring notwithstanding the Frenchmē, that vnder that meane he wold so worke as they shold all be sent. Moreouer he much troubled the kings mind with his variety & diuerse maners of proceeding: for, besides his vncertaine & cold dealings in the affaires of the Councell, he inclined fully & openly to the motion of peace with the Venetians, which was solicited by the Pope & the king of Aragon with many offers: and on the other side, cōplaining bitterly against the king Catholike, both for that contrary to all shame, he had so apparently impugned the league of Cambray, & also in this new confederation (which he rather called treason) he had named him but as accessary: he suborned Galeas S. Seuerin to go to Rome in person as enemy to the Pope, but refurbished by the king for the greatest part of his army, & releued with great quantities of treasure: and yet he made no declaration of these things with such assurance as it could not be doubted what he would at last determine (notwithstanding all his demands were satisfied to him.) In this sort the kings mind was eftsóones trauelled with his accustomed suspitions, that if he abandoned Cesar, he left him at liberty to ioyne with his enemies: and if he would still sticke to him and sustaine him, his alliance would be bought with too deare a price, and yet doubtfull what fruit would reuert of it, well knowing by experience of things past, that oftentimes his owne disorders did hurt him more then his forces did ayde him: yea the king was not able to iudge in himselfe, which would most hurt him in this action, either the well doings & good successe of Cesar, or the contraries. Besides, the king Catholike nourished him & entertayned him as much as he could in that doubt: and, to make him proceede more slowly in the prouisions of the war, he gaue him hope not to stir in armes. The king of England did the like, and for the same causes, who had made answer to the French Embassador, that it was not true, that he had consented to the league made at Rome, but that he was fully determined to keepe the alliance which he had with the French king. Besides, at the same time the Bishop of Tuolsy proponed peace in the name of the Pope, so farre forth as the king would no more fauor the Councell, and withdraw himselfe from the protection of Bologna, for the which he offered to giue assurance that the Pope should dresse no more new enterprises against him. The king seemed lesse displeased with the peace, notwithstanding it bare hard conditions, then to put himselfe to the dangers & expences of the war, which by computation seemed infinit, hauing to make resistance against his enemies, and to refurbish the wants of Cesar: neuerthelesse, disdain drew him almost to be forced by the king of Aragon to make peace for feare of warre: besides that, it was a matter very hard to assure him that the Pope would obserue the couenants of peace, after he had recovered Bologna, & should be deliuered from the feare of the Councell: he doubted also that when he should be ready to consent to the conditions offered, the Pope would draw backe as he was wont to do at other times. In which maner of proceeding, besides that his dignity should be offended, and his reputation diminished, Cesar would hold himselfe iniured, for that leauing him in warre with the Venetians, he sought of himselfe alone to conclude the peace. Therefore he made precise answer to the Bishop of Tinoly, that he would not condescend to subiect Bologna to the Church in other forme then it had wont to be in auncient times. And at the same time, to establish a firme resolution with Cesar who lay at Brunech, a towne neare to Trent, he sent to him in great diligence, & with very large offers, Andre de Burgo Cesars Embassador resident with him. At this time certaine of his subiects of the countrey of Tyrol occupied Batisten, a place of very great strength in the entreie of the valley of Culdora.

The practises of the peace being wholly broken & dissolued, the first thoughts & deuises of the king were, that when Monsieur Palissa (leauing in Verona three thousand footemen to appease Cesar not well contented with his departure) should haue led the residue of the bands to the Duchy of Millan, there should be made new leauies of footmen: and so all the army being reassembled, they should march to assaile Romagnia, hoping to occupy it either all or in part, before the Spaniard should approach: and then either to march further according to occasions, or at least to entertaine and beare out the warre vpon the dominions of others vntill spring time, when the king passing into Italy in person with all the forces of his kingdom, hoped to make an vniuersall suppression of his enemies. But as he stood wauering in this deuise, his resolutions not proceeding with that expedition which the occasions required, and by reason of his nature estranged from expences, himselfe no lesse slow in many prouisions, but specially to wage new souldiers, he fell into new suspitions of the stirring of the Swissers, of which nation for that heretofore we haue set downe some generall mention in sundry places, it cannot be inconuenient to the present purpose, to deale somewhat more particularly.

the Swissers be.

The Swissers, which are those peoples whom auncient histories call Heluettians, haue their habitations in the most high mountaines of Iura, named S. Claudio, S. Briget, and S. Godat: a race of men naturally valiant, warlike, and rude; and for the sterility of the countrey, more giuen to grazing, then to tillage: They haue bene in times past vnder the subiection of the Dukes of Austrich, whose iurisdiction they shaked off by rebellion many yeres sithens: They haue their pollicy & gouernement of themselves, without any signe of depending or relation to either Emperors, kings, or other Princes: They are deuided into xiiij communalities, which they call Cantons, and euery of them seuerally are gouerned by Magistrates, lawes & ordinances proper & particular: They hold their parliament or Councell euery yeare, or more often if occasion and necessity require, wherein they dispute of vniuersall affaires, their assemblies and meetings being not subiect to certainty of places, but referred as best pleaseth the Deputies of euery Canton: They call those assemblies dyots or iorneyes, imitating the phrase and customes of the Germans . In them they resolute vpon peace, vpon warre, vpon confederations, vpon legations and demands made to leauy souldiers, either by publike decree, or by permission: in them also they set downe directions for all things that appertaine to their common interest: when they agree by publike decree to deliuer souldiers, the Cantons chuse amongst themselves a Captaine generall, to whom they giue the banner with the Ensigne and name publike: Thir vnity and agreement, together with the glory of their armes, hath made them very notable and renowned thorough the regions of the earth, notwithstanding for their outward shape and personage, they beare a preience barbarous and rude, & for their behavior and conuersation, hold more of inciuility then of comelinesse. By their naturall valour ioyned to due discipline & order, they haue not only & at all times made valiant defence at home for their owne countrey, but also in forreine warres they haue performed singular feates of armes to their perpetuall praise: wherein sure their recommendation and merit had bene farre greater, if they had exprest such effects of valour for their proper iurisdiction and impery, and not bene mercenarie to the appointments of others, and for the increasing of the dominion of strangers, or if they had set before their eyes an end more worthy and noble then the desire of money, by the loue and corruption whereof they haue lost the occasion to be feared and redoubted in Italy: for, where they haue not come out of their countrey but as souldiers waged & mercenary, they haue not caried backe a publike fruit of their victories: the desire of gaine makes them for the most part to follow armies, and besides their huge pensions, to be troublesome by new demands of payes almost intollerable: to such as wage and pay them, they are for the most part hard and vnease in conuersation & obedience: in their houses & apart, the principals of them forbear not to receiue gifts and pensions of Princes, to follow and fauour their faction in their dyets and parliaments. By reason whereof, things publike being referred to priuate profit, and fauours & payes being made vendible and corrupted, discords by litle & litle haue bin kindled amongst themselves: the same being the occasion that matters which haue bin approued in the parliaments by the most part of the Cantons, beginning not to be embraced and followed of all, they fell at last, not many yeares afore that time, to manifest warres amongst themselves, much to the diminution of the authority which they bare throughout the parts of the word. Somewhat below these, be certaine townes and villages inhabited by a people called Valleyemen, as hauing their dwellings in valleys, they are inferiour to the Swissers in number, in authority, in valour, and in euery other disposition: & yet more lower then they, is another generatio of men called Grisons, which are gouerned by three Cantons, and vpon that are called the Lords of the three leagues: the capitall towne of their countrey is called Coire: they haue often society and confederation with the Swissers, and with them they go commonly to the warre: they haue almost the same pollicy, the same lawes, the same constitution of maners and customes. In matters of armes and valour they are preferred afore the Valleyemen, but they hold no comparison with the Swissers, either in numbers, in pollicy, or in vertue. The Swissers then, who at that time were not so much degenerate and corrupted as they haue bene since, tooke incitation by the Pope, and prepared to descend vpon the Duchie of Millan, both dissembling that that leauy of armes proceeded of the vniuersitie of the Cantons, and also spreading a brute, that the Cantons of Swiz and Fribourg were the authors of the action: of whom, the first tooke his complaint and consideration of this, that a post of theirs passing through the Duchy of Millan was murdred by certaine French souldiers: the other pretended a reuenge for certaine particular wrongs that had bene done to them. The Councels of these, and generally, the resolution of the whole nation, albeit they were afore signified to the French king, yet they could do nothing to draw them to accord with him, notwithstanding the aduise and perswasions of his Lords & wise men concurred in it, and the friends and fauourers which he had amongst them gaue him hope to be able to obtaine it. He was stayed also by his accustomed difficulties to enlarge their auncient pensions with twenty thousand frankes, which may be a little more or lesse then ten thousand duckets: so that he refused for a matter of small price and value, the amitie, which afterwards he would haue bought with infinite treasures. He perswaded himselfe that either they would not stirre at all, or if they did, at least they could not much hurt him, for that being accustomed to go to the warre on foote, their want of horse and artilleries would bring great impediments to their seruice. Besides, about that time (now was Nouember begunne) the riuers were swelled, and they had neither vessels nor bridges: the victuals of the Duchie of Millan were restrayned into fortresses and places of strength, the townes thereabout well garded and kept, and in the plaine the men at armes were able to make head against them. By which impediments and necessities he presumed, that if they did march, they would be constrained esstoones to retire. But the Swissers taking litle amaze by these difficulties, began to descend at Vareisa, at which place their numbers increased continually: they had with them seuenth field peeces and many harquebuzes a crosse caried by horses, and some reasonable prouision of victuals. Their comming seemed to be so much the more dangerous, by how much, the inhabitants of Millan began to be weary of the French iurisdiction, the same growing both by certaine new insolencies and disorders in the French souldiers more then of custome: and also by the couetousnesse of the king, who would not suffer to be made any newe leauyes or prouision of footemen. Besides, the men at armes that at that time were in Italy, which in true computation exceeded not a thousand and three hundred launces, together with the two hundred Gentlemen, were not all able to make resistance to the Swissers, both for that part of them were gone to the gard of Perona and Bressa, and also Monsieur de Foix had newly sent two hundred launces to Bologna to withstand the comming of the Cardinall of Medici and M. Amb. Colonne to Faenza: where albeit they had no footemen as yet leauied, yet both to repress the diuisions that were in Bologna, and also for that at that time the Castle-keeper of the rocke of Sassilon (a borough of the mountaine of Bologna) had voluntarily put it into the Legates hands, it was thought necessary to send a garrison thither. From Vareza the Swissers sent a trompet to defie the kings lieutenant, who hauing as yet but a slender strength of men at armes, and no more then two thousand footemen, whereof he was not yet resolued to make new leauies for feare to displease the king, was now come to Assaron a place about thirteene miles from Millan: he had no intention to fight with them, but to accost them, and cut off their victuals, in which action only rested his hope to let and stay them, seeing there was not betweene Vareza and Millan neither riuers hard to passe, nor any place of defence. From Vareza, the Swissers marched to Galera, where they mustred their army, which contained ten thousand able bodies. Monsieur de Foix who followed Iohn la Trinuice, put himselfe within Legnano, which is about foure miles from Galera: by reason whereof they of Millan hauing more feare then assurance, and yet their perill as yet lesse then their suspicion, waged bands of footemen at their proper charges for the gard of the towne. Also Theodore Trinuice caused to fortifie the bastillions, and (as though the army would haue retired within Millan) he caused to cast squares and Cariers within and about the rampiers that enuironed the suburbs, the more easily to manage horses. Neuerthelesse, Monsieur de Foix accompanied with five hundred launces, and the two hundred Gentlemen of the kings, presented himselfe before Galera with great store of artilleries: which as soone as the Swissers were aware of, they issued out in order of battell, and retired as soones within the towne, refusing to fight in a place open, vnlesse their numbers were greater. During these actions, and in a small respite of time, their numbers increased, in which respect determining no more to refuse the fight, they marched to Bussy, where was a garrison of an hundred launces, who saued themselues with much ado, loosing their baggage and part of their horses. At last the Frenchmen, who retired alway by the like measure and distance that the Swissers aduanced, were returned and lodged within the suburbs of Millan, but there was no surety that they would stay and stand to defence, for that sometimes they affirmed and sometimes denied, furnishing with great diligence the Castels with victuals. The Swissers afterwards marched within two miles of the suburbs, but the vniuersall feare that was had of them before, began now to diminish much, both for that the bands of men at armes that were reuoked began to arriue continually at Millan: and besides, they mustred many footemen, expecting also from time to time Captaine Molard with his regiment of Gascon footemen, and Captaine Iacob with his lanceknights, the one directed to come from Verona, and the other from Carpy. About this time also were surprised certaine letters written by the Swissers to their Lords, whō they aduertised that the Frenchmen gaue them no great impediments, and that albeit they had as yet receiued no newes from the Pope, and lesse intelligence what the Venetian army did (whereof they marvelled) yet they forbore not to march and aduance continually according to the orders of the resolution. They were by this time sixteene thousand in number, and turned towards Moncia, which they assayed not to take, but bearing more towards the riuer of Adda, they kept the Frenchmen in feare that they would aduenture to passe ouer: by reason whereof they cast a bridge at Cassanto hinder their passage, vsing therein the oportunity of the towne and the bridge. In this meane while a Captaine of the Swissers hauing first obtained safe conduct, came to Millan, and demanded a moneths pay for all the footemen which offred to returne into their countrey: but being departed without any effect of his message, for that their offers were farre inferiour to his asking, he returned the day following with greater demands: and albeit there were made to him greater offers then the day before, yet as soone as he was returned to his army, he sent backe immediatly a trompet to signifie to them, that they would no more harken to accord. The day following, contrary to the expectation of euery one, they retired towards Coma, and so returned into their countries, leauing to iudge whether they were discended to assaile the Duchy of Millan, or to passe into some other place: and also for what cause, being as yet constrained by no euident necessitie, they returned so sodainly: and if they were afore determined so to do, why they did not accept the money that was offered them, seeing withall themselues made the demaunds. Whatsoever the cause was, this is certaine, that as they retired, there came two postes from the Pope and the Venetians, who if they had arriued somewhat sooner, it is likely the armie of the Swissers had not returned: and it is not to be doubted, that if at the same time that the Swissers entred the Duchie of Millan, the Spaniards had bene neare to Bologna, the affaires of the French who were not able to make resistance in so manie places, had forthwith fallen into manifest ruine and perdition.

The French king finding now by experience the perill which he could not foresee afore by reason, sent to Monsieur de Foix (before he knew of the breaking vp of the Swissers) that he should not spare neither labour, money, nor diligence, to make agreement with them: and not doubting of anie other violent assault, the Swissers being compounded withall, he gaue present direction to all the men at armes that he had in Fraunce (except two hundred launces which he reserued for Picardy) to passe the Mounts, sendig besides a new strength of Gascon footmen, & commaunded Monsieur de Foix to furnish his armie with footmen of Italians & launce-knights. And because the succours of the Florentines were of great importance to him, both for that the warre was made verie neare them, and also for the oportunitie of their frontiers to trouble the state Ecclesiastike, besides cutting off of victuals and other commodities from the armie of the enemies if they should approach Bologna, he solicited them with great instance, to declare on his side, and ioyne with him in the warre with all their forces, for that the present necessity required another matter then either a succour litle or limited, or that they should now stand contained within the tearmes of confederations: besides, they could neuer expect a more great or goodlie occasion to bind him perpetuallie to the, nor do a more singular benefit or pleasure, which both he and his successors should reknowledge to them and their estate from age to age: lastly, he told them that if they descended into the matter with necessarie consideration, they should find that to succour and defend him, did comprehend to support & protect their owne cause, for that they were not ignorant what hatred the Pope bare to them, and with what desire the king Catholike laboured to dresse and establish in that Citie an estate depending whollie vpon him. But at Florence the opinions of men varied and were deuided, for many blinded with the sweetnesse of present sparing, considered not what the time to come might bring: and with others preuayled not a litle the memorie of ancient dealings, wherein neither the faith nor the actions of that commō weale had bene at any time thankfully requited by the king raigning, nor by Charles the eight his predecessour: they remembred how he had sold with a great price his promise, not to hinder them in the recouery of Pisa, by which examples they said they had no reason to trust eithers in his promises, neither could they stand assured by any offers he could make, that he would yeeld recompence for anie office or benefite they should do to him. In these respects they held it great rashnesse to resolute to enter into a warre, which not well succeeding they should pertake in all the euils more then either reason would, or in due proportion they ought: and falling out happilie, they should in no sort communicate with the fruits and benefits, or at least in very small part and share. But of farre greater importance were they, who either for hatred, or for ambition, or for the desire of another forme of gouernement, were opposed against the Magistrate or Gonfalonier: they extolled the reasons aforesaid, and inferred others, that being neuters they should not incur the hatred of either party, nor giue to any of the two kings iust occasion to complaine: for that touching the French king, they were not bound to him in anie other thing then to aide him with three hundred men at armes for the defence of his proper estates, a proportion which they had already accomplished to him: and for the king of Aragon, he could not be discontented with them, but would esteeme it a great gaine if they would forbear to entermeddle otherwise in that warre. They occupied also this reason, that such as kept their faith best, were most worthy of praise & merite: and by that example he was to hope that when he should fall into affaires and doings, they would likewise obserue iustlie to him that which was promised in the capitulation made in common with the French king and with him: that proceeding in this sort, if peace were made betweene the Princes, the citie should be named and preserued of them both: and in case the victorie should fall to the one of them, neither holding himselfe offended, nor bearing them any particular hatred, they should more easily buy his friendship with the same mony, and haply with a lesse quantity, then they should haue disbursed vpon the warre, which was an expedition and meane, with the which, more then by armies and warres; their elders had many times saued their libertie: where if they should proceed otherwise, they should defray for another during the warre, and without any necessitie, intollerable expences: and yet the victorie falling to the enemye, the libertie and safetie of their countrey should remaine in most manifest perill. The aduise of the Magistrate or Gonfalonnier was contrary to the opinions of these men; he held it better that the common weale should take armes for the French king, for which reason he had afore fauoured the Councell, and giuen to the Pope sufficient matter to be discontented, to the end that the Citie being prouoked by him, or at least beginning to enter into suspicion, might be as it were constrained to make that resolution: he perswaded besides, that in that nature of time it could not be but a counsell preiudiciall, to remaine idle, expecting the issue of the warre managed so neare them, and betweene Princes so mighty and farre about them; for that in the warres of another, then is neutralitie commendable and apt to shake off and auoid many troubles and expences, when our proper forces are not so weake as may make vs feare the victorie of either partie, seeing that then it bringeth vs a surety, & oftentimes by their long warres, we are enabled to good means to increase our estate: He told them it was no sure foundation not to haue offended either partie, or not to haue giuen any iust occasion to complaine, for that verie rarely it happeneth that the insolency of the conquerour is bridleed or repressed, either by equitie, iustice, conscience, or other discreet considerations, the same being the reasons why great Princes esteeme themselves not the lesse iniured, when they are refused in the things they desire, but stand disdainfull against euery one that followeth not their will, and ioyneth not their minds to their fortune: the Prince for the time he commandeth hath his fortune hardly brought to limit his desires, or in his ambition to respect other things then such as may glorifie his victories: that it was a follie to belecue that the French king would not take it for an offence, to see himselfe left abandoned in so great perils, to find that the effects nothing answered the confidence and expectation which he had in the Florentines, both touching matters which he promised to himselfe of them, and also for things which they had so oftentimes assured: that it was also a greater folly to belecue that the Pope and the king of Aragon being victors, would not dispose immoderately of the victorie against that common weale, weighing with the insatiable hate of the one, the ioynt desire of them both, to erect there a gouernment to their fancie, least that citie remaining in her libertie, would be alwayes more inclined to the French then to them: the experience and prooffe of which desire might be easily discerned, in that the Pope (the king Catholike approuing it) had preferred the Cardinall Medicis as Legate to the armie: so that as to remaine neuter, was as much as to offer themselves a willing praie to whosoever should become victor: so in ioyning to the one of them, at the least by his victorie, they should be assured & preserved: a reward and fruit to be well considered vpon, seeing the daunger wherein were reduced the estate of their affaires: and in case the peace were made, they should reape benefits vnder better conditions: but to whether of the parties they ought rather to ioyne themselves, it was superfluous to dispute, for that there was no comparison betweene friendships ancient, experienced, and tried, and fauours new, vncertaine, and doubtfull: lesse doubt to follow an ancient amitie, by whose meane, albeit the common weale had not bene rewarded and recompenced, at least it had bene oftentimes defended and preserved, then to embrace new fauours and leagues, which would be neuer vnaccompanied with their infidelities and suspicions. The Magistrate occupied in vaine these discourses, such being the most hinderers of his aduise, who it grieued most that it should come to the French kings knowledge that it was by his meane and working, that the Florentines should be ioyned “ with him. Such is the propertie of enuie, not only to wish harme to another, but also to let, that “ by another no good be done. The Adder doth shoot out his sting, and partaketh no more after “ with poyson: but the man of enuie, when he can do no more harme of himselfe, forbeareth not “ to let another to do good. Amid these contentions, one faction breaking the aduise of the other, there could be established no resolution, whether they should declare or stand neutrals: their counsels oftentimes were verie vncertaine, their affections different, their wils contrarie, and their deliberations repugnant in themselves, without concluding any grace or merite towards any party. But that which more is, proceeding with these incertainties, they sent (to the great displeasure of the French king) Embassador to the king of Aragon, Frauncis Guicciardin Doctor of Law, he who wrote this present historie, and at that time of so young age, that, according to the lawes of the countrey, he was vnable to manage any office: and yet they gaue him not such natures of commissions, as thereby he was able to make the confederates to leaue off in any sort their ill dispositions.

But a litle after the Swissers were returned to their countries, the Popish and Spanish souldiers began to enter into Romagnia, whose coming bringing more feare then perill, made all the townes which the Duke of Ferrara held on this side Pau, except the Bastillon of la Fosse and the foord of Gemola, to render at the sommons of a simple Trumpet. And for that the whole regiments were not yet assembled and arriued in Romagnia, nor the artilleries which the Viceroy expected at Ymola; it was thought good, to the end the time should not be spent without profite, that Peter of Nauarre Captaine generall of the Spanish footmen, should go to besiege the Bastill: he began to batter it with three peeces of artillerie, and finding it more hard to be taken then he looked for, both for the quantity of munitions, being aptly applied and executed, and for the resolute defence of the souldiers, being fittie able bodies, he caused to make two bridges of wood to giue a greater commoditie to the souldiers to passe the ditches which were full of water: and soone as he might carie with him the oportunitie of these bridges, the third day after his approaching before the Bastill, which was the last day of the yeare 1511, he gaue a furious assault, and such as after a long and braue fight, the footmen winning the walles with the helpe of their ladders, at last tooke it, making slaughter almost of all the footmen defendants, together with their Captaine. Peter of Nauarre left two hundred footmen within the Bastill, contrarie to the opinion of Iohn Vitelli, who assured that it was so much shaken with artillerie, that there was no possibility to defend it without making new fortifications: but he was scarcely returned to ioine himselfe with the Viceroy, ere the Duke of Ferrara, being gone thither with nine great peeces of artillerie, assaulted it with such furie, that laying open a litle place reuerfed in many parts, he entered by force the very same day of his enterprife, where were slaine partly in fighting, and partly to reuenge the death of his people, the Captaine with all his footmen. The Duke himselfe was hurt on the head with a stone, which did him litle harme for the defence of his head peece, his valour carying him further into perill then belonged to the regard of such a personage, if in Noble men honour and reputation were not dearer then life.

In this meane while all the regiments Ecclesiasticke and Spanish were assembled at Ymola, mightie in numbers, braue souldiers, and valiant Captaines: for as the brute went, the king of Aragon had there a thousand men at armes, eight hundred mounted vpon Iennets, and eight thousand footmen Spanish; to whom, besides the person of the Viceroy were ioyned many Barons of the kingdome of Naples, of whom the most notable and renowned by experience of armes, was Fabricio Colonne, in whom was inuested the title of Gouverneur generall, Prosper Colonne hauing refused it, for that in the warre he could not brooke to be subiect to the commandements of the Viceroy. On the Popes side there were eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horsemen, and eight thousand footmen Italians vnder M. Amb. Colonne, Iohn Vitelli, Malatesta Baillon sonne to Iohn Paule, Raphaell de Pazzi, with other leaders and Captaines, all subiect to the obedience of the Cardinall de Medicis, Legate: onely they had not yet a Captaine generall, for that the Duke of Termini whom the Pope had chosen, as one in whom the king of Aragon reposed much, died at Ciuita Castellana coming to the armie: & the Duke of Vrbino, to whom that place was wont to be transferred, came not at all, either for that such was the Popes pleasure, or else that he held it as a thing ynworthie of him, euen vpon the territories and lands of the Church, to obey a Viceroy bearing authority of Captaine general ouer the whole armie of the confederates.

With this Armie plentifully furnished with artilleries which were almost all come from the realme of Naples, they determined to bring the Campe before Bologna: not that they were not ignorant that the enterprife was of verie hard action, seeing how easilie the Frenchmen might minister succours: but for that there was no other sort of enterprife which contained not greater difficulties and impediments: and to remaine idle with so great an armie, could not be without manifest argument of cowardise. Moreouer, the Pope made so great instance to embrace some enterprife, that who so euer would put into consideration the difficulties, seemed to giue him occasion to belecue, and cause to complaine, that the sleights & wiles of the Spaniards began to appeare: The forward horse is not holden backe with the bridle without forming and shewing his furie: The streame that runneth is not stayed contrarie to his course, without roaring and making a noyse: And to the mind desirous, euerie litle impediment is grievous, and with his trouble brings both suspition and feare (expectation of it selfe being no lesse ielous then infinite in desire.) In these respects the Viceroy causeth the armie to march, incamping betweene the riuers of Adice and Bologna: where, after he had giuen order to things necessary for the besieging of that Citie, and turned the channels which go to Bologna by the riuers of Rhene and Sananna, he approached neare the walles, he stretched out and bestowed the greatest part of his armie betweene the mountaine & the way that goeth from Bologna to Romagnia, & that for the commodity of victuals that come from that side. Fabricio Colonna with the auant-gard containing seuen hundred men at armes, five hundred light horsemen, & sixe thousand footmen, was lodged betweene the bridge of Rhene, standing vpon the high way of Romagnia which leadeth into Lombardy, & the gate S. Felix, being also vpon the same way, & that to obiect more easie impediments for any French succors to enter: and because they wold command the mountaines, they bestowed one part of their bands of souldiers in the Monastery of S. Michael of the wood, which is verie neare the Citie, but seated in a high place and commaunding ouer it: they also made themselues Lord of the Church which is more high, called S. Maria on the Mount. In Bologna, besides the people that bare armes, haply more by necessity then by nature, with certaine troupes of horsemen and footmen waged by the familie of Bentiuoley, M. de Foix had sent thither two thousand launce-knights, and two hundred launces, vnder Odet de Foix and Tues Allegre verie notable Captaines, the one for his long experiēce in warre, and the other for the nobilitie of his house, ioyned to the great tokens of valour that euen his youth did expresse: with the was captaine Saietta & Vincent called the great diuel. Neuerthelesse they reposed more suretie in the succours which M. de Foix had promised them, then in their proper forces, both considering the great circuit of the City, & also weighing the incommodities that were on the mountaine side: besides, there were no other fortifications, then such as for the present daunger were made in haste, and the Bentiuoleis distrusted many of the nobility and people: and lastly they had made a late experience about the Bastill of Geninola, that the valour of the Spanish footmen answered the praises that haue gone on them in all times, to be men apt to besiege townes, by reason of their great agilitie: neuerthelesse they began esloones to be assured, when they saw the enemies aduanced litle, lying nine dayes about the walles without doing anie thing, sauing that they began with two Sakers and two Culuerins planted in the Monasterie of S. Michael to shoot in vaine into the Citie, rather to terrifie men then to hurt houses: an execution which they gaue ouer immediatly, knowing by experience that in doing litle damage to the enemy in that sort, they made also an vnprofitable waste of their munitions. The matter that kept them so long from doing any thing, was an aduertisement that they had the same day they incamped, that M. de Foix being then come to Finalo, waged souldiers from all parts, with intētion (which he caused to be iustified with a brute running) to offer himselfe to all perils for the preservation of the Citie, knowing how much it would preiudice the affaires of the king, and no lesse diminish his owne reputation, if he suffered a City of that importance and conueniency to be taken out of his hands. This made them draw into counsell to debate better, not onely on which side they might besiege it with most hope and greatest facilitie, but also by what wayes they might let the French succours for entring. In the first counsell it was agreed, that Fabricio Colonna passing to the other side of the towne with his due prouisions of victuals and artilleries, should lodge vpon the hill side beneath S. Maria of the Mount, from whence he might both easily giue impediments to anie that should attempt to enter into Bologna, and yet he should not be so farre deuided from the residue of the armie, as not to be succoured in time what perill soeuer could happen: and that at the same time they should begin from that part where they were incamped, or very neare, to batter the towne. Such as were the authors of this counsell, alleaged, that as all that the French held in Italy depended wholly vpon the preservation of the armie, so it concerned M. de Foix in discretion and all good respects, not to hazard to do any thing, in the execution whereof he might be constrained to fight: & much lesse wold he be of that iudgement, albeit he knew he might do it in suretie, to inclose himselfe with all his armie within Bologna: an action wherein he should deprive deprive himselfe of all meanes to succour in cases of necessity the estate of Millan, which was not as yet wholly assured from the movings of the Swissers, and where also was greater doubts to be assailed by the Venetian armie, which being come vpon the marches of Verona, seemed to threaten the towne of Bressia. These reasons being layd in consideration with the enemye & his estate, and weighed withall with the examples and experiences of times past, seemed at the first to carie much in the mindes of men : but the day following almost all such as had approued this counsell, were of opinion contrarie, considering it was not a thing certaine that the French armie would not come, and if it did come, the vauntgard onely would not suffice to resist them. They said also that that deliberation was not to be approued, which was established vpon such a foundation that it rested alwayes in the power of the enemye to innouate or chaunge it: for this cause the aduise of Peter of Navarre was allowed by the Viceroy, to whom onely he communicated his opinion, that making prouision for five dayes, and leauing a gard onely in the Church of S. Michaele, all the armie should passe to the other side of the Citie, where both might be objected conuenient impediments, that the enemye should not enter: and also the towne, not fortified on that side (neuer fearing to be there assailed) they should be able without doubt to carie it in five dayes. But as soone as this resolution was dispersed amongst the armie and generall bands of souldiers, there was none which did not openly reprove the directiō to go lodge with the armie in a place meere-ly voide of all traffike of victuals which were brought from Romagnia: which as it was the onely meane to sustaine and nourish the armie, so no doubt it could not stand vndissolued and broken, if within five dayes it enforced not Bologna. And what is he (saith Fabricio Colōno) that cā assuredly make promise of such a thing within so short a time, seeing there is nothing lesse likely to come to passe, thē that which depends vpon many daungers & difficulties. Matters of enterprise can not be warranted by coniectures onely, seeing oftentimes they draw with them so many accidents, that euen the wisdomes of the wisest mē are found vnperfect to assure them: What reason is there that vnder a vaine hope, which of her proper nature is fallible and subiect to chaunces, we should offer so glorious an armie to so manifest a danger? It is more honorable to auoid a perill by counsels and considerations, then by too much rashnesse and presuming to offer our selues to an action, wherein the confidence is farre lesse then the dispaire. Who seeth not, that our houres and time limited being runne out, we haue no possibilitie to retire our selues and our people made hungrie, disordred, and fearefull, without our losse and certaine ouerthrow, hauing Bologna in our face, where is a great masse of people and many souldiers, and at our backs the French armie, which will not ouersee the oportunitie of our great presuming and securitie. Some others aduised, that bestowing in the vauntgard a greater strength of footemen, it should incampe on the other side of Bologna almost at the foote of the mountaine, betweene the gate Saragozza and S. Felix, fortifying themselves with trenches and other defences: and from that side the towne should be battred, being there not onely the weakest in wals and rampiers, but also by planting some peeces of the artillerie about the mountaine, they should execute in flanke during the assault, such of the defendants as would come to the breach. This counsell also was reiected, as not sufficient to let the coming of the French: and no lesse dangerous, for that if they should be charged by the enemye, the armie, notwithstanding it commaunded the mountaines, could not descend to their succours in lesse time then three houres. Amid these variations and ambiguities, being farre more easie to reprove the counsels that were propounded by others, then to open other aduises that deserued to be followed, at last the Captaines grew to a deuise to assaile the towne on that side wherein the armie was already incamped: a resolution which amongst other reasons tooke furtherance by an opinion they had that Monsieur de Foix would not come at all, since he lingred so long: therefore they began to cast platformes to bring the artillerie to the wals, and called backe the vauntgard to incampe together with the others. But a little after they had many aduertisements that the French bands increased daily at Finale, which reuiuing efsouones their former suspition of their coming, there might be discerned amongst thē a new diuersitie & disagreement of opinions: for euery one being of this minde, that if Monsieur de Foix approached, they should lay to set vpon him afore he entred Bologna: many perswaded, that in that case, the artillerie planted already before the wals, which then should be retired, would giue many impediments and difficulties to the armie: a matter in such termes of affaires both daungerous and hurtfull: Others reasoned, that it was no lesse to their infamie then to their hurt, to remaine so many dayes about the wals of Bolo- gnia without doing any thing, both confirming at one time the courage of those that were within, and giuing leasure to such as were without to prepare to succour them: and therefore it were not best to deferre any longer to plant the artillerie, but in such place as it might be easily retired, making the better to oppose against the Frenchmen, the platformes so large, that both the artilleries and the armie might be able to moue together. The Legate was fully with them that gaue counsell to begin to batter the towne, both for the displeasure he had of so long deferring, and also somewhat suspecting least the matter had bene wrought by the direction and fancie of the king of Aragon, according to the subtleties and dissembled maner of proceedings of the Spanish: he complained that if from the first incamping they had begun to batter the towne, they might happily afore that time haue bene maisters of it: That it belonged not to noble men of warre to ioyne fault vnto fault, and much lesse to remaine as enemies about a towne, and yet expresse no valour to assaile it: That the Pope sent to him dayly curriers and postes, but he knew no more what to answere and alleage, holding it a dishonor to entertaine and nourish him any longer with promises and vaine hopes: Lastly, that it touched much the reputatiō of a Generall, to prepare to an enterprise which he durst not execute. These wordes moued not a litle the Viceroy, complaining much against his importunitie and hast, that he being a man of no trayning in armes nor exercises of warre, would so vehemently solícite a resolution so rash and daungerous. He sayd, that in those counsels there was debated the interest of all the world, wherein yet they could not proceede with such absolute maturitie as there were not further neede of deeper counsell and consideration: that there were no humane things more subtle and intricate then the enterprises of war, nor any worldly accident of more compassion then the losse of a battell: that the counsels of war drew with the infinite considerations and reasons, and yet kept alwayes suppressed and retained some secrets which the wisdom of men could not finde out: that it was the custome of Popes and common weales to enter willingly into warre, and afterwards the expences and perplexities encreasing about expectation, to wish the end with vndiscrete desires: he willed him to gue ouer to the Capitaines the deliberations of things, who hauing the same intention that he had, were somewhat about him in the administration and experience of a warre. Lastly Peter de Nauarre, in whom the Viceroy reposed most, alleaged that in an expedition of so great importance, men ought not to respect so much the distance of two or three dayes: and therefore it was necessarie to continue the counsell and direction for prouisions necessarie, as well for the besieging of Bologna, as for the battell, and for their better gouernment afterwards, according to the proceedings of the French. Two dayes passed afore could appeare any light of the better resolution, for that Monsieur de Foix, to whō Centa, Piaua, with many other boroughs of the countrey of Bologna were rendered, remained still at Finalo, where he lay to reassemble his forces & bands of souldiers, who as well for that they had bin distributed in many places, as also that his footbands which he had waged were long in coming, could not so suddenly come to the muster: So that, no further cause of deferring appearing, at last the artilleries were planted against the wals, about thirtie fadomes neare the gate of S. Stephen which leades to Florence, where the wall turning and crooking towards the gate called Chastillon, that hath his prospect vpon the mountaine, maketh an angle. And at the same time Peter de Nauarre was about to make a mine, drawing more towards the gate of the way of Chastillon, on that side the wall where within is a little chappell called Barbacana, to the end that the assault being giuen at the same instant, they might with more difficultie make resistance being deuied then if they were vnited and ioyned, to defend one onely place. Moreouer following still their first thoughts to oppose against the Frenchmen, they gaue order that the vauntgard should returne to the lodging where it was before; The artilleries brought downe to the earth in xxiiij. houres an hundred fadomes of wall: and the tower of the gate was battred with such furie, that being no more able to maintaine defence, it was abandoned, so that they might very conueniently giue the assault on that side: but they expected till the mine were accomplished, notwithstanding by the rashnesse of the souldiers, the assault was almost executed the same day in disorder: for certaine Spanish footmē being climed vp by a ladder to a hole which had bin made in the towre, descended that way into a little house which on the inner side belonged to the wals, wherein was no gard: which being found by the other bands of footmē, they had all runne thither by heapes, if the Capitaines hearing of the noyse, had not repressed their wilfulnesse. But after the defendants, hauing leauied a Cannon iust with the house, had slaine one part of them, the others fled for safetie fro the place place where vndiscreetly they entred to seeke for perill . And whilest they were busie about the mine , others laboured in the armie to make bridges of wood , and to fill vp the ditches with baskets and earth) the better to be able (marching as it were in a plaine way) to bring the footemen to the wall which had bene well battred , and to draw euen vpon the ruines some peeces of artillerie , to the end that in the execution of the assault, the defendants should not be able to continue the resistance . But the Frenchmen, seeing into these preparations, and discerning withall that the people began already to giue theselues ouer to feare, sent immediatly to pray succors of Monsieur de Foix, who dispatched thither the same day a thousand footemen, and the day after four-score Launces : a matter which made the enemies beleue assuredly that he was determined to passe no further , it seeming a matter not likely nor congruent that he would separate from himselfe one part of his strength if he had another intention: but truly such was his meaning , for that holding that succour sufficient to defend Bologna, he would not without necessitie assay the fortune of the battell . At last the mine was accomplished, and the armie standing in order of battell to go forthwith to the assault, for the execution whereof with greater strength the vauntgard was reuoked , Peter of Navarre caused fire to be put to the mine , which with so great noyse and furie blew vp so high the wall and chappell, that in that space and diuision was made open to those without the intrals of the Citie within, together with the maner of the souldiers prepared to defend it: but falling eftsoones downe againe, the whole wall tooke the same place from whence the violence of the fire had driuen it , and was so reioyned and knit againe, as if there had not bene any separation or remouing at all: so that being impossible for the souldiers to go to the assault on that side, the Captaines iudged it no lesse hard to follow it on the other part . They of Bologna interpreted this aduenture to a miracle, saying it was impossible without diuine aide, that the wall should fall and reioyne so iustly vpon his old foundations : for which cause the Chappell was afterwards increased and frequented of the people in great deuotion. This successe (as though there remained nothing else to be feared touching the affaires of Bologna) was the cause that Monsieur de Foix thought good to go to Bressia , both for an espiall he had that the Venetian armie drew that way, & also for feare least the inhabitants there fell not into some want and necessitie , for that by reason of the perils of Bologna he had left there a very slender garrison , & no lesse doubted of secret practises and intelligences. Neuerthelesse he chaunged opinion at the contemplation & requests of the captaines that were within Bologna, who somtimes alleaged to him that if he wēt his way, the dangers of the war would redouble & become greater then before; & somtimes they gaue him hope to ouerthrow the campe of the enemies if the would but ioyne his presence to their valour. In regard of which reasons, accompanied with a deepe consideration of the perill of the affaires present, notwithstanding in the counsell almost all the Captaines were against him, he issued very late out of Finale: and the morning following, being but two houres of daylight, he drew towards Bologna with all his army in battell aray, laboring with importunity of trauel against the snowes, the ice, & bitter weather: he entred by the gate of S. Felix, hauing with him xiiij. hundred launces, vij. thousand Launceknights, whom he had bestowed all in the vauntgard, & viij. thousand footemen aswell French as Italiā. Being thus with great felicitie & valour entred into Bologna, he put into questiō to assaile the morning following the campe of the enemies, the souldiers making their sallies at three gates, & the people issuing out by the way of the mountaine: if this resolution had bin aduanced, he had found the not doubting of his coming; a matter which assuredly their Captaines had knowledge of, neither that day nor the most part of the day following. The execution was hindred by Yues Allegre, who gaue counsell, that the bāds made weary with the bitter wayes they had marched, should haue one day to repose theselues, thinking withal (which also any wise man might haue iudged) that it was not possible that so great an army, and in the broad day, and by the high way, could without their knowledge enter into a Citie, before the which they lay incamped. The same ignorāce had also kept the abused the day after, if by aduēture a Greek stradiot had not bin takē, being issued out of the skirmish amongst other horsemen: & being demaunded of the state of the towne, & what they did within it: he answered that he was able little to informe them, for that he had but entred the day before with the Frēch armie. Vpon his words, confirmed both with faith & constācie, the Captaines entred into such amaze & maruell, that they determined to leaue their campe, holding the danger too great to remaine there, aswell for the bitterness of the season which greatly afflicted the soldiers, as for the neighbourhood of the citie, wherinto so great an armie was entred: They iudged it no pollicie to contend at one time, and with one force, against so many aduersities: the intemperance & afflictions of the season were more intollerable to them than the hand of the enemy, who yet could not but be fearefull, both for their numbers, their trayning, and their resolute mindes: They made also coniectures of the monstrous reioyning of the wall, after it was blowen vp, a consideration which not the least increased their feare, though in souldiers valour ought to be more ready then superstition. The night following, which was the xix. day since their incamping, they retired their artilleries with as little brute as they could, and marched with their armie in good time along the high way towards Imola, drawing along the plaines and squares by the which they came, in the middle of which was the high way and the artillerie: and bestowing in their rearegard the flower of their armie, they marched and wonne way with suretie, for that there issued none out of Bologna other then certaine French horsemen, who hauing made spoile of part of the munitiōs & victuals, & therefore begun to fall into disorder, were to their harmes repulsed euen to Bologna by Malatesta Baillon, who gouerned the last part of the armie.

As soone as the campe was leauied, Monsieur de Foix leauing three hundred Launces and foure thousand footmen within Bologna, departed in great diligence to march to the succours of the Castell of Bressia, the Citie being taken by the Venetians the day before he entred into Bologna: for Andrew Gritti induced by Count Louis Anogato a gentleman of Bressia, the most part of the people of the countrey concurring also, and hoping much that within the towne they would draw to some mutinie, had passed by commaundement of the Senate with an armie of three hundred men at armes, xiiij. hundred light horsemen, and three thousand footmen, the riuer of Adice at Albera, which is a place neare to Legnagne, and afterwarde waded the foord of Mynchia at the turning mill betweene Croito & Valegge: and comming at last to Montcharo, he encamped by night at Castagnet a village within fife miles of Bressia, & from thence made sudden incursions with his horsemen euen to the gates. And at the same time the authoritie and affection to the name of S. Marke resounding in all places, Count Louis came hard to the gates with eight hundred men of the vallies of Entropien and Sabina whom he had drawne into commotion, and sent his sonne on the other side of the Citie eue to the gates with other companies of footmen: but Andrew Gritti, neither receiuing from within the Citie those intelligences which he expected, nor being made to him any such signes as were agreed, he held himselfe preuented by the pollicy and well garding of the Citie: and therefore, refusing to abide perill where he saw no tokens of safetie, and at the same time the sonne of Anogato being taken prisoner by a fallie made out of the towne, he retired to Montagnano from whence he departed at first, leauing a sufficient gard vpon the bridge which he had made vpon Adice. But being called againe not many dayes after, he repassed the riuer of Adice with two cannons and foure falconets, and incamped at Castagnet, Count Louis being at the same time approched within a myle of Bressia with a great strength of the sayd vallie men: and albeit there were as yet small tokens or apparance of fauour from them within, yet, Gritti seeing his strength to be greater then it was, determined to venter to haue it by force: his valour made him resolute against all doubts of fortune, which is not the least vertue in a man of warre disposed to do an enterprise: he brought all his payfants to the wals, & began to execute the assault in three places, which albeit was ill followed at the gate of the tower, yet it did more haply succede at the gate of the piles where Anogato fought, and at the gate La Garzula where the souldiers led by Baltazar Scipio entred by the iron grates, by the which the riuer (bearing his name of the towne) entred into the citie. In this furie of the assault, notwithstanding the resistance of the Frenchmen, who both seeing the enemies enter the Citie, and the townesmen conspire in their fauour, they retired into the castel, together with Monsieur du Lude their Gouvernour, loosing their horses and baggage. In this tumult, that part of the towne which is called the Citadel, & standeth separated from the residue of the Citie, a part wherein almost all the Gebelins inhabited, was spoiled and sacked, except the houses of the Guelfes. After the conquest of Bressia, Bergama rendred immediatly except the two castels, whereof the one is in the middle of the Citie, and the other stands within halfe a myle. This rendring happened not so much by the exāple of Bressia, as by the meane and working of certaine Citizens. Orcinacche, Orcinono, and Pontuquo, with many other places there about did the like: and perhaps much more had bene done, or at the least the victorie had bin better assured, if at Venice they had had a care necessarie & cōueniēt both to send souldiers and artilleries to get the castell, which no doubt would haue made no great resistance, and also to

to create Magistrates for the well guiding of places already recovered: their ioy was greater for the victorie they had gotten, then their prouision to preferue the things which their fortune had brought them: their glorie was farre aboute their pollicie which in men of warre is not the least error, for that it makes them more apt to winne, then able to hold; and this negligence of the Venetians was so much the more hurtfull, by how much more great was the celeritie & diligence of M. de Foix, who hauing passed the riuer of Paw at Stellato (from whence he sent fifty launces for the gard of Ferrara and 500 French footmen) he passed also the riuer of Mincia at the mill bridge, hauing almost at the same time of his marching, sent to demaund passage of the Marquisse of Mantua: his sodaine damaund of the Marquisse drew one of these two reasons, either to giue him no respite to take aduise in a matter so present & peremptorie, or else that the Venetian bands should be so much the later aduertised of his comming: A man of warre hath no one property, more commendable then his celerity and speed, for that by aduancing oportunities, he takes from his aduersarie all counsell, & by his quicknesse ouercommeth the hardnesse of things which otherwayes his valour were not able to suppress: The tide that is driuen with a violence more then ordinarie, beguileth the Mariner that standeth to expect, but maketh much for the ship that taketh the benefite of it: There is no sort of action wherein fortune more fauoureth men of enterprise, then when their celeritie is equall to their valour, for that it cuts off from the enemy all discourse of counsell and makes him blind in the defence of his proper harines. From thence he went the day after to Nogero vpon the territories of Verona, and the day following to Pontesero & to Trenilla three miles from Escalo: where, receiuing aduertisement that Iohn Paule Baillon was come from Frankencastle with three hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horsemen, and twelue hundred footmen to encampe within the Ile of Escalo, he made haste thither, to charge him with three hundred launces and seuen hundred archers, the residue of the armie comming after, which otherwise could not march with such diligence: but finding that he was remoued an houre afore his coming, he put himselfe in order to follow him without tarying. Ioh. P. Baillon had receiued aduertisement that Barnardin de Monson to whom was left the gard of the bridge made at Albero, had broken it vp, hearing of the comming of the French, for feare he should be inclosed by them; and the launce-knights which were within Verona, whither Cesar had a litle before sent 3000 footmen which he had in Fryull, being at that time released of all gard at Fryul, for that all was returned to the power of the Venetians, except Gradiqua, who more then the rest expressed her fidelity against the aduersities of the warre. For this cause Ioh. P. Baillon had gotten into Bressia, if he had not bene told that a litle beneath Verona the riuer might be passed ouer by foord: but as he went to performe his passage, he discouered a farre off M. de Foix, whose incredible celerity, for that it was farre more then the report and renoume that went of him, he thought they could be no other troupes then one part of the souldiers that were within Verona; and in that perswasion ranging his companies in battell aray, he taried their comming with great courage at the tower Magnanino, which is somewhat neare Adice, and of a verie litle distance from the tower of Escalo. The encounter of both parties was verie furious with their launces, and afterwards falling to other weapons, the battell was hotly continued more then an houre: but the condition of the Italians grew worse and worse, for that the other part was continually supplied with new reliefe of souldiers from the armie which was left behind: and albeit not so much by the valour of their enemies as by their proper imbecility of numbers, they were often put to disorder, yet by their vertue and gouernement they reassembled as often: at last, being not able to make a perpetuall resistance against the greater number, they were broken and put to flight, & were chased by the enemy (the night now beginning) euen to the riuer, which Ioh. P. passed in safetie, his fortune being better then many of his people, who were drowned by the fury of the chase. In this medley were slaine and taken about fourescore and ten men at armes of the Venetians: amongst whom fell into the calamity of prisoners Guido Rangom and Baltazar Signorello de Perousa: the footmen were all disperfed and broken, and two Faulconets lost, which was all they had to leaue to the enemy as monuments of that miserable aduerture. In this calamity it seemed fortune respected much the Frenchmen, for that few of them fell into the mercy of the enemy, and fewer into the miserie of imprisonment (their felicitie with their valour, making them free from those daungers which reason & coniecture threw vpon them.) The day after they encountred Meleager de Furly with certaine light horsemen of the Venetians, whom they easily put to flight, Meleager remaining prisoner: & in this course of felicity, holding it not necessarie to lose one houre of time, the ninth day after they parted from Bologna, M. de Foix with the vaungard incamped within the suburbs of Bressia about two crosbow-shoots from the gate of Tourlongue, and the residue of the armie more backward along the way that leades to Pesquero. As soone as he was incamped, not giuing to himselfe as it were any leasure to breathe, he sent one part of his footmen to charge vpon the Monasterie of S. Fridian, which is halfe way to the hill vnder the which he was incamped, and the hill kept by many paynants of the valley Tropia: this gard was soone broken & most of them slaine by the footmen, who made their entrie into many places by climing being fauoured with certaine showers of raine, by the which the artilleries that were in the Monasterie could not execute. The day following M. de Foix sent a Trumpet to summon the towne to render with conditions of safetie for their liues and goods, except the Venetians: and his Messenger being proudly answered in the presence of Andrew Gritti, he turned his army to the other side on the towne to be more neare the castle, and was lodged in the suburbs of the gate called S. Johns gate: the morning following, euen by the first reuealing of the day, he choise out of the maine armie more then foure hundred men at armes all armed in white, and fixe thousand footmen, part Gascons, & part launce-knights; and with them putting himselfe on foot, he went vp on that side towards the gate of the piles, & entred without resistance within the first walle of the castle: where causing his companies to rest & refresh themselves a litle, he encouraged them with short speeches to mount resolutely vp to that rich and wealthie citie, where the glorie and bootie wold be greater without all comparision then the paine or peril, hauing to fight with souldiers of Venice, who were manifestly inferiour to them in numbers, in vertue, and in fortune: he contemned their numbers, for that being people vnexperienced in warre, he iudged them more apt to flie then to fight: he bad them hope that the cowardise of some bringing disorder to the residue wold be the cause that the whole wold fall into feare, negligence, & confusion: he put the in remembrance of their ancient victories wherein their vertue was no lesse meritorious then their fortune: he told them that to men of action nothing more hindereth their glorie then to be slowe to take the benefit of occasions, and the resolute man neuer findeth want of fortune where he expresseth no want of valour: he desired them lastly, that as he had chosen the for the most valiant of the whole armie, so they wold not bring shame to themselves and to his iudgement, but that they wold consider what infamie and dishonour it wold be to them, if they who made profession to enter cities notwithstanding the resistance of souldiers, of artilleries, of walles, and of rampiers, should not now reioyce in their desires, hauing no other impediment then men onely, in whom nothing was lesse familiar then dispositions to fight. Immediately he put his footmen before his men at armes, and began to march out of the castle, and at his going out he found certaine bands of footmen who with their artillerie assayed to stop him for passing further: but his valour making the to retire, he descended furiously by the skirts of the pallace greene of the Captain Bartetto, where the Venetian regiments well ranged and close together expected him with great resolution: they fell immediately to hand-strokes, when the medley was terrible for a long time, the one part fighting for their proper safetie, and the other part for glorie, ioynded to a desire to sacke a citie so full of riches: the Captaines, besides their office to command and dispose, most often tooke the places of meane souldiers, the vertue of M. de Foix being singular about the residue: at last the Venetian armie were driuen from the place after they had made a wonderfull defence: in so much as the Conquerours, who now deuided themselves into two bands, made their entrie, the one by the Citie, and the other by the Citadell, finding in euery quarter and corner a maruellous resistance by the souldiers & by the people, in whom it seemed their aduersitie had nothing diminished their vertue: but the Frenchmen being alwayes followed with victorie, passed through all impediments and chased all their enemies that stood afore them: they gaue not their minds to pillage vntill they saw themselves absolute maisters of the towne: such was the direction of their Captaine, whom they obeyed & obserued so iustly: that whatsoever he were that did otherwayes, he was forthwith slaine by his fellowes. In these encounters there died of the French part many footmen, and a great number of men at armes: but of the enemies were left on the ground eight thousand dead carkasses, part of the people, and part of the Venetian souldiers, which were five hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horsemen, and eight thousand footmen, amongst whom was Comarin commander of the stradiots, who was slaine vpon the greene with with a bullet of a harquebuse: all the residue were taken except two hundred stradiots who fled by a posterne neare the gate of S. Nazareth, albeit with no better fortune, for that falling vpon the Frenchmen which remained without the towne, they were almost all taken or killed: they also immediatlie after the execution entred the towne by the same gate, and falling to pillage as well as the residue, they enioyed the trauels and dangers of others. Andrew Gritti and Anth. Justinian whom the Senate had sent into that Citie as gouernour, remained prisoners together with John P. Manfron and his sonne the knight de la Volpe, Baltazar Scipion, one of the sons of Anth. de Pio, Count Lowys Auogato, and one of his sonnes, and Dominicke Busechio Captaine of the stradiots: these being Chieftaines of the army were referred as miserable examples of their owne calamitie; they were by the wretchednesse and fortune of prisoners disposed and caried about as best pleased the appetite of the Victors, sometimes brought to behold the dead bodies of their companions and friends; a spectacle lamentable, to be compelled to see those men dead, whom in life they so much honoured and loued: and sometimes appointed to stand in the presence of the enemy, taking speciall glorie in that which to them could not be but an increase of discomfort. By strait commandement of Monsieur de Foix, the honors of the women of religion were kept vndefiled, but their goods together with such others, as for protection were conueighed into their couents, were made a praie to the Captaines. Count Lowys was executed in the market place, M. de Foix being present, and seemed to hold it a sacrifice best acceptable and pleasing to his eyes: his two sonnes albeit they were for a time deferred, suffered in the end the same paine; the authoritie of the Victor reigning verie iudicially ouer the liues of whomsoever it pleased him. In this sort by the valour and fortune of the Frenchmen, of whom they of Bressia vaunted to be descended, fell into this extremitie that citie, for nobilitie and dignitie nothing inferiour to anie other citie of Lombardie, but in riches and plentie farre aboute them all except Millan. And as the miseries that war draweth with it are infinite, so the whole city for vij. dayes together was exposed to the couetousnesse, to the lust, & to the crueltie of souldiers; things sacred as well as prophane being parcell of the praie: and no lesse the liues then the goods of men committed to the discretion of spoylers. This victory brought great reputation to the name of M. de Foix, Italy no lesse then the other Regions of Christendom resounding much his glorie, that by his celeritie and valour in the space of xv. dayes he had compelled the armies Ecclesiastike and Spanish to dis campe from before Bologna, ouerthrowne in the plaine field John P. Basson, with part of the Venetian regimēts, & recouered Bressia with so great a slaughter of souldiers & other sorts of peoples: it was confirmed by the iudgemēt of wise men, that touching enterprise & matters of war, Italy had not felt the like of long time, the aduersity far exceeding the memorie and example of all times past.

After the action of Bressia, together with the other places that were lost, of whom Bergamo drawne into rebellion by the ayde of verie few of the towne, had by common consent reuoked the Frenchmen before M. de Foix made his entry into Bressia: & after M. de Foix had set downe a forme to the affaires of Bressia, and had somewhat refreshed and reordered his armie made wearie with so great trauels, and no lesse disordered partly by keeping and partly by distribution of the spoile: he determined according to the kings commandement, to go seek the armie of the confederates; which, after his departure from before the walles of Bologna, was stay ed vpon the lands of the Bolognois. To this direction the king was constrained by many vrgent accidents, which droue him into necessitie to take new counsels, for the safety and benefit of his affaires: for, he discerned manifestly that he should haue war with the king of England, notwithstanding that king had in franke tearmes afore assured him the contrary, & since kept him in suspense with tokens and words doubtfull: the actions which were quite contrary to his promises could be no more couered, for that there came aduertisement from Rome, how he had at last approued & ratified the league by writing: besides, the French king was not ignorant, that in England were made great preparations of men and ships, and in Spaine was rigged a great nauie to passe into England, where was an vniuersall disposition in all sorts of the people of that region, to make warre vpon the realme of Fraunce. To this humor of the king & people, was much helping the arriual of a Galiasse from the Pope, laden with Greeke wines, with cheeses and other prouisions, which distributed in his name to the king, Barons, and Prelates of the realme, were receiued of all with a wonderfull gladnesse: the comon sort of people which oftentimes is no lesse caried by vaine & small things, then by matters more graue & great, ran with generall admiration to behold the Galiasse, accounting it so much more to their pleasure & glorie, by how much they had neuer scene in that Ile anie vessell bearing the Popes banners. At last, Bishop Morton, who had long negotiated betwene the Pope and the French king, induced either by his conscience, or by desire to be Cardinall, was appointed in an assembly of all the states of that Iland, where he shewed with equall fauor & full testimonie, what was the iustice of the Popes cause. Vpon this both it was determined to send the Prelates to the Councell of Latran in the name of the whole realme, and also (the importunities of the Popes Embassadour concurring) the king commanded the French kings Embassadour to depart out of the realme: he published this reason of his commandement, that it was not conuenient to entertaine about the person of a king, and in a kingdome so deuout to the Church, a man that represented a king so manifestly persecuting the Sea Apostolike. Now began to be discovered the secret resolution wherein the king of England with his armie by sea should molest the shoares of Normandy and Britaine, and should send eight thousand footmen into Spain to make warre vpon the Duchie of Guyen, together with the forces of the king of Aragon: a suspition which not a litle afflicted the French king, both for that the memorie of the warres past had made the English name verie terrible to those peoples, and also he knew the daunger would grow so much the greater, by how much the Spanisli forces were ioyned with them: he was fearefull also by the consideration of his owne weaknesse, hauing sent into Italy all his companies of men at armes sauing two hundred launces, which if he should call backe either in part or in all, the Duchy of Mullan, which he esteemed much, should remaine in manifest perill: and if for his resupplie he should increase the ancient band of eight hundred launces, he could repose litle confidence, and hope for lesse assurance amid so great dangers in persons newly created & vnexperienced: he added to this the suspition of the alienation of Caesar, which daily more and more increased: for, notwithstanding Andrew Burgos whom he had sent with so great expectation, and being returned, brought tidings that Caesar was disposed to abide in the confederation: yet he made offers of verie hard conditions, entermedling many complaints: for, he required of the king, to assure him to recouer all that appertained to him by the capitulations of Cabray, alleaging that he could no more trust in simple promises, for that he hath alwayes known both fro the beginning & since, that it was a matter very grievous to the king that he should conquer Padoua: and that to consume and hold him in continuall trauels, he had willingly wasted two hundred thousand ducckers euery yeare, knowing that to him the spending of fifty thousand was much more: that he had refused the last yeare to deliuer to him the person of Triunleo, being a Captaine that had both the will & the experience to put a speedy end to the war: he required that the kings second daughter being but two yeares old, might be promised to his nephew, induing her for her dowry with Burgonny, & that the daughter might presently be deliuered to his hands: lastly, that there should be left referred to him the quarrels of Ferrara, of Bologna, and the controuersie of the Councell, forbidding the French armie to march towards Rome, and protesting that he was not to endure that the king should any way increase his estate in Italy. These conditions of themselves grievous & almost intollerable, were yet made more heauy by the experience he had, that notwithstanding he should accord to him so many things, yet he could not be assured that he wold not varie, either according to occasions or according to his custome: yea, the iniquity of the conditions offered, serued almost as a certaine argument, that being already alienated from the French king, he sought the occasion to put it to effect vnder some colour, seeing that as well in words as in works he disclosed many signes of an ill will: for, both the Proctors which he had so many times promised to send to the Councell of Pisa, were not come with Burgos, & also the Prelates assembled at Auspurge, had at last made answer by a publike decree, that the Coucell of Pisa was schismaticke & detestable, but yet with this moderation, that they were ready to chage sentence, if they might be resolved in the contrarie by reasons more strong & auailable. And yet notwithstanding the king, at a time, when he stood in most need to assemble his forces, was constrained to maintaine at the request of Caesar two hundred launces, & three thousand footmen in Verona, and a gard of a thousand footmen in Legnagna. Moreouer, the feare of the Swissers vexed not a litle the kings mind: for, albeit he had obtained to send to their Parliaments the Bailiffe of Amiens, to whom he had giuen verie ample commissions, and was now resolved by discret counsell (if such may be called counsels discret as are taken when the oportunitie of helping is past) to spare no liberalitie nor offers of money to reduce them to his amitie: yet what with the hatred of the commons (which in this respite was made greater) and with the importunate persuasions of the Cardinall of Syon, preuailing about the authority of those that from parliament to parliament had hindred all resolutions that were to be made against him: it was discerned that they inclined to send sixe thousand footmen to the pay of the confederates, who made demand of them, to oppose against the firme squadrons of the launceknights. Besides all this, the king found himselfe depriued of all hopes of peace and agreement, notwithstanding during the heate of the warre, there had bene great labour and solicitation made by the Cardinall of Nants and the Cardinall of Strigonia, a mighty Prelate of the Realme of Hungaria: for, the Pope had made this last and resolute answer, that if they would be better heard then before, they should so bring to passe that the diabolicall Councell of Pisa might be reuersed, and see restored to the Church her Cities of Bologna and Ferrara. Wherein expressing no lesse violence in effects then fury in words: he had newly deposed from their dignities many of the French Prelates which were resorted to the Councell, together with Phillip Dece, one of the most excellent lawyers of that time, both for that he had written and disputed in the iustice of their cause, and did follow the Cardinals to be at hand for direction, when matters required aduise and interpretation of law: In all these difficulties, dangers, and aduersities which enuironed the French king on all sides, he had not one firme or certaine footing in any part of Italy: the estates of Ferrara and Bologna serued him (as in times past) more for vexations and charges, then for any other vse: and touching the Florentins, to whom he made a new instance to ioyne with him in a warre against Romagnia, he could not draw from them other then generall answers: no, he rather held them suspected by reason of the *Viceroy*s Embassador of Naples ordinarily remaining at Florence, but much more for that they had set the Embassador to the king Catholike, & did no more communicate with him of their affaires, as they were wont. But most of all, for that hauing labored to prolong the league which was finished within few moneths, without that they demanded either mony or other great obligations, they temporized, to the end to be at liberty to take that part that seemed best for their safety, & conueniency of their affaires. The Pope also, to augment this disposition, & for feare withall, least his too great seuerity & rigour induced them to follow with their force the fortune of the French king, both gaue them absolution of paines & censures, the common-weale not suing for it, and also sent as Nuncio to Florence with very easie and gracious conditions, Ioh. Gossadin a Bolognois, one of the Clarke of the chamber Apostolike, labring to take from them the suspition that they had had of them: so that the king seeing himselfe left alone against so many enemies, ther already pronounced or very likely to be so. And hauing but very hard meanes of resistance, if so many aduersities should thunder vpon him in one time, he addrest speedy commandement to Monsieur de Foix, to march with as great diligence as he could against the army of the confederates: against whom, as he promised to himselfe the victory, supposing the to be the weakest, so, being possessed of the victory, he should proceed to assaile Rome & the Pope without any respect: in the good issue & succeeding of which, he had opinion that he should stand acquitted all his great dangers. And to the end that both the enuy of the enterprize might be diminished, and his iustifications the more increased, he gaue order that the enterprize should be made in the name of the Councell of Pisa, by whom should be assigned a Deputy Legate to go with the army, and vnder the sayd name, to receiue the townes that should be conquered.

Thus, Monsieur de Foix, departing from Brescia, came to Finalo, where he remayned certaine dayes, partly to make prouision of victuals that came out of Lombardy, and partly to reassemble and draw into one strength all his bands which the king had sent out of Italy, except such as by necessity remained for the gard of townes, and partly for the great and sudden raynes that fell, which gaue impediment to his marching: from thence he went to S. Georges, which is vpon the territories of Bologna, and thither came to him a new supplie of three thousand footmen Gascons, a thousand aduenturers, and a thousand Piccards, all men of choise, and such as the Frenchmen made great reputation and reckening of: his whole campe according to a iust number contained siue thousand launceknights, siue thousand Gascons, and eight thousand Italians and French, with a thousand sixe hundred launces, comprehending the band of two hundred Gentlemen. The Duke of Ferrara was also to ioyne to this army with a hundred men at armes, and a great traine of good artilleries, Monsieur de Foix hauing left behind him all his great shot and munitions for the deepe & foule wayes to draw them. To this army was also to come, and was already on his way, the Cardinall S. Senerin appointed Legat of Bologna by the Councell, he was a braue and valiant Cardinall, bearing more inclination to armes then to holy exercises, and contemplations of religion, and lesse giuen to the vocation of the Church or ciuill or private profession, then to publike action and warlike imitation. As soone as Monsieur de Foix had set downe these directions for his affaires, he marched forward to seeke the enemies, his valour carying him in a burning desire to fight with them, no lesse for the continuall commandements and incitations of the king, then by a resolute working and property of his owne mind, naturally thirsting after glory, and in him so much the more vehement and kindled, by how much his former successes & victories caried him into a weening of further fortune and felicity: and yet he gaue not himselfe ouer so much to this humor of glory and desire, as that his intention was to set vpon them rashly, but approching neare their campe, either to see if he could willingly drawe them out to the battell in some place where the qualitie of the situation might giue least impediment to his vertue, or els to constraîne them to fight in cutting off their victuals and their other succours. But farre other was the intention of the enemies, in whose army (after the regiment of the Duke of Vrbino was gone vnder colour of some controuerfie) were a thousand foure hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and seuen thousand Spanish foote men, with three thousand Italians newly leaued: they were of this opinion, that being both inferior in numbers, & the French horsemen better disposed then theirs, it could not be for their surety to fight in a place of equality, at the least afore the six thousand Swissers were come, which being newly graunted by the Cantons, there was practise at Venice, whither the Cardinall of Sion with twelue Embassadors of that nation were gone for that purpose, to leauy at the common charges of the Pope and the Venetsians: there was added to this, the will of the king of Aragon, who had giuen commandement both by letters and messengers expresse, to abstaine from battell as much as could be: for he hoped specially in the thing which the French king feared most, that if the battell were deferred vntill the king of England and he began the war in Fraunce, the French king would be constrained to call home either all or the greatest part of his companies, & by that meane he should put end to the war of Italy & remaine possessed of the victory without bloud or danger: and for this reason he had forbidden the Viceroy to besiege Bologna, had it not bin for the great instance & complaints that the Pope made. Thus the Viceroy of Naples together with the other Captaines, were at this point to encampe alwayes neare to the French army, both to let that the townes of Romagna remained not to them in pray, & also to stop the way for going to Rome: and withall they were resolved to keepe them alwayes in places of strength, where, either for their situation, or to be backt with some great towne, the Frenchmen should haue no oportunitie to charge them but to their great disadvantage: and therefore they were determined to make no account nor difficulty to retire as often as neede should be, iudging, as men well vnderstanding the quality of war, that they were not bound to the apparances and brutes that ran, but principally had to looke to obtaine the victory which was followed with glory, with reputation, & with praise of men. According to which resolution, the same day that the army was lodged at the Castle Guelfe and at Medicina, such as were incamped neare those places, retired to the wals of Ymola: the day following the Frenchmē passed within a mile & an halfe of Ymola, the enemies keeping good order in the place where they were encamped; but refusing to assaile them at so great a disadvantage, they passed further, the vaungard lodging in the borough of Bubana foure miles from Ymola, and the other part of the army at Mordana & Bagnaro, townes somewhat more then a mile one from another: They chose their lodging places beneath the high way for the oportunitie of victuals, which with surety were brought by the riuer of Paw, Lugo, Bagna, Canall and the townes thereabout, being abandoned of the Spaniards, & eftsfoones returned to the deuotion of the Duke of Ferrara when Monsieur de Foix entred vpon the territories of Bologna. The day after, the Spaniards leauing sufficient garrison in the Castle of Ymola, and lx. men at armes in the towne vnder Ioh. Saffatello, wēt to Castle Bonlonnois, & incamped vpon the high way, their campe stretching towards the Mountaines: and the same day, the Frenchmē tooke by force the borough of Solarola, the terror whereof made Cotignola and Granarola to render to them, where they remained the day following: and the enemies encamping in a place called the field of flies. In these litle remouings and nearnesse of places, the two armies marched alwayes in good order, their artillery going foremost, with the face to the enemy, as though the battell were to begin at euery houre: and yet both the armies

marched with very great respect, the one not to be constrained to come to blowes but in a place where the advantage of the situation should recompence the disadvantage of their number and forces: and the other to seeke to draw the enemies to a necessity to fight, but with this regard, that at one time, both the weapons and place should not be contrary to them. In that place, Monsieur de Foix receiued a new commandement from the king to hasten the battell, the same causes and reasons still increasing that had first induced him to aduance to seeke the enemies: For, where the Venetians had obstinately refused to make peace with Cesar, but vpon condition that they might retaine Vincenza, notwithstanding they were much weakened by the accident of Brescia, and also much pressed first by requests and after by protestations and threatnings of the Pope and king of Aragon. There was at last made betweene them a truce for eight moneths before the Pope, with couenant that either parts should retaine the things they possessed, and to pay so Cesar fiftie thousand florins of the Rhem: the same removing from the king all doubts that he would not be deuided from him; and at the same time he had intelligence that he would haue warre beyond the mounts: for, Ierome Cabanillo the king of Aragons Embassador and resident in his Court, making instance to be heard in plaine counsell, told him he had receiued commandement from the king his Maister to depart, exhorting him in his name to forbear to fauour against the Church the tyrants of Bologna, and, for so vniust a cause, to leaue off to trouble a peace of so great importance and profite to the whole common-weale of Christendome. In which exhortation he offered, that in case he feared to receiue any damage for the restitution of Bologna, he would assure him in all sorts he would desire; adding in the ende for a resolution immouable, that he would not, nor could not faile to defend the Church according to the office of euery Christian Prince.

Therefore Monsieur de Foix, being now certaine that he should neuer accomplish his intention in accosting and following the enemy, for that, for the commodity they had of the townes of Romagnia, he could not easily cut off their victuals nor force them to the battell without great disadvantage: and his owne army also suffering no small necessity of victuals by the barrenesse of places where he lay, he tooke counsell of his Captaines, and determined to go to encampe afore Rauenna: he hoped by this meane, the enemies, not to diminish their reputation, would not suffer to be lost before their eyes a City of that importance: and withall he doubted not vnder this occasion to fight with the enemies in a place of indifferency: and to let the enemy (haply suspecting his deuise) to approach to Rauenna, he encamped betweene Cotignola and Granarola vij. miles from them, where he stayed foure dayes expecting from Ferrara twelue Cannons and twelue other lesser peeces of artillery. The enemies doubted such a resolution, and for that cause sent to Rauenna Mark. Anth. Colonna, who before he entred into the iorney, tooke the faith and promise of the Legat, the Viceroy Fabricio and Peter of Nauarre, with all the other Captaines of the army (otherwaies he would not vndertake the enterprize) that if the French came to encampe afore it, they should make to his succours with the whole army. There went with him in this expedition, threescore men at armes of his owne band, an hundred light horsemen vnder Peter de Castre, and sixe hundred Spanish footemen commanded by Captaine Parades and Salezart: touching the residue of the army, they encamped neare the wals of Faenza, along the gate that goeth to Rauenna, entertayning the time of their abiding there with a hote skirmish with the enemy. About that time Monsieur de Foix sent an hundred launces and fiftene hundred footemen to take the borough of Rusci garded by a garrison of the place it selfe, who; notwithstanding in the beginning (according to the manner of commons and popular men) shewed themselves very resolute and assured, yet, their naturall feares vanquishing their frayle shewes of courage, they entred the same day into a parley to render and yeeld: during which commonings the Frenchmen taking the oportunity of their negligence and disorder, entred the place with no little furie and sacked it, putting to the sword more then two hundred men, and reduced all the residue to the calamity of prisoners: from Rusci, Monsieur de Foix drew neare to Rauenna, and the day after incamped neare the wals betweene the two riuers in the middest whereof the towne hath her situation: the riuier of Ronquo which old histories call Vitis, and the riuier of Moncono, not a litle esteemed, for that next after Paw, it is the chiefeft of those riuers that haue their head on the left hand of the Appennyn, and entreth into the sea of his proper course, fall from the Appennyn hilles, and where they take their head, there they make the separation of Romagnia from Tuskane. These riuers make their course so, as they inclose the City of Furly; Montono that runneth on the left hand toucheth almost the wals, and Ronquo falling on the right hand, passeth within two miles of it, and afterwards are restrained and drawne narrow neare Rauenna, with so litle space, that the one on the one part and the other on the other, make their course fast by the wals: a litle below which wals, their waters meeting and embracing together, they fall afterwards into the sea, being now three miles off, but in old time (as is sayd) did beate vpon the wals of the towne: Monsieur de Foix commanded the space or distance that is betweene the one and other of the riuers, the front of his campe bearing towards the gate Adriana, which is almost ioyning to the brinke or shoare of Montono. The day after he was incamped, he made to plant the artillery, partly against the tower called Roncoro, situated betweene the port Adriana and the riuier of Ronquo, and partly on the other side of Montono whither one part of the army was passed by a bridge which was cast ouer the riuier: he hastned the battery as much as he could, to the end to come to the assault, both afore the enemies approached whom he knew to be marching, and also for his great necessitie and difficultie to recouer prouision of victuals, seeing the Venetian bands which lay at Ficqueroles, with many vessels armed, gaue impediment to such as were brought out of Lombardie. And hauing sunke to the bottom certaine barks in the mouth of the channell which entreth into Pau twelue miles from Rauenna, and passeth there within two miles, they also stopped the entry of those that came from Ferrara in vessels of that countrey: a prouision which was no lesse dangerous then vncasie to be brought by waggon or cart. Besides this, the incommodities and dangers were no lesse for their forragers, who of necessity were to raunge seuen or eight miles from the campe: impediments not small to a campe lying vpon the execution of some enterprise. In regard of these difficulties, concurring also the consideration of other extremities and dangers, Monsieur de Foix determined to giue the assault the same day, notwithstanding he knew it was no lesse hard then dangerous to make his entry: for, of the wall that was battered, there was brought downe to the earth but thirty fadoms, and yet they not altogether ruinous, for that three fadoms were yet left standing on high, so that there could be made no entry but by ladders. But to surmount these difficulties with valour and direction, and the better to encourage his people by a striuing and emulation amongst themselues, he deuised in three squadrons distinct and separate one from another, the regiments of footemen of the Almains, Italians, and French: and after he had chosen out of euery company of the men at armes, ten of the most trayned and resolute, he charged, that being couered with the same armes with the which they were wont to fight on horsebacke, they should march afore the footemen: he brought them all in good order of warre afore the wals, & recommending them to their seuerall fortune, he saw them giue a very furious assault, respecting so much the lesse the perils that were afore them, by how much more euery one of them labored to make good his election and iudgement of their valour. The defendants made valiant resistance, to the speciall praise of Mark. Anth. Colonne, who, during that sharpe storme, omitted in himselfe no office, no part, no place, that concerned the rescue and succour of his people, doing double seruice, both by direction and by example. The Frenchmen were wonderfully troubled with a culuerine that was planted vpon a bastillion, by which, with other afflictions farre contrary to their looking, they saw themselues out of all hope to be able to force the towne, and therefore after they had fought three houres, they retired to their lodgings with the losse of three hundred footemen and certaine men at armes: many were miserably hurt, as Monsieur Chastillon and the Captaine of the artillery, who receiuing their wounds from out of the towne, dyed not many dayes after: Federik de Bossolo was also hurt but not to the death, all men in such a calamity, not being subiect to one kind of fortune. The day following, the deuises to batter the walles, were turned to fight with the enemies in the field: They, as soone as the French armie was remoued, remembring their faith and promise to Mark. Anth. were entred within Furly which is betweene the same riuers, and hauing afterwards passed the riuier of Ronquo a few miles lower, they came towards Rauenna: about which time the Citizens of the towne, brought into terrour by the assault of the day before, sent out one to treat of composition without the priuity of Mark. Anthony: but as he was in the action, going and returning with answers, the army of the enemy was discouered, which marched along the riuers: and as soone as the Frenchmen discerned it, they drew immediatly into armes with a great noyse and

and ranged their companies vnder their ensignes : they retired in great hast their artilleries from before their wals, and turned them towards their enemies : And in the meane while Monsieur de Foix consulted with the other Captaines, whether it were good to passe the riuier at the same instant, to let them for entring into Rauenna : a matter which either they had not determined to do, or at least it was impossible with order couenient, and with necessarie diligence : where it was easie to the armie of the confederates to enter the same day into Rauenna by the wood of Pineta, which is betweene the sea and the Citie : a deuise which had contrained the Frenchmen to retire with shame, and to go out of Romagnia, considering the want of victuals. But they either not knowing the occasion, and fearing withall, that as they marched they should be enforced to fight in the plaine field : or else supposing that by the onely view and shewing of their armie, Rauenna was sufficiently succoured, for that Monsieur de Foix durst not easies send to the assault : they incamped, contrarie to all expectation, three myles within Rauenna, in a place called Montinacco, spending the residue of that day and the night following in intrenching their campe with ditches, so large and deepe, as the shortnesse of the time would suffer. In this respite of time, the French Captaines consulted together not without diuersitie of opinions : some held it an enterprize too daungerous to giue a new assault to them within Rauenna, hauing before them so little a breach in the wall, and behind them so great a campe and armie of enemies : They iudged it vnprofitable to remaine there without hope to be able to do any thing, yea the scarcitie of victuals bringing apparant impossibilitie to all action : and that in retiring, there would grow to the Spaniards a greater reputation then was wonne the day before by aduancing. Lastly, that as it was a matter very daungerous, and against all deliberations and counsels made before, to go charge them in their campe, which they had to thinke was well fortified, so, of all sortes of daungers that chiefly was to be eschued by which might happen greatest harmes, and of all other harmes this is the greatest without all comparison, to be ouerthrowne. Amid these discourses of difficulties and perils, it was in the end resolved, that they would go set vpon the enemy as soone as it were day, Monsieur de Foix allowing that resolution as most agreeable to his glorie and their common safetie. All the night they wrought to set vp the bridge vpon the riuier of Ronquo, making plaine the risings of the bankes on all sides, to make the way more easie and passible. The next morning by the first appearing of the day, being the eleuenth of Aprill, a day very solemne for the memory of the holy resurrection, the Launceknights of the footemen marched ouer the bridge, almost all the vauntgard and the battell passed the riuier by foord, and the rearegard guided by Yues d'Alegre, wherein were foure hundred Launces, remained vpon the shore of the riuier on Rauenna side, to the end to succour the armie in necessitie, and to make head if the souldiers or people issued out of Rauenna : and to the gard of the bridge which had bene afore built vpon the riuier of Montono, was appointed Captaine Paris a Scottish man with a strength of a thousand footemen. Immediately vpon this the Frenchmen prepared themselues to the battell in this order : The vauntgard with the artillerie before, gouerned by the Duke of Ferrara with seuen hundred Launces and the Launceknights, was placed vpon the banke or shoare of the riuier which was on their right hand, the footmen being on the left had to the horsemen : on the side of the vauntgard and in flanke, were bestowed the footmen of the battell, which were eight thousand, part Gascons, and part Piccards : and after, in enlarging alwayes and bearing further from the banke of the riuier, was the last esquadron of Italian footemen led by Federike Bossolo, wherein was not aboue the number of fife thousand bodies : for notwithstanding Monsieur de Foix comming from before Bologna, tooke with him such as were there in garrison, yet many of them were shronke away, by reason the pay was small : and on the side or wing of this Squadron were all the archers and light horsemen, which exceeded the number of three thousand : After the ordering of all these squadrons, who not stretching directly right forth, but plying and bowing, bare the forme of a halfe Moone, and vpon the banke of the riuier, were the six hundred launces of the battell commaunded by Monsieur de la Palissa, together with the Cardinall S. Senerin Legate of the Councell, who being of stature huge and mightie, and of courage and minde nothing inferiour, and armed withall from top to toe with glittering armes, performed far better the office of a Captaine then of a Cardinall or Legate. In this disposing of the army Monsieur de Foix reserued to himselfe no charge or place particular, but hauing made a choise of thirty of the most valiant Gentlemen of the whole armie, he stood free & at libertie to be the better able to succour and minister to all parts. The goodly estate and presence of his personage couered with armour shining and wrought, made him easie to be discerned from all others: ioyning his liuerie or cassacke, in whose colours was represented the inclination of his mind. And because there should be omitted in him nothing that either belonged to the testification of his proper valour, or was necessarie to stirre vp the mindes of his people, he mounted vpon the rugg of the shore of the riuer, and with a countenance of singular ioy and comfort, disperfed into his eyes and all his other outward senses and parts, he spake to his companies with an eloquence more then martiall in this sort:

geth his souldiers to the

My good friends and souldiers, this is the day wherein fortune offereth to leade vs to fight with our enemies in open field: a matter so much the more welcome, by how much it hath bene long desired with an vniuersall expectation of vs all. The same fortune, whose fauour we haue caried alwayes vpon our shoulders in so many victories, presenteth her selfe now to kisse our cheekes in signe of her perpetuall assistaunce: and holding her lap open, she puts into our hands an occasion to winne the most honourable and glorious victorie that euer was got by any armie in the memorie of man: for not onely Raenna, not onely all the townes and limites of Romagnia, are subiect to your discretion, but also the wealth and plentie of riches contained in those large limites, shall be the least part of the rewardes of your valour. Not one Prince or Potentate remaining in Italie able to make head against your force and felicitie, what shall let you to runne vp euen to Rome, where the infinite treasures of that wicked Court drawne in so many ages out of the bowels and intrals of Christendome, shall be the honourable fruits of your trauell: yea your valour and your fortune will put into your hands so many stately ornaments, such heapes of siluer, so many wedges of gold, such mountaines of precious stones, and so many rich prisoners, that the whole world will enuie your condition. And from Rome, euen with the same facilitie, we shall march into the bowels of the kingdome of Naples, executing reuenge vpon the iniuries done to vs and ours heretofore. These be felicities which I see not subiect to any impediment, when I consider your vertue, your fortune, and the honourable victories you haue gotten in few dayes. These expeditions bring with them no doubt nor feares, when I behold your countenances, and do remember that there are very few amongst you, who in my presence hath not giuen some notable testimonie of his valour. Our enemies be the same Spaniards, whom our arriuall forced with shame to flye by night from before Bologna, they be the same mindes and bodies who not many dayes since sought their safetie from vs, no otherwise then by hiding themselves vnder the wals of Ymola and Faenza, and afterwarde couered their dishonor in places mountenous and impassible. This is a race of people and nation, that in the kingdome of Naples neuer fought against our armies in plaine field, or places discouered, but brought with them alwayes the aduantage of rampiers, of riuers, of diches, or the weather, reposing lesse in their valour and vertue, then in their sleights and ambushes. And yet I can not terme them that portion of Spaniards which haue bene norished and made old in the warres of Naples, but rather a people new, raw, and vnexperienced, who neuer fought against other armies then bowes and arrowes and launces pointed after the maner of the Moors: who notwithstanding is a nation & people weake of body, without heart, without armour, and wholly without knowledge of the art of warre, yet the last yeare they ouerthrew this proud generation of Spaniards, to their great infamie in the Isle of Gerbes: from which place fled this Peter of Nauarre, a Captaine of so great name and reputation with them, seruing as a notable example to all the world touching the difference to make wals fall with the furie of powder, and sutteltie of vaults secret and vnder earth, and to fight in the field with a true resolution and magnanimitie of courage. They are now inclosed with a trench which feare hath driuen them to make this night in great hast: their footemen are shadowed and couered with the rising of the banke, and they put confidence in their armed wagons, as if the battell were to be performed by those childish instruments, and not with the resolution of minde, and meere force of hands and armes. But with our artilleries we can not but hunt them out of their vaultes and caues, and compell them to come into the field and open plaines, where the world shall heare of the oddes and difference betweene the furie of the Frenchmen, the resolution of the Almaines, valour of the Italians, and the suttelties, wiles, and ambushes of the Spaniards. The greatest matter that I finde to diminish our glorie, is the inequalitye of our number, being almost twise so many as they. And yet to vse this aduantage can not

not be referred to our cowardise, but to their rashnesse, for that their valour and courage is not the cause of their appearing, but the authoritie of Fabricio Colono, in respect of his promises vndiscreetly made to Marke e Antonio, or rather it is a sentence of Gods iustice for the iust punishment of the prittle and impudent vices of that false Pope Iulius, and of so many treasons and decets as that disloyall king of Aragon hath wrought against vs, abusing the goodnesse of our king. But in vsing so large a scope of perswasions to souldiers of your vertue, methinkes I do so much deferre and hinder our victorie and the glorie thereof, as I spend time in debating with you to whom the rewardes of the iourney are not vnknown: March on a Gods name according to the direction set downe, and fight with this hope, that this day will giue vnto the king imperie and iurisdiction, & to you the wealth and riches of all Italie. For my part I will be all this day at your election, not further extending my authoritie then may needfully tend to the benefite of the seruice, and make lesse reseruatiō of my selfe then belongs to the place which I occupie amongst you. The seruice of this day being all one, the perill shall be equall both to you and to me, and as I promise to be indifferent with you in the action, so I doubt not but we shall all communicate in one fortune and felicitie. It shall be a great happinesse to me, that being the Captaine of this dayes battell, my souldiers shall be made more glorious and more rich, then hath bene euer any armie or souldiers these three hundred yeares.

With these wordes the armie fell to a generall showting and crying, euery one wishing that they were at the place where they might expresse their valour: they all called vpon him to be forward to leade them, whom they were willing to follow euen to the last man. Then the trompets blew and the drummes stroke vp, warning euery souldier to repaire to his ensigne: in which order, with more ioy then feare, they began to march towardes the enemies campe, distant from the place where they passed the riuer lesse then two myles: their lodgings stretched out along the shoare of the riuer, which was on their left hand, where they had cast afore them a trench so deepe as the shortnesse of the time would suffer, which winding and turning vpon the right hand, & enuironed all the place where they were incamped, sauing they had left at the entrie of the trench an opening of twentie pases for the horsemen to issue out to the skirmish. In this campe, as soone as they saw the French begin to passe the riuer, they were ranged in battell in this sort: The vauntgard of eight hundred men at armes commaunded by Fabricio Colono, The confederates armie, was bestowed along the shoare of the riuer, and ioyning to the right hand of the same a squadron of sixe thousand footemen: after the vauntgard occupying the place along the riuer, was the battell of sixe hundred Launces, and on the wing a squadron of foure thousand footemen, all gouerned by the Viceroy, who was accompanied by the Marquis of Palude: the Cardinall de Medicis, who by nature had no cleare sight, and in behauiour very easie and tractable, marched in the battell in an habite of peace, seeming as well in demonstrations as in effectes, very vnlike to the Cardinall S. Seuerin. After the battell, and likewise along the brinke of the riuer, followed the rearegard of foure hundred men at armes, led by Caruagiall a Spanish Captaine, with a squadron for his wing of foure thousand footmen, & with the bands of light horsemen, of whom was Captaine Generall Fernand d'Aualo Marquis of Pesquiere, albeit but very young, yet of singular expectation: They were on the right hand at the backes of the footemen to succour such as should suffer distresse. The artilleries were bestowed about the men at armes: & for Peter of Nauarre who had made a choise of fiue hundred footmen, and would not for that day be bound to any one place, had bestowed vpon the trench afore the footemen, thirtie waggons resembling the example of the old times: euery waggon was full of small shot, with a verie long boare speare vpon them, the more easily to sustaine the assault of the Frenchmen. In this order they kept themselues close within the body of their trench, expecting the armie of the enemy to come and charge them: a resolution that as it proued in the end little to their profit: so, from the beginning it appeared very preiudiciall: for Fabricio Colono had giue aduise to charge the enemy whe they began to passe the riuer, iudging a greater aduantage to consist in this, to fight against one part onely, then to stand to the defence of a slender trench which they had cast afore them. Against this aduise was Peter of Nauarre, whose counsels were receiued of the Viceroy as Oracles, and by him it was resolued to suffer them to passe: an opinion no lesse vndiscreet, then altogether full of perill. The Frenchmen marched on, and were by this time come within two hundred paces of the trench; and seeing their enemies shew no disposition to come out of their place, they stayed for not to giue them the aduantage which they sought to haue : and in that sort both the one and the other armie stood at gaze without stirring for the space of two houres, onely the shot executed on both partes, endomaging not a little the French footemen, for that by direction of Peter of Nauarre, the artilleries were planted in a place that gaue great oportunitie to distresse them. But the Duke of Ferrara retiring behind the armie one part of the artillerie, drew it in great hast to the point of the Frenchmen, in the very place where the archers had bene bestowed. This point, for that the armie bare the forme of a halfe Moone, was almost vpon the backes of the enemies, who were now furiously battered in flanke, and to their great harmes, but specially the horsemen. Those companies of the Spanish footemen which the Captaine of Nauarre had withdrawen into a low place on the side of the rising of the riuer, being in no perill to be hurt, for that according to his commaundement they threw themselves flat vpon the earth, Fabricio cryed aloud, and with great importunities by messengers, called on him to issue out to the battell, and not tarie till they were consumed with the shot of the artilleries. But it was in vayne to raunge the Captaine of Nauarre, in whom bare more dominion a cursed ambition, then either reason or conduct : for imagining that by the valour of the Spanish footemen (though all the residue perished) he should carie the victorie, he esteemed his glorie would by so much be augmented, by how much should be increased the daunger of the armie. By this time the artillerie had made such mortalitie of the men at armes and light horsemen, that they were able to sustaine no longer. There might be seene with a miserable spectacle mingled with cries lamentable, both men and horses fall dead to the ground, their quarters flye into the ayre, and their heades and armes separate from the residue of their bodies : an execution so bloody in the eyes of Fabricio, that he cryed out, shall we all dye heere through the wretched obstinacie of one straunger, shall this gallant armie be offered to the butchers boule without any reuenge of the blood that is spilt? Where is the glorie of our victories so oftentimes obtained against the Frenchmen? Shall the honour of Spayne and Italie be lost for the pleasure of a particular man of Nauarre? In which rage and furie of complaint, he caused his companies to issue out on the other side of the trench, without tarrying for licence or direction from the Viceroy : and being followed with all the horsemen, Peter of Nauarre was compelled to make signe to his footemen, who being risen from the ground, charged with incredible furie the footemen of the Launceknights which were already come vpon them. By this meane all the squadrons being ioyned pelmell, there began a most desperate and hot battell, and out of doubt one of the greatest, and best executed that had bene fought in Italie of long time : for the battell of Taro was almost no other thing then a gallant encounter of Launces, and the deedes of armes in the kingdome of Naples, were rather actions of disorder and rashnesse, then battels pitched and performed : and in Guia Radadda the lesser part onely of the Venetians was brought to the fight : but here there was not a body which passed not through the middest of the battell, the fight being in the plaine field without impediments of waters or rampiers, both the armies fought with a wonderfull resolution and courage, they came to the fields with mindes indifferently determined to dye or liue, being kindled not onely with glorie, with hope, and with daunger, but also with hatred of Nation against Nation. In the heate of the fight there hapned this spectacle worthy of memorie : in the medley of the Launceknights with the Spaniards, two Captaines of great reputation marching afore their squadrons, fought hand to hand as it were by defiance, where the Launceknight being slaine, the Spaniard had no more glorie by his victorie, then the other had honour by his death. The horsemen of the league which ordinarily were not equall to the French, & that day hauing suffred much by the artillery, were become farre inferior, being not able to make further resistance, gaue their backs to the enemy, hauing lög borne out the furie of the fight more with courage then with strength. And Tues d'Allegre also who M. la Palissa had called, comming with the regard to charge them in the flanke, & with a thousand footmen that had bene left at Montona, were taken prisoners by the souldiers of the Duke of Ferrara, together with Fabricio Colonne fighting valiantly. In this giuing backe the example of the Captaines did much, for that the Viceroy and Carnagiall, without making a last prooue of the vertue of their men, began to flye, carying with them the third Squadron almost whole & vnbroken : with them fled Antio de Lena, a man at that time of very base cōdition, but rising by cōtinual exercise of armes, to all the degrees of warre, he became at last a Captaine of singular reputation and name:

name. All the light horsemen were likewise overthrowne, and their Captaine the Marquis of Pesquiere taken prisoner, having his armour all covered with blood, and his body full of wounds, expressing his valour to be greater then his fortune. There was taken also the Marquis of Palude, who in great disorder had led the second Squadron to the battell through a field full of ditches and bushes. And albeit by the wretched successe of that day, all the place was covered with bodies of dead men and carcasses of horses, yet the footemen of the Spaniards abandoned of their horsemen, continued to fight with an incredible valour and assurance: for, albeit in the beginning of the fight and at the first encounter with the lanceknights, they were somewhat shaken by the firme and close order of the pikes, yet coming afterwards to the sword's point, and many of the Spaniards covered with their targets running with their daggers and short weapons betweene the legges of the lanceknights, they came with a wonderfull slaughter almost euen to the middest of their Squadron: and neare vnto them the Gascon footemen hauing occupied the way betweene the riuer and the rising, had charged the Italian footmen, and albeit they had much suffered by the artilleries, yet they had expelled them to their great praise, if, with a guidon of horsemen Tues Allegre had not thrust in amongst them, with a greater valour then fortune: for Monsieur Vinarais his sonne being slaine in the action euen afore his eyes, he thought to take present reuenge of his new sorrow, or haply hauing lesse delight to liue after he sawe the priuation of his sonne, he thrust in with his horse into the thickest presse of enemies, where he communicated in the miserable destinie of his sonne, fighting as appertained to a valiant Captaine. The Italian footemen gaue backe, being no more able to resist so great a multitude: but one part of the Spanish footemen running to their succours, sustained them for a time: neither could the footemen of the lanceknights make any further resistance, being also oppressed by the other part of the Spaniards: but the horsemen being already fled, Monsieur de Foix turned him to charge them with a great troupe of horsemen, by reason whereof the Spaniards rather retiring then chased out of the battell, and winning the way which is betweene the riuer and the rising without shewing any manner of disorder, they began to get further off, not giuing faster backe then by foote paces, keeping the front of their Squadron very close, by whose force they repulsed the Frenchmen. It was at that time that Peter de Navarre hauing lesse desire to liue then to saue himselfe, and in that mind would not go out of the battell, was taken prisoner, receiuing a reward of his obstinacy to the vniuersall ruine of the army: The mind thirsting after glory is infinite in opinion and weening, and to the man that is caried with ambition and desire of honour, nothing can stay or limite his aduentures. For Monsieur de Foix could not brooke that the Spanish footemen should go their wayes as it were victorious and in so good order, neither could he thinke his victory was perfect, if they were not overthrowne as well as the residue: therefore respecting more the glory he should get, then the perils that commonly lye lurking vnder vndiscrete aduentures, he went furiously to the charge with a Squadron of horsemen, and executed vpon those that were last, by whom being enuironed and cast from his horse, or as some suppose, his horse falling vpon him whiles he fought, he was slaine with a thrust of a pike giuen him in the flanke. And if it be then time for a man to desire to die, when his fortune hath set him in the full of his felicity, he may by imputation be sayd to die happily, falling into his last time, when he fell into the last act of so glorious a victory: he died very yong, but with a singular reputatiō throughout the world, hauing in lesse then three moneths, & being almost a Captaine before he was a souldier, obtained so many victories with incredible celerity & valour. Neare vnto him Monsieur Lautrech was left as dead, hauing vpon him twenty wounds, but being afterwards caried to Ferrara, his life was saued by the diligēt cure of Physicians. Monsieur de Foix being dead, the Spaniards wet away without receiuing afterwards any trouble or impediment, the residue of the army being dispersed & put to chase, the baggage sacked, the Ensignes of artilleries spoyled, and the Popes Legat taken, who from the hands of the stradiots being come into the power of Federick Bossolo, was by him presented to the Legat of the Councell: There fell also into the fortune of prisoners Fabrizio Colonna, Peter Navarre, the Marquis Palude, the Marquis Bitonte, the Marquis Pesquiere, with many other Lords, Barons, & honorable Gentlemen, as well Spaniards as of the kingdom of Naples. In battels there is nothing more vncertaine then the computation and number of the dead, the common brute was, that of the one and the other army, there was left on the ground at the least ten thousand bodies of men, one part being of the French part, and the two other halves

of the confederates : some publish a greater number, onely this is certaine , that the castell fell vpon the most valiant and brauest sort , of which number on the Ecclesiastlike side was Raphaell de Paisi a Captaine of great name, & of such as were hurt the number was infinite. Touching the Frenchmen, the victory was not more glorious then full of damage and discomfort , by reason of the death of Monsieur de Foix, Tues d'Allegre, and many of the Nobility of Fraunce: as also of the Almains, for the losse of Captaine Jacob with many other resolute leaders and commanders, to whose valour (but with a great price of their blood) the victory in the greatest part was attributed : and lastly for the death of many Gascous and Piccards being left there with Captaine Molard, which nations lost that day all their glory with the French: onely the harme that exceeded all those losses, was the death of Monsieur de Foix, with whom perished wholly the very sinew and strength of that army. Of such as were vanquished and saued themselves from the misery of the battell, the most part drew towards Cesena, and from thence fled further off: the Viceroy himselfe made small repose till he came into the countrey of Ancona, whither he brought with him a very slender troupe of horsemen. Many escaping the stroke of the battell, found peril by flying where they sought for safety, for that the wayes being full of peasants, they were slaine and stripped by them, their fortune taking them out of one danger which they could not but feare, and caried them into another which they had no reason to doubt: so futtle is the stroke of destiny, ordained from the beginning to fall vpon mortall men. And the Duke of Vrbino did not only stirre vp the councitmen against such as fled, but also sent bands of souldiers into the territorie of Pejera to aggrauate their calamity: he was in this suspected, for that many dayes afore he had sent Baltazar Chastillon to the French king, and entertained also certaine bands of men with Monsieur de Foix: reasons that made some men belecue he had secretly conspired against his Vncle: only such as fled by the dominions of the Florentines, passed without any harme, the compassion of that common-weale being greater then to adde affliction to the afflicted, since one sort of calamities sufficeth to vexe the minde that carieith with it feare and dispaire. As soone as the French army was returned to their tents, not more reioycing in the honour of their victorie, then loaden with burdens of sorrow and lamentations, the people of Rauenna sent to render themselves: but such is the nature of fortune, to suffer no part vntouched whom she hateth, as they were in debating of the coucnants, or haply being already concluded, the Almaine footemen and Gascous taking the oportunitie of their negligence in garding their walles, entred the towne at the breach which Monsieur de Foix had made: and as men whose minds were not yet free from the blood of the battell, they sacked it in great cruelty, adding to the despite of the harmes they receiued in the battell, the vniuersall and naturall hatred they bare to the Italians. In this cruell action nothing was lesse respected then moderation in killing and spoiling, no age spared, no sexe reserved, no sort of people nor goods pardoned, all things were brought into the rewards of the victorie, and nothing left free from the violence and furie of the souldiers. The fourth day after Marke Antho. Colonne forsooke the Citadell, into the which he was retired, yeelding it vpon promise of life and goods saued, giuing also his faith, as also for his other Captaines not to beare armes, neither against the French king, nor against the Councell of Pisa, vntill Magdalen day next. By this example, and vnder the same conditions, the Bishop Virelli with an hundred and fiftie footemen, consented to giue vp the Rocke which was committed to his keeping: the Cities of Ymola, of Furly, of Cesena, and Rimini, together with all the peeces of Romagnia, except the Rockes of Furly and Ymola, followed also the fortune of the victorie, and were all receiued by the Legate in the name of the Councell of Pisa: but the French army, both for the death of Monsieur de Foix, and so great harmes receiued at the battell, remained foure miles from Rauenna, without doing any thing, the terrour of their losses being greater in them, then that they were yet apt to take counsell what to do. The Legate and Monsieur Palissa to whom was diuolued the gouernement of the army (for Alfonso d'Este was now returned to Ferrara) being vncertaine what would be the kings will, temporized and tarried for his further direction: neither was their authority such with the souldiers, as to commaund the army to march, being so troubled in sending to places of surerie the things they had sacked, and also so weakned in force and courage for so bloudy a victorie, that they seemed to carie the countenances rather of men vanquished, then of conquerours. This amaze and confusion made all the souldiers with plaintee and teares call vpon

upon the name of Monsieur de Foix, whose presence only had sufficed to remove all impediments that might have let them to have followed him: and it was not to be doubted, that being pushed on with the fury of his valour, and the promises that the king had made to him, that to his use the kingdom of Naples should be conquered, but he had with his accustomed felicity and diligence stretched out his victory even to the bosome of Rome, and that the Pope and all his dependants had bene put to chase, having no other hope to save themselves.

The thirteenth day of Aprill the newes of the battell came to Rome by the relation of Ottavian Fregoso, who went thither in post from Fossambrun: They were heard not without a great feare and tumult of the whole Court, which made the Cardinals runne in hast to the Pope, and with vehement petitions to presse him, that accepting peace, which they distrusted not to obtaine of the French king vnder honest conditions, he would at last dispose himselfe to deliuer the sea Apostolike and his person from so many perils: They told him he had taken trouble and trauell enough for the aduancement of the Church, and the liberty of Italy, his intention only giuing him sufficient glory: They alleged, that in so holy an enterprize, the will of God struing against him, which he might know by many signes and tokens, to obiect himselfe against Gods ordinance, were no other thing then to tempt God, and turne the whole Church into her latest ruine: That as to God more then to him appertained the care of his spouse: so it belonged to him being a man to referre himselfe to his will, and embracing peace according to the voyce of the Gospell, to retire his old age and the state of the Church from so many perplexities and trauels, giuing his whole Court time to take breath from the long afflictions of so raging a time: That it was to be beleued that the fortune of the victors would raise them vp to a higher ambition, even to come to the wals of Rome: That felicity being to be feared, wherein is offered glory ioyned with profite and riches, it was to be doubted least his Nephew would ioyne with them, Robert Vrsin, Pompey Colonna, Anthonie Sauello, Peter Margano, and Rance Mancin, bearing the same inclination: And as it was knowne that all these had receiued money of the French king, and were prepared even afore the battell to distresse Rome: so to meete with these pretences afore they burst out into action, and to auoide the falling of the storme that was already gathered into a cloud, there was no other helpe then the remedy of peace. On the other side, the Embassadors of the king of Aragon and the Senate of Venice, solicited vehemently to the contrary: They perswaded him that the state of things was not reduced to so great affliction, that the despaire was lesse then the hope and comfort, nor the army so extremely disperfed, that without great charge and in litle time it might not be redressed: They alleged that the Viceroy was in safety with the greatest part of the horsemen, and that the Spanish footemen not broken were retired from the battell in good order, who if they were reserued (as was very likely) all the other losses were of no importance: It was not to be feared that the Frenchmen could march so speedily to Rome, but that there would be respite enough to provide against them, both for that it could not be, but that the death of their Captaine would be followed with many disorders and insolencies, and also that they would be holden in suspence for feare of the Swissers, who now were no more to be doubted to professe openly for the league and discend into Lombardie. Lastly, that there was no hope to obtaine peace of the French king but vnder conditions vnequall and full of infamie, being also driuen to receiue lawes of the pride of Bernardin Caruagiall, and of the insolencie of Federike S. Seuerin. In these respects they held it better to take anie other course then to stoupe vnder the wings of peace, specially in such intollerable and vnfaithfull seruitude, and with so great indignitie and infamie: the rather (sayd they) for that these troupes and leagues of Schismatikes would neuer cease to persecute his authority and his life: They held it yet a lesse euill (if extremity would it so) to abandon Rome, and to withdraw himselfe and all his Court either to the kingdom of Naples or to Venice, where he might remaine with the same surety, the same honour, and the same greatnesse, that he had there: for that with the losse of Rome, the Pontificacie was not lost, being alwayes tyed to the person of the Pope in what place soeuer he were. Lastly, they encouraged him to keepe still his accustomed constancy and magnanimity, and that God, who is the searcher of the hearts of men, would neuer fayle to ayde him in so holy a purpose, and much lesse would abandon the little ship of Saint Peter, which though it hath bene wont to be tormented with the stormes and waues of the Sea, yet it is ordayned neuer to be drowned: And finally, it would stand with the zeale, with the honour, with the piety, and with the policy of Christian Princes, to be calouse ouer the mightinesse of the French king, and bearing any affection to religion, they would communicate with him in this quarrell, and ioyne to his defence both with their forces and their proper persons. These reasons were heard of the Pope with so great doubt and ambiguity of mind, that being not able to conceale his passion, it was discerned how on the one side did worke in him hate, disdain, and his inuincible obstinacy to bend or submit: and on the other side, the considerations of feare, suspicion, and daunger. The answers he made to the Embassadors comprehended that it was not so grievous to him to abandon Rome, as that he could not resort to any place where he should not be in the power of another: He told the Cardinals, that he would haue peace, consenting that the Florentines might be solicited to interpose to that end with the French king: and yet his answer bare not that resolution, nor was so cleare from doubts, as might assure them what was his intention: He caused to come from Cintrauechie, Bascia a Genoway and Captaine of his Gallies, which was a manifest coniecture that he would go from Rome: but afterwards he dismissed him to returne to his charge, leauing doubtfull that expectation: He spake to leaue those Barons of Rome which were not of the conspiracy with the others: He heard willingly the comforts of the two Embassadors, but so, as oftentimes he answered them with words full of reproch and disdain: He dissembled alwayes in incertainties, which for the most part deceiued the wisedomes of such as gaue him counsell.

About this time came Iulio de Medicis knight of the Roades and afterwards Pope, him the Cardinall Medicis vnder the leaue of the Cardinall S. Seuerin, sent from the army vnder colour to recommend himselfe to him in so great a calamity, but indeed to relate vnto him in what conditiō and state things stood. The Pope vnderstanding by him at large how much the Frenchmen were weakned, of how many Captaines they were depriued and made naked, and how many valiant bodies of souldiers they had lost, how many lay hurt, and for many dayes would be vnprofitable, what spoyle of horses they had suffered, and how one part of the armie was disperfed abroad by reason of the sacke of Raenna, the Captaines vncertaine of the kings will, and not at good agreement amongst themselues, because Monsieur Palissa refused to endure the insolency of the Cardinall S. Seuerin vsurping the office of a Legate and a Captaine: that there were secret murmures of a descending of Swissers, & no apparant token scene that the army could march so soone. This discourse comforted much the Pope, who causing the reporter to be brought into the consistory, he willed him els soones to relate them in the presence of the Cardinals, in the same forme of discourse which he had vsed to him apart. To these was added the doing of the Duke of Vrbis, who (what soeuer moued him) changed counsell, and sent to offer the Pope two hundred men at armes and foure thousand footemen. Notwithstanding these reports and all the comforts they brought with them, the Cardinals continued to aduise him to peace: a matter which albeit in words and outward actions seemed not vnplausible to him, yet in mind he was not resoluēd to accept it but for a last remedy: yea albeit for the present there appeared no present cure or salue for the fore, yet he would rather chuse to go from Rome, so farre forth as he were not out of all hope that his cause might be supported by the armies of Princes, and principally that the Swissers would stir, who shewing great inclination to his desires, had many dayes before forbidden the French kings Embassadors, to be in the place wherein were assembled the deputies of all the Cantons to determine vpon the Popes demands.

In this estate of affaires, there appeared some hope of peace, for that before the battell of Raenna, the French king what with the consideration of the dangers that hung vpon him on all sides: and what with the despite of the inconstancy of Caesar, and the hard conditions he proponed, respects that much induced him to yeeld rather to the Popes will in many things, had secretly sent Fabricio Casetto brother to the Cardinall Finalo, to the Cardinals of Nants and Strigonia, who had not yet altogether abandoned the negociations of peace: his charge was to require them to propound to the Pope that he was cōtent to reder vp Bologna to him: That Alfonso d'Este should giue vp to him Lugo with the other townes that he held in Romagnia: That he should be bound to pay him his auncient tributes, & to make no more salt vpō his grounds: And that he wold agree to the extinctiō of the Councell: he demanded no other thing of the Pope, thē to haue peace with him, & that Alfonso d'Este might be absolued of the paines, and restored to his auncient rights & priuiledges: That to the family of Bentiuoleis, who should remaine in exile, their proper goods should be be reserved, & the dignities restored to the Cardinals & Prelates which had followed the Councell. Which conditions albeit the two Cardinals feared that the king would no more consent vnto, by reason of the victory that had succeeded since, yet they durst not propound them in other manner. And the Pope seeing the so honorable for him, & not yet willing to manifest that which he had secretly determined in himself, iudged not that the king could refuse them, but peradventure that it was more profitable with these enterspēches to stay the kings armie, to haue the better leasure to see what would be done by those in whom he had reposed the residue of his hopes: so that the Cardinals still importuning him, he subscribed those articles the ninth day after the battell of Rauenna, giuing to the Cardinals his faith and promise to accept them if the king did confirme them: he sent also by letters to the Cardinall Emale remaining in Fraunce, but absent from the Court for feare to offend the Pope, & to the Bishop of Tuoli, who kept the place of Legate in Auignon, that they should go to the king to debate of these things: but he sent them no authoritie nor power to conclude them.

Vntill this time the affaires of the Pope went but in an euill course: vntill this day was aduanced the full of his calamities and his daungers: but after this day (worldly affaires haue their ordinarie mutations) his hopes began to appeare greater, and the wheele of his fortune ceased not with an incredible swiftnesse to turne to his greatnesse.

The thing that gaue beginning to so great a mutation, was the sodaine departing of M. Palissa out of Romagnia: he was reuoked by the Generall of Normandy for feare of the descending of the Swissers, and for that cause he drew his armie towards the Duchie of Millan, leauing in Romagnia vnder the Legate of the Councell three hundred launces, three hundred light horsemen, and fixe thousand footmen with eight peeces of great artilleries. The feare of the comming of the Swissers was made greater, for that the same Generall thinking to do a seruice more agreeable to the king, had vndiscreetly dismissed the Italian footmen, and part of the French footmen immediately after the battell of Rauenna, contrarie to all reason, pollicie, and that which the present affaires required. By the departure of M. Palissa, the Pope was deliuered of the feare that troubled him most, he was more confirmed in his obstinacie, and it helped him greatly to assure the affaires of Rome: for the better oportunitie whereof he had leauied certaine Romaine Barons with three hundred men at armes, and debated to make Captaine Generall Prosper Colonne, the rather for that the courages of such as desired new things being abated, Pompey Colonne that made preparation at Montfortin, consented by the working of Prosper to depose Montfortin into the hands of Marke Anth. Colonne for the Popes suretie, retaining basely in his hands the money he had receiued of the French king. By this exāple also Robert Vrsin, who was come afore from Petillano vpon the lands of the Colonnos to leaue armes, keeping likewise in his hands the money he had receiued of the French king, was brought in afterwards by the meane of Iulio Vrsin, receiuing of the Pope in recompence of his disloyaltie, the Archbishopricke of Reggio in Calabria: only Peter de Margana was ashamed to keepe the money he had receiued, doing the same haply with a counsell no lesse honorable then happie, for that otherwise he had iustly payed the merite and paine of his deceit, being not long time after taken prisoner by the succellour of the king reigning.

But now the Popes mind being greatly confirmed by reason of these things, and hauing no more to feare either enemies forraine or domesticall, the third day of May in great solemnitie, he gaue beginning to the Councell in the Church of Saint Iohn Latran, being now assured that not onelie the most regions of Italie would come thither, but also the realmes of Spaine, of England, and of Hungarie. In this first action he was in person in habite Pontificall, accompanied with the Colledge of Cardinals and great multitudes of Bishops, where the Masse of the holy Ghost (besides manie other prayers) being celebrated according to ancient custome, and the Fathers exhorted with a publike oration to incline with all their hearts to the publike benefit and dignitie of Christian religion: it was declared (the better to lay foundations for other matters) that afterwards should be ordained, that the Councell assembled was a true, a lawfull, and holy Councell, & that in the same remained vndoubtedly all the authoritie and power of the vniuersall Church: Ceremonies assuredly both goodly & holy, & able to pierce euen into the hearts of men, if it might haue bene beleueed that the thoughts and intentions of the authours had bene such as were their words. In this sort did the Pope gouerne himselfe after the battell of Rauenna.

But the French king, notwithstanding that after the death of M. de Foix, which somewhat troubled the ioy of the victorie, as one whom he loued dearly, had commanded M. de Paliffa and the Legate to leade the armie vp to Rome as soone as they could: yet he seemed to abate of that inclination, and began to returne with all his deuises to the desire of peace, fearing that at one time and from many places great stormes would thunder vpon him and trouble his affaires: for, notwithstanding Caesar diminished nothing of his promises, that he would remaine firme with him, assuring that the truce made with the Venetians in his name, was concluded without his consent, neither would he ratifie it: yet besides the feare of the inconstancie of Caesar, & doubt whether his promises were dissembled, it seemed to the king that for the conditions which he demanded, he should haue a companion in time of warre chargefull to him, and to the proceeding of the peace verie preiudiciall and hurtfull, fearing that by his interposing, he should be constrained to consent to more vnworthy conditions. Besides all these, he had no more doubt that the Swissers would ioyne with them of the league: and he was sure he should haue warre with the king of England, who had already sent a Herald to signifie to him that he pretended to be ended all confederations & couenants betweene them, for that in them all was comprehended this exception, that he should make no warre neither against the Church, nor against the king Catholike his father in law. Therefore the king vnderstanding with a great pleasure that the Florentins were solicited to worke the peace, he dispatched speedily to Florence the president of Grenoble with very large commission, to the end matters might be debated more at hand, and if need were he might goe vp to Rome: and knowing afterwards by the subscription of the articles that the Popes inclination was more ready then he seemed, he gaue himselfe ouer for his part wholly to the peace: and yet fearing least for the retiring of his army the Pope would estoones returne to his obstinacie, he sent to M. Paliffa lying then at Parma, to march againe immediately into Romagnia with part of his regiments, spreading a brute that it was to passe further. It seemed to him a matter grievous to deliuer vp Bologna, not so much for the instance that Caesar made to the contrary, as for the feare he had, that notwithstanding the peace, the Pope would continue his euill mind towards him: and therefore it could not but be an action preiudiciall to him to deprive himselfe of the towne of Bologna, which was as the fort and bulwarke of the Duchy of Millan: and besides, the Cardinall Finale and the Bishop of Tinoly being come without expresse authoritie to conclude, he interpreted that to an apparant signe that he had dissemblingly giuen his consent, partly for the straits and daungers wherewith he stood enuironed: neuerthelesse at last he determined to accept the said articles vnder certaine limitations, and yet not such as by them the substance of things should be troubled or altered. With which answer the Secretarie of the Bishop of Tinoly went to Rome, demanding in the kings name, that the Pope would send authoritie to the Cardinall and the Bishop to conclude, or else, that he would call afore him the President of Grenoble who was at Florence, to whom was recommended sufficient power to do the like: but the hopes of the Pope augmented dayly, and by consequent, if he euer had had any inclination to the peace, it was now diminished, he being a man more disposed to obserue and follow times, then to respect and imitate the qualitie of his calling.

About this time arrived the commission of the king of Englād, by the which being dispatched since the moneth of Nouember, he gaue power to the Cardinal of Torke to enter into the league: the reason why he was so long in coming, was the long course he had by sea, hauing bene afore in Spaine. Caesar also, after verie long doubts, had newly ratified the league made with the Venetians, being principally pushed on to that actiō for the hopes which the kings Catholike & of England gaue to him of the Duchies of Millan and of Burgundy. In like sort the matter that much helped to confirme the Pope, were the verie great hopes which the king of Aragon put him in: who hauing the first knowledge of the ouerthrow by letters from the French king written to the Queene, expressing that Guastō de Foix her brother was dead with great glorie, carying with him the reputation of a famous victorie obtained vpon his enemies: and afterwards more particularly by aduertisements of his owne people coming somewhat later for the impediments of the sea. And for that withall, it seemed to him that greater perill would grow to the kingdome of Naples, he had determined to send into Italy the Great Captaine with a strength of new men: a remedy which he was driuen to vse, hauing almost no choise of others: for notwithstanding in outward shew he seemed to respect much the Great Captaine for his behauiour in the kingdome of

of Naples, yet he both suspected his greatnesse, and durst not trust him with authoritie. The Pope then being confirmed by these occasions, at such time as the Secretarie of the Bishop of Tinoli arrived with the articles that had bene debated, putting him also in hope that the limitations added by the King so moderate the infamie that might grow to him by abandoning the protection of Bologna, should be referred to his will: he determined altogether not to accept them: but making semblance of the contrarie in regard of the subscription and faith he had given to the Colledge of Cardinals: a maner which sometimes he vsed contrarie to the opinion that went of him to be alwayes vpright and iust: he caused the articles to be read in the Consistorie, and asked aduise of the Cardinals. Whereupon the Cardinall Arborens a Spaniard, and the Cardinall of York an Englishman, according to a secret pact afore, the one speaking for the king of Aragon, & the other in the name of the king of England, perswaded him to perseuer in his constancie, & not to leaue abandoned the cause of the Church, which he had embraced with so great honor: They alleaged, that all the necessities that had induced him to hearken to these offers, were remoued and ceased, and that now it was manifestly seene that God would not suffer his ship to perish, though for some purpose vnkown to the wit of man he had suffered it to lie open & subiect to sundrie stormes: They told him, it was not reasonable that he made peace onelie for himselfe, and much lesse to debate it without the participation of the other confederates, the action being common and deuided from all particularitie: Lastly they exhorted him to consider well what preiudice it might bring to the Sea Apostolike and to him, to separate himselfe from true and faithfull friends, to imbrace the amity of enemies reconciled. By the operation of these counsels the Pope openly refused the peace: and within a verie short time after, proceeding in his ancient furie, he pronounced in the Consistorie an admonition against the French king, charging him to release the Cardinall of Medicis vpon the penalties ordained in the holy Canons: but he forbore to publish it, for that the Colledge of Cardinals beseeching him to deferre asmuch as he could rigorous remedies, offered to worke by letters writtē in the name of them all, by the which they would both comfort him & beseech him as a right Christian Prince to set him at liberty.

The Cardinall de Medicis was caried to Millan, where he was kept vnder reasonable and easie gard: and albeit his fortune had brought him subiect to the power and disposing of others, yet such was his vertue and spirit, that the authoritie of the Sea Apostolike shined in him, together with a wonderfull reuerence of religion. And about this time began to appeare a great contemning of the Councell of Pisa, the cause whereof was not only abandoned of others with deuotion, with diligence, and with faith, but also euen of such as afore had followed it with armes, and fauored it with affection, with study, and with resolution: for, the Pope hauing sent to the Cardinall of Medicis full power both to absolue from all paines & cursings the souldiers that would promise to beare no more armes against the Church, and also to giue libertie of holy buriall for all the bodies that were slaine at the battell, (a fauour demanded with great importunities) the concourse of people was wonderfull, and no lesse maruellous the deuotion of them that came to demand and promise such matters: yea the Ministers and officers of the king were not against it: onely it was not without manifest indignation of the Cardinals, who saw euen before their eyes, and in the place where was the seate of the Councell, the souldiers and subiects of the king, contrary to his honour, against his profit, vpon the lands of his iurisdiction, and without respecting any thing the authoritie of the Councell, run after & follow the Romaine Church, acknowledging with great reuerence as Legate Apostolike the Cardinall Medicis being prisoner: Great is the force of a people and multitude beginning to vary and chaunge; and so much more preiudiciall and pernillous their reuolt, by how much vpon their numbers and forces depend principally the estate, and expectation of affaires.

Now because the truce was ratified by Cesar, notwithstanding his agents that were within Verona maintained that it was nothing, the French king called home one part of the bands that he had in garrison in that citie, as seruing to small purpose: and hauing reuoked also the band of two hundred Gentlemen, the archers of his gard, and two hundred other launces, fearing the threats of the king of England, he knew by the suspicion he had of the Swissers, which was redoubled in him, that he should need greater forces in the Duchie of Millan: for which cause he had pressed the Florentines to send him into Lombardy three hundred men at armes, as they were bound by the couenants of confederation betweene them for the defence of his estates in Italy: and for that, that confederation drew to end within two moneths, he compelled them (the more and reputation of the victorie being yet fresh) to confederate with him of new for five yeares: wherein he bound himselfe to defend their estates with 600 launces, & the Florentines for their parts promised to furnish him with 400 men at armes for the defence of all that he possessed in Italy: and yet, to auoyd all occasions to enter warre with the Pope, they excepted in the general obligation of defence, the towne of Cotignole, as if the Church might pretend right to it.

But now were apparantly disclosed right great daungers to the affaires of the king, for that the Swissers at last were determined to send sixe thousand footmen to the pay of the Pope, who had demaunded them vnder colour to employ them against Ferrara: those that in this action sustained and fauoured the kings side, could obtaine no other thing but to protract and deferre the deliberation till that time: and against those men the communalities of people made vniuersall exclamation in their parliaments, for the wonderfull hatred they bare to the name of the French king: They affirmed that the king rested not contented with this kind of ingratitude to refuse to increase a litle the pensions of those, by whose blood and valour he had won perpetuall reputation accompanied with a great estate, but also with words full of reproch he had despised and reiected them as villaines, as though all men in the beginning were not conceived vnder one element, were not cast in one mould, & had not one maner of creation vpon the earth, & as though any mortall man were now either great, renowned or noble, whose ancestors in the beginning were not poore, vnkowne and basely descended: That he had begun to wage footmen of the Launce-knights, to shew the cōtempt he had of their nation for the seruice of his warres, perswading himselfe that suffering priuation of his pay, they could not but die in their mountaines of idlenesse and famine: therefore they had reason to expresse to all the world, how much he was deceived in his vaine thoughts and perswasions: That his ingratitude was onely hurtfull to himselfe: That nothing could stay men of warre from shewing their valour: That for such was fit the vse of gold and siluer, in whom was most apt & ready the managing of armes: Lastly, that it was necessarie to shew once to the world, how vndiscreet were the resolutions of him, who in warre would preferre the Launce-knight footmen afore the nation of the Swissers. This affection & violence of passion caried them so farre, that wedding themselves to the cause of the Pope, as if it had bene their owne, they departed from their houses, hauing receiued in prest only one Florin of the Rhein for a man, where afore they were not wont to march for the seruice of the king, without promise of manie payes, and great distribution of presents amongst their Captaines. Their muster was at Coire the capitall towne of the Grisons, who hauing cōfederation with the French king, and being in his ordinarie pensions, had sent to excuse themselves, that for the ancient alliances they had with the highest Cantons of Swissers, they could not refuse to send with them certaine bands of footmen. This mouing troubled much the minds of the French men, whose forces were now much diminished: for, after the Generall of Normandy had dismissed the regiments of the Italian footmen, they had not in all about ten thousand footmen: and the companies of men at armes which the king had reuoked, being returned ouer the mounts, there vvere left in Italy but thirteene hundred launces, vvhof three hundred were at Parma: and yet the Generall of Normandie doing more the office of a Treasurer then of a man of warre, would in no wise leaue new succours of footmen vwithout the kings commission: only he had caused to returne to Millan the bands that should haue marched into Romania vnder M. Palissa, which vvere already arriued at Finalo. The Cardinall of S. Senerin had direction also to do the like with those companies that vvere in Romagnia: for the retiring of which strengths so needfull for the suretie of that country, Rimini and Cesena together with their castles, and also Rauenna, reuerted vwithout difficulty to the obedience of the Pope: and because the Frenchmen would not disfurnish the Duchy of Millan, Bologna for the defending whereof they had receiued so many afflictions, stood in great danger, being almost abātioned both of fortune & of men: Such is the instabilitie of mortall things, neither certaine in theselues for an vniuersall frailtie in all earthly actions, nor made assured by the deuises and wisdomes of men for infinite imperfections which are proper to them with their creations. After the Swissers had mustered at Coire, they marched frō thence to Trent, hauing permission of Cesar to passe through his lands, who yet studying to hide from the French king as much as he could, the things he had determined, excused himselfe that he could not withstand their passage, in respect of the confederation he had with them: from Trent they went vpon upon the territories of Verona, where they were taried for by the armie of the Venetians, who together with the Pope contributed to their pay. And albeit there was not in the campe sufficient money to pay them, for that their number was farre greater then six thousand which was demanded: yet such was the hatred that the Commons bare to the kings name, that contrarie to their custome, they brooked with patience all difficulties.

On the other side Monsieur Palissa, who was first come with his armie to Pintoillo, to the end to hinder their passage, thinking they would descend into Italy on that side, but finding afterwards their intentions to be otherwise, he encamped at Chastillon, a place six miles from Pesquiera, being vncertaine whether they would take towards Ferrara according to the brute, or else do some enterprise vpon the Duchie of Millan, which was to be feared. It may be that this vncertaintie hastned and brought forth the harmes that hapned: for, it is not to be doubted, but they had taken the way to Ferrara, if by ill aduenture had not fallen into the hands of the Venetian estradiots, a letter, by the which M. Palissa debated with the Generall of Normandie being at Millan, the estate wherein stood their affaires, assuring him it would be hard to resist them if they turned towards the Duchie of Millan. By the direction of this letter they changed aduise, and the Cardinall of Sion who was now come from Venice, with the other Captaines, after they had taken counsell together, determined with reason (which seldome beguileth men) to follow that enterprise which they perceiued by the letters to be most troublefom to the enemies. In which opinion they went from Verona to Villa Franche, where they ioyned with the Venetian armie, wherein (vnder the gouernement of Iohn Paule Baillon,) were foure hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horsemen, and sixe thousand footmen with diuerse peeces of artillerie, as well for batterie, as for the field. This was the cause why Monsieur Palissa abandoning Valegge the place not being defencible, retired to Gambara, with intention to encampe at Pontuigna: his strength was not aboue a thousand launces, and sixe or seuen thousand footmen, the residue being distributed in Bressia, Pesquero and Legnagno, for, notwithstanding he was resolu'd to call backe the three hundred launces that were at Parma, yet, what by compulsion of the apparant daunger of Bologna, and great importunities of the Bentinioles, he gaue order that they should be bestowed in that citie remaining almost without garrison. But seeing in that place into the daunger wherein they were, and examining at last the vanitie of the hopes wherewith they had bene beguiled, and withall complaining bitterly against the couetousnesse and corrupt counsels of the Generall of Normandy, they constrained him to suffer Federike Bosfolo with certaine other Italian Captaines, to leaue so fast as they could, sixe thousand footmen: a remedie which they could not apply to any purpose, til at least the space of ten dayes were past. And besides the small number of souldiers, the disagreement amongst the Captaines weakened much the French armie: for the Captaines were hardly brought to obey Monsieur Palissa, and the souldiers and men at armes made wearie with so long troubles and trauels of warre, wished rather the Duchie of Millan were lost, to the end they might returne into their countrey, then to continue the defence of it with so many disadvantages and daungers. As soone as M. Palissa was gone from Valegge, the Venetians and the Swissers entred into it, & afterwards passing ouer the riuer of Mincie, they lodged vpon the territories of the *Mantuan*s, where the Marquis gaue them libertie of passage, excusing himselfe vpon his disabilitie. Amid these difficulties the generall resolution of the Captaines was to abandon wholly the field, and to lay for the defence of places of most importance, hoping that by temporising, so great a multitude and number of Swissers would at last disperse and breake: wherein they were gouerned with this reason, that the Pope no lesse cold to furnish the expences, then hote to further the warre, was very slow in sending their payes, being no more able to aduance the wages of so great a number.

The Frenchmen bestowed within Bressia two thousand footmen, an hundred and fiftie launces, and an hundred men at armes of the Florentines: to Crema they sent fiftie launces & a thousand footmen: and in Bergama they put a thousand footmen and an hundred men at armes of the Florentines: the residue of the armie which contained sixe hundred launces, two thousand footmen french, and foure thousand launceknights, was retired to Pontuigno, a place very strong by the benefit of his situation, and no lesse conuenient to succour Millan, Cremona, Bressia & Bergama, and there they hoped to be able to sustaine the enemies. But the day after came letters and commandements from Cesar to the Almaine footmen, to depart immediatly from the pay of the French king: & they, being subiects of the cōuntry of Tyrol, obeyed the letters, the same day they receiued the, as not to be disobedient to their naturall Lord. By reason of their departure, more lesse sudden & vnlooked for, then most preiudicial to the French affaires, Palissa and his Captaines lost all hope to be able any longer to defend the Duchie of Millan: & in that passion of feare & despair, they retired in great hast from Pontuigne to Pesqueton: by whose departure, they of Cremona being left abandoned, gaue themselves vp to the armie of the confederats which was at hand, binding them selues to pay to the Swissers fortie thousand duckats: but as among such varieties of nations, nourishing not few differences of ambition, desire and opinion, there was no certaintie in whose name the money should be receiued: so after some disputation, the Venetians making great instance that it might be delivered to them, it was at last receiued (the Frenchmen notwithstanding holding as yet the Castell) in the name of the League and of Maximilian sonne to Lodowike Sforce, on whose behalfe the Pope and the Swissers pretended the conquest of the Duchie of Millan. At the same time the Citie of Bergama fell into the power of the confederats, the meane was this: After Monsieur Palissa had called backe the companies that were there to ioyne them to the armie, certaine of the banished crewes who entred as soone as the other companies were departed, procured them to reuolt, (it being no hard matter to alter a multitude that hath no head to hold them:) from Pesqueton Monsieur Palissa passed the riuer of Adda, where the three hundred launces appointed for the defence of Bologna came to him, hauing reuoked them to him for the greatnesse of the perill. There he hoped to be able to giue impediment to the enemy to passe ouer the riuer, if the strength of footmen that were appointed to be leauied, had come: but it was in vaine for him to thinke vpon those things, for that neither was there present money to wage so many footmen, neither could the Generall of Normandy, binding for securitie the kings demaine, raise it by any deuice, (credit being wholly lost in so great daungers:) and therefore hauing remained there foure dayes, as soone as he saw the enemies approach the riuer, three miles below Pesqueton, he retired to S. Ange to go the day following to Pauia: and so their danger redoubling, and no expectation of succors in a state so desperat, both the hope to defend Millan being taken away, and the cōuntry already drawing fast into tumult, Iohn Iacques Trinuice, the Generall of Normandie, Anthony Maria Paluozin, Galeas Visconte, with many other gentlemen, and all the kings seruants and officers, went from Millan, and sought their safetie in Piemont. Not many dayes afore the Cardinals fearing no lesse the people then the enemies, were fled, notwithstanding (to shew that valour in decrees, which they durst not expresse in other actions) they had at that time almost suspended the Pope from all administration spirituall and temporall of the Church: a degree to depriue him of the place which he held. These tumults were much helping to the safetie of the Cardinall Medici, whom it seemed God reserued to a greater happinesse: for, as they were leading him into Fraunce, and the morning that he entred the barke at the passage of Paw which is right ouer against Bassignany, called in histories Angusta Baciennorum, certaine paissants of the village beginning to murmur, one Reignold de Lallo chiefe of the conspiracie, accompanied with certaine of the Cardinals fauorites lodging there all night, assembled a number, & tooke him from the Frenchmen that garded him: they, whom other aduersities had made fearefull of all accidents, hearing a noise of a tumult which they durst not abide to suppress, were more careful to flie then to fight, loosing their prisoner by cowardise, whom they had wonne in the daunger of a battell. Palissa being entred into Pauia, determined to stay there, sending for Trinuice and the Generall to come to him thither: whereupon Trinuice by the aduice of the Generall & principals of the French side, layed afore him the vanitie of the counsell, and how vnpossible it was to abide so great a ruine, the armie being vnmanned with footmen: That the shortnesse of the time suffered not to wage new companies, and much lesse to draw any but from places farre remoued and with great difficulties. Lastly, that though all these impediments were not, yet there was no money to pay them, all their reputation being lost, their friends full of astonishment, and the people puffed vp with incredible hatreds, for the immoderate insolencies which the souldiers had vsed so long time. Trinuice applying this counsell to the present necessitie of things, he went and caused to cast a bridge where the riuer is straightest and furthest off from Valence towards Ast, by the commoditie of which he meant to passe his companies ouer Paw: But by this the armie of the confederates (to the which after the Frenchmen were retired from Adda, the Citie of Lody was rendred together with the Castell) discamping from S. Ange was come neare to Pauia, where the

Venetian Captaines euen at the first arriual began to batter the Castell, and one part of the Swissers to passe the riuier that ioyneth to the Citie, with boates. The French men fearing they should find impediments to passe the stone bridge which is vpon the riuier of Tessin, by the which onely they might saue themselves, wonne the other bridge, to be able to issue out of Pavia: but afore the reregard was come forth, wherein to sustaine the horsmen, certaine footmen of the Launceknights which were not issued out with the others, were bestowed the last of all, with whom the Swissers, issuing out of the new gate and of the Castell which was now abandoned, went skirmishing all along Pavia and the bridge, the footmen of the Launceknights making resolute defence aboue all others: but passing ouer the bridge of Grauatona which was of wood, the planks breaking with the weight of the horses, all the Frenchmen and Launceknights that were not yet passed ouer, were either slaine on the place, or taken prisoners: (that last calamitie being so much the more lamentable and grieuous, by how much they hoped by their diligence to make way for their safetie, which they saw their fortune persecuted to the vttermost.) The towne of Pavia bound it selfe to pay a great quantitie of money, by whose example also Milan compounded, but for a greater summe; and all the other townes except Bressia & Crema, fled from the aduersities of the Frenchmen: all the countrey cried now vpon the name of the Empire; the state was receiued and gouerned in the name of the holy League (so was it called vniuersally) and all affaires disposed by the authority of the Cardinal of Sion assigned Legate for the Pope: but the treasure, and whatsoeuer was taxed vpon the townes, was made a reward to the Swissers, to whom was transferred an interest in all things that concerned gaine or profite: the same being the cause that many other bands and troupes of them descended into Lombardy to ioine with the residue, after the parliament of Zurich was ended, which was assembled for that cause. In this mutation, the Cities of Plaisance and Parma gaue themselves willingly to the Pope, who pretended they appertained to him as members of Rauenna. The Swissers made themselves Lords of Lucarno, and the Grisons got Valuololino and Chianenna, places very commodious for them. And in the heate of this fortune, Ianus Fregosa Captaine of the Venetian armie, being gone to Genes with such bands of horsmen and footmen as he had obtained of the armie, was the cause that that Citie reuolted (the French Gouverneur being fled) whereof he was created Duke; a dignitie afore time inuested in his father: with the same violence of fortune, all the townes and Castels of Romagna returned to the Popes obedience. And lastly, the Duke of Urbino approching neare to Bologna with the bands of souldiers of the Church, the familie of the Bentiuoles left it abandoned, their fortune leauing them desperate, hauing by these violent degrees deprived them of all hope. The Pope pursued this familie very sharply, excommunicating all the places that should receiue them hereafter: he expressed no lesse hatred against the Citie; and being most kindled for their forgetfulnesse of so many his benefites bestowed vpon them, and in that ingratitude not onely reuolting from his obedience, but also in their spite, had not forborne to spurne his picture, and raile out many villanous wordes against him: he would consent no more that they should create new Magistrates, nor communicate any way in the gouernement of the towne: he exacted by the meane of seuerer officers, huge summes of money of sundry Citizens, as partakers with the Bentiuoles: yea the opinion ran, that if his deuises had not bene broken by death, he had a meaning to destroy that Citie, and translate the inhabitants to Genoa.

THE ELEVENTH BOOKE OF THE historic and discourse of Guicciardin.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Duke of Ferrara is in great trouble: The Medices returne to Florence: The king of Romans makes alliance with the Pope: Maximilian Sforce is put in the possession of the Duchy of Milan: The French King makes his preparations to reconer Milan: Pope Iulio dieth: Leon the tenth is created Pope: The Frenchmen are ouerthrowne neare to Nouaro: and the Venetians neare to Vincenza.

NOtwithstanding the Pope, amid his greatest aduersities and daungers, had not onely obtained victorie of his enemies, contrary to all hope and coniecture, but also with the same felicitie, had amplified the iurisdiction of the Church aboue expectation, and contrary to common equitie: yet, his auncient couetousnesse to the Citie of Ferrara, (the first matter of all these broiles) so held him stil ouerruled, that he could not make his desires equall to his fortune, nor conforme his wandring mind to rest and tranquillitie: Such is the rage of couetousnesse when it hath the assistance of authoritie, which makes men hard to be contented with that which occasion doth offer, for that those things that come first do abhorre them, so long as by the greatnesse of their power and place, they aspire and thirst for better. But albeit the Pope had violent desires to turne his forces against Ferrara, yet, the way of peace seeming more easie then the warre, or rather hoping more in the benefite of secret and artificiall practises, then in actions apparant and discovered; he gaue care first of all to the Marquis of Mantua, who besought him that Alfonso d'Este might come to him to Rome to demaund pardon, and that he would eslones reclaime him to grace vnder some indifferent conditions. In this request was concurrant the Embassadour of the king of Aragon, suing for him, both for that he was the kinsman of his king (for Alfonso came of a daughter of the old Ferdinand king of Naples) and also for that he esteemed it more to the commoditie of the affaires of his king; to bind him to him by this propertie of benefite, then to suffer so great an estate to be adioyned to the greatnesse of the Church. Moreouer the familie of the Colonna, being become of great amitie with Alfonso, were earnest solicitors in this cause. The reason of their compassion was, for that after the battell of Rauenna, Fabricio Colonna, who was Alfonsoes prisoner, being sent for and required of him, he vsed so many delayes, first in refusing, and then in interposing many excuses, that by the mutation that happened, he brought it into his owne power to giue him his libertie without any charge or raunsome. At last safeconduct was obtained for him from the Pope, by the suretie whereof, confirmed also with the faith of the Embassadour of Aragon in the name of his King, which was protested to him by the consent and priuie of the Pope, he went to Rome, his submission being greater then his hope to be forgiven: and being come to Rome, the Pope admitted him into the Consistorie, suspending in the meane while all censures and paines. There, with great humilitie he demaunded pardon, and with the same submission besought him, that he might be receued into his grace, and restored to the fauour of the sea Apostolike, offering to do hereafter all those offices and duties which might appertaine to a most deuout and faithfull vassall of the Church. The Pope heard him with a countenance and aspect reasonably peaceable, and substituted fixe Cardinales to debate with him touching conditions of agreement: who, after certaine dayes spent in disputation and argument, declared to him, that the Pope neither would nor meant to deprive the Church of the Citie of Ferrara, since it was lawfully reuerted to the imperie of the Church: But in recom-

recompence, there should be giuen to him the Citie of Ast, which being receiued in the name and authority of the league by the departure of the Frenchmen, the Pope had vainely sent thither to take possession of it the Bishop of Agrigenta, pretending that whatsoever was on this side Pam, appertained to the Church. This offer was constantly refused of Alfonso; who, for that it comprehended a demaund contrary to all the hopes that had bin giuen him, began to feare least the Pope sought but to entertaine him cunningly within Rome, whilst he dressed some executiō against Ferrara, the late accident at Regge nothing diminishing the reason of this feare.

The Pope had dealt with the inhabitants of Regge (who in so great confusion of things feared much to giue themselves vp to the Church,) following the example of Parma and Plaisance, wherein to giue greater force to his counsels and perswasions, he had giuen direction to the Duke of Vrbino to march with his companies vpon the territories of Modona: in like sort Vitfruch was gone to Regge, to attempt the like action for the profite of Cesar, on whose behalfe did worke the Cardinall of Este; who, in the absence of his brother had charge ouer his estates; he seeing that Citie could not be kept, and iudging the daunger would be lesse if it fell into the hands of Cesar, who both pretended nothing against Ferrara, & also in his affaires there was hope of a greater change; he aduised the people of Regge rather to acknowledge the Empire then the Church: but they answered (in matters of election the will of a popular multitude is stronger then their reason) that they would follow the example of the Duke, who was gone to the Pope and not to Cesar: and so receiued into their towne the souldiers of the Church, who immediatly found means to be Lords of the Citadell, notwithstanding Vitfruch had furnished it with a garrison of footmen. Lastly, Garfagnana was rendred to the Duke of Vrbino, who returning afterwards to Bologna, dismissed all his bands of footmen: for that the confederates somewhat angrie that the Pope occupied Parma and Plaisance, the Cardinall of Sion signified to the Duke that it was not necessarie that he passed further, since the victorie was already obtained against the common enemies.

The Duke of Ferrara being entred into many suspitions, both for the hard conditions that the Pope offered, and for the taking of Regge, made meane to the Pope by the Spanish Embassador and Fabricio Colomno who neuer left to accompany him, to haue leaue to returne to Ferrara. This request the Pope shewed no disposition to agree vnto, but maintained that the safeconduct which he had giuen him for the controuersie he had with the Church, could not let him to do iustice to his particular Creditors, of whom manie demanded instantly that he would administer iustice to them. The Embassador and Fabricio answered him frankly, that it was not to the Duke and to them that he ought to breake his faith; and therefore to preuent the Pope to do any further spite against him, the next morning Fabricio being well mounted, went towards the portall of S. Iohn de Latran, the Duke and Marke Anth. Colomno following him a good distance off: and finding the portall garded with a greater strength then it was wont to be, and such as was set to stop his going; he hauing a force about theirs, brought the Duke thorough the gate, & conducted him in suretie to the water side. This friendship he did to the Duke, in recompence of the benefit of his liberty which he had receiued of him: for it is not to be doubted, but the Pope wold still haue retained him prisoner, had it not bene for the impediment of the Colomnois, who finding that the way was daungerous for him to go by land, were driuen to procure his passage by sea to Ferrara.

And whilst these things were in doing, the Pope, in whom was yet no diminution of hatred against the libertie of the Florentines, had so wrought with the Cardinall of Sion, that the bands of souldiers which they had sent to the king were stripped and put to spoyle: of these bands, albeit such as were vnder Luke Sauella, being fixscore men at armes and fiftie light horsemen (the residue were left for the gard of Bressia vnder Frauncis Torelle) had afore the French army were passed the riuier of Pam, obtained safeconduct of the Cardinall of Sion, confirmed by the oath and faith of Io. Paule Baillon and almost all the Venetian Captaines, that they might returne to Tuscane: yet as they lay lodged neare to Cremona, according to the rule and direction they had receiued, they were spoyled by the Venetian souldiers by the consent of the Cardinall of Sion: who to the end the violence might be executed with more suretie, sent thither (as some suppose) two thousand footmen, the rather for that the companies of Triuulce and others were lodged with them, and they for that they were almost all Italian souldiers, had likewise obtained safeconduct to passe. Immediately vpon the robbrie and spoile of these souldiers, the Bishop of St. n sent to Christopher More and Paule Capello agents for the Senate, to demaund the bootie that had bene made, as appertaining to the Swissers: but they refused it, and therefore comming the next day to the campe of the Swissers to speake with the Cardinall of Sion, they were almost all led prisoners to Iacques Staffler their Captaine, and by him caried to the Cardinal, who constrained them to pay fixe thousand duckets in recompence of the pray, (not holding it conuenient that his disloyaltie should turne to the profite of others:) he sent also to summon the Marquisse of Montferrat to deliuer to him as prisoner Nicholas Capponi Embassadour of the Florentines, to whom he had giuen safeconduct being retired to Casall Cernas. In this meane while the Senate desiring to recouer Bressia and Crema, laboured the Cardinall of Sion, that their companies might be returned, whom the Cardinall entertained vnder colour to march together with the Swissers into Piemont against the Duke of Sauoy and the Marquisse of Salussa, who had followed the faction of the French king: but that reason ceasing afterwards, both for the wonderfull augmentation of the number of Swissers, and also for that it was well seene that the French souldiers returned ouer the Mounts, he neither refused nor agreed that they should go: a matter supposed altogether to proceed of the instance of Cesar, to the end they should not recouer those townes. At last, the Swissers being in Alexandria, the Venetians departed from Bojco vpon the sodaine, and passed the riuier of Paw without anie impediment, at Cana vpon the territories of Cremona: an expedition which the Cardinall might haue let, if he had not disssembled it (as was beleueed) at the Popes request: but being once ouer the riuier, some marched against Bressia, and some tooke the enterprise of Crema, both which were kept yet for the French king. The Frenchmen that were within Bressia, seeing their present fortune could suffer no delay of action, went out and set vpon them at the village of Paterna, where they were constrained to retire within the towne, with the losse of more then three hundred men.

Conquest draweth with it ambition, insolencies and couetousnesse: And with men of warre triumphing in the victorie, all things seeme to hold of equitie, that they do in their rage and couetousnesse: For, the Swissers remaining alone in the Duchy of Millan and Piemont, deuised how to taxe and rate the whole countrey, being now wholie assured of the Frenchmen: and albeit the French king, for the great affectio he bare to the Duchie of Millan, was hardly brought to abandon altogether the affaires of Italie: yet necessity compelled him to hearken to the counsels of such, as aduised him to deferre those deuises to another time, and dispose his wits for that summer, to defend the realme of Fraunce: the rather for that the king of England, according to the contract made with the king Catholike, had sent by sea an armie of fixe thousand footmen to Fentarabio, a towne of the kingdome of Spaine standing vpon the Ocean sea: the chiefe end of this iourney was, that ioyning to the companies of the said king Catholike, they might in one maine force assault the Duchie of Guien: he began also with another nauie to scoure all along the coasts of Normandy and Brittaine, to the great astonishment of the peoples of those Prouinces. Moreouer, the French king had no hope to draw againe Cesar into amity with him, for that he vnderstood by the Bishop of Marseilles his last Embassadour resident in his Court, that he bare a mind farre estranged: he aduertised him also that Cesar had not entertained him with so many hopes, nor for other regard debated with him vpon so many matters with so faire apparance, then to win occasion to oppresse him when he thought least of it, or at least to giue him (as it were) some violent and deadly blow, as he gloried that he had done, at such time as he reuoked the Launce-knights.

Thus Italy being for this yeare assured frō the armies of the French king, whose souldiers notwithstanding held as yet, Bressia, Crema, Leguague, the castle and lanterne of Genes, the castle of Millan, the castle of Cremona, with certaine other fortresses of that estate. There were discerned amongst the confederates, manie signes of difference and disagreement, for the diuersitie of their wils, and their ends: for, as the Venetians desired to recouer Bressia & Crema, as due to the by the articles of capitulation, and for that they had borne out the daungers and troubles of the war: a matter which the Pope desired likewise for the: so, on the other side, Cesar (from whose wil the king of Aragon at last could not be separate) thought to appropriate them to himselfe, and also to depriue the Venetians of all that had bene iudged to them by the league of Cambray.

Besides

Besides, Cesar and the king of Aragon practised (but verie secretly) to make to diuolue the Duchie of Millan to one of their Nephewes: a working quite contrary to the Pope and the Swissers, who laboured apparantly as much as they could, that according to the vniuersall resolution and consent from the beginning, Maximilian, sonne to Lodowike Sforce might be restored to the place of his father, after whose fall he had remained alwayes in Germanie. The matter that moued the Pope, was a feare he had, least Italy should fall into a miserable seruitude of the Almaines & Spaniards: and that which induced the Swissers, was a desire for their owne profite, that that estate should not be brought into the power of so mighty Princes, but rather to stand subiected to one that could not maintaine himselfe, without their aide and succours. Which election, as it depended almost whollie vpon those in whose power was that estate, and for the feare of their forces: so the Pope, the more to confirme them in that will, and in all necessities to haue in his hand the bridle, with the which he might moderate the ambition of Cesar. and the king Catholike, did all that he could to winne their amitie: and for that cause, besides the great account he made publikely of the nation of Swissers, raising to the starres the actions they had done for the safetie of the Sea Apostolike, he gaue them yet for their greater honour the banners of the Church, with this glorious title, to be the champions and defenders of the Ecclesiastike libertie. Besides these diuersties, the Viceroy had readdressed the Spanish companies which after the battell were retired with him into the kingdome of Naples: and beginning estoones to march, and to passe with them into Lombardie, the Pope and the Venetians refused to recontinue the payes of fortie thousand duckets by the moneth, which had bene discontinued since the ouerthrow: their reason was, that seeing the French armie was chased home, they stood no more subiect to such bond, for that it was to cease by the articles of the confederation whensoever the French were expelled out of Italy. Whereunto was replied on the behalfe of the king of Aragon, that it could not be said that the French king was driuen out of Italy, so long as Bressia, Crema, with other many strong places, stood at his deuotion. Moreouer, the king of Aragon together with Cesar complained, in that the Pope did appropriate to himselfe the profits of the victorie that was common to them both; and vsurped that which manifestly appertained to another, making himselfe Lord (vnder colour of certaine reasons suborned, or at least so old and withered, that their force was gone) vpon Parma & Plaisance, cities which the Lords of Millan had holden so long time, as freeholders of the Empire. The diuerstie was also expressed for matters that concerned the Duke of Ferrara: for, as the Pope on the one side nourished his ancient couetousnesse to vsurpe that Dukedome; so on the other side the king of Aragon, who desired to preferue and protect him, stood yet discontented with the iniurie that was offered to haue stayed him at Rome contrarie to the law of faith and safeconduct giuen: for these reasons the Pope deferred to vex Ferrara, expecting perhaps the issue of affaires of farre greater importance: whereof Cesar not thinking good that any resolution were made without him, dispatched into Italy the Bishop of Gurcy, whom he had appointed to that expedition euer since after the battell of Rauenna: there was negociation of peace betweene the Pope and the French king: he appointed to send him then for the feare he had lest they compounded amongst themselves without respecting him and his affaires: but the mutatio of things hapning afterwards he still continued his deuise to send him: in like sort fell into consideration the affaires of the Florentines, who being filled full of suspicion, began now to feeble the fruits of the neutralitie which vndiscreetly they had vsed, finding withal, that it was not sufficient to beare themselves vpon the iustice of their cause, wanting discretion and forecast: for in the war present, neither had they offended the confederates, nor ministred anie succours to the French king, but so far forth as they were bound for the defence of the Duchie of Millan, according to the confederation made in common betweene them, the king Catholike, and with him: they had not suffered within their iurisdiction any violence to be done vpon those Spanish souldiers which fled from the battell of Rauenna, for the which the king of Aragon himselfe gaue thanks to the Embassador of Florence: yea they had satisfied all his demaunds, for that after the Councell was broken vp from Pisa, his Agents being in Italy, and the king himselfe offering to their Embassadour to be bound to defend their common weale against all men, so farre forth as they promised him they would not defend Bologna, nor take armes against the Church, nor fauour the vnlawfull Councell of Pisa: but they being let by ciuill discords to make the better election, gaue themselves neither to follow the French nor any other, and obseruing neutralitie from one day to another, and that with counsels no lesse doubtfull then broken, not iointly and fully resolu'd whether they would obserue it, they offended much the French king, who in the beginning promised much of them, they remoued not the hatred of the Pope, and left the king of Aragon without any recompence to enioy the fruit of their neutrality: a matter which he would gladly haue couenanted with them to obtaine. So that the Pope pushed on with his aunient hatred against the Gonsalonnier or Magistrate, and a perpetuall desire descending from all Popes to haue authority in that common weale, solicited earnestly the restitution of the family of Medici to their ancient greatnesse. To this the king of Aragon, notwithstanding he vsed dissembled phrases to the Embassadour of Florence, bare some inclination, but not with so great vehemency, for feare least in any stirre or alteration they might be brought to fauour the French king by the authoritie of the Magistrate: yea, it was distrustful that though the Gonsalonnier were deposed and taken away, yet the common weale being freely gouerned, would not haue the same affection, in respect of the new and ancient dependances: but the resolution of this matter together with others, was reserued till the coming of the Bishop of Gurci, with whom it was agreed that the Viceroy, & such as were for the other confederates, should meet at Mantua. In this respite of time that the Bishop was coming, the Pope sent to Florence his Datario, Laurence Pucci a Florentine (he was afterwards chosen Cardinall, and called Cardinall of foure Saints) to sollicite them, together with the Embassadour which the Viceroy had there, that they would sticke to the League, and contribute to the charges against the Frenchmen: that was the colour of his going, but in true meaning he was sent to sound the willes of the Citizens. That demaund was debated many dayes without any conclusion: the Florentines made offers to pay to the confederates certaine proportions of money, but they answered doubtfully to the demaund to enter the League and protest themselves against the French king: which doubtfulness, moued partly by an opinion they had (which was true) that those matters were proponed artificially, rather to entrap them then to assure them; and partly by an answer which the Bishop of Gurci had made to their Embassadour at Trent, whom they sent to meet him: he seeming to make small reckening of the report made to him that Cesar by the capitulation of Vincenza subsigned with his owne hand, was bound to defend them, assured them that the Pope was determined to trouble them, and yet in paying to Cesar fortie thousand duckets, he would deliuer them of that daunger. To this he added, that the confederations betweene Cesar & the French king continuing yet, they should not therefore enter into the league, if first Cesar gaue them not example. The Florentines were not farre estranged to buy their quiet with money, but they feared that the onely name of Cesar (notwithstanding the Bishop assured them that his will should be followed by the Spaniards) would not suffice to remoue and make cease the ill intention of the others: a perswasion which held them in doubt, and kept them so restrained, that with a counsell well disposed, they could not minister the salue to such as had power to help their infirmitie. It was a matter perhaps considered vpon with counsell and discretion, and yet it could not but proceed either of negligence, or of their discords, or of too much confidence in their strength of footmen, forbearing in that respect to refurnish themselves of souldiers trained, by whom they might haue bene defended from any sodaine assault, or at least might haue made easie the couenants with the confederates, and with better conditions, knowing once how hard a matter it were to force them. Whilest these things were in action, the Viceroy with his regiments of footmen was entred vpon the countrey of the Bolognois, where hauing no meane to satisfie the payes which he had promised to the souldiers, they ran with such a tumult to his tent, threatening and conspiring to kill him, that he had scarce leasure to steale away, seeking his safety by flying towards Modona: one part of the army tooke towards the countrey of the Florentines, the residue chaunged not place, but liued there without law, without order, and without commandement: and within three or foure dayes after their light rages being somewhat satisfied with part of the payes that had bene promised, the Viceroy also and the residue being reassembled and returned to the armie, they gaue their promise to tarie for him in that place till he returned from Mantua, where the Bishop of Gurci was now arrived. As the Bishop passed by the territories of them of Verona, the Frenchmen that lay in garrison in Leguagno hauing refused many offers of the Venetians, gaue vp to the Bishop that town which they could no longer hold: this was thought to be done by a former commandement of Monsieur Palissa, as well to them as to all the residue that had in charge the other townes, to the end to nourish discord betweene Cesar and the Venetians: But it was an action very vnfortunate for the souldiers; who (without respecting their safe conduct obtained from the Bishop of Gurci) were miserably robbed and stripped by the Venetian army which lay encamped vpon the confines of Bressia, after they were returned from Bosco, and after they had recouered Bergama without any difficulty: only they forbore to batter the towne, for that (as was sayd) the Cardinall of Sion had forbidden them.

It was resolued in the assembly of Mantua, that Maximilian Sforce should be reinuested in the Duchy of Millan, the desire of the people being nothing inferior to the equity of his title. To this agreed the king of Aragon and Cesar, no lesse to satisfie the great instance of the Pope, then to please the wils of the Swissers. Touching the assignation of the maner and time, it was referred till the Bishop of Gurci met with the Pope, to whom he was to go, both to conclude the alliance betweene Cesar and him, and to sollicite peace with the Venetians; and so by the meane of common alliance, to confirme Italy in her auncient surety, that the French king should no more trouble it. In that assembly also was disputed the expedition against the Florentins, wherein Julio de Medicis made instance, as well in his owne name, as for the Cardinall: he proued that the alteration of that state would be easie, for the diuision amongst the Citizens: for the affection of many that desired their returne: for the secret intelligences they had with sundrie Noble; & mighty personages: and withall, for that one part of the men at armes of that common-weale being in Lombardy, and another moytie inclosed within Bressia, they had not sufficient forces to make defence against the assault so suddenly. Lastly, besides the money he offered, he shewed the fruite that would come by restoring them to their former dignity: for, the authority and power of that City being taken out of the hands of one that depended wholly vpon the French king, it would fall to the administration of persons, who standing discontented and wronged by that king, had no reason to depend or hold vpon other alliance then of the confederates. Barnard de Bibiena (afterwards Cardinall) wged this matter much in the name of the Pope, who for that occasion had sent him to Mantua, a man for his learning no lesse meete for this legation, then for his affection most friendly to the Medices, in whose house both he and his brothers had bin trained vpon from their youth. Iohn Vitorio Soderin, a Lawyer, & brother to the Gonsalonnier, was at this time Embassador to the Florentins with the Bishop of Gurci, to whom nothing was sayd, nor any thing demanded, either by the Viceroy or in the name of the league: only the Bishop declared to him the daunger, and how conuenient it was that they accorded with Cesar according to the demands made before, offering that Cesar and the king of Aragon should receiue them into protection: but the Embassador in whom was no power to conclude, could do no other thing then aduertise the common-weale and expect answers: neither did he sollicite the Viceroy by himselfe or by others, nor vsed any diligence to hinder the workings of the Medices: hauing no fulnesse of authority, he was driuen to be silent in things that concerned directly the safety of the common-weale: and yet the matter of it selfe was not without many difficulties, both for that the Viceroy had not so great an army, as to aduenture to make triall of his forces without necessity: and also the Bishop of Gurci, to let the Venetians for recouering Bressia, or to make any greater proceedings, desired that the Spaniards might passe into Lombardy with all speede conuenient. By these considerations it was beleueed, that if the Florentins forbearing their niggardnesse as the present perils required, had consented to contribute to Cesar the mony he demanded, and releued the Viceroy with some small summe, whereof he had great necessity, they had easily turned away & auoyded the storme: yea the Bishop of Gurci & the Viceroy might perhaps with better will haue entred into couenant with the common-weale, of whom they were certaine to receiue the things that should be promised, then with the Medices, who had no ability to giue them any thing, if first they returned not to Florẽce with armes. But the cause of that City being almost abandoned, either by the negligence or by the malice of men, it was determined that the Spanish army, together with the Cardinall & Julian Medicis, should march towards Florence: in which expedition the Pope had declared the Cardinall Legate of Tuscane, with fulnesse of power to leauy the souldiers of the Church, and wage such others of the townes adioyning, as he should thinke conuenient for that seruice. The Pope omitted nothing that might aduance this enterprife, rather applying his authority to his will, then to the equity of the matter.

The resolution of the treatie of
the confederates.

But as soone as the assembly of Mantua was broken vp, the Viceroy returning to the territories of Bologna, caused his army to march with speede against the Florentins, who had very small respite to make necessary prouisions, for that they were not aforehand aduertised of the resolution of Mantua. The Cardinall ioynd with the Viceroy as soone as he drew neare the frontiers, hauing caused to be drawne from Bologna two Cannons to supplie the want of the Spaniards, who had no peeces of batterie. Also Francis Ursin and the Vitelli (Captaines for the Church) came thither to him, but without their bands of souldiers, both they and the other companies of the Church being forbidden by the Duke of Vrbino: who, notwithstanding Iulian Medicis had had some bringing vp in his Court; a matter to moue fauour, and that he had alwayes professed to desire the greatnesse of the Medices, which was a strong argument of affection, refused to furnish them with artilleries or any sort of succours either of his souldiers or subiects, though the Pope had commanded the contrary by large letters, as well to him as to other townes subiect to the Church. As soone as the Viceroy was entred vpon the lands of the Florentins, there came to him an Embassador, who in the name of the whole common-weale declaring the respects they had alwayes borne to the king of Aragon, both what were their actions in the last warres, and also what that king might hope for of such a City receiuing it to his amity, besought him, afore he passed further, to signifie what it was he demanded of the Florentins: for that in demands reasonable, and not exceeding their power, they would willingly satisfie him. The Viceroy answered, that his coming had not bene determined onely by the king Catholike, but also by all the confederates for the common surety of Italie, seeing that so long as the Gonsalonnier remained in that administration, they could not be assured, that that common-weale would not follow the French king, and be seruiceable to his occasions: therefore he demaunded in the name of the whole league, that the Gonsalonnier might be deprived of the gouernement, and that there might be instituted a forme of pollicie not suspected to the confederates: which could not be vnlesse the Cardinall and Iulian Medicis were restored to their naturall countrey: That if they would consent to these things, they should find agreement in the residue more easily: Lastly, he willed him to signify this report and his intention to the state of Florence, and yet he would not stay till answers were returned.

At Florence immediately vpon the bruite of the marching of the Spaniards, might be discerned an vniuersall astonishment in the minds of men, both doubting that the Popes forces would inuade them on some other side, and fearing the diuision of Citizens, and the inclination of the multitude to new things: they were very weake in men at armes, and had no other strength of footemen, then such as were either leauied in haste, or at least drawne out of their garrisons, an estate of souldiers not yet experienced in warre: they had no excellent Captaine, vpon whose vertue and authority they might repose the guiding of an army; and their other leaders were such as in the memorie of man they had not in their pay men of lesse expectation: their weakenesse was great in regard of the strength that was coming against them, their wants were farre inferior to the preparations of their enemies, their wisdomes vnable to preuent the daungers that threatned, their wealth vnprofitable, where wanted men for action: Lastly, they had nothing amongst them which did not helpe to the desolation of their estate, and wanted all things wherein they might hope for comfort, counsell, or compassion: their feares were vaine, for that their perill was swifter then their prouision: and there could be no place for confidence, where was nothing to assure their hope: all things were full of confusion, and the suddennesse of the calamity made them lesse apt to consult for their safety: and yet making such prouision as they could, according to the shortnesse of time, they reassembled their men at armes distributed into many places, they waged footemen, but such bodies as they could get: They chose out the best bands of their Pensioners, and drew to Florence all their principall forces, both for the surety of their Citie, and to returne from thence all other places that should suffer most danger: And amidst these meanes of prouisions for the warre, they forgot not (but very late) to proue what they could do by way of accord: for which cause, besides the continuall solicitation of their Embassador with the Viceroy, they wrote to the Cardinall of Volterra lying at Gradoli neare to Rome, to go to the Pope, and labour to appease him with offers, with petitions, with humilities, and all other sorts of offices whatsoever. But he hauing a hart hardened, answered notwithstanding with words contrarie to his doings, that the enterprise came not of

of him, and that it was followed without his forces: only not to stirre vp the league against him, he was constrained to consent to it, and to suffer the Cardinall of Medicis to draw artillery from Bologna: That he was not able to stay the expedition afore it was begun, and much lesse could he breake it now that it was in action: He made himselfe sorrowfull for their affliction, and yet expressed no inclination to compassion: his words were doubtfull, and his intentions dissembled: he saw the humour that was offended, and yet would not apply the medicine to comfort it, iudging it best for the seruing of his tyme, to suffer them to languish in their proper calamities. By this time the Viceroy had passed the mountaines of Barberina within fiftene miles of Florence, from whence he sent to signifie to the Florentins, that it was not the intention of the league neither to alter the iurisdiction, nor change the liberty, so farre forth as for the surety of Italy, they would depose the Gonfalonnier from his estate: He desired that the Medices might be restored to their countrey, not as chieftaines of the gouernement, but as persons priuate, subiected to the lawes, and to the Magistrates, and not seperate in any thing from other Citizens. This proposition being knowne throughout the City, the opinions of men were diuerse according to the diuersity of iudgements, passions, and feare: Some blamed the Councell, that would, for the regard of one onely, preferre to so great a danger the generality of Citizens and the vniuersall iurisdiction: seeing that in deposing him, they lost neither the counsell popular, nor the publike liberty: a thing which it could not be hard to keepe, though the Medices, depriued of reputation and power, would strue to exceede their degree priuate and limited: That it was to be considered in what sort the City might resist the authority and forces of so great a league: that of themselves they were not able: that all Italy was become their enemy: that they had wholly lost all hope of succours with the Frenchmen, both for that being driuen with cowardise out of Italy, they had enough to do to defend their owne Realme, and also knowing their weaknesse, they had answered to the demands of the Florentins, that they were contented to set them at libertie to make accord with the league. Of the contrary, others reasoned how vaine it was to beleue that so great a stirre was made only for hatred to the Gonfalonnier, or to set vp the Medices in Florence as Citizens priuate: That farre otherwise was the intention of the confederates, who to ioine the City to their wils, and to make it contributory to their wants of mony, respected no other end then to bring in the Medices in tyranny: only they disguised their corrupt intentions, with demaunds not sharpe nor square, and yet pretended the same effect: for it was no other thing to take out of the pallace the Gonfalonnier in a time so troubled, and with such threatning and compulsion of armes, then to leaue a flocke wandring without a pastor, the more easily to fall into the iawes of the wolfe: It comprehended no other thing to bring the Medices into Florence in so great a tumult, then to strike vp the drumme and aduance the standard, that such might follow it, as liued in no other study then to deface the name, the memory, and the forme of the great Councell: an estate of gouernement which could not be deposed without the absolute ruine of the common liberty: And what is there to let the Medices, backt from the forreine with the Spanish army, and followed at home with troupes seditious and ambitious, that they may not oppresse the liberty euen as soone as they make their entrie into Florence: They haue the time by election, the place is prepared, mens minds altered, the good men of the towne do feare, the euill sort expect, if there be any place of the towne free from tumult, at least there is none voide of suspicion, few to be trusted, and none assured, all things in confusion, yea euen the wisest furthest off to auoide the storme which euen now is gathered into a cloude and readie to breake: It were good to consider what the ouerture of such things might engender, and what may happen by yeelding to demaunds vniust and preiudiciall: That it is no good affection so much to feare their dangers, as thereby to forget the safety of their liues, and to consider how intollerable it would be to liue in seruitude, to such as haue bene borne and bred vp in liberty: That they were to remember with what valour they had opposed against the late king Charles the eight for the protection of their liberty, at such time as he was possessed of the City with a mighty armie: Lastlie that they had to consider how easily they might resist so small an army, vnfurnished of mony, vnprouided of victuals, naked of great artilleries, & all other commodities to beare out the war, if only the City resisted their first fury: yea when they found a resolute defence in place of the vaine hopes that had bin giuen to cary Florence at the first assault, they would be easily ranged to agreement vpon reasonable conditions. These discourses ran in the market places and streetes amongst the Citizens: but the Gonsalonnier holding it best, that the aunswere which the Magistrate was to make to the Viceroy, should be communicated with the people, called together the great Councell, and in full presence of the Citizens, gaue his opinion in this maner.

the Councell.

If I thought the demaund of the Viceroy touched me onely, or that his desires were stayed simply ypon particularities, I would of my selfe make a resolution conformable to my intention, and do the thing without your counsell, which could not but turne to your common saiety: for hauing alwayes caried this mind to giue my life for your benefit, it could not but be iust in me to resolue of my selfe, to renounce the office you haue giuen me, to deliuer you from the dangers & harmes of the warre, hauing especially worne out both my body and mind with the trauels of the place in so many yeares since you preferred me to it: but since it may be that this demaund stretcheth to things further then to me and my priuate interest, it is thought good by this honourable assistance, and by me, not to deliberate without publike consent in a matter that so vniuersally concerneth you all, and lesse seeming that a cause so graue and generall, should be referred to the counsell of that ordinary number of Citizens, which are ordinarily called the priuity of common things, but to you in whose persons is resembled the Soueraigne Maiesty and presence of this City, and by whose wisdomes are to passe deliberations of so great importancē. I induce you, not to incline more to the one part then to the other, I referre all to your counsell and iudgement: I bring higher no meaning to perswade you to partiality, I set not my selfe betweene your affections and the present cause: The same you shall resolue, the same shall be accepted by me, who do not only lay at your feete the office which is your owne, but also my person and life which is to my selfe alone: a sacrifice which I would thinke happily dedicated, if it had any operation tending to your safety. Examine of what importance the *Viceroy*s demand may be for your liberty, wherein I beseech God so to leade your minds as you may make election of the better way. If the Medicis were disposed to liue in this City as priuate Citizens, with conformity to your lawes and rulers, it could not be but vertuous and commendable to suffer them to returne and receiue them, to the end the members of our common countrey might at last be reincorporate into one common body: but if they bring with them other intentions, and vnder shadowes of conformity, shroud minds of tyranny, it were good you considered of your danger, not holding it grievous to sustaine all expenses and difficulties to preserue your liberty, a Jewell whose preciousnesse you shall then best discern, when you shall suffer priuation of it. Be not perswaded that the gouernement of the Medices will be the same it was afore they were expelled, seeing the forme and foundations of things are chaunged: for then as they had their trayning vp amongst vs almost as Citizens priuate, wealthy in goods according to the degree they held, and not offended of any, made their foundation of the good will of the Citizens, vsed to consult with the principals of publike affaires, and labored with the cloake of ciuility to couer rather then to discouer their greatnesse: so now that they haue bene so many yeares seperate from the lawes of Florence, infected with the fashions and customes of strangers, and by that reason lesse practised in ciuill causes, mindfull of the exile and scuerities done to them, poore in goods, iniuried of so many families, & according to their owne testimony knowing that the most part of this presence abhorreth tyranny: they will repose confidence in no Citizen, nor haue no conformity to your lawes & Magistrates, but compelled by pouerty and suspition, will bring backe to themselves the administration of all things: they will not reestablish good will and loue, but recontinue force & armes: they will reduce this City in short time to the image and state of Bologna, and to Senna & Perouza in the time of the Bentinoleis. I speake this to such as keepe obseruation of the time and gouernement of Lawrence Medicis, which yet in comparision of this wold seeme a golden age, notwithstanding the conditions of that time were hard, and the gouernement was a kind of tyranny, albeit more easie then many others. Now it appertaineth to you to resolue wisely, & to me, either to giue vp constantly this office, or else resolutely, to apply my selfe to the preseruacion of your liberty: You are to determine, and I to be directed, you stand in the stands of your owne counsell, and I subiect to your arbitration.

There was no doubt what the Councell wold resolue, the whole multitude of the people bearing almost an vniuersall inclination to maintaine the popular gouernement: Therefore it was determined by a wonderfull accord, to consent to the returning of the Medices in the nature

nature of persons priuate : and that in no wise the Gonfalonnier should be depofed from his place, againſt which if the enemies were obſtinate, then the whole body of the Citie ſhould be applied to the defence of their libertie and countrey, not ſparing either goods or life in an action ſo honorable and neceſſarie: ſo that diſpoſing all their thoughts to the warre, they made prouiſions of money, and ſent men to the towne of Prato ten myles from Florence, a place which they thought would be ſubiect to the firſt violence of the Viceroy: who after he had gathered together his army at Barberina, together with the artillerie which was drawen with a wonderfull paine, both for the ill way of Appennin, and alſo for that want of money they lacked labourers and inſtruments neceſſarie for the cariage, he tooke the way to Prato as had bene ſuppoſed : he arrived there about the breaking of the day, and euen then began with two Falconets to batter the gate Mercatale by the ſpace of an houre, albeit little to his profit, for that it was mightily rāpiered within. The Florentins had beſtowed within Prato about two thouſand footmē, the moſt part of their Penſioners, & the reſidue leauied in haſt of all ſciēces and baſe trades. In that number there were very few experienced and trained to the warre. They had alſo ſent thither with an hundred men at armes Luke Sauello an ancient Captaine, but yet neither for his age nor for his experience come to any degree of martiall knowledge : and the men at armes were the ſame bodies who a little before had bene ſpoiled and ſtripped in Lombardie. To this was added, what by the ſhortneſſe of the time, and the ignorance of ſuch as had the charge to make prouiſions, both great want of artilleries, and not halfe the munitions and other things neceſſarie to defend the place. The Viceroy had in his armie two hundred men at armes, ſiue thouſand footemen Spaniards, and two Cannons onely: an army very ſmall in numbers and other prouiſions, but great as touching their valour, for that the footemen were all of thoſe bodies, who in ſo great reputation were retired from the battell of Raenenna, and who reſoſing much in their vertue, deſpiſed greatly the ignorance of their aduerſaries. But being brought to march, and no order as yet taken for their victuals, and leſſe reliefe through the whole countrey, for that harueſt was fully finiſhed, & all gleaned & caried into places of ſtrength, they began immediatly to fall into neceſſities of food, which made the Viceroy to incline to accord, and the ſame followed with continuall ſolicitation, that the Florentins ſuffering the Medices to returne equall with the other Citizens, there was no more ſpeech of the depoling of the Gonfalonnier, onely the Citie ſhould pay to the Viceroy (to the end to withdraw his armie from their dominions) a certaine ſumme of money, which was ſuppoſed not to exceede thirtie thouſand ducckers. In reſpect of this he had graunted ſafeconduict to the Embaſſadours elected for that expedition, and had abſtained vntill their coming from any further action againſt Prato, if they within had furniſhed him with victuals: There is nothing that ſlieth faſter away then occaſion : nothing more dangerous then to iudge of the intention and profeſſion of another : nor nothing more hurtfull then an immoderate ſuſpicion. All the chiefe Citizens deſired agreement, being accuſtomed by the examples of their elders, to defend their libertie againſt armes, with gold : and therefore they made requeſt, that the Embaſſadours elect ſhould depart incontinently, being charged amongſt other things to ſee them of Prato furniſh the Spaniſh armie with victuals, to the end the Viceroy ſhould expect with patience if the compoſition that was now in action would bring forth any effect. But the Gonfalonnier perſwading himſelfe againſt his naturall timorousneſſe, that the enemies diſpairing to be able to do any more would depart theſelues, or fearing that the Medices by one meanes or other would returne to Florence, or whether his deſtiny pulſhed him on to be the cauſe of his owne ruine and the calamities of his countrey, he held artificially in delay the diſpatch of the Embaſſadours, not ſuffering them to depart the day that was appointed according to the reſolution which had bene made : in ſo much as the Viceroy both preſſed with the want of victuals, and vncertaine whether the Embaſſadors would come, diſlodged by night from the gate Mercatale, and incamping before the gate called Soraglio, from the which the way goeth to the mountaine, he began to batter the next wall with two Cannons, chuſing that place for the commodity of a high heape of earth ioyning to the wal, by the which he might eaſily go to the breach of the wall from aboue that was battred : which facilitie for the campe being turned into a difficultie for the towne, for that the breach that was made aboue the heape of earth, remained within very high and thicke of earth, one of the Cannons was broken at the firſt execution, and the other with the which the battrie was continued, had ſo loſt his force with oftē ſhooting, that his bullets came ſlowly to the wall, and yet did no great harme. Laſtly after they had executed many houres and made an opening in the wall of more then twelue sadomes, certaine of the Spanish footemen got vp to the terrasse or heape of earth, and began to assaile the breach : from whence they got to the top of the wall, where they slue two of the footemen that garded it, whose death giuing feare to the residue and driuing them to retire, the Spaniards forbare not to take the oportunitie of their timerousnesse, and climbe vp by the helpe of scaling ladders. And albeit there was within neare the wall a Squadron of shot and pikes, bestowed there both to suffer none of the enemies to stay vpon the wall, and also to make slaughter of the first man that rashly should scape within or otherwise go downe, yet (such is the feare of men vnexperienced in dangers) as soone as the enemies vpon the wal, they brake their rancke, and of themselues abandoned the defence of the place. This cowardise depending somewhat vpon want of experience in the seruice and perils of warre, gaue courage to the Spaniards to make their entrie in sundry places without any impediment . And crying Victorie, they followed their fortune with valour, and began to runne through the towne, where was seene no other thing then flying, violence, spoiling, bloud, murders. & crying, the footmen of the Florentins making no resistance, but casting away their weapons, they offered their bodies to the rigour of their enemies: fro whose couetousnesse, lust, & crueltie, nothing had escaped, if the Cardinal Medici by bestowing gards in the great Church had not saued the honour of women which in their calamitie were fled thither for safetie . There were more then two thousand men that dyed, not in fighting, for almost not one would ioine himsele to the fray, but in flying, in hyding, and in crying mercy to the enemies, who disdained to shew compassion vpon men of so small merite. The residue were referued prisoners together with the Florentin Commissioners, none escaping the calamitie that so wretched a fortune did bring . By the losse of Prato they of Pistoie, not falling otherwise from the iurisdiction of the Florentines, agreed to relieue the Viceroy with victuals, receiuing his promise not to be distressed by his armie. But at Florence, as soone as the successe of Prato was knowne, and the Embassadours that went to the Viceroy being on the halfe way, were returned by the brute of the accident, there were discerned manifest alterations in the mindes of euery one: some lamenting the losse that was hapned, some fearing greater harmes, some suspecting by nature more then they ought to do by reason, some distrusting shadowes whose bodies were farre off, all things in confusion, and euen those men the least assured, in whom was more reason of confidence and resolution . The Gonfalonier repenting now the vanitie of his counsell, was no lesse amazed then the residue, and hauing almost altogether lost both reputation & authoritie, he stood so irresolute and vngouerned, that he gaue himsele vp to the wils of others, without making prouision either for his owne safetie, or the common tranquillitie: others, who desired the alteration of the gouernement, tooke audacitie by the state of their fortune, and blamed publicly the things present: but the multitude of Citizens not accustomed to tumults and armes, & hauing alwayes afore their eyes the miserable example of Prato, notwithstanding they affected much the gouernement popular, yet what through feare and cowardise, stood as a miserable pray to whosoeuer would oppresse them . In this tumult and separation of mindes Paule Vettori and Anth. Fran. Albizi, two young Gentlemen of the nobilitie, no lesse seditious and desirous of new things, then by these occasions full of audacitie and boldnesse, hauing many moneths afore conspired secretly with others in fauour of the Medices, and for the better forme and maner of their restoring, had secretly spoken with Iulian de Medici in a village of the Florentin territorie neare to Sienna, determined to make experience to draw the Gonfalonier out of the publike pallace by force: and drawing into this counsell one Barth. Valori, a young man of like qualitie, but entangled by his vnreasonable prodigalities with sundry debts, as was also Paule, they went the second morning after the losse of Prato, being the last day of August, with a small company to the pallace, where finding no great gard or resistance, for that the Gonfalonier left all things to aduecture, they entered his chamber, and threatened him to take his life from him if he would not depart the pallace, but in case he would go out, they gaue him their faith to defend him from harme: his feare and the present extremitie made him ouedient to the rage of the young men. Then the whole Citie was drawen into tumult, and many were disclosed against him, but not one appeared in his fauour. He by and by, by direction and commaundement of others, caused to assemble the Magistrates, whom, hauing by the lawes a full authoritie ouer the Gonfaloniers, they required to depriue him lawfully of his office, or otherwise, they would kill him . In which feare they deposed him contrary to their will, and led him in safetie into the house of Paule, from whence in the night

being well accompanied, he was conueyed vpon the dominions of Sienna, and from thence making his way to go to Rome with safeconduct obtained of the Pope, he tooke secretly the way of Ancona, and passed by sea to Raugia, for that he was aduertised by the meane of his brother the Cardinall, that the Pope would breake his promise with him, & spoyle him of the money which he had, supposed to be in great quantitie. Assoone as the Gonsalonnier was deposed from his place, the Citie dispatched present Embassadors to the Viceroy, with whom they compounded easily by meane of the Cardinall de Medicis: for the Cardinall was contented as touching his particular, that there should be no further communing but for the restoring of him and his, and all such as had followed him, as Citizens priuate, with power to redeeme within a certaine time the goods that had bene aliened by the fiske: That there should be repayment of the moneys that had bene disbursed, and amends made by such to whom they had bin transferred: That touching the common affaires, the Florentins entred the league: They were bound to pay to the king of Ro mains forty thousand duckats, according to the promise which the Medices had made at Mantua to the Bishop of Gurci, in recompence of their restoring, to the Viceroy twentie thousand, and to the armie fourescore thousand, the one halfe presently, and the residue within two moneths: but vpon this condition that the first payment being receiued, the armie should forthwith depart the lands of the Florentins, leauing at libertie all that they had possessed. Besides this, they contracted a league with the king of Aragon, with bonds reciprocall for certaine numbers of men at armes for the defence of their estates, and that the Florentines should entertaine in their pay two hundred men at armes of the subiectes of that king: wherein albeit it was not expressed vnder whom they should be led, yet the charge meant to the Marquis of Paluda, to whom the Cardinall had promised, or at least giuen him hope, to make him Captaine Generall of the Florentin men of warre. Thus the businesse of the deposing of the Gonsalonnier being passed ouer, and the daungers of the warre remoued by the composition, the Citizens began to fall to correct the gouernement in points wherein the former forme was thought vnprofitable, but with an vniuersall intention, except of a very few which were young and almost not falling in consideration, to preserue the libertie, and support the counsell popular. Therefore they determined with new lawes, that the election of the Gonsalonnier should not be established perpetuall, but for one yeare onely: That to the counsell of the fourescore, which chaunged from fixe moneths to fixe moneths, and by whose authoritie causes of greatest grauitie were determined, to the end there might be a continuall communitie of the Citizens of greatest qualitie, should be alwayes added all those that had administred either at home or abroad, the chiefe offices and places: At home, such as had bene either Gonsalonniers of iustice, or of the ten of the Balia, an office in that common weale of great authoritie: Abroad, such as being chosen by the counsell of the fourescore, had serued either as Embassadors to forreine Princes, or else as Generall superintendents ouer the warre: All the other orders and ordinances of the gouernement remained firme and stable without innouation.

After these things were resolued, they elected Gonsalonnier for the first yeare, John Baptista Rodolfe, a Citizen of noble descending, and no lesse esteemed for his discretion and gouernement. And as it happeneth in all times troubled, so in this election the people not beholding so much such as by popular practises were most agreeable to them, as one, who what with the great authoritie he had in the Citie, specially with the nobilitie, and with his proper vertue which was peculiar to him, might reduce and make firme and stable the shaking estate of the common weale. But by the present tumult things were too much disordred, the common libertie had too many mighty enemies, in the bowels of the countrey was an army suspected, and within the Citie an vnbridled boldnesse of young men desirous to oppresse it, and to their wils was conformable the will of the Cardinall Medicis, notwithstanding in wordes he made demonstration of the contrarie: for, as in the beginning he esteemed not the restoring of him and his as Citizens priuate, a recopence worthy of so many trauels & paines, so also he considered for the present, that that state could not endure, for that together with his name, they should be greatly hared of all sorts, the Citizens living in continuall suspition, that they would dresse some ambush against their libertie: They would alwayes remaine discontented, for that they had brought the Spanish armie against their countrey, and were the causes of the wretched spoyle and lacke of Prato: and lastly that by compulsion of armes the Citie had bene constrained to receiued conditions so vnworthy and vniust. To this he was vrged by such as afore had conspired with him, and others who in a cōmon weale well ordered, held no honorable place: but the consent of the Viceroy was necessary, who expecting the first payment, which for the diuisions in the citie could not so soon be made, kept as yet within Prato, and had no fancie (whatsoever was the cause) what any new change should be made in the Citie of Florence, notwithstanding the Cardinall ioyning to him the Marquis of Paluda & Andrew Caraffe Captaines in the armie, told him that the name of the Spaniards could not be but very odious to a Citie, against which they had done so many harmes: that in all occasions they would sticke alwayes to the enemies of the king Catholike, and that there was daunger, least when the armie should depart, they would reuoke the Gonsalonnier who they had expelled by constraint. By these perswasions he consented to the Cardinall, who assoone as he had made agreement and resolution of affaires with him, came with diligence to Florence into his houses, where many Captaines and souldiers of the Italians entred, some with him, and some separate, the Magistrates being affrayed to let their entry for feare of the Spaniards that were at hand. The next morning the counsell of the multitude of Citizens being assembled at the publike pallace to consult vpon the affaires present, Iulian de Medicis being present and assisting the action, the souldiers charged the gate of the pallace, and climing vp by ladders, they made themselves maisters of the pallace, and made pillage of the siluer vessell which lay there of store for the vse and seruice of the Citie. There the Citie together with the Gonsalonnier compelled to giue place to the insolencies of such as could do more with armes and weapons then the Magistrate with reuerence and authoritie, called together with the ringing of the great bell (by the direction of Iulian de Medicis) the people, to Parliament vpon the pallace greene: where, such as went thither being enuironed with armed souldiers, and the young men of the Citie that had takē armes for the citie, they consented that to fiftie Citizēns of the Cardinals naming, should be giuē the same authority ouer publike businesse which all the people had: a forme or state of power which the Florentins call Amplia balia. By the decree of these men, the gouernment being reduced to that forme which it caried before the yeare a thousand foure hundred nintie & foure, & a garrison established within the pallace, the Medices resumed vpon the selfe same state of greatnesse which their father had, but their gouernmēt was more imperious, & with a power more absolute.

In this sort, and with armes, was oppressed the libertie of the Florentins, being brought to that degree of aduersitie principally by the disagreements of the Citizēns. It was thought it had not fallen so far, if they had not behaued themselues with great negligence in the defence of the common businesse, specially in the last times, not speaking of the neutrality, which they vsed very vndiscreetly, and the cowardise of the Gonsalonnier giuing too much head to the enemies of the popular gouernment. The king of Aragon had not from the beginning so great a desire to reuerse the libertie, as to turne away that Citie from the alliance of the French king, & to draw some summes of money to pay his armie: in so much that assoone as the French had abandoned the Duchie of Mullan, he sent to tell the Viceroy, that whether the affaires occurrent should draw him to another enterprise, or for any other occasion, he should know that the restitution of the Medices would be of hard action, that he should take libertie to determine according to the condition of times, and agree or not agree with the Citie, according to the meane that brought the best oportunitie to his affaires. This was his commaundement in the beginning: but being afterwarde discontented with the Pope for the violence he would haue done at Rome to Alfonso d'Este, and entering withall into suspicion for the threats he gaue publicly against straungers, he gaue plainly to vnderstand to the same Embassadour of Florence that came to him in the beginning of the warre, enioyning no lesse to the Viceroy, that there should be no struing to alter the gouernement. In which deuise these two reasons were indifferent to him: he iudged that either it would be a thing of more suretie to him to preferue the Gonsalonnier, who was enemie to the Pope, or else he feared that the Cardinall of Medicis being restored, would not more depend of the Pope then of him. But his last deliberation came not to the knowledge of the Viceroy, vntill the day after the common weale was reduced to the power of the Cardinall.

By this discourse it may be discerned, that if the Florentins, after the French were chased, had looked to assure their affaires by some agreement, or at least had made theselues strong with men & souldiers trained, either the Viceroy had not marched against them, or at least finding resistance, he would easily haue bin brought to composition for money. But their destinie was against their safetie, safety, being besides the coniectures and comprehension of mans wisdom, warned of the perils were towne them, by certaine signes in the ayre: for, not long afore, the lightning that fell upon the gate that leades from Florence to Prato, carried away from an ancient shield of Marble, a golden flower de Lys, which is the Ensigne or armes of the French kings: An other time a flash of lightning descending from the top of the pallace into the chamber of the Gonfalonnier, touched no other thing then a great vessell of silver wherein the lots are wont to be put when they come to be made, squall for the creation of the great Magistrate: and afterwards falling downe, it stroke so violently a great stone which lay at the foote of the stayres, and bare vp the burden of the building, that being remoued from his place without any other hurt, it seemed that the hands of men had taken him out with a wonderfull knowledge in Archyecture.

About these times, or a litle before, the Genowases bearing vpon the Castle of Genes with the artilleries which the Pope had lent them, the Castle keeper being corrupted with a bribe of ten thousand duckats, deliuered it vp to the townes men: This treason of the keeper moued partly by feare, for the French army by sea which was sent out of Prouence for the defence of the towne, hauing not courage to talke land, were retired, by whose cowardise he had no hope to be succoured: But the Lanterne held out for the king, wherein the same day certaine French vessels had conueyed victuals and other necessary prouisions.

Alloone as the matters of Florence were dispatched and the mony receiued, the Viceroy remoued his army to march to Bressia: about which City the Venetians, hauing now appeased the wils of the Swissers, were encamped and lay afore the gate of S. Iohn, battering at one time both the towne and the Castle with artilleries planted vpon the mountaine opposite: They had a certaine light hope to be let in at the pile gate by meane of an intelligence, which neuerthelesse proued vaine, for that it was disclosed: But when the Spanish army ariued at the borough of Gairo which is neare to Bressia, Monsieur d'Aubigny gouernour of the French that were within, had a mind to giue vp the Towne together with the Castle to the Viceroy, with composition that all the souldiers that were within should issue out, their goods and liues saued, but their Ensignes foulded, and the points of their weapons downeward, and leauing behind them their artillery: wherein it seemed Monsieur d'Aubigny respected more the Viceroy then the Venetians, by a commandement which he had receiued afore from his king, to deliuer it to the Spaniards or to Cesar, not that he hated more the Venetians, but rather to entertaine matter of contention with Cesar and with the king of Aragon. The Frenchmen that kept Leguague followed the same counsell afore the Spaniards passed into Lombardy: for, litle esteeming of the many offers of the Venetians, they sur-rendred it vp to the Bishop of Gurci, as also did Pesquiero at the same time that the Viceroy en-tred Bressia, the possession whereof the same Bishop desired to haue, but it pleased the Viceroy to retaine it for the League, in whose name he had receiued it: it hapned otherwayes to the towne of Crema, about the which lay incamped Ranze de Cere with a part of the Venetian soul-diers: for, by that time the army of the foure thousand Swissers which Ottavian Sforce Bishop of Lode and gouernour of Millan sent to conquere it, in the name of the expected Duke Maximilian Sforce, were come neare the wals, Benedict Crisbario what by corruption of money, and an ambitious desire to be created a Gentleman of Venice, gaue it vp to the Venetians; in which action was concurrant the consent of Monsieur Duraz that kept the Castle, who reposed no confidence for his safety in the faith of the Swissers.

Immediately vpon these expeditions the Bishop of Gurci went to Rome, whom the Pope desiring earnestly to reconcile to him, gaue order to receiue him through all the dominions of the Church with all sortes of honours: and not sparing to enforce his nature to aduance his desire, he defraied his expenses by the wayes, together with all such as followed him, to whom were made many great feasts and liberalities: euery towne which he entred honored him, with shewes and offices not accustomed, both for their variety which was strange, and for their state and ma-iesty, most rich and sumptuous: The wayes which he passed were full of personages appointed to meete him, and in many seuerall places he was visited by sundry new Embassadors of Prelates & personages of honor of the Popes sending: yea he would that the Colledge of Cardinals should haue gone to the gates of Rome to receiue him, but the whole Colledge refusing, as a matter for the newnesse, hurtfull in example, and for the indignity, most preiudiciall to their reputation, they appointed only the Cardinals Agienese and Strigonia to go out of the gates halfe a mile into the medowes, to receiue him in the name of the Pope, who with great respect & ceremony led him to the Church of S. Maria de Popolo, he being in the middest betweene them as Li. II. haut ar Cesar: there the two Cardinals left him, and from thence being honourably accompanied beside the generall multitudes that followed, he went to the Pope, who sitting in solempne habit vnder his estate pontificall, expected his comming in the publike Consistory, where not many dayes before he had in great honour receiued the twelue Embassadors of the Swissers, whom all the Cantons had sent to him, both to giue him publike obedience, and to make offer of their nation to be perpetuall defenders of the state of the Church, and withall to thanke him, that with so great honour he had giuen them the sword, the hat, the helmet, and the banner, together with the title to be the defenders of the Ecclesiastike liberty. When the Cardinall was arriued, & had performed his presence to the Pope, they began to debate of the establishment of the common affaires, whereof the foundation rested in this, to remoue all quarels and contentions particular, to the end that the regions of Italy reunited and confirmed, might with one ioynt resolution and counsell, be able to make a full resistance to the French king. The hardest matter in this action was the composition so many times practised betweene Cesar and the Venetians: for the Bishop of Gurcy could haue bene contented that Padoa, Treuise, Bressia, Bergama and Cremona could reioyne to the Venetians, so farre forth as they would render to Cesar Vincenza, renounce their claimes and rights they pretended to the townes that Cesar held, and pay to him presently two hundred thousand florins of Rhein, and thirty thousand yearly for euer in forme of tribute. It troubled the Venetians to acknowledge themselves tributaries for those townes which they had possessed for many yeares as proper owners: and no lesse were they grieued to giue mony, notwithstanding the Pope offered to lend them part of the summe: but the thing that troubled them most, was the restoring of Vincenza, in which action they alleaged they should seporate the body of their estate, and stand deprived of the commodity to passe from the head and principall parts to the other members, by which priuation the possession of Bressia, Bergama, and Crema would stand ill assured. Besides, to refuse the restitution vnder more honest colours, they sayd, they had giuen their faith to the Vincenzins the last time they put themselves into their hands, neuer to separate them from them. Other conditions were debated betweene the Pope and the king of Aragons Embassador, proponed more for reuenge and recompence of the complaints of others, then that there was hope to obtaine them: for, the Pope demanded that that king according to the contents of the confederation, should aide him to conquer Ferrara: he required him to leaue off the protection of Fabricio and Mark. Anth. Colonne, against who he had begun to proceede with spirituall armes, for that they had forced the gate of Lairan, and receiued the Duke of Ferrara (rebelled against him) into those townes whose iurisdiction appertained directly to the Church: he required him to renounce the protections he had made in Tuscane of the Florentins, of the Siennois, of the Lucquois, and of Plombin, matters done to the diminution of the rights of the Empire, and generally suspected of all Italy, but particularly of the Church: for that as it was not profitable to the other Potentats that he should haue so many aliances in Italy, so it was most dangerous for the Church, that a prouince belonging to the dominion of the same, should depend vpon his authority. To these the Spanish Embassadors replied, that they refused not to ayde him against Ferrara, so far forth as according to the bonds of the same confederation, he made payment of the mony due to the army both for that was past, & to make new prouision for hereafter: That it was an action neither of praise nor merit to proceed against Fabricio & Mark. Anth. Colonne, by who, if they were pursued, what by reason of their great friends and dependances, and for that they were Captaines of authority, would be renewed matter of a new warre: That the king Catholike could not leaue them abandoned, without special preiudice to his proper honor, neither did their seuerall seruices in the ioynt warres of the Pope and him against the French king, deserue that property of recompence. Touching the complaint he made of the protections of Tuscane, they thought it proceeded not of any good or iust zeale, but to the end that Sienna, Lucqua, & Plombin, should remaine a pray to his couetousnesse, condisending notwithstanding to referre themselves in those actions, to the arbitrement of Cesar. All the confederats agreed with full consent, that Maximilian Sforce should enter vpon the Duchy of Mislan, but Cesar consented not to inuest him, nor to indue him with the name of Duke or any title iudiciall. But estoones did renew the complaints of the Bishop of Gurcy & the Spaniards touching the occupation of Parma & Plaisance: they brought great preiudice preiudice of the rights of the Empire, too much encrease of greatnesse to the Popes, and an apparent weakning of the Duchy of Millan, which had neede to be made more strong and able, or that it lay alwayes open and subiect to the first inuasions of the French: That in the capitulations of the league, the Pope had made mention of no other things then of Bologna and Ferrara: That now he vsurped that which of long time since, had not bene possessed by the Church of Rome, yea there was no certaine knowledge that euer she could claime interest, not in the times most ancient: That this vsurpation was vnder shadow of rights and interests, whereof appeared no authentike memory, he seeming to make the donations of Emperours none other thing then a simple writing, which might be forged or fayned according to fancy: And yet the Pope, taking the occasion of the tumults of Lombardy, did reason to himselfe, as in a matter manifest and notorious: These disputations could not be resolued easily: But the matter that troubled most the issue of things, was the controuersie betweene Cesar and the Venetians, by reason whereof the Pope did what he could, sometimes prouoking them, sometimes praying them, and sometimes threatening them, and all for a desire he still nourished to preferue the Venetians, both for the common benefit of Italy, and also for that he hoped, vnder the oportunity of their succours, to be able to reuery Ferrara without the forces of the Spaniards. In this action the Aragon Embassadors labored with great importunity, fearing least to a common danger, there were no cause added to the Venetians to turne their dispositions to the French, and be ctsfoones reunited to that nation: but they were driuen to proceed aduisedly and with temperance, both not to prouoke Cesar to make alliance with the Frenchmen, from whom their king had separate him with so great paine, and also for other reasons necessarily mouing him not to breake amitie with him. Lastly the Swisser Embassadors omitted no trauell in this action, for that being bound to defend the Venetians, who also in that regard were bound to pay them euery yeare 25000 duckets, they wished not to be brought to this necessitie, either not to obserue their promise, or to be driuen to make head against Cesar if he offered to vex them. At last, neither the Bishop of Gurci, being not to be drawne from the demaund he made that the Venetians should render Vincenza to Cesar, nor the Venetians disposed to giue it vp, who stood also yet disagreed touching the quantity of mony, the Pope, who aboue all things desired, the rather to reuerse the name and authority, of the Councell of Pisa, that Cesar might approue the Councell of Latran, protested to their Embassadors, that he should be constrained to persecute that common-weale with armes spirituall and temporall: which protestation because it moued them not, he onely was brought to confederate with Cesar, the Spanish Embassador refusing to deale in the action, either for that he had no commission from his king, or else for that that king sought still to nourish the Venetians with some hope, notwithstanding he was resolued in mind to ayde Cesar. It was expresse vpon the proëme of the confederation which a litle after was solemnly published in the Church of S. Maria de Popolo: That for that the Venetians had obstinately refused the peace, and the Pope by the necessitie of the Christian common-weale, had protested to abandon them: Cesar did now enter and accept the league made in the yeare a thousand five hundred and eleuen, betweene the Pope, the king of Aragon, and the Venetians, according as the liberty and respite was reserued for him: That he promised to cleaue to the Councell of Latran, disauowing and reuoking all commissions, procurations, and actes done in the fauour of the Councell of Pisa: He bound himselfe not to ayde any one of the subiects or enemies of the Church, but chiefly Alfonso d'Este and the Bentiuoleis occupiers of Ferrara & Bologna: And lastly he promised to call home all the bands of Almain footmen that were in the paies of Alfonso, together with Federik de Bossolo that held on him: On the other side the Pope promised to ayde Cesar against the Venetians with armes both spirituall and temporall, vntill he had recouered all that was contained in the league of Cambray: It was declared that the Venetians were altogether excluded out of the league and truce made with Cesar, for that in many sorts they had impugned both the one and the other: That they were enemies to the Pope, to Cesar & to the king Catholike, to whom they reserued place & time to enter the confederation, and vnder certaine conditions: That the Pope could make no couenant with them without the consent of Cesar, or till Cesar had recouered that which appertained to him, as was sayd afore: That neither the Pope nor Cesar, without reciprocall priuity and consent, could contract or couenant with any Prince Christian: That during the war against the Venetians, the Pope should do no displeasure to Fabricio & Mark. Anth. Colonne, being notwithstanding left at liberty to proceede against Pompey and Iulio and others that had bene declared rebels. That notwithstanding he was suffered to possesse Parma, Reggia and Plaisance, yet by this capitulation it was not meant to preiudice the rights of the Empire. When this confederation was published, the Bishop of Gurci in the next session of the Councell of Latran, approued the Councell in the name of Cesar, and as his Lieutenant generall in Italy: and cancelling all former commissions, acts, & procurations, he testified in the presence of the whole Councell, that Cesar neuer consented to the conuocation of Pisa, disauowing all such as had vsed his name. Assoone as he had thus ratified the Councell of Latran, he departed from Rome to be present when Maximilian Sforce (being now come by commission of Cesar to Verona) should take possession of the Duchy of Mil-lan: the Cardinall of Sion disposed himselfe very hardly to expect and attend his comming, and also the Embassadors of the whole nation of Swissers that were at Millan, for that they would that in the demonstrations and solemnity of the actions that was to be vsed, it might appeare that the Swissers were the men that had chased the Frenchmen out of that state, and by their valour & courage Maximilian receiued it: they would that the verity and effect of that conquest might be transferred to them by such publike ceremonies as were to be vsed in the installing of him, whom their vertue only made Lord of the Duchy. But such was the working of the Viceroy, that, more by practise then by his authority he obtained so much, that they taried for the comming of the Bishop of Gurci: who, after he had ratified at Florence in the name of Cesar, the confederation made in Prato, & receiued certaine summes of money of the Lacquois, whom he tooke into protection, came at last to Cremona, where Maximilian Sforce and the Viceroy attended him: from thence they went altogether to Millan, to make their entry at the day appointed into that City, with solemnities and honors accustomed to new Princes. In which action albeit it was long disputed betweene the Cardinall of Sion and the Viceroy, which of them should giue him the keyes at the entry of the gate in signe of possession, yet in the end the Viceroy giuing place, the Cardinall put into his hands the keyes of the towne in the vniuersall name of the Swissers, and that day, being one of the last dayes of December, he did all things both in shew and act, that were necessary to make knowne that Maximilian Sforce receiued the possession of them: he was receiued with an incredible gladnesse of all the people, both for the desire they had to haue a Prince proper and particular, and also they hoped he would resemble his grandfather or his father, of whom the memorie of one remained very fresh in the minds of the people of that state, and touching the other, the despites they had receiued by the gouernement of strangers, had turned their hatred into good will: The working of time, with the experience of the yoke of strangers had made in that people a wonderfull conuersion, and nature in those actions workes not a little, bringing that people to reioyce at the returne of him, whose father they abhorred with a iust and vniuersall hatred. But these gratulations and ioyes were yet vnperfect vntill the Castle of Nonaro were recovered: a matter not long deferred, for that they within, yeelded it vp, their fortune being far inferior to their faith.

*Maximilian
red to Millan.*

The confederation made at Rome, had not altogether broken the hopes of agreement betweene Cesar and the Venetians, for that the Pope had vpon the sudden sent to Venice Iacques Staffilio his Nuncio, with who went accompanied three Embassadors of the Swissers to perswade the to accord: And on the other side, the Senat, the better to entertaine the good will of the Pope, and not to giue cause to Cesar to inuade them with armes, had sent to their Embassadors a new direction to cleaue to the Councell of Latran: they had commaunded also the men of warre assoone as the confederation was made, to retire vpon the territories of Padoa: and for that cause the Viceroy not willing to trouble the hopes of the peace, had turned his armie towards Millan. But all these things serued to no purpose, for that the same difficulties did yet continue touching the restitution of Vincenza, and the payments of money which Cesar demanded. That was the cause that the Pope assayed not the Duke of Ferrara, whom (agreement going betweene Cesar and the Venetians) he supposed he should be able to vanquish with the aides of the Venetians, together with the brute that the Spaniards were to come on if neede should be: otherwise he had resolved to deferre that expedition till the spring time, for that he accounted it a matter of hard actiō to take in a season of winter, the towne of Ferrara, the situation being strong in respect of the riuier, and greatly fortified besides, by the continuall industrie of Alfonso.

It may haply seeme to some, if I intangle my history with the accidents of Fraunce in that yere, that that I wander or change my course, which is not to speake of matters hapning out of the bounds of Italy: but because the affaires of that nation haue some affinitie and relation with the businesse of these parts, and that to the successe of the one, the counsels and issues of the other were oftentimes conioyned, I am constrained not to passe them altogether vnder forgetfulness and silence.

About the beginning of May, an armie of sixe thousand English footmen sailed in vessels of England and Spaine to Fontaraby, a frontier towne belonging to the crowne of Spaine vpon the coast of Fraunce, and standing vpon the Ocean sea. The seruice and purpose of this armie, according to the couenants made betweene the father in law and sonne in law, was, together with the forces of Spaine, to set vpon the Duchy of Guyen, which is a part of the prouince of Aquitaine, according to the ancient names and diuisions of the same. Against this war, the French king not yet assured on the coast of Picardy, prepared a new pencionary band of eight hundred launces which he had erected, and waged many bands of footmen of the lower parts of Germany not subiect to the Emperour: and knowing of what importance for the defence of the Duchy of Guien, was the realme of Nauarre, which was both appropriate and dowrie to Katherine de Foix, and possessed by John the sonne of Albert, who was her husband: he called to the Court the father of the law John, and carefully considered how he might make him his friend & consociate. John serued to good purpose the death of Gaston de Foix, by the instigation of whom pretending the same kingdom not to fall vpon the female, & by consequent to appertaine to him, as to the next heire male of the house of Foix, the French king had pursued the said John. On the other side the king Catholike, who had set his eyes vpon that realme, required the king of Nauarre to stand neuter betweene the French king and him: and to suffer to passe through his realme, his souldiers that were to enter Fraunce: and for the assurance of these things he would put into his hands certaine places of strength, vnder promise to render them assoone as the warre should end. It hath bene a perpetuall desire in the ancient kings of Spaine, to impatronize theselues vpon the realme of Nauarre: in which respect the king of Nauarre, being also not ignorant whither those demands tended, chose rather to offer himself to a perill that was vncertaine, then to accept a losse certaine, hoping he should not faile of the succours promised by the French king, for whose affaires it came well to passe that the warre began in the realme of Nauarre: and at the same time, either to giue more leasure to such as were appointed to come to his succours, or to deliuer himselfe if he could from those demaunds, he treated with the king of Aragon, who according to his custome proceeded in those conferences with great cunning. But the industrie & warinesse of the king of Aragon hurt not more the king of Nauarre, then the negligence of the French king, who taking courage by the slownesse of the English army, that for many dayes since they were arriued at Fontaraby, had done nothing: & trusting withall, that the king of Nauarre was able with his owne forces to defend himselfe for a time, deferred very long to send him succours. By the commodity of which delayes, the king of Aragon, who had cunningly nourished and entertained the hopes of the king of Nauarre, conuerted thither with great expedition the bands which he had prepared to ioyne with the English: so that the king of Nauarre both vnprepared of himselfe, and by his priuation of hope, despairing to be able to make resistance, gaue place to his fortune, and fled into Bearn beyond the Pyrene hilles. By which accident, the realme of Nauarre was left abandoned, except certaine strong places which yet held out for the king, who in his feare was fled: and so without any expences or difficultie, and more for feare and reputation of the English that were at hand, then by his owne forces that were farre off, the king of Aragon made himselfe Lord of that kingdome. And because he could not affirme that he possessed it lawfully with any other title, he alleged that he was rightfully and iudicially impatronized of it by the authority of the Sea Apostolike. For the Pope not satisfied for the happie successe of Italy, had a litle before published a Bull against the French king; wherein naming him no more Christianissimo, but Illustissimo, he subiected aswell his person as whosoeuer were his adherents, to all the paines of heretikes and schismatikes, giuing sufferance to euery one to occupy their substances, estates, and all that appertained vnto them: and in the same seueritie & rigour, ioyned to an indignation that the Cardinals and other Prelates who were fled to Millan, had bene receiued into the towne of Lyon, he commaunded vnder grieuous penalties and taxations, that the Fayre or Mart accustomed to be kept at Lyon foure times euerie yeare, the traffike of

The Englishmen at Fontaraby against the French king.

Marchants being no lesse plentifull, then the resort of strangers infinite, should be hereafter transferred to the citie of Genewa, from whence king Louis the eleuenth had taken it for the better of his kingdome. And lastly, he had brought the whole realme of Fraunce vnder the interdiction Ecclesiasticall. In his malice he omitted nothing that might appertaine to scueritie or rigour: But after the king of Aragon had conquered the kingdom of Nauarre, which albeit is but of little circuit and of lesse reuenue, yet for the situation, it is verie conuenient for the kingdome of Spaine, & greatly auailable to the surety of it: he determined in himselfe to passe no further, esteeming it no lesse against his profit then inconuenient for his safetie, to make war against the French king beyond the Mounts. In this respect, as also cuen from the beginning that the Englishmen arriued, he had bene dilatorie in bringing forth his forces, rather temporising with euasions and deuises, then aduancing according to the true meaning of his promise. And after the conquest of Nauarre, as the English solicited him to ioyne his forces with them, to the end to march together and incampe afore Bayon, a citie neare to Foniaraby, and almost standing vpon the Ocean sea: so he protracted the expedition they required, and proponed other enterprises in places removed from the sea, alleaging that Bayon was so manned and fortified, that there was no hope or possibilitie to carie it. These reasons were answered and auoyded by the Englishmen, who, without the towne of Bayon, esteemed nothing of all the other conquest of the Duchie of Guien. And therefore after the English armie had vainely spent much time to vrge the king, that was altogether vnwilling, they contemned his subtelties and delayes, and embarked to returne into England without commission or licence of their Prince. By the retiring of which armie, the French king remained assured on that side, and fearing no more the inuasions of the English by sea, for that at last he was become so strong by sea, that he commanded all that part of the Ocean from the coasts of Spaine to the shoares of England: he determined to make triall if he could reconquer the realme of Nauarre: to which expedition he was encouraged besides the departing of the English fleet, for that by reason of his aduersities in Italie, all his bands of souldiers that remained, were returned into Fraunce. At the time that the king of Aragon gaue hope to the Englishmen to enter into the war, the better to bring vnder him the whole iurisdiction of the realme of Nauarre, he had sent certaine regiments of men to S. Ioh. Pie de Porto, which is the last place of that kingdome, standing at the foot of the Pyrene hilles, on that side towards Fraunce: and afterwards as the French forces began to increase thereabouts, he had sent thither with the maine armie Federike Duke of Alba, Captaine generall of the warre. But the French army at last being become farre more mighty, by the prelence of the Daulphin, Charles Duke of Bourbon, and M. L'oguenille, the verie floures of the realme of Fraunce: the Duke of Alba lying incaped in a strong place betweene the plaine and the mountaine, held it an action verie necessary to that seruice, to the Frenchmen for entring into the realme of Nauarre. The Frenchmen not able to force him out of that place for the strength of his situation, determined that the king of Nauarre with seuen thousand footmen of his countrey, & M. Palissa with his companie of three hundred launces remouing from Sauueterre neare to S. Ioh. Pie de Porto, where the whole armie lay, shold passe the Pyrene hilles by the way of the vale of Willowes, and drawing neare to Pampelune the capitall towne of the kingdome, their deuise was to occupie the way of the willowes, by the which were brought to the Spanish armie victuals, whereof the sterility of the countrey had made them suffer great want. In Pampelune the peoples taking courage by the nearnesse of the Frenchmen, began already to draw to mutinie, not otherwayes rebelling then to relieue their king, for whose restoring they thought it good deuotion to aduerture their liues. This was the effect of this deuise: after the king of Nauarre and Monsieur Palissa had won the way that is vpon the top of the Pyrene hilles, they tooke by assault the towne that stands at the foot of the hilles, wherein was Baldes Captaine of the gard to the king of Aragon, with many bands of footmen: and if to winne the way of the willowes they had vsed the celeritie that the consideration of the seruice required, famine only had bene sufficient to vanquish the Spanish armie, enuironed on all sides with enemies, with ill wayes, with ill fortune, & with wants. But the diligence of the Duke of Alba preuented the enemy & preserued himself, for that leauing in S. Ioh. Pie de Porto a thousand footmen with all the artillerie, he passed to Pampelune by the way of the willowes afore they came thither. So that the king of Nauarre and Palissa being disappointed of that hope, to whom also the Daulphin had sent a new strength of foure hundred launces, and seuen thousand Latince knights, made made their approaches to Pampelune with foure peeces of artillerie, which they had drawne with great difficultie, by reason of the steepnesse of the mountaines: they gaue the assault, but with a fortune farre inferior to their forwardnesse, for that being not able to carie by their valour that they were denied by the present season (being then December) & by the want of victuals (being falne into a countrey barraine) they repassed the Mounts Pyrene, vpon the which they were constrained to leaue the artillerie, both for the difficultie of the passages, and for the impediments of the paſſants of those hills. And at the same time M. de Lawtrech who was entred Biscay with 300 launces and three thousand footmen, making waste and pillage of the whole country, after he had in vaine assaulted the towne of S. Sebastian, he repassed the mounts and returned to the armie, which now brake vp, both hope and feare ceasing on all parts, and the whole realme of Nauarre remaining free and peaceable to the king of Aragon. About this time there was a detection of a conspiracie, that Ferdinand son to the late Federike king of Naples, who called himselfe Duke of Calabria, had secretly conspired with the French king, and to steale to the French army not far from the towne of Logrognia, where at that time was the king of Aragon: who sent him to the Castle of Sciatiua whither the kings of Aragon are wont to send prisoners, personages of name and merite either for their nobilitie or for their vertue: for this conspiracie was quartered Philip Coppola a Nepolitan, who was the secret messenger to the French king in these actions: such is the alteration of the state of worldly things, that he was executed in the seruice of him, whose grandfather by the fathers side had cut off the head of Count de Sarny his father. The detection of this conspiracy was of some consequence for the affaires of Italy: for, as it had his beginning of a certaine gray Frier, which the Duke of Ferrara had secretly sent to Ferdinand; so the king Catholike hauing already an inclination to satisfie the Popes will, tooke this matter so to heart, that he commanded the Viceroy & his Embassadors resident with the Pope, to conuert when they thought good, his army against Ferrara, seeking to exact no further taxations of mony, then such as should be necessarie to entertaine them. These were the accidents of that yeare both in Italy, in Fraunce, and in Spaine, their issues being diuerse, as their causes were seuerall.

strange and fundrie then the other. In the beginning of this yeare, armes ceased on all parts, for that neither the Venetians molested others, nor any other moued against them: only the Viceroy marched with three thousand footmen to incampe afore the rocke of Tressa, which immediatly was giuen vnto him vnder condition that the bodies that were within should depart with goods and life saued. But euerie one vniuersally was troubled with the consideration of things to come: they saw that the French king deliuered from furraine armes, and eftsoons reincouraged both for the great leaue of Launceknights he had made, and for the increase of his numbers of men at armes, had nothing in so great desire as to recouer the Duchy of Millan: which disposition albeit was verie violent in him, and no lesse desire to hasten the warre whilest the Castles of Millan & Cremona were yet kept by his souldiers: yet looking into the great impediments offered by the opposing of so manie enemies, & being not yet assured that the king of England would not make strong war against him the next Sommer: he determined to enter into no action, vnlesse he separated some one of the confederates from the common aliance, or else to winne to him the amity of the Venetians. Of these things, the yeare past gaue him manie hopes, that some one of them might haply succcede to him: for, at that time that the Bishop of Gurci went from Rome to Millan, he heard graciously by the way one of the familiar friends of the Cardinal S. Seuerin sent to him from the French Queene, and afterwards he had sent into Fraunce one of his men to make these ouertures: That the king should be bound to aide Cesar against the Venetians: That the mariage should go forward betweene the second daughter of the king, and Charles nephew to Cesar: That to the Daughter should be giuen in dowrie the Duchy of Millan: That the king besides, should giue vp to his Daughter and his future sonne in law the rights he pretended to the realme of Naples: And because simple words and promises should not stand to Cesar as a suretie, he required that the Daughter might be immediatly put into his hands: And that when the king should haue recouered the Duchie of Millan, Cremona and Guia Radada should be to Cesar. The king hoped likewise that he might easily ioine to him the Venetians, who were not a litle angrie at that time that the Viceroy occupied Bressia, but much more for the matters, which afterwards were accorded at Rome betweene Cesar and the Pope: therefore from that time, the king had caused to come secretly to his Court Andrew Grutty, who being taken within Brescia, remained as yet prisoner in Fraunce: he wrought so also, that Ioh. Ia. Trivulze, in whom the Venetians reposed much, did send to Venice one of his Secretaries vnder shadow of other affaires there offered him withall a certaine hope to be able to compound with the king of Aragon, who according to his custome oftentimes to debate in his affaires by the negociation of men religious, had sent secretly into Fraunce two gray Friars, to the end that expressing how they were touched with a conscience and zeale to the common benefite, they might begin to negotiate with the Queene in some points, either concerning the peace vniuersall, or particular betweene the two kings: wherein neuerthelesse there was no great hope, the king knowing well enough that he would still retaine the realme of Nauarre, and to him it was a matter of no lesse indignity to leaue abandoned that king, who to reenter into his amity and vnder hope of his succours, was falne into that calamity: but nothing troubled so much the French king as the desire he had to be reconciled to the Swissers: he knew that vpon their amitie depended his assured victorie, both for the great authority that that nation had then got, and their armes no lesse feared, and for that they seemed to be now drawne into a forme of gouernment, not as souldiers nor men savage, but with a wonderfull warinesse and vigilancie, as men trained vpon a common weale well instituted, and nourished in the administration of estates and managing of affaires without suffering any stirre or leauies to be made but by good counsell and discretion. By this conformitie of theirs, there was in Switzerland a resort and presence of Embassadours from all Princes in Christendome: the Pope with almost all Potentates payd them yearely pensions, to be receiued into their confederation, and to haue sufferance to leaue for their proper defence in times of necessitie, souldiers of that nation. The remembrance of these things made them so proud, that weighing withall how king Charles the eight by their armes had first altered the quiet estate of Italy, and after king Louys his successeur by their valour had conquered the Duchy of Millan, recovered Genes, and ouerthrowne the Venetians, they vsed towards all men an imperious & insolent behauiour: Amongst the harmes that prosperity bringeth, this is not the least, that it rayseth men into opinion and weening, and listeth vp their thoughts through vaine and light affections, like as birds vse to do, whose naturall lightnesse conuey them to the starres. They considered not that the estate of humane felicitie is subiect to emulation, & nothing of more difficulty to worldly men then to beare well the height and greatnesse of fortune: and yet the French king notwithstanding the perswasions of many particulars of that nation, together with his owne opinion that they would stirre and draw into armes for the great offers of money that were made them, was not without hope to win them: his reason was, that albeit such as gouerned Millan hauing agreed with the Embassadours of the Swissers in the name of Maximilian Sforce, that he should giue them an hundred and fiftie thousand duckets so soone as he had receiued the possession of Millan and the Castles, and pension of fortie thousand duckets euerie yeare for xxv. years, taking him into their protection, with couenant to deliuer into his pay bands of their footmen: yet the Cantons would neuer ratifie those couenants. In which hope, in the beginning of the yeare present, notwithstanding afore he had in vaine proued to haue his Embassadors heard, which he meant to send to sollicite in those affaires, yet to purchase audience in their parliaments, he consented to giue vp to them frankly and freely the castles of the vale of Lugan and Lugarna: with so great indignity great Princes sought at that time the amity of that nation. In the end M. Trimonulle with commission from the king came to Lucerna, a place appointed to heare him in publicke assemblie; and albeit he was receiued with good shew & countenance, yet he saw he should do litle good touching the actiō of the Duchy of Millan: for that not many dayes before, 6 Cantons had ratified & subsigned the capitulations made with Maximilian Sforce, three had determined to confirme them, and touching the other three, they were not yet resolued: by reason of which doubts, the Embassador speaking no further of Millan nor the affaires therof, demaunded that at least they would aide the king to recouer Genes and Ast, matters not comprehended in the capitulation made with Maximilian Sforce. And the better to aduaunce that demand, Trimonulle made request that he might be at the parliamēt vnder colour to treat vpon affaires particular, wherein safeconduct was granted to him, but with this condition, that he should not sollicite in any matter appertaining to the French king: & being come to Lucerna, he was enioyned not to haue conference with Trimonulle, neither in publicke nor in priuate. At last by an vniuersall consent, the capitulations made made with the Duke of Millan were ratified by all the Cantons, and all the demands of the French king denied, with this addition, that they would not suffer any leaues of footmen of that nation to serue him either in Italy or out of Italy: a matter which made the king desperate of all fauor, hope, or amity with that people, and therefore being excluded quite out where he thought to find some entrance, he saw by considerations of his affaires, that it was necessary for him to be reconciled either to Caesar or the Venetians, who for their parts solicited at the same time with Caesar, for that the suspicion of their reconciliation ceassing in the minds of the confederates, the Bishop of Gurci consented that they should retaine still Vincenza: but the same reasons encouraging the Senate which gaue feare to the enemies, they stood vpon this, to make no more peace if Venice were not rendred to them, giuing Caesar a recompence of a great quantitie of money. This demand seemed to containe difficultie, which made the Venetians to incline so much the more to the French amitie, and in that disposition contracted with the Secretarie of Triuulce to be confederate with the king, according to the capitulations made betweene them afore, by the which Cremona and Guia Radada should remaine to them. But the Secretarie set downe expresse mention in the capitulation, that that agreement should stand as voyd and of none effect, if within a certaine time it were not approued by the king: in whose Councell the disputations were great, which was most to be desired, either a reconciliation with Caesar, or a confederation with the Venetians: Robert Este a Secretarie of great authoritie, Triuulce, and almost all the chiefe of the Councell proued the necessitie of confederation with the Venetians: They alleaged that which the present experience made them to know of the inconstancie of Caesar, bringing no small damage to the kings affaires: They ript vp the hatred he bare to the king, together with his disposition to reuenge: They related what they had heard of personages worthie of opinion and credit, who reported how often they had heard him say in that time, that he kept precisely in minde the remembrance of seuateene iniuries receiued by the French, and that whensoever the oportunitie serued him to be reuenged of all, he would not loose the occasion, nor forget the desire: They alleaged, that these solicitations were practised by him for none other effect, then by the meane of reconciliation full of fraude and ill meaning, to haue a greater way to do harme, or at least to breake off that which he knew was practised with the Venetians, or else in his spite, to detract the preparations of the warre: Lastly, they gaue this as a warning and lesson, that that man was neither to be excused, nor esteemed worthie of compassion, who being once beguiled by another, returneth eftsouones to repose confidence in him: An enemy reconciled, charitie leades vs to loue him, but wisdom willeth vs not to trust him; and to a friend once disproued, there can be no greater daunger, then eftsouones to reenter into confidence with him. The Cardinall of S. Senerin was of another opinion, who (as his aduersaries said, crossing Triuulce more through enuie then for other occasion, for that with his brethren he had alwaies defended the Gebelin faction in Millan), replied in the contrarie, that nothing could be more profitable to the king and his seruices, then in ioyning with Caesar, to breake the vnion of the enemies, specially the confederation being made by such meanes as they might hope it would last: That it was the propertie of Princes in their counsels and deliberations to preferre alwayes profite afore good will, afore hatred, and afore other affections: And what greater benefite could be done to Caesar, then to ayde him presently against the Venetians, with hope that his Nephew should come to succeed in the Duchie of Millan: That Caesar being separate from the others, the king Catholike would not obiekt against his authoritie, as well for the interests of his Nephew, as for other good regards. Moreouer, that as nothing could more amaze the Pope then this confederation: so, of the contrarie to confederate with the Venetians, was full of indignitie, since there must be accorded to them Cremona and Guia Radada, members so conuenient to the Duchie of Millan, that to recouer them, the king had stirred vp all the world: and yet if the vnion of the others were not broken and deuided, the confederation with the Venetians would not suffice to obtaine the victorie. At last this opinion carried the King, the rather for the authoritie of the Queen, who desired greatly the aduancement of her Daughter: onely her desire was accompanied with this condition, so farre forth as it might be obtained, that till the consummation of the mariage the young Damsell might remaine with her; and she to bind her faith and promise to keepe her in the name of Caesar, as the spouse assigned for his Nephew, to whom she would redeliuer her as soone as her age and yeares made her able to the full office of mariage. But the King being afterwardes certified that Caesar would not agree vnder this forme of limitation, but rather that he foisted in those offers for the time & by sutteltie, to detract his diligence, and giue him cause to proceede more slowly in his other plots, he brake off from this practise, and sent backe againe for Monsieur de Asperos brother to Monsieur de Lanus, already gone from the Court with his commission to finde the Bishop of Gurcs. On the other side, the feare of the vnion betweene the king and the Venetians increasing dayly, the king of Aragon aduised Cesar to render Verona, and to transerre the warre into Burgundie, by the helpe of the money which he should receiue of the Venetians, and with the Spanish armie. Of this aduise was the Bishop of Gurcs, who hoping to be able to moue Cesar by his presence now returned into Germanie, being followed not onely of Dom Peter de Vree which was come with him, but also of John Baptista Spinella Count of Carriato, Embassadour to the sayd king of Aragon, resident with the Venetians. And because no new difficulties should breake off the matters that were now in action, he induced first the Senate to make truce with Cesar for the whole moneth of March. And those Embassadours gaue them their faith that Cesar should render Verona, if they would promise him within certaine times two hundred and fiftie thousand duckats, and for yearly pension fiftie thousand.

The purposes of Pope Iulio
and the second his death.

In these alterations of affaires, and in these times so deuided and conspiring, the Pope fell sicke, and haply he was then more full of high conceits & traueilling thoughts then at any time before: for notwithstanding he had brought his fortune to be equall to his desires, and obtained the thing he aspired vnto, yet his deuises and plots did nothing diminish, but grew increasing by the same meane which should haue satisfied them: he had determined in the beginning of the spring and first opening of the yeare, to send to the enterprise of Ferrara which he so much desired, and his opiniõ was that that state was able to make no resistance, both for that it was naked of all succors, and because the Spanish armie was to ioyne with his companies. He had secretly bought of Cesar for the price of thirty thousand duckats, the Citie of Sienna for the behoofe of the Duke of Urbino, to whom (except Pesera) he would neuer giue any thing of the estate Ecclesiastike, to the end to referue to himself the whole glory to haue simply & only studied for the exaltatiõ of the Church: he agreed to lend to Cesar fortie thousand duckats receiuing Modona in gage: he threatned them of Lucqua, who in the heate of the affaires of the Duke of Ferrara, were become Lords of Garsagnana, making instance that they would deliuer it to him: he was out of conceit with the Cardinall of Medicis, for that he thought him to cleaue more to the king Catholike then to him: and because he knew he was not able to dispose of the Citie of Florence as he thought, he studied already new plots and new practises to alter that estate: he was ill contented with the Cardinall of Sion, from whom he tooke the name of Legat, and enioyned him to come to Rome, for that in the Duchie of Milane he had appropriate to himselfe a yearly rent of more then thirtie thousand duckats of the estates & goods of diuerse persons. The better to assure the Duke of Urbino of Sienna by intelligences of his neighbours, he had of new taken into his pay Charles Bailon, to chafe out of Perousa John Paule, who by affinitie was very neare ioynd to the sonnes of Pandolfe Petrucci, successours to the greatnesse of their father. He would of new create Duke of Genes, Ottavian Fregosa, deposing Ianus frõ that dignitie: an action whereunto did consent the others of the house of Fregosa, because for the degree that his auncestours held in that state, it seemed best to appertaine to him. He studied continually either how he might worke out of Italie the Spanish armie, or cut it in peeces by the ayde of the Swissers, whom aboue all others he exalted & embraced. In this deuise he had this intention, that the kingdome of Naples being occupied by him, Italie should remaine free frõ straungers, a speech that often passed out of his mouth, & to that end he had hindred that the Swissers did not confederate with the king Catholike. And yet, as though it had bin in his power to batter all the world at one time, he continued his accustomed rigour against the French king, and notwithstanding he had heard a message from the Queene, yet he stirred vp to make war, the king of England, to whom he had transferred by publike decree of the Councell of Latra, the name of Christianissimo, whereof there was already a Bull written, and in it likewise was contained the priuation of the dignitie and name of the king of Fraunce, giuing his kingdome to who could occupie it. In these conceptions no lesse straunge for their varietie, then great for the importance they drew, and perhaps in other thoughts, more secret & singular, (for in a minde so fierce & terrible, all sortes of imaginations how great and vaine so euer they be, are not incredible) after the continuation of his sicknesse for many dayes, he declined towards death: and feeling the end of his his mortallitie to hasten on, and the same to prevent the execution of his high thoughtes, he caused to call together the consistorie, which albeit he could not assist in person by reason of his disease, yet by the authoritie of it, he caused to be confirmed the Bull which he had published before against such as by symonie would climbe to the Popedom: He declared that the election of his successor appertained to the Colledge of Cardinals, and not to the Councell: And that the Cardinals schismatikes could haue no presence or community there, to whom he protested there to pardon the iniuries they had done him, & prayed to God to forgieue them the wrongs they had done to his Church. After this he besought the Colledge of Cardinals, that in his fauour and for his sake, they would graunt to the Duke of Urbino his Nephew, the Citie of Pefera in patronage or Vicarage, alleaging the consideration, that by meane of the Duke it had bene recouered to the Church after the death of Iohn Sforce. In no other matter he expressed no priuate or particular affection: in so much as Madame Felice his daughter (ioyning with her the petitions of many others) beseeching him with great importunitie, to create Cardinall Guido de Monsfalcon being her brother by the mothers side, he answered roundly that he was not worthy of that degree; he made not his affections conformable to their desires: In that last actiō of life he shewed no partialitie in worldly causes: his present debilitie could diminish nothing of his auncient resolution, but expressed in all things the same constancie and seueritie, together with that iudgement and force of mind which he had before his sicknesse: in which firme estate and disposition of spirit, he receiued deuoutly the offices of the Church, and the xxi. day of Februarie he ended his course of these mortall and present paines: he was a Prince of incredible constancie and courage, but so full of furie and vnruled conceptions, that the reuerence that was borne to the Church, the discord of Princes, and the condition of times, did more to stay him from his ruine, then either his moderation or his discretion: worthy no doubt of great glory, if either he had bene a Prince secular, or if that care and intention which he had to raise the Church into temporall greatness by the meane of warre, had bin employed to exalt it by the mediation of peace, in matters spirituall: Neuerthelesse he was lamented aboue all his predecessours, & no lesse esteemed of those, who hauing either lost the true consideration of things, or at least ignorant how to distinguish & paize them rightly, iudged it an office more duely appertaining to Popes, to increase the iurisdiction of the sea Apostolike by armes and bloud of Christians, then by good example of life and due curing and correction of corrupt maners, to trauell for the sauiug of those soules, for whom they glory so much that Iesus Christ hath named them his Vicars in earth.

The Viceroy of Naples who was marched with his Spanish armie towards Plaisance, constrained that Citie to returne vnder the gouernement of the Dukes of Millan, on whom it depended by auncient tenure. They of Parma did the like, hauing the same feare of the Spanish souldiers, being followed in all places with more terrour then loue. On the other side the Duke of Ferrara, after he had in great speede recouered the townes of Romagnia, drew neare to Reggia: but finding no stirre nor tumult within the towne, he durst not abide there for feare of the Spanish armie, which lay disperfed betweene Plaisance and Reggia. Touching the estate of the Church, there appeared no other stirre nor mouing, and the Citie of Rome nor the Colledge of Cardinals, felt none of those difficulties which they had felt in the death of the two last Popes: so that the obsequies and funerals being ended according to the accustomed maner, foure and twentie Cardinals entred peaceably into the Cōclaue, hauing graūted afore that the Marquis of Māruaes son whom Pope Iulio kept with him for ostage, should be made free and acquitted of his faith and promise, with libertie to returne to his father. The first matter that was debated in the Conclaue, was with strait articles to moderate the authoritie of the Pope to come, which they sayd the last Pope had vsed too immoderately: and yet, as amongst men some haue not the heart to oppose against a Prince and great Lord, and some desire to enter into his grace and liking: so within small time after, they dissolued and cancelled of themselues the articles which they had made with so great aduise, and to so good purpose. The seuenth day they chose Pope without any discord of consent, the Cardinall of Medicis, who tooke vpon him the name of Leo the tenth: he bare but xxxvij. yeares of age, which albeit was so much the more maruellous & wonderfull, by how much the election was contrary to custome, yet the young Cardinals were the principall causers of it by their industry, hauing long time afore secretly agreed amongst themselues to create the first Pope of their number. The most parts and nations of Christendome reioyced much at this election, euery one entertaining an assured expectatiō of his vertues, aswel by the present & greene memorie of the valour of his late father, as for an vniuersall reputation that went of his owne inclinaciōs & liberalities. To this estimation also was ioyned a generall opiniō of his continencie & life not attainted, together with a glad some hope that by the example of his father, he would be a furtherer of learning, & beare fauour to wits disposed to study & knowledge. To these hopes was much helping the maner of the electiō, being made in his person sincerely, & without symonie or suspitiō of other corruption. And it seemed that God began to approue and confirme his seate, for that the fourth day after his electiō, came into his power the Cardinals of S. Crosse & Senerin, who as soone as they heard of the death of the Pope Iulio, went by sea to Rome accompanied with the Embassadour of the Frēch king. In their passage they strooke into the hauen of Lynorno, where vnderstanding that the Cardinall of Medici was chosen Pope, they tooke lād, the one hauing cōfidence in the naturall inclination & clemencie of the Pope, & the other reposing much in the ancient friendship & strait familiarity had with him & with his brother. There they obtained safecōduct of the Capitaine of Lynorna, which albeit stretched no further thē the bounds of his iurisdicōiō, yet without seeking other surety, they went vp in that cōfidence to Pisa: in which citie they were honorably receiued, & afterwards in no lesse assurāce cōueyed to Florence, where they were kept with that easie & fauorable gard, that they had no dispositiō to depart: the same being the desire of the Pope, who sent to them the Bishop of Ornietto, to exhort them with wordes gracious and full of affection, that as well for their proper suretie, as for the present tranquillitie of the Church, they would abide at Florence vntill the Court had determined in what maner they should come to Rome. He willed them also, that whereas they had bene iudicially depriued, and their depriuation cōfirmed in the Councell of Lattrā, they should forbear to go in habites of Cardinals, to the end that expressing signes of humiliation, he might take the better occasion to reduce and redresse their affaires according to their desire and his determination. The first act of this new Pope was his Coronation, which was represented according to the vsage of his predecessours in the Church of S. Iohn de Latran. The pompe was so great both of his fastulie and his Court, and also of the Prelates and multitudes that were there, together with the popular and vniuersall assemblies of peoples, that by the opinion and iudgement of men, the pride and maiestie of that action did farre surpasse all the celebrations that had bene done in Rome since the tyrannies of the Gothes and sauage nations. In this solemnitie the Gonfalone of the Church was caried by Alonso d'Este, who hauing obtained a suspension of his Censures and paines, was come to Rome, with great hope that by clemencie and facilitie of the Pope, he should be able to compound for his affaires. The Gonfalone of the religion of Rhodes was borne by Iulio de Medici mounted vpon a stately Courser armed at all points: by his nature he bare an inclination to the profession of armes, but by destinie he was drawen to the life Ecclesiastike, in which estate he may serue as a wonderful example of the variation of fortune. One matter that made the memorie of that day wonderfull, was the consideration, that the person that then in so high and rare pompe was honored with the most supreme and soueraigne dignitie of the world, was the yeare before, and on the very same day, miserably made prisoner: the great magnificence that appeared vpon his person, and his expences, confirmed in the generalitie & multitude of men, the expectation that was had of him, euery one promising that Rome should be happy vnder a Pope so plentifully indued with the vertue of liberalitie, wherof that day he had giuen an honorable experience, his expences being aboue an hundred thousand ducats. But wise men desired in him a greater grauitie and moderation: they iudged, that neither such a maiestie of pompe was cōuenient for Popes, neither did the cōditiō of the present time require, that he should so vnprofitably disperse the treasures that had bin gathered by his predecessour to other vses.

Coronation of the Pope.

Disposition of Princes to the warre.

But such was the disposition of Princes to warre, that neither the chaunging of the Pope, nor the presence nor feare of other accidents, were sufficient to establish and assure the tranquillitie of Italie: euery one discerned, that things of their proper inclination tended more to warre then to peace: for Cesar would heare no more speaking of the rendring of Verona, fearing thereby to be depriued of all oportunitie and meane to haue any easie entry into Italie. And albeit the truce was prolonged for the full moneth of Aprill, yet he kept no reckening of the conditions of accord that had bene debated at Millan: and in that minde being discontented with the instance and importunities of the king Catholikes Embassadours, he stucke not to tell the Count of Carriato, that for the inclination he expressed to the Venetians, he deserued better to beare the name of an Embassador of Venice then of Spaine. But that which much more augmented this disposition, was the truce that was made for a whole yeare betweene the French king and the king Catholike, tending onely to the affaires on the other side the mounts: the oportunitie of which truce gaue to the French king (being now deliuered of the suspitions of Spaine) a great facility to renew the warre in the Duchie of Millan.

The king Catholike had neuer any disposition to haue warre with the Frenchmen beyond the Mounts, for that being not mightie enough in money and treasure, and therefore depending on the forces and aydes of the Barons & peoples of Spaine, either he had no readinesse of succors, or else by his necessities in times of warre, they would hold him with them as it were in subiection: but then principally he stood confirmed in his ancient counsell, for that together with his owne tranquillity and rest, he was so much the more assured of the realme of Nauarre newly conquered by him: & withall for that since the death of Queene Isabel, his absolute authority ouer Castille being embased into a gouernement limited, he had not in troubled seasons so great and firme authority: of this he had seene a late experience in the action of the kingdom of Nauarre, wherein albeit he had an end happie and honourable, yet it hapned not by other meane then by the negligence and slownesse of succours. And hauing no more desire to returne to the daungers which he had suffered, and not knowing yet of the Popes death, he agreed to the truce, which neuerthelesse was not published before he had receiued newes of the election of the new Pope. The better to iustifie himselfe of this vnlooked for deliberation, he alleaged that the Pope and the Venetians had behaued themselues towards him cleane contrarie to the league: for that since the battell of Rauesenna they neuer offered to pay to him the forty thousand duckets as they were bound whilest the French king possessed any thing in Italy: That only he had had care of the common benefite of the confederates, and yet had not attributed to himselfe the rewards of the common victorie: That he did not possesse in Italy so much as a small tower more then that he had before the warre: But the Pope had had regard to his benefit particular, and made proper to himselfe the things that were common: That he occupied Parma, Plaisance and Reggia, and nourished a continuall studie to possesse Ferrara: which couetousnesse of his had bene the onely impediment of the recouering of the Castles in the Duchy of Millan and the Lanterne of Genes: That touching his part, he had interposed all his diligence and authority to worke the accord betweene Cesar and the Venetians, but the Pope for his proper interests, laboured to exclude them out of the league: wherein he said his Embassadors had behaued themselues vndiscreetly, who not consenting (for that they knew such was his intencion) that he was named in the head of the confederation, had suffered him to be expressed in that article wherein euery one named the confederates, of which the Venetians were not. Moreouer, that in those negotiations and practises the Venetians had not answered the opinion that men had of their wisdom and discretion, holding such an estimation and account of Vincenza, that the feare to lose it, hath kept them from deliuering themselues from the trauels of the warre: That it was impossible to him to nourish the armie he had in Italy without the payes and contributions that were promised, and much lesse reasonable to sustaine the whole warre vpon the confines of his realmes, a matter which he knew all the residue did desire and procure: That the Pope could no more dissemble his desire and intencion to take from him the kingdom of Naples: And yet notwithstanding, neither these present iniuries, nor the consideration of other wrongs could euer moue him to haue a thought to abandon the Church and the other estates of Italy, so farre forth as he might find in them reasonable correspondencie to contract and capitulate with him for their common defence: a matter which he hoped they would be moued vnto, the rather by the oportunitie and meane of this truce. He caused to expresse in the instrument of the truce the names of Cesar and the king of England, notwithstanding he had nothing communicated with them: and therefore it was a thing verie scorneful & ridiculous, that at the same time that the truce was solemnly published through all parts and regions of Spaine, a Herald arriued euen in the action from the king of England, to signifie to him the strong preparations & furnitures of war which he leauied to inuade Fraunce, soliciting that he would likewise enter into the warre against the king on the coasts of Spaine, according to the articles and promises reciprocally passed betweene them.

The truce made in this maner, amazed much in Italy the minds of such as had any discontentment with the rule or iurisdiction of the Frenchmen, euery one holding it almost for certaine, that the French king would not be long ere he sent an armie on this side the Mounts: & also that by the obstinacy of Cesar touching the cōditions of the peace, the Venetians wold ioyne with him, against whom it seemed a very hard matter to be able to resist, for that the Spanish army had now no more meane to be entertained, notwithstanding they had at times drawne some summes of money out of the estate of Millan, which stood greatly impouerished with continuall expences. Touching the new Pope, men could not discerne what was his intention: he seemed to wish secretly that the power of the French king should haue his ends and limits within the Alpes; & yet being newly ascended to the Popedom, and no lesse confused then the others, for the truce that was made by the king Catholike, in a time when men had greatest expectation that he would apply his thoughts to the warre, he was in great doubt and variation of mind: besides, he was angrie, for that demanding with great instance the restitution of Parma & Plaisance to the Church, he found a readinesse of hope and promise, but verie slow disposition to execute and performe, all the others desiring to preferue them to the Duchie of Millan, and haply hoping that his desire to recouer them, would induce him to the defence of that state. The Swissers seemed to be a more certaine and a more mightie defence and succour, but because the summes of mony, which according to the covenants were necessarie to wage and leaue them, could not be aduanced neither by Maximilian Sforce nor the residue, there was great feare, that in greatest necessitie that nation would refuse to descend to the rescue of Millan.

On the other side, the French king after he had finished the truce, determined to send an armie into Italy, the reasons afore recited giuing him great hope of the victorie. To those reasons also he added the propertie of his owne iudgement vpon the people of Millan, who, vexed with so many taxes and imposts of the Swissers, and no lesse troubled with the harbouring and payes made to the Spaniards, he knew had an vniuersall desire to returne eftssoons vnder his obedience: he gathered by generall argument, that hauing now compared the heauie yoke of others with the easie imperie of the French, the seuerity of the one would make the other lesse contemptible: and particularly he vnderstood by many Gentlemen, some relating to himself, and some entertaining intelligence with Trisulce, whom the king had sent to Lyon, the better to debate with them of Millan, that he was not to deferre to send an armie, hauing their promise to take armes and be his as soone as his armie were passed the Mounts. To these furtherances the king wanted no sort of continuall perswasions, as well of Trisulce, as of others that were banished, who according to such as be depriued of the libertie of their naturall countrie, omitted no reasons which might make the enterprise seeme easie, speciallie the Venetians being brought to ioyne with him in the action. But the matter that enforced the king to make haste, was the confidence he had to preuent with the end of that expedition, the beginning of a warre which the king of England meant to make vpon him, which yet he could not begin till after certaine moneths; both for that that kingdome hauing liued many yeares in peace, was vpon the sodaine disurnished of armes & armour, of artilleries, and almost of all other necessarie ablements of warre: and also in great want of horses of seruice, for that to the inhabitants of those regions, the seruice on foot is more familiar, then to make warre on horsebacke: & also the footmen lacking training and experience, the king of England was cōstrained for the better strength & abilitie of his armie, to leaue a great number of Almain footmē: matters which could not be dispatched without great tract of time. The French king in like sort made more haste to haue his army to march, for that he feared the castles & peeces that held for him wold be lost for want of victuals, but specially the Lanterne of Genes, which not many daies before had missed to be relieued with victuals by a ship sent for that effect: which from Arbinga being thither accompanied with three ships & one gallion, being entred the maine sea with a good wind, had by a strainable gale passed through the midst of the Genoways flecte, & cōming neare the castle of the Lanterne, she cast anker, & throwing yet with good successe her cables to those of the castle: she begā to vnlade her victuals & munitions which she had brought: but euen in the action, and before the desolate soules of the Castles could take the fruit of the benefite which their fortune seemed to offer, Andrew Doria, he who afterwards was so notable in marine seruice, thrust in with a great ship, wherof he was owner, betweene the castle of the Lanterne and the French ship, and cutting asunder the cable that was cast to the of the Castle, & the cables that held the ankers, he set vpon the ship with no lesse felicitie then perill, and albejt in the fight he was wounded in the face, yet by his valour he wan and caried away the ship. The king therefore therefore being determined not to deferre the beginning of the warre, in which respect, and to be readie in all occasions, he had already sent many launces into Burgundy and Dauphine, he thought good now to hearken with diligence after the matter debated vpon so many moneths with the Venetians. They had bene somewhat deferred & protracted aswell by the one as by the other party, both for that sometimes the hope to haue peace with Cesar, & sometimes the great instance made by the Venetians for Cremona and Guiaadadda, had holden the king in suspence: and also in the Senate the opinions of Counsellors were diuerse, for that many of great authority in that common weale, preferred the accord with Cesar: wherein they shewed that it would be more profitable to discharge themselves for the present of so huge expences, with freedome from daungers, thereby to be the more ready to imbrace the occasions that wold offer, then their common weale being so ouer-wearied and trauelled, & the wealth of priuate men abated, to entangle themselves with new warres in company of the French king, whose amitie how faithfull and assured it was, they were not without a late and greene experience. Neuerthelesse the greater part seeming that rarely an occasion would rise to make them recouer their ancient estate, & that the agreement with Cesar (he retaining Verona) had not deliuer them from troubles and daungers, they reiected all thoughts and deuises for Cremona and Guiaadadda, and resolved to make confederation with the French king, in whose Court it was concluded by Andrew Gritti representing already more the person and place of an Embassador then of a prisoner. By this confederation, after it was graunted that Bart. Aluiano and Andrew Gritti should be set at liberty, the Venetians were bound to aid the king with eight hundred men at armes, a thousand five hundred light horsmen, and ten thousand footmen, and that against all such as would rise vp to let him for recouering of Ast, of Genes, and the Duchy of Millan. The king for his part was bound to ioyne with them vntill they had recouered all that they possessed in Lombardy and the Marquisdome of Treuisana, afore the league of Cambray. Vpon the resolution of this contract, John lacques Trimulce and Bart. Aluiano went to Suso: the one to go from thence to Venice by the more sure way, and the other to assemble there the armie appointed for the warre. It contained vpon the full muster fiftene hundred launces, eight hundred light horsmen, & fiftene thousand footmen, wherof eight thousand were Launceknights, & the residue of the French nation. This armie was committed to the authoritie and guiding of M. Trimouille, whom the king appointed his Lieutenant, to the end the action might proceed with more reputation.

In this time the French king made great request to the Pope not to hinder him in recouering his Duchie of Millan: and the better to containe the Pope, he offered that he would not onely not passe further after the victorie, but also would alwayes referre himselfe to him to make peace vnder what conditions it should please him best. To which motions albeit the Pope gaue gracious & willing care, and that to draw better faith to his words, he vsed to sollicite with the king by the meane and labour of Iulian his brother, yet many things made him suspected with the king: first the memorie of things done afore the time of his Papacie: then since he was Pope, how he had sent to him Cinthio his familiar and fauorite with letters & very friendly commissions, but so generall as they well declared the litle inclination of mind he bare to him or his affaires: also for that he had consented that Prosper. Colonne should be elected Captaine generall ouer the Duchy of Millan: a matter which his predecessor had alwayes hindered for the hatred he bare to the family of Colonne: he entred also into greater doubt by a signification which the Pope addressed to the king of England to continue still in the confederation made with Cesar, with the king Catholike & him: lastly, he wrote to the communalities of the Swissers, exhorting them almost to the defence of Italie, wherein he could not dissemble that he wold continue with them the confederation made by his predecessour, by the which they were bound to the defence of the estate Ecclesiasticke, receiuing of him a yearly pension of twentie thousand duckets: it was also a signe of his will and intention, that he had not receiued into grace the Duke of Ferrara, but by manie excuses deferred to render to him Reggia vntill his brother the Cardinall came to Rome, who to auoyde the persecutions of Pope Iulio, was withdrawne into the countrey of Hungaria, and liued vpon his Bishopricke of Agria. But the matter that aboue all other things made the king enter into suspicion against the Pope, was, that he had in great secrecie counselled the state of Venice to come to accord with Cesar: a matter cleane contrarie to the intention of the king: who also had interpreted in ill part, that the Pope declaring that he moued not for other respect then to satisfie his soueraigne dutie, had written vnto him in a kind exhorting, not to take armes, but rather to expresse a disposition to finish the warre with some honourable composition: a matter which the king would not haue blamed, if for the same desire to peace he had also declared to the king of England, that he ought not to make warre vpon the French king. Sure this suspicion of the king was not without cause, for that the Pope desired that the French might be cut off from all seate and habitation in Italy, either for that he thought it more profitable for the common suretie, or for the greatnesse and aduancement of the Church: or at least that he kept still fixed in his mind the remembrance of harmes receiued by the Crowne of Fraunce, whereunto albeit his father and other his predecessours had borne no litle affection, and in sundrie accidents had reaped many honours and profites; yet it was an iniurie fresh in memorie, that his brethren and he had bene expelled Florence by the comming of king Charles: and that the king reigning bearing fauour to the popular gouernement, had either alwayes rejected them, or if at any time he shewed inclination to them, it was to vse them as instruments to draw the Florentines by that suspicion to couenants of more aduantage for himselfe, without bearing respect or care to them. To this perhaps was much helping, a disdain that he was led prisoner to Millan after the battell of Rauenna; and by the kings commaundement should haue bene caried in that calamitie into Fraunce. But whatsoeuer was the disposition of the Pope, or howsoeuer his coniecture was caried for these or other causes, he proceeded aduisedly, and dissembled as much as he could his intention, for that both he saw he had not so strong foundations to resist, as he wished, and also he gaue eare dayly with great affection to the demands and complaints made against the king: for the Swissers bearing an vniuersall inclination to stirre and rise for the defence of the Duchy of Millan, offered to enter into the action with a farre greater number then before, so farre forth as they were furnished in prest with a certaine summe of money, which for the pouertie and weakenesse of others, could not be hoped for otherwise then of the Pope. Touching the Viceroy, his counsels were vncertaine, and his speeches seuerall and suttie, for that sometimes he offered the Pope to oppose against the Frenchmen, not sparing to enter openly into the cause, by sending his bands of souldiers to ioyne with him, and waging for three moneths a great number of footmen, and the rather to accompanie his doings with faith and credite, he caused to be retired his souldiers from the townes of Parma and Reggia, and lay incamped with his armie vpon the riuer of Trebia, leauing notwithstanding certaine bands of his souldiers for the gard of Tortona and Alexandria, such as had not stirred from thence: sometimes also he did assure that he had receiued commaundement from his king, and that at the same time that he wrote to him of the truce, to leade backe the armie to the kingdome of Naples. But Ierome Vich Embassador resident with the Pope, vsed other speeches, and yet he agreed with him in this, that his king promised, so farre forth as the Pope would take vpon him the defence of Millan, to begin the warre in Fraunce, without bearing respect to the truce that had bene made: a libertie which he said he might lawfully take without making violation of his faith promised. Therefore it was beleued of many, that the king Catholike, fearing that by the truce that had bene made not one would appeare to oppose against the French king, had commaunded the Viceroy, that if he saw none would proceed roundly to the defence of the Duchy of Millan; that he should not seeke to prouoke the French king by new iniuries, but should retire his armie to Naples: for which cause also he shewed to the king a contentment to hearken to the peace, offering withall to bring in Cesar and the king of England. And to make him the more tractable if he should recouer the Duchie of Millan, he made almost an assured promise; that his armie should beno impediment to him: so that the Viceroy who was determined to go his way, reuoked the souldiers that were vnder the Marquis of Pesquero in Alexandria and Tortona, & at the same time, as was said, did communicate his resolution to Triunice, to the end his departing might be more acceptable to the French king: neuerthelesse he did not execute so speedily his deuise, for that the Swissers very desirous to defend the Duchie of Millan, had sent thither by common consent fve thousand footmen, and giuen hope to supplie the seruice with a greater number: but making demonstration of the contrarie, he sent Prosper Colonnato debate with the Swissers of the place where they should assemble against the French, either that he had receiued aduertisement that the truce was discontenting to Cesar, or else that he was enioyned by new commissions fro his king to follow the will of the Pope, who persecuted still in the same perplexities, suffering a conflict betweene his small hope and his proper inclination: and yet notwithstanding the Swissers being come vpon the territories of Tortona, where Prosper had signified to them that the Viceroy would come and ioyne with them, interposing many excuses, he labored then to come vpo the lands of Trebia to ioyne with him. By which manner of solicitation, they finding a diuersity betweene his will and his words, made this braue answer, that the Viceroy made no such demand to the end to go looke the enemies in the face, but to turne their backs with greater surety: they sayd they cared not whether he feared to fight with the Frenchmen or not, neither did it import them, whether he went away, or whether he tarried still, whether he followed, or whether he fled, for that their valour onely did suffice to defend the Duchy of Millan against all enemies.

But now was all the countrey in amuciny, and the Count Mussocke son to Iohn Iacques was got into Alexandria without any impediment, & after into Alexandria, all those bands of Frenchmen which were parted from Susa, marching with great diligence. The Duke of Millan who was come somewhat too late to enter Alexandria, ioyned himselfe to the Swissers neare Tortona, and they being made to vnderstand by the Viceroy that he was determined to go his way, retired to Nonaro. Of all voluble things there is nothing more light then report, & in times of mutation nothing lesse assured then the minds of people popular or commons, whom euery new occasion can carry and leade contrary to all reason and confidence (that feare and ficklenesse which they haue by nature being not able to be assured by any order or discretion:) for the inhabitants of Millan at the first brute of the departing of the Viceroy, sent Embassadors to their Duke at Nonaro to excuse them, if hauing no ability nor meane of defence, they compounded with the Frenchmen, to the end to auoide the extreame calamity. He was tractable according to the condition of his present fortune, and with a mind humbled with the consideration of his miseries that were towards, he accepted willingly their excuse, recommending to them with words of great affection and zeale to haue a charitable care ouer the safety of the common countrey. Vpon this occasion Sacromoro Viscount to whom was appointed the besieging of the Castle of Millan, turned to the French, and reuictualled the Castell which he was sent to batter and beate. The Viceroy brake vp from Trebia with all his armie, which was twelue hundred men at armes and eight thousand footemen, to returne to the kingdome of Naples, as though the affaires of Lombardy had bene desperate: a reason only wherein he sought to saue his armie: but receiuing the same day in the way betweene Plaisance and Florenzola letters from Rome, he caused immediatly the Ensignes to march backe againe, returning to the same lodging from whence he was departed: the cause was, that the Pope, to whom almost at the same time were rendred Plaisance and Parma, determining to proue if the Duchy of Millan might be defended by the force of the Swissers, gaue very secretly to Ierome Moron the Dukes Embassador remayning in his Court, forty two thousand ducats to send to the Swissers: but with this charge, that if the matter came to the knowledge of others, he should giue out, that twenty thousand of them were vpon the accompt of their pensions, and the other twentie two thousand to satisfie a pretended due to the three Cantons by his predecessor, but alwayes refused to be payed by him. This returning of the Viceroy with his army, together with a brute of the descending of new companies of the Swissers, made the Millanois eisthones. sorie for their sudden reuolting, and in that confusion betweene a new hope and their old feare, they gaue tokens to Maximilian Sforce their Duke, that they would be readie to returne to his obedience, whensoever they saw the Swissers and the Spanish armie ioyne together in the field. And the more to nourish them in these hopes, the Viceroy, with whom was Prosper Colonne, prepared to plant a bridge vpon Paw, promising from time to time to passe ouer, but neuer did put it in effect, for that hauing a speciall care to saue his armie, he determined to proceede according as things fell out: he held it very dangerous to haue the Frenchmen in his face, and the Venetian army at his backe, who hauing already taken the City of Cremona, and cast downe the bridge into the bottoome of Paw, were not farre from him. By this was Bartl. Aluiano gone from Susa to Venice: where after he had in open Councell without any contradiction, cast vpon the Count Petillano the fault of the ouerthrow of Guiana: he spake very proudly of the present warre, and by the Senate was chosen Capitaine general of their army, with the same conditions vnder the which the Count Petillano had bene preferred to the same degree. This estate and election happened to him much about the same time.

that foure yeares before he fell into the power of the enemies: so often doth fortune laugh at the ignorance of mortall men, deuising in their vaine fancies what shall happen vnto them. As soone as he was chosen Generall, he went to the army that was mustering at S. Bonifacio vpon the demaines of Verona, Theodore Trinulce was with him as Lieutenant to the French king, with whom he drew neare in great diligence to the gates of Verona the selfe same day that the French armie parted from Susa: the reason of this expedition was, that in that City certaine factions had conspired to receiue him in: but the day after, a strength of fife hundred Launceknights entred the towne by the riuer of Adice, by which impediment together with the detection of the conspiracy, Aluiano loosing all hope to preuaile, determined, contrary to the authority of the Venetian assistant, to draw towards the riuer of Paw, either to stoppe the Spaniards, or else according to the state and behauour of things, to ioyne with the French armie: a resolution which he did not imparte to the Senate, vntill he was gone from Verona one daye, for that notwithstanding he alleaged, that the whole depended vpon that which should succede in the Duchy of Millan, and that there the affaires of the Frenchmen being in ill condition, whatsoeuer should be attempted or obtained in any other place would be but vaine and not durable, and therefore it was necessary by all possible meanes, to helpe to make the French king victorious: yet he feared (and not without cause) that the Senate would be against it; not so much for the desire he had that there should be first a care to recouer Verona and Bressia, as for that certaine other of the Captaines allowed not that they should passe the riuer of Mincia, vntill they had first a more particular knowledge of the proceedings of the French: wherein they shewed, in case of any inconuenience, how hard it would be to retire in safety, hauing to passe by the confines of Verona and Mantua, countries either subiected, or at the deuotion of Cesar. Valeggia and the towne of Pesquero, fearing the threatens of Aluiano, yeelded themselves to him, by whose example also the Castel-keeper gaue vp the Rocke; his feare being greater then that any hope could assure him: onely he receiued by composition a small summe of money aswell for himselfe, as also to be shared amongst certaine Launceknights that were within it. About the same time certaine of the chieftaines of the Mountaine, entred into Bressia in fauour of the Venetians with a great strength of peasantes: and yet Aluiano, neither for the requests of the Bressian Embassadors which came to him to Gambaro, nor at the desire of the Venetian Assistant, could not be brought to consent to go thither and remaine there onely one day, to recouer the Castle that was kept in the name of the Viceroy, so great was his desire to follow without intermission his first deliberation. With which celerity being come to the gates of Cremona, he found that at the same time Galeas Paluiofin (called by certaine of Cremona) was entred in fauour of the French king: but hauing in him no lesse ambition then valour, and not liking that any other should participate with him in the glory of that action, he brake and put to pray his bands of souldiers, and entring the towne, he stripped Cesar Fieramosqua that was left there in garrison with three hundred horse and fife hundred footemen of the Duke of Millans. He had not to lose time to recouer the Castle, for that it had bene alwayes holden by the French king, and newly reuictualled a litle before by Ranfe de Cere: who as he returned to Crema where he was appointed gouernour, he brake a troupe of two hundred horsemen of Alexander Sforce, which he encountred at Serzana. From thence Aluiano encamping at the channell vpon Paw with the bridge made to passe ouer, he could not let his souldiers to do insolencies sometimes vpon the lands of the Pope, his discipline not being able to conaine the men, who had as great custome in spoyling as in well seruing. Afterwards he marched to Pesqueton, hauing already for the mutation of Cremona, Soncino, Lody, and other places there aboutes, aduanced the French Ensignes. But afore, as soone as he had recouered Cremona, he had sent to Bressia, Ranfe de Cere with one parte of the men of warre, both to assure that Citie, and to recouer the Castell, but much more to hinder the good successe of the Almains: for that almost as soone as he was broken vp from before Cremona, Rocand Captaine of the Launceknights, and Feder Gonsago de Boffolo issuing out of Verona with fixe hundred horse and two thousand footemen, were gone to S. Bonifacio, where Aluiano had left vnder Sigismond Canallo and John Fortin, three hundred light horsemen and fixe hundred footemen: and they being scattered in the countrey without all discipline and order, hearing of the comming of the enemies, were fled to Colorno, where the Launceknights following them in chase, entred the towne by force, and committing all the souldiers to the calamity of prisoners, they sackt and burnt the towne. Afterwards their furie redoubling with their fortune, they executed the like cruelty vpon Soano, and brake downe the bridge which the Venetians had made ouer Adice: yea they had with the same rigour occupied Vincenza, if a great strength of peasants had not suddenly entred: which maner of actions in that kind of cruelty were so much the more feared, by how much the brute ranne, that there came to Verona new supplies of footemen out of Tirol.

About this time the French Nauie contayning nine light gallies and certaine other vessels, Genes at the drew neare to Genes by sea: and Antbo. and Ierome brethren of the house of Adorna, appro- denotion of the ched by land with the fauour of those of the riuers that held their faction, with other bands of French souldiers that had bene leauyed with the kings money. This action was aduanced with the benefit of a great occasion, by reason of a discord hapned a litle before betweene the Fiesquols and the Duke of Genes, with whom they were at first confederate against the family of the Adornes. This was the manner of the accident: either for some quarrell that hapned by chaunce, or for some suspicion that could not be tempered, Ierome the son of Iohn Louis Fiesqua, comming out of the common pallace, was slaine by Lodowike and Fregosin, the Dukes brothers: for which iniurie, the violence being greater then their ability to reuenge, Othobon and Simbald his brethren, retiring to their Castels, and a litle after contracting with the French king, and conspiring with the Adornes, approached neare to Genes by another way with foure thousand footemen. The Duke was not mighty enough of himselfe to make resistance against both the families of Fiesqua and Adorna ioyned together, and by the celerity and diligence of his aduersaries, the succours which he had demanded of the Viceroy, could not ariue in time. And as one aduersity draweth on another, and no euill comes vnaccompanied, so the thing that in this condition of fortune, did wholly embase him, was, that a thousand of his footemen, who were possessed of the mountaines neare the towne, were ouerthrowne, their weakenesse being not able to resist the calamity that his destiny did hasten on. In which aduersity or persecution of fortune, the Duke together with Fregosin, hauing scarce leisure to saue his owne life, fled away by sea, leauing Lodowike his other brother to gard the Castell. In which oportunity the victors entred Genes, where the bretheren of the family of Fiesqua caried with furious desires of reuenge, mured and cruelly caused to be drawne at a horse taile, Zachary the Dukes brother, who had bene taken in the encounter vpon the mountaines, and was present with the others at the slaughter of their brother: and so Genes being reduced to the deuotion of the French king, Antonio Adorna was created gouernour in the name of the king, and as the French Nauie by sea, reuietualled the Lanterne, and afterwards sacked Specia, and then roade at Pertouenere: so there now remained no more but Nouaro and Coma, to make perfect the kings conquest; and recouering of all those estates which he had lost the yeare before: onely those two Cities through the whole Duchy of Millan, held out yet for Maximilian Sforce.

But the glory of this warre was referued to the great infamie of all others, not to the French Nouaro be- men, not to the Almaine footemen, not to the Spanish regiments, nor to the Venetian bands: but sieged by the it was an honour, a reputation, a renowne, and perpetuall praise prepared by destiny for the French Swissers only, against whom the French army, hauing first left sufficient garrison within Alexandria, the better to assure those peeces that were beyond Paw, drew neare to Nouaro, brauing in great arrogancy of so many happy successes, boasting of the enemies whom they had inclosed within the wals, & contemning the manifest feare of the Spaniards. Besides, there seemed to present to the memory of men, as it were an image and representation of things that had bene passed: That that was the same Nouaro wherein Lodowike Sforce father to the Duke raigning, was made prisoner: That in the French campe were the same leaders, Trimouille, and Trunlce: yea certaine of the same Ensignes and Captaines of those Cantons, which in another war had sold the father, did now accompany the son in this warre: This made Monsieur Trimouille write proudly to the King, that he would send him prisoner, the son from the same place where he had deliuered into captiuitie the father: The Frenchmen did violent executions vpon the wals of Nouaro with their artillery, but in a place of no lesse difficulty then danger to discend into the towne. And for the Swissers, they contemned them so much, and shewed to haue so little feare of their valours, that they would neuer suffer to be shut that gate of the towne that was towards the campe. After the artillery had beaten downe to the earth, a sufficient space of the wall, the army without prepared furiously to the assault, but finding so valiant resistance within, and vnderstanding they did presently expect Altosasso a Captaine of great renowne with a farre greater supply, they doubted of the successe of the enterprise, which made them the day following to retire from the wals of Nouaro two miles, hoping afterwards to cary the victory more by the disorders and wants of the enemies, then by fortune or the furie of their armes. They hoped to do more by temporising then by present action, & looked that other accidents would make easie the enterprise which was almost desperate to their valour. But these hopes were made vaine by the resolute mind of Motin one of the Swissers Captaines, who calling together all the bands of soldiers vpon the market place of Nouaro, encouraged them with words full of resolution, and assurance, that without rarying for the succours of Altosasso, who was to arriue the day following, they should issue out and set vpon their enemies in their campe: he told them how farre it was necessary to their honour, and reputation of their valour, to suffer the glory and victory which they might appropriate to themselves, to become common, or rather wholly transferred to another: seeing (saith he) that as things that follow draw with them such as go afore, and the increasing of any thing couereth the part that is augmented, so the merit and praise of this figure would not be cast vpon vs, but vpon the supplies that came after: By how much the enterprise may seeme hard and perillous, by so much the issue is to be considered more easie and sure, for that the more sudden and v unexpected are accidents, the more do they terrifie and amaze the men that suffer them. The Frenchmen will rather doubt all other things at this hower then to be charged by vs, and yet where they lye incamped, they cannot but suffer disorder, the place being neither intrenched nor fortified. The Frenchmen were neuer wont to haue the courage to go to battell if their armies were not full of our men; and though of late they haue aduentured to fight without vs, yet they were neuer so hardie once to lift vp their weapons against vs: so that it cannot but bring to them great astonishment when they see them charged vpon the sudden, aboue expectation, in a time of their feare, and by those bodies whose vertue and resolution were wont to encourage and assure them. Stand not amazed with the multitude of their horsemen, nor the fury of their artillery, since we haue had many experiences, what confidence they repose in those things against vs: it is but two yeares sithens Gaston de Foix so braue a Captaine; notwithstanding he was strong in multitudes of launces and cannons, gaue place to our armes and suffered vs to passe by him along the plaines euen to the gates of Millan, and yet we were not otherwise armed then with pikes. They haue now with them many bands and companies of Launceknights, a matter that doth so much the more encourage me to the enterprise, by how much fortune doth offer vs at one time an occasion both to shew to him who with so great couetousnesse and with so great ingratitude hath contemned our trauels and our bloud, that he neuer made a worse resolution, either for the honour of himselfe, or profit of his Realme: and also to declare to those that thinke that the employment and seruice of their persons, is sufficient to make vs perish of hunger, that the Launceknights are not equall to the Swissers; and albeit they beare with vs one language and forme of discipline, yet they haue neither the same valour nor the same resolution: the praise they beare for seruice is lesse by their proper merite, then for their naturall vertue, more by the name of their nation and auncelors, then by any experience of their owne bodies, nor so much in deede and substance, as in report and opinion, not equall to the shew they make, and farre inferior to the vniuersall coniecture, yea they are but shadowes whose bodies be farre off: all the perill is to winne their artillery, and yet in the action you haue these comfortes, that it is not planted in a place fortified, that our inuasion is sudden, and to the enterprise beareth a speciall fauour the darkenesse of the night: and whilest we are at the fight, there can damage vs but a very small space of time, which yet cannot but be cut off with the tumult, with their disorders, with their feares, and with the sudden confusion of things. Touching the residue, this brings facility to the action, that neither their horsemen dare venture vpon our pikes, nor their vile troups of French footmen and Gascons, will enter the skirmish with vs. This is the counsell, this is the plot, and this is the enterprise, wherein we shall make no lesse prooffe of our wisdomes and gouernement, then of our valour and resolution. Our nation beareth that reputation and fame, that the glory of our name cannot be preferred, but by attempting some matter beyond the expectation expectation and common vsage of all men: And since we are vpon the territories of Nouaro, the place it selfe speakes to vs, that in other sort we can not quench the auncient infamie we got here in the pay and seruice of Lodowike Sforce: It is a double honour to be reuenged of infamie: It is a vile infirmitie in a man of warre, to suffer the reparation of honour to be more slow then the infamie, and to refuse to recouer the reputation lost, is to be guiltie of the flaunder and to confirme it; a disposition most base in the minde of a souldier, who of all other sortes of men ought to be most icalous of his honor. Let vs go on then in the name of the great God, the persecuter of schismatikes, excommunicants, & all enemies to his name: Let vs march on to a victorie no lesse easie, then assured, if we haue not mindes to feare the thing we haue not proued: And by how much the danger seemeth great, by so much shall our name be made glorious, and the greater our enemies be in number, the more shall we be enriched by their spoyle: Things got with most difficultie are of most merite, and where is hope of honour, pray, and perpetuall prayse, what can be wanting to prouoke such as you are to the fight?

At these speeches of Motin all the bands of souldiers began to reioyce, euery one approuing his deuise by holding vp his hand: he commaunded them to go to rest, and to cherish somewhat their persons, the better to fall into array when the drum should strike. The nation of Swissers neuer made a more brave, nor more resolute counsell, being but a few in number, without horsmen, and without artilleries, against an armie most mightie in men, munitions, horses, & all other things meete for defence. Besides, they stood not desperate for any necessitie, for that both Nouaro was deliuered from daunger, and they expected the day after a great strength of souldiers: They made rather a choise of this way wherein the suretie was lesse, and the hope of glory greater, then any other, that for a greater safetie there might happen to them a lesse glory. The sixth day of Iune about midnight they issued out of Nouaro, bearing mindes lesse affected to safetie then to glory: their whole strength was about ten thousand men, who were so distributed and disposed, that seuen thousand were appointed to charge the artillery which was garded by the Launceknights, the residue were to be bestowed with their pikes an end vpright ouer against the men at armes. The Frenchmen, what for the shortnesse of the time, or that they doubted no such accident, or at least looked not for it so soone, had made no fortification of their campe: and albeit at the first tumult and alarme that their sentinell made of the comming of the enemies, the suddennesse of the aduecture, and the darknesse of the night, brought vpon them a great feare and confusion: yet both the men at armes drew forth with into strength, and presented themselves in battel-ray, and also the Launceknights who were followed with the other bands of footemen, fell presently into order. The artillerie shot off with great noyse against those squadrons of Swissers that came to assaile it, making lamentable slaughters, and deuiding their places and rankes, which was rather discerned by the cryings of men, then by the benefite of the eyes, the vse whereof was taken away by the darknesse of the night. Neuerthelesse, such was their desperate resolution, that neither respecting their death present, nor discouraged with the slaughter of their fellows lying at their feet, and for all these daungers not once breaking their order, they ranne as fast as they could vpon the artillerie: and being come to it, the Launceknights and they had together a bloody medly, the one fighting against the other with an vnappeasable furie, which in them both was so much the more redoubled, by how much in the one was infinite the humour of hate, and in the other no lesse resolute the desire of glory. There might haue bene scene (for now the sunne began to shew) the estate and diuersitie of the fight, sometimes one side to yeeld, sometimes the other: oftentimes that part to seeme to preuaile which earst was thought to haue the worst, on one side, and in one time the one bartell to sway, and the other to aduaunce, some to expect aduantage, some to lose no oportunitie, one part to inuade furiously, and another part to resist hardly, all things on all parts full of dead bodies, wounded men, and of blood: sometimes the Captaines would valiantly enter into the office of souldiers, both striking their enemies and defending themselves, and sometimes they would discretely manage the place of Captaines, encouraging, prouiding, succouring, relieuing, and commaunding: there was nothing lesse feared then death, nor any thing more obliuied the feare: the greatnesse of the perill made both sides more resolute then any other thing. On the other side the troupes of men at armes stood firme without doing any seruice, for neither the horrible, the perswasions, the commaundements, the exclamations, the threatnings, nor the example of Triunice and Trimouille, could do any thing to moue the horsmen, whose mindes were already made timorous : neither the consideration of their owne perill ; (which their cowardise made the greater) nor the calamities of their fellowes (which were redoubled by the feare they shewed) could once draw them to the charge : they seemed to stand and abide the daunger which by fighting they might haue auoided : it sufficed the Swissers to keepe them impaled in their ranks , and to let them from ministering succours to the footemen : such was the calamitie of that fight , that those found most certaintie of perill who ventured furthest for their safetie, and on such whose feare was greater then their valour, fortune threw most fauour and securitie. At last in so great a hardinesse and valour of such as fought, the vertue of the Swissers carried the battell, who hauing wonne the artilleries, turned them vpon their enemies , whom they put to flight aswell by that meane as by their incredible vertue. To the flying of the footemen was ioyned the breaking and running away of the men at armes , who in that seruice shewed no vertue, nor did any thing worthy of merite or prayse: onely the Lord Robert la March came with a vehement affection of a father, entred the battell of the Swissers with a squadron of horsemen, to rescue Florango and Iames his sonnes, Captaines of Almaine footmen, who lying sore wounded on the earth, his valour to the great wonder of the Swissers , drew them a huc out of that daunger. The battell continued about two houres, both parties receiuing no small discomforture. There was slaine of the Swissers about fiftene hūdred bodies, of which number was that Captaine Morin that was the first mouer of that glorious counsell : his deathes wound was by a thrust of a pike through the throat: but farre greater was the slaughter of the enemies , of whom some say were left dead ten thousand carkasses : the most part of the Launceknights dyed in fighting , and the greatest execution and slaughter on the French and Gascon footmen, was in flying: almost all the horsemen went away in safetie, the chase being so swift that the Swissers were not able to follow them: if the Swissers had had horsemen , they had made their calamitie equall with the footemen, their feare being greater and their disorder nothing inferiour : all the baggage and stuffe became a pray to the Victors, with two and twentie peeces of great artillerie, & all the horses assigned for the seruice of the same. The same day the Swissers returned into Nonaro almost triumphantly, but with such reputation and renowme throughout the world , that what with the consideration of the magnanimitie of their enterprise, the euident reiecting and despising of death , the resolution they shewed in the fight, and the happy and honourable victorie of the same, there were some that durst preferre this action, almost afore all the enterprises worthy of memorie which we reade set downe vpon the Greekes & Romans. The Frenchmen fled into Piedmont , from whence Trinulle lost time to cry after them, their feare being swifter in flying then his force able to follow them.

Vpon the report of this victorie, Millean with all the other places that were declared for the French, humbled themselves and sent to demanda pardon, which accordingly was graunted to them vpon bonds & conditions to disburse a great portion of money . The inhabitants of Millean were taxed at two hundred thousand duckats , and euery particular of the others rated according to his behaviour: the whole taxation was giuen to the Swissers, to whom ought iustly to be transferred, aswell the gaine as the glorie of the victorie , got with their valour and with their blood. And as men whose felicitie made them to account it to good equity to draw all the fruite they could, they entred afterwards into the Marquisdome of Montferrat and Piedmont, countreys which they charged to haue receiued the French army: there, partly by pillage, & partly by ransoming the poore peoples, they raised a great gaine, forbearing notwithstanding to touch either the life or honor of persons. The Spaniards also were not altogether deprived of the profits of the victory, for that Ianus lastly chased out of Genes, & Othaniā Fregosō (both which aspired to be Duke) being retired to the Viceroy after the battell; the Viceroy perfering Othaniā, for who the Pope did what he could in regard of their auncient amitie, & withall receiuing his promise to pay him fiftie thousand duckats when he should be possessed of Genes, he deliuered him three thousand footmē vnder the Marquis of Pesquero, & for his own part, went with the residue of the army to Chiesteggio, making semblance to passe further if need required. As the Marquis & Othanian drew neare to Genes, the brethrē of the familie of Adorno, knowing their owne weakenesse, abandoned the towne without any triall of resistance: and immediatly entred Othanian and was created Duke of that Citie, which in the course of a yeare had for gouernours the Frenchmen, Ianus Fregosō, the Adorney, and Othanian. Bartlemew Aluiano hearing of the overthrow giuen to the French armie, and fearing least he should be also put to the chase by the Spa- miards, retired with speed to Pontuquo, leauing in the way (for loosing of time) certaine peeces of artillerie, whose inconueniencie and slownesse of cariage might haue bin an impediment to the expeditiō of his marching: frō thēce he sent Ranse de Cere vnto Crema, & after he had abandoned Bressia he went to Tomba neare to Adice, neuer reposing in any place longer then the necessitie to refresh his men and horses did constraîne him. The reason of his abandoning Bressia and disposing Ranse de Cere in Crema, was, for that he held it a matter very vnprofitable to diminish the armie, wherein were remaining fixe hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and fīue thousand footmen: he marched with the same celeritie that he retired to Pontuquo, & had so great feare and disfaour of the countrey, that the least companies that had followed them, might haue sufficed to haue disordered & broken them. When he saw that both feare & perill ceased, since no man followed him, he stayed at Tomba, where he gaue order to be conueyed to Padoa & to Tre- uis, the greatest prouisiō of victuals that he could draw frō the territories of Verona. And at the same time he sent to Legnague with lx. men at armes, & twelue hundred footmen, Iohn P. Baillō, who, being immediatly receiued by the inhabitants of the towne where was no garrison, gaue assault to the rocke which was garded by a hundred & fiftie footmen, part Spanish, & part Launce- knights: he first did execution vpon it with the artillerie, battering that place that had his prospect towards the greene. In this assault it may be a questtion which had more forcē, valour or fortune, for that during the fight, the fire by aduēture fastning vpon the munitiōs, by meane of certaine instruments of artificiall fiers throwen by those that were without, part of the rocke was burned: in which tumult the footmen that gaue the assault being entred some at the breach, & some by ladders, killed and tooke prisoners so many as they found within, their Captaine that was a Spaniard falling with much ado into the fortune of a prisoner. After the enterprise of Legnague, Aluiano caused to build a bridge vpo Adice, & afterwards certaine inhabitants of Verona giuing him hope that they would mutine against the Almaines, he wēt to incampe at the village of S. Iohn a quarter of a myle frō Verona: & frō thēce the morning following drawing neare to the gate called S. Massimo, he planted his artilleries with great furie against the tower of the gate and the wall ioyning to it, expecting in the meane while if there would rise any tumult in the towne: and after he had brought down to the earth about fortie fadome of the wal, besides the tower, whose fall was such, that the ruines serued for a very strōg rāpier to the gate, he gaue a very hot & furious assault. But there were within Verona three hundred horsemen & three thousand Launceknights vnder Rocandolph a Captaine much esteemed, by whō was made a valiant defence: besides, the breach was very high on the townes side, which made the descending vneasie; & lastly they of Verona stirred not according to the hopes that were giue: so that Aluiano seeing what difficulties resisted his victorie, retired his footemen from the wals, & began also to withdraw the artillerie: when changing counsell in a moment, & as was supposed, by a certaine message which he receiued frō the towne, he returned immediatly his footemen to the wals, and recontinued the assault with a greater furie then before: but he found the former difficulties redoubled, and the faction that had called him, so terrified and wearied, that hauing lost at the assault more then two hundred of his people, of whom Tho. Fabro of Rauenna Marshall of his footmen was one, he began to dispaire wholly of the victory, & retiring with great diligēce his artillerie, he returned the same day to the lodging frō whence he was departed the morning. That day he was nothing esteemed, either for his counsell or for the issue of the same, only his celeritie was renoumed throughout Italy, for that in one day he had done that, which hardly other captaines are wōt to do in three or foure. After all this he gaue the spoile to the cōtrei, prouing by that feare to cōstraine the inhabitants of Verona to come to some accord: but by this did the Spanish army march & come on, for that the Viceroy after he heard of the losse of Legnague, fearing least by the ill disposition of the townesmen, Verona would set opē her gates to the Venetians, determined to giue present succours to the actiōs of Cesar: wherein he had now no impedimēt, nor was not retained since the affaires of Genes had happily succeeded. Therefore after he had passed without difficultie the riuier of Paw at Stradella, & that the cities of Bergama and Bressia were rendred to him without resistance, together with the towne of Pesquiera, he encāped before the castell that was māned with two hūdrēd & fiftie foot- mē. This peece, notwithstanding by cōmō opiniō might haue holden out yet certaine dayes, came by force into his power, the Venetian ruler being made prisoner & al the residue of the footemē that were not slaine at the assault: for that the Spaniards approached, Aluiano retired to Albero to the other side of Adice, & called to refurbish his armie, such numbers as he could, not onely certaine bands of footemen which were at Polisena Romagna, but also euen those regiments whom he had left within Legnagno. A little after the Launceknights ioyned at S. Martin with the Viceroy, who also after the recovery of Legnagno went to Montagnano: and the Venetians who held no more in that quarter but Padoa and Trenisa, caring for no other thing then the preservation of those Cities, ordained that the armie should be distributed in them, and that Iohn Paule Baillon, with whom were Malatesta Sogliano and the Knight la Volpe, should be bestowed in Trenisa with two hundred men at armes, three hundred light horsemen, and two thousand footemen, Aluiano remaining in Padoa with the residue of the armie. There, in considering the fortifications and state of the bastillions, and giuing perfection to many things that were vnperfect, he caused to dismantell and raze vp all the houses, and cut downe all the trees that were within three myles about Padoa, to make more hard and daungerous the approach of the enemies, and to giue to their diuice necessitie of multitudes of labourers and pyoners.

seeks to appease the king.

But whilst the matters of warre proceeded in this sort, the Pope trauelled with great industry to weede out of the Church the diuision brought in by the Councell of Pisa: a matter as it wholly depended vpon the will of the French king, so he laboured to appease him by many meanes: he assured the king, that touching the rumour that ran that he had sent money to the Swissers, it was a false brute suborned by men of little fidelitie, since he referred himselfe to all his actions, wherein he had expressed to desire nothing more then an vniuersall peace, and to be the common father of all Princes Christned: and he alleaged how grievous it was to him that his dissention with the Church, depriued him of all meanes to know how naturally he was inclined to his amitie, seeing that for the honor of the sea Apostolike, and the dignitie of his person, he was constrained to proceede with him seuerally, vntill by his returning to the obedience of the Church of Rome, it were lawfull for him to receiue him as king most Christian, and embrace him as the eldest sonne of the Church. The king also for the regard of his affaires, desired the vnion of his kingdome with the Church, the same being also demaunded by all his peoples, and the Queene no lesse concurrant then the residue: it was well discerned by the King and his counsell that there could be no hope of alliance with the Pope in matters temporal, if first they fell not to agreement for controuerfies spirituall: for which cause, either trusting indeede, or at least dissembling vnder shewes, and seeming to giue faith to his words, he sent to him as Embassador to negotiate in these causes, the Bishop of Marzeilles: at whose coming the Pope by decree of the Councell, reiuicteed the Bishops and Prelates of Fraunce, with power to purge themselves of their contumacie during the whole moneth of Nouember. Against these Clergie men his predecessour had proceeded rigorously, by way of threatning, as against persons guilty of schisme: and the same morning wherein this decree was determined, there was read in the Councell a writing subscribed by Bernar. Carnagiall and Feder. S. Seuerin, wherein forbearing to name themselves Cardinals, they approued all the actes of the Councell of Latran, and promised to cleaue to the same, and obey the Pope. In this action consequently they confessed themselves to be lawfully depriued of the estate of Cardinals, which priuation being done by Pope Iulio, had bene in his life time confirmed by the same Councell. It had bene debated afore in the consistorie to haue them restored, but the resolution was afterwards deferred for the impediment of the Embassadours of Cesar & the king of Aragon, together with the Cardinals of Sion and Yorke, who alleaged, that it was a matter vnworthy the maiesty of the sea Apostolike, and of very ill example to pardon the authors of so great wickednesse, accompanied with manifest abomination and impietie: a matter which the last Pope had constantly maintained against them euen to the last momēt of his life, & that for no other cause then for the publike benefite. But the Pope reigning inclined to that side that was least rigorous, iudging it more easie & worthy to quench altogether the name of the Councell of Pisa, rather with clemencie then with seueritie: besides, he would not stirre vp the minde of the French king, who was a diligent intercessour for them: neither was he caried against them by any particular hatred; for that neither was the iniurie done to him; neither before his Pontificacie he nor his brethren had bene great friends to Federike: for which reasons, of his owne motion he caused to be read before the fathers of the Councell, the writing of their humiliation, & assigned a day for their restoring, which was done in this maner: Bernar. and Feder. entred secretly into Rome by night without either habite or ceremonies of Cardinals, and the morning following being to present themselves before

the Pope sitting in full consistory with the presence of all the Cardinals, except the Swisser and the Engliss, who refused to assist the action: they first passed apparelled as simple Priests, with blacke bonnets on their heads through all the publike places of the pallace of Vatican, where they had lodged: a wonderfull concourse and presse of people flocked to see them, euery one iudging that a punishment so honourable did serue as a cruell torment for the vnruled pride of Bernardus, and no lesse for the vnstayed arrogancy of Federike. Assoone as they were admitted into the presence of the consistory, they fell downe on their knees, and with many signes of great humility they demanded pardon of the Pope and the Cardinals: They approued all things that had bene done by Pope Iulio, and namely their priuation and the election of the new Pope, as an act canonicall: and they publikely reprobued the Councell of Pisa, to be an assembly schismaticke and detestable. When this confessiō was subscribed with their hands & solemnly enregistred, they rose vp and stood on their feete, & after reuerence done, they embraced all the Cardinals, who stirred not out of their seates: then they were reinuested & apparelled in the habite of Cardinals, & receiued by the residue to sit in the same order wherein they were wont to sit before their priuation: they recouered only by this act the dignity of Cardinals, & not their benefices and other reuenues which they had possided, for that long time before they had bin distributed to others by the liberty of vacation. In this act the Pope satisfied the French king, if not so much as he desired, at least in part of that he expected: but he satisfied him nothing in other matters, for that he sought by all the wayes he could to accord Cesar and the Venetians; a matter which seemed to him of easie actiō for the accidents that were hapned: for it was beleueed that Cesar stirred vp by the occasions beyond the Mounts, would be brought to be contented to be discharged of such a burden, to haue the more oportunitie to hearken to the recouering of Burgondy for his Nephew. And touching the Venetians, it was hoped that they would much more desire it, as well for that they stood amazed with the ouerthrow of the Frenchmen, as also that they knew that the French king for the many dangers hanging ouer his Realme, was not able for that yeare to do any more to the affaires of Italy: Besides, they saw fast vpon them the Spanish army, whereunto were to be vniued the companies that were within Verona: They were made dry of mony and treasure, ill furnished of souldiers, and namely of footemen: and (which was not least in their consideration) they were to resist all alone of themselves without any hope or shew of other succors: and yet the Senate answered very constantly, that they would not hearken to any accord, vnlesse they were repossessed of Vincenza and Verona.

Cesar at that time demanded of the Pope two hundred men at armes against the Venetians: a demand which albeit was grieuous to the Pope, both for feare least the French king should be discontented, and also he saw how inconuenient it would be for Cesar and him to become suspected to the Venetians for a matter of so small importance: yet by the obstinate importunity of Cesar, he sent him vnder Troillo Sauello, Achilles Torello, and Mutio Colonno, the numbers he required, both for that by refusing he would not shew any token not to perseuer in the confederatiō contracted with the last Pope, and also he considered he was not holden by any bond or obligatiō that he had with the Venetians: who besides that their army did almost expresse behauiours of hostility vpon the lands of Parma & Plaisantin, at such time as Aluiano lay neare to Cremona, yet they had not elected Embassadors to protest their obedience to him according to their custome, untill the Frenchmen being ouerthrowne, were returned beyond the Mounts. This deliberation wrought no litle amaze to the Venetians, not so much for the importance of such a succour, as for feare least by this beginning the Pope would passe further, taking it for a manifest signe that he would neuer be seperate from their enemies. Neuerthelesse all these dangers & shewes of calamities could not make them change their first counsels, but standing resolute to make as good head as they could against fortune, they sent to their Admirall that was at Corfu to assemble his Nauie, & assaile the marine places of Powilla. And yet considering a litle after, of what importance it would be to prouoke so much the king of Aragon, they reuoked that counsell, being more courageous then discrete, no lesse for the might and power of the same king, then for that he had alwayes shewed that he perswaded Cesar to peace.

The Viceroy remained at Montagnano, hauing as yet determined vpon nothing of that he had to do, both for that the conceptions of the Launceknights were diuerse, and very hard, and the prizes that remained to be attempted either of Padoa or of Trenisa, and the forces farre inferiour to the difficulties : for in the army there was little more then a thousand men at armes , not many light horsemen , and onely ten thousand footemen, as well Spanish as Launce-knights : and lastly there was expectation of the comming of the Bishop of Gurci, vpon whose will and direction depended resolutely all things . About this time a Spanish magistrate being in Bergamo to gather the impott of five and twentie thousand duckats, taxed vpon that Citie at such time as it was rendred to the Viceroy, Ranſe de Cere lent thither from Crema one part of the souldiers , who entring by night by the helpe of certaine conspirators of the towne, tooke the Spaniard with all the money he had leuied, and returned afterward to Crema.

There was discerned about this time a preparation to new troubles in the state of Genes, being conformable in that plot the wils of the Duke of Millan and the Swissers, to whom Anthonie and Ierome Adorno had recourse: they declared to the Duke the affinity and dependencie which their fathers had had with Lodowike his father : That by the ayde of their family he had recovered and many yeares holden in peace the principality of Genes, from the which he had bene fraudulently deuelted by the Dukes Fregoso : That the family of the Adorney had participated with the aduersities and fortunes of the Sforces, for that at the same time that Lodowike was Duke of Millan, the Adorney were chased out of Genes : and therefore they perswaded that it was conuenient that they should likewise communicate in the returne of good hap and fortune , seeing the same affection and the same faith continued: That they ought not to be charged by imputation, if being not so much as heard in any one place, but abandoned of all hope , their necessity & their good will had driuen them to haue recourse to that king, by whom they had bene chased and expelled before: That on the other side he was to remember the auncient hatred of the Fregosei, and how many iniuries and practises had bene wrought against his father by Baptista and the Cardinall Fregosa, Dukes of Genes successiuelly : and lastly he was to consider how farre he was to trust Ottavian Fregosa, who, besides the auncient hatred he bare, refused to haue a superiour in that gouernement . To the Swissers they recommended the profite, the surety, and the honour that they might reape by the enterprise : that if by their meane they were effsoones restored to their countrey, they would pay a summe of money equall to that which Ottavian Fregosa payed to the Spaniards : that as by their vertue the Duchy of Millan had bene preferred , so to them appertained in honour the protection and defence of the thing they had gotten by their valour : wherein they were to consider what a matter it would be contrary to the surety of that state, that Genes a City of so neare neighbourhood and importance, should obey a Duke that depended wholly vpon the king of Aragon : that it were an action vnworthy their name & their glory, to suffer Genes (the fruit of the victory of Nouaro) to fall to the share and profit of the Spaniards, who whilst the Swissers with so great valour ran their bodies vpon the thundering shor of the French, were with more ease then danger vpon Trebia, watching as it were the issue of the battell, to rob and to vsurpe by suttlety the rewards of the victory gotten with the blood of others . Vpon these complaints, accompanied with other reasons of compassion , the Duke caused his companiesto march, & the Swissers aduanced 4000 footmen: but what with the threatens of the Viceroy against the Duke, and the authority of the Pope with the Swissers, the enterprise ceased euen as soone as it was begun, the affection that the Pope bare to the affaires of Ottavian, doing more to dash the expedition then any other thing. In this meane while the Viceroy went vp to Battell, a place about seuen miles from Padoa, where Carnagial riding vndiscretly with a small strength of horsemen to view the seat of the countrey, was taken by Mercario Captaine of the Venetian light horsemen. About which time the Bishop of Gurci arriuing in the army, they drew to consultation what was to be done: The Bishop gaue counſel to besiege Padoa, saying, he hoped so much in the vertue of the Spaniards & Launceknights against the Italians, that in the end they shold be able to overcome all difficulties: he sayd it was a matter of lesse labour to take Trenſa, but the honor and rewards of the victory were far different, for that to win only Trenſa, was not of such importace for the substance of the war, but by the taking of Padoa, both the townes & peeces of Cesars obediect should stand assured from troubles and perils of the warre, & the Venetians should be left depriued of all hope, to be able to reconquer the places they had lost . The Viceroy and almost all the other Captaines were of a contrarie opinion : they iudged it rather impossible then hard, to force Padoa for the incredible fortifications: it was thoroughly furnished with artilleries & all things necessary for defence: it was double manned with souldiers, besides many young men of the Nobility of Venice, that were come thither as they had wont to do at other times: they alleaged that the circuit of Padoa was large, in which regard, as also for the multitude of the defendants and other difficulties, it required to be enuironed with a siege of two armies: a computation so farre from them, that they were not able to make one sufficient, the number of their souldiers being not great, and yet no signe of readinesse in the Launceknights, for that they murmured already for want of pay: Lastly, they had not sufficient munitions, and no lesse want of pyoners; a provision very necessary for an enterprise of that difficulty. But in the end the reasons of the Viceroy and the other Captaines gaue place to the authority and will of the Bishop of Gurci, according to whose direction the army drawing neare to Padoa, encamped at Bassanella vpon the right shore of the channell: but being subiect there to the affliction of certaine double cannons that lay pickt vpon the bastillion of the towne, they passed the channell and lodged a litle further from the towne, from whence sending certaine bands of footemen to S. Anthonies Church within halfe a mile of Padoa, they began to approach with lesse danger, & to cast trenches neare to, S. Anthonies gate: but for that the worke was great, and the want of pyoners no lesse, and in a countrey abandoned of all inhabitants, the trenches aduanced litle, and not without danger, for that the souldiers making many sudden sallies aswell by day as by night, gaue great damage and impediment to those that trauelled. They suffered besides great want of victuals, both for that onely a small part of the towne was inuironed by the enemies, and also the estradiots that had liberty to issue out of the other quarters of the towne, ouerrunning freely the whole countrey, gaue impediment to all that was brought to the campe: the traffike of victuals was also hindred by certaine armed barkes which the Venerians had set for that purpose vpon the riuer of Adice, for that the me that they caried, ceased not to make incursions into the vpland and plaine countrey, scouring all places, and respected nothing in the fury of their spoyle. In regard of these difficulties, the estate of things being estfoones brought into the Councell by the Viceroy, euery one gaue this free iudgement, that it would be a lesse infamy to correct the deliberation vndiscretely made in leauying the campe, then by iustifying the error to breede and bring vpon them some greater damage, & that not without the society of a farre greater shame. This opinion being related to the Bishop of Gurci by the Viceroy in the presence of many Captaines, for that he had refused to be at that Councell, he made answer, that for that the discipline and practise of warre was not his profession, it was no shame to him to confesse his ignorance in the seruice & guiding of war: only touching the counsell he had giuen to pitch the campe afore Padoa, it moued not by any singularity of credit in his own wisdom, but in the action he was caried by the opinion & authority of the Viceroy, who both by letters & expresse messengers had counselled the Emperour, and giuen him great hope to cary it. At last the difficulties not ceassing neither for their complaints, nor for their debating, no rather the dispaire of the enterprise daily increasing, the campe brake vp, after it had lien xvij. dayes afore the wals of Padoa: and hauing both at their breaking vp, and vpon the way, the light horsemen at their backes, they withdrew to Vincenza, which then was voide of inhabitants, and lay as a pray to who was maister of the field.

In this meane while the souldiers of the Duke of Millan, to whose ayde the Viceroy had sent Antio. de Lena with a thousand footemen, tooke Pontuiguo, wherein were two hundred footme in garrison for the Venetsians, who neither amazed with the thunder of the artilleries, nor discouraged with the mines that were made, were constrained at the end of a moneth to yeeld for want of victuals, after they had valiantly sustained the assault. About the same time Ranfe de Cere issuing out of Crema ouerthrew Siluiso Sauello marching with his bands and foure hundred Spanish footmen to Bergamo, whither the Duke of Millan sent him. And a litle after a Spanish officer being returned to Bergamo to gather mony, Ranfe sent thither a strength of three hundred horsemen and five hundred footemen, who tooke together with the officer the Rocke whereunto he was fled for his safety with the money he had leauied. In this Rocke were very few men of warre for that lx. men at armes, three hundred light horsemen, and seuen hundred footemen, with two thousand paisants of the Mount of Brianzo were gone from Millan vnder the leading of Siluiso Sauello and Cesar Fieromosquo, to reconquer Bergamo: and they encountering vpon the way five hundred light horsemen and three hundred footmen, sent by Ranfe to Bergamo, were forced to flight, by whose example the residue that afore had occupied Bergamo abandoned it, leaving onely a garrison in the Rocke, which standeth out of the City vpon the Mountaine called the Chappell.

The Viceroy and Bishop of Gurci remained certaine dayes at Vincenza, and sent one part of the Spaniards vnder Prosper Colonne to sacke Basciano and Marostiquo: not that they had offended, but that the substances of that wretched people should minister nouriture to the army, wherein the payes did fayle, Cesar standing alwayes oppressed with his accustomed difficulties, the king of Aragon not able of himselfe to beare out so great a burden, and the Duchy of Millan being excessively taxed by the Swissers, was no more able to contribute to the reliefe of the residue. The army abode at Vincenza, not without great discommodities, by the continuall vexations of the light horsemen, who ouerrunning day and night the whole countrey, stopped all traffike and passage of victuals, vnlesse they were garded with a great strength, and that of necessity must be of men at armes, for that they were very few light horsemen: therefore to be out of these torments, the Bishop of Gurci went to Verona, very much discontented with the Viceroy, who following him by small iournies, got into Albero vpon the riuer of Adice, where he remained certaine dayes to giue opportunity to them of Verona to make their haruest, the incursions of the light horsemen not ceasing for all that, who tooke from the Almains euen neare the gates of Verona, the oxen that drew the artilleries. The Viceroy had layd a former plot to bestow the army in garrison in the countries of Bressia and Bergamasqua, and at the same time to molest Crema, which was all that the Venetians held on the other side the riuer of Mincia: which deuise being published, had so assured the countries thereabouts, that the territories of Padoa were full of inhabitants and goods, the same being the cause that the Viceroy, who had no other meane to feede his army then by prayes and pillage, altered his plot, and calling backe the Almains, went to Montagnana and to Esse, and from thence to the village of Bonolento, where after he had driuen away great flockes of cattell, the souldiers consumed with fire many faire houses that stood thereabout: Still the desire of pillage caryed them on, and being the rather encouraged that the bands of the Venetian footemen were distributed to the gard of Padoa and Trensa, the Viceroy marching in pillage from Bonolento, determined to approach Venice, but against the opinion of Prosper Colonne, who told him that no lesse was the danger of the enterprise then the counsell rash: so that after they had passed the riuer of Bacquillon, and sacked Pieno de sacco, which is a borough both great in situation, populous, and ful of all things, they went to Mestro, & so to Marguera, which standeth vpon the salt waters: from that place, to leaue a more honourable memory of this expedition, they discharged towards Venice x. peeces of great artillery, whose bullets pierced the Monastery of S. Secondo. And as in war where discipline is at liberty, there insolencies be infinit, so they proceeded still in pilling & waisting the whole countrey, whose inhabitants being fled, they made with great iniquity wars against the wals: for, not content with the rich prayes of cattell and other wealth, in their cruelty they burned Mestra, Marguera, and Lissafusina, together with all the other villages and townes of the countrey, not sparing any house or pallace which had any extraordinary representation or apparance. In these insolencies, the impiety of the Popes souldiers and the other Italians, was not the least, but so much the greater by how much it was more infamous in them then in the forreiners, to vse cruelty against the magnificence and ornaments of their proper countrey. But they of Venice discerning within their towne the smoke by day, and by night the fire thorough the whole countrey, and hearing within their owne houses the noyse of the artillery of the enemies, which was planted for no other purpose then to encrease their ignominy, were touched in their minds with right great indignation & sorrow. It seemed to euery one a hard and grievous chance of fortune, that in place of so great glory & so many victories obtained in Italy afore time both by sea and land, their eyes should behold at that instant a small army in comparison of their auncient force and power, to offer to the maiesty of their common-weale so great a brauery, to their perpetuall reproch & ignominy. In regard of which indignities, the deliberations of that Senate being enforced, who till that day stood resolute, what hopes soeuer were offered, to eschue to make any experience of fortune: they now consented by the hawty perswasions of Bart. Aluiano, that resembling all the souldiers, and stirring vp all the villages as well of the plaines as of the mountaines, they should assay to stop the returne of the enemies: a matter which Aluiano proued to be of very easie action, for that their rashnesse hauing brought them in the midst of Venice, Trensa, and Padoa, and being laden with burdens of pray and spoyle, they could not retire without great danger, danger, as well for the incommodie of victuals, as for the impediment of riuers and hard passages: and now the Spaniards vnderstanding of the musters and preparations that were in hand, marching a good pace, were by this time come to Citadella, which whē they saw they could not get for a succour of souldiers newly entred, they lodged a litle beneath neare to Brenta, to passe to the village of Conticella, a place where the riuier of Brenta was passable by foord: but they durst not venture to passe ouer for feare of Aluiano, who stood on the other side with his companies ranged in battell, and his artillerie planted along the shoare of the riuier, carefully prouiding for the safety not only of that place, but also of many others: wherunto, if resistance had not bene made, the enemy had had easie passage. It hapned (such be the stratagems of souldiers) that as the Viceroy continued his shewes and demonstrations to passe ouer at the place below, to the which Aluiano had turned all his forces, he passed the night after without anie impediment at the passage called the new crosse, three miles about Citadella: frō thence with great diligence he tooke his way to Vincenza, but Aluiano seeking to stop his passage ouer the riuier of Bacquillon, preuented him. Io. P. Bailon and And. Gritti with a strength of two hundred men at armes, & two thousand footmen of the forces of Trenisa, came and ioyned with Aluiano neare to Vincenza: they with the other Venetian Captaines were of counsell not to fight with the enemies with banner displayed and in open place, but garding well the passages of strength and places most conuenient, they should labour to stop their way on what place soeuer they came, drawing now towards Vincenza. To this end they had sent Ioh. P. Manfron to Montebio with foure thousand men trained: and to Barberano to hinder their passage in the mountaines, were sent fīue hundred light horsmen with many other bands of the paisants: they had also stopped in the villages all the passages that led into Germany, & fortified thē with trēches, with stones, & with trees cut downe & layd athwart the wayes: Aluiano left Theo. Trinnice to gard Vincenza with a garrison sufficient, and himselfe with the residue of the armie encamped at Olmo, a place within two miles of Vincenza, vpon the way that leades to Verona: this passage with another fast by, was so choaked with trenches, ditches, and artilleries planted vpon the places comming to it, that it was almost impossible to passe. As the way towards Verona was full of these impediments, so it was likewise hard for the Spaniards that marched along the mountains, to go larger through the countries that were full of marishes and waters, and no lesse hard to take the way of the mountaine, which was narrow, and garded by many armed men: in so much as being enuironed almost on all parts with enemies, their perill all one both before, behind, and in flanke, and continually chased by great troupes of light horsmen, they could make no deliberation wherein the difficultie was not greater then the danger. After they had spent certaine time in skirmishing, they encāped towards the entry of the night, within half a mile of the place where the Venetians lay, and there the Captaines drawing to counsell what was best to do amid so many aduersities and perils, they chose as least dangerous to turne their ensignes towards Germanie: they iudged that the best way, to returne to Verona by Trenia, notwithstanding what for the longnesse of the way, & the smal garrison they had left there, they had almost an assured opinion that the celeritie of the Venetians would preuent their purpose. In this sort then did they march at the dawning of the day towards Bassan, turning their backs to the enemies, a matter then the which there is nothing more timorous nor pernicious to armies: and albeit they marched in order, yet their fortune had left them so small hope of safetie, that they thought the losse of their baggage and horses of cariage would be the least harme that could happen to them. What by their secret discamping without sound of trumpet or drumme, & the commoditie of a thicke myst falling that morning which tooke away the benefit of his eyes, Aluiano was not so speedily aware of their breaking vp: but he was no sooner aduertised of their departing, then he set to follow thē with all the army, wherein was thought to be a thousand men at armes, a thousand stradiots, & sixe thousand footmen: the stradiots vexed them continuallie on all sides, and infinite troupes of paisants descending from the Mountaines, were no litle trouble to them with their small shot: so that with their danger the difficultie of the wayes increased continuallie, both for the multitude of their cariages, and the great quantitie of their pray, & also for that they were driuē to passe through wayes straight & ful of ditches, which they had not had oportunitie to inlarge or make plaine with mattockes and spades: and yet notwithstanding by how much their aduersities were great & apparant, by so much greater was their necessity of speed and haste, their extremities could not make them forget to march in order, the same proceeding as well of the vertue of the souldiers as the care & good office of the Captaines: neuerthelesse, after they had marched two miles with so many perplexities of wayes and trauell, they iudged it would be hard to hold out long in that sort, their griefe being greater by the wearinesse of their bodies, then by any feare of the perilles they saw at hand. But the enemies by their rashnesse had not patience to expect till so faire an occasion might be ripened, which already was come to his perfection: for Aluiano according to his custome being not able to containe himselfe, charged vpon the rearegard of the enemies guided by Prosper Colonne: he went to the charge not in disorder, but with the armie arranged in battell, and his artilleries planted ready for the execution: and it was said for certaine, that being long in preparing to the charge, Loredano a ruler among the Venetians, rebuked him with verie sharpe words, that he went not to the charge, whose slownesse, said he, gaue oportunitie to the enemies being already broken, to saue themselves. By these prouocations so valiant a Captaine was compelled to run headlong to the fight, and in great furie gaue the signe of the battell. Some other affirme that Prosper Colonne was the cause of all the actions of armes that day, by whose counsel the Viceroy had rather proue the vncertaine chaunce and fortune of the fight, then otherwise to follow so small a hope of safetie: and it is said that hauing made a shew that he would returne towards Vincenza, Aluiano had caused to be bestowed in the suburbs of Vincenza, Iohn P. Baillon, with those bands that were come from Trenis, and himselfe with the residue of the armie was incamped at Creatia within two miles of Vincenza. In this place is a litle hill that gaue a conuenient commodity for the vse and seruice of the artillery against the enemies, and at the foot of it is a valley capable of a maine armie ranged in battell, but it hath no way of access but onely by one straight way that runneth vp along the hils, and is almost incompassed with marishes. It is said that Prosper knowing what incommodities this place gaue to the enemies, perswaded to set vpon them in that quarter, hauing there the oportunitie and seate of the place to set forth their valour: but whatsoeuer it was, Prosper began to go to the charge with a resolution worthie of the reputation he bare, and hauing sent to call the Viceroy which brought on the battell, & on the one side, & at one time the Spanish footmen aduancing by the direction of the Marquis of Pesquaire, & on the other hand the squadrons of the Launceknights, they brought vpon the Venetians so hot and furious a charge, that their feares being redoubled by the terrour and valour of their enemies, the first assault almost sufficed to put them all to flight: the footmen threw downe their pikes and fled with more shame then hope of safetie, their ignorance or want of courage making them vnable to sustaine the fury of the charge: the footmen of Romagnia, whose Coronell was Ra. de Naldo Brisquello, were the first that serued to the others as an example of cowardise and infamie: the residue of the armie tooke the same course, no man almost being seene to fight, or once looke his enemy in the face; yea, the vertue of Aluiano was so abated and confused by this sodaine flying away, that without stroke striking he left the victorie to the enemies, to whom the artilleries with all the baggage remained a pray: the footmen were scattered into diuerse places; and for the men at armes, some fled to hide their shame in the mountaines, and some sought their safetie in Padoa and in Trenis, whither fled in like sort Aluiano and Gritti. In this encounter were slaine Anth. Pio an ancient Captaine, with Constance his sonne, Meleager Furdy, and Lodo. Parma, and the fortune of P. S. Ange was litle better, who though his life was reserued, yet he escaped not without manie miserable and mortall wounds. The prisoners were Io. P. Baillon, Iulio the sonne of Iohn P. Manfrè, Malatesto Soligiano, with manie other Captaines and persons of name and marke. Loredano the Venetian ruler fell into this calamitie, but with a worse fortune; for that two souldiers struing whose prisoner he should be, the one of them killed him against all humanitie. Touching the generall slaughter of this conflict both of dead bodies and prisoners, there remained about foure hundred men at armes, & foure thousand footmen, the slaughter being so much the greater, by how much there could be no expedition of flying by reason of the marishes: this also brought great damage to such as trusted in the chafe, that Theo. Triunlice shut the gates of Vincenza, and would receiue in no kind of person, for feare least the Victor and the vanquished should enter pelmel together: by which impediment manie struing to passe further, drowned themselves in the next riuer, amongst whom were Hermio Bentiuole and Sacramoro Visconte.

Overthrow of
armie.

This was the ouerthrow that fell vpon the Venetians the seuenth day of October neare to Vincenza, worthy to be remembred, both for the example it gaue to Captaines not to haue confidence touching touching matters of armes, in the Italian footmen not experienced in battels pitched and ranged, and also that almost in the turning of a hand the victorie was transferred to those in whom was least hope of safetie. This ouerthrow had put in daunger either Trenis or Padoa, notwithstanding with the residue of the armie Aluiano was retired to the one, and Gritti to the other, if both the season of the yeare when raynes began to fall, had not bene contrarie, & the townes bearing good fortifications, and the Captaines much troubled to dispose to new enterprises the souldiers that were not yet paid. Neuertheles, albeit the Venetians stood afflicted with so many aduersities, & no lesse confused with an accident so far cōtrarie to their hopes, yet they forbore not according to the time & their ability, to refurbish those cities, to the which, besides other prouisiōs they sent many yong gētlemen of the nobility, as they had wont to do in times of greatest perill.

After this battell, things began to draw from armes to cogitations and deuises of peace, which was negotiated with the Pope: towards whō was gone the Bishop of Gurci, principally to protest obedience to him in the name of Cesar & the Archduke: in which action he was followed by Frauncis Sforce Duke of Bary, to performe the like for his brother Maximilian Sforce. And albeit the Bishop of Gurci represented in Italy the full person of Cesar, as he did at other times, yet laying now aside his pompe and accustomed magnificence, he entred more modestly into Rome, & forbore by the way to weare the cap of Cardinal which the Pope had sent to him at Poggibonso. At his comming was compounded a compromise by him & the Venetian Embassadors in the person of the Pope, of all the controuersies that were betweene Cesar and their common weale: but it was a compromise more in name & apparance then in effect & substance, for that neither of the parties for the importance of the cause would be referred to an arbitrement suspected, vntill they had seuerally & secretly receiued promise of him, that he would not giue vp his arbitratō without their consent & priuity. The Pope by this authority of compromising, declared in writing, that there should be a surceasing of armes betweene the two parties, which albeit was ioyfully accepted by them both, was yet ill obserued by the Viceroy: for that being come betweene Montagnana & Este, besides that he had done no other thing since the victory, then made pillage & ouer-run the whole countrie, hauing withall sent part of his souldiers to Policena, he committed in sundrie places manie insolencies and harmes: sometimes he excused his doings, in that they were vpon the lands of Cesar, and sometimes he alleaged that he expected new intelligence from the Cardinall of Gurci: lastly, the end of the compromise was no more happie then had bene the midst & the beginning, by reason of difficulties that fell out in the negociatiō of affaires: for, Cesar would not consent to the accord, but with condition to retaine part of the townes, and for the other to receiue a great proportion of money: and of the contrarie, the Venetians demaunded all the townes and offered a very small summe of money: It was beleeued also, that the king Catholike did secretly disswade the accord, notwithstanding openly he made demonstration to desire it: yea it was said, that to make it more hard, he had at the same time put Bressia into the hands of Cesar, a place which the Viceroy neuer till that day would giue vp, alleaging that he kept it to make him more inclined to the peace: but the causes were cōiectured diuersly, either he had so far offended the Venetians that he iudged he wold no more entertaine with them a true and assured amitie, or else he knew that his reputation and greatnesse in Italy depended vpon continuing and keeping on foot the army, which for want of mony he was not able to feed & nourish but by racking & ransoming the peoples that were his friends, & in making pray & pillage of the countries that were enemies. These difficulties, together with the vntowardnesse of the parties, made the Pope leaue the matter vnperfect, when a litle after the Almaines, by the helpe of the exiles and banished men, tooke Marano vpon the sodaine, a seafaring towne in the countrie of Friull, & so descended to the like action vpon Montefalcon: & albeit the Venetians both for their honour and profit desired to reconquer Marano, being 60 miles frō Venice, & in that disposition did assaile it both by sea and land, yet their fortune being all one in all places, they receiued losse and vexation on all sides: only Rauise de Cere in that time sustained the name & credit of their armes, to his great praise and merite: for, albeit there was a great rage of plague and hunger in Crema where he lay in garrison, and that the bands of Spaniards and Milanois being disperfed into the townes therabout by reason of the season, he was as it were besieged, yet he gaue a sodaine charge vpon Calcinia, a towne of the countrie of Bergamo, & stripped Cesar Fieramosquo with fortie men at armes and 200 light horsmen of the regiment of Prosper Colonne: and not many dayes after, he entred by night into Quinsawo, and tooke the Lieutenant of the Count S. Senfrin, and spoiled fifty men at armes, and within Treny stripped ten men at armes of the company of Prosper.

About this time things were quiet enough in other places of Italy, sauing that the Adornei & the Fiesqueis with 3000 mē of the coutry, accōpanied perhaps with the secret fauor of the Duke of Millan, drew neare the walles of Genes, after they had taken Spetia and other places of the riuer of Leuant: but their fortune being far inferiour to their valour, they went away almost ouerthrowne, hauing lost part of the men they brought to the enterprise, and certaine peeces of artillerie. There appeared also in Tuscane certaine beginnings of new iniuries: for, the Florentines began to molest them of Lucqua, trusting that through feare of the Pope, they should redeeme peace in restoring to them Pietrasanta and Mutrona. They alleaged besides, that it was not conuenient that they should enioy the benefite of that confederation, which they had broken in ministering secret succours to the Pisans. Against these suggestions they of Lucqua complained to the Pope & to the king Catholike, in whose protectiō they were, but seeing there grew no remedy to them, they were at last contented (to auoyd greater mischiefs) to refer a compromise to the person of the Pope: who hauing like authority for the Florentines, pronounced that they of Lucqua, who had afore rendred to the Duke of Ferrara, Garsagnana, should leaue to the Florentines the places of Pietrasanta & Mutrona, and that there should remaine betweene them a perpetuall peace and confederation.

About the end of this yeare the Castles of Millan and Cremona, who for the necessity of victuals had agreed to yeeld if they were not succoured in a certaine time, were deliuered into the power of the Duke of Millan: so that there remained no more that the French king held in Italy, but the Lanterne of Genes, which in the end of the yeare the Genowayes assayed to cast downe by mines: they approached to it vnder the benefite of a caske or vessell of wood containing thirty fadoms in length and twenty in breadth: within which was stowage for 300 men, & set round about with packes of wooll the better to defend the shot: at the first shew it caried great arte and deepe inuention, but being brought to triall, it serued to litle vse, as most often is seene by those new and strange workes.

THE ARGUMENT.

The king of England makes warre vpon the French king. The Venetians recover Friull. The Pope as arbitrator pronounceth peace betweene the & the king of Romaines. King Louis the xij. dieth. Francis the first commeth to the Crowne, and descendeth into Italy to reconquer Millan.

Here hapned the same yeare in the regions beyond the Mounts, most daungerous warres, whereof I will make present discourse, both for the same reasons, and with the same shortnesse that I haue touched them in the narration of the yeare before.

The beginning of these preparations and stirres grew vpon a resolution which the king of England made to inuade that Sommer the realme of France, with a maine armie both by sea & land: & to make the victory of this enterprise more easie, he had agreed with Cesar to furnish him of an hundred & twenty thousand duckets, to make an entry at the same time into Burgundy with an armie of three thousand horsemen, & eight thousand footmen, part Swissers and part Almains. He promised also to the Swissers a certaine porportion of money, the rather to induce them to ioyne in the action with Cesar, who was contented to put into their hands in pawne one part of Burgundie vntill he had fully satisfied the of their payes: Lastly also the king of England occupied this perswasion, that his father in law the king Catholike, cleauing to the confederation of Cesar & him (which he had alwayes protested and assured) would open the warre on his side at the same instant. By reason whereof, the report of the truce made by the English with the French King (and yet for all that the desire to make warre was nothing diminished) was so ill brooked not onely by him, but by all sortes of states and peoples in England, that the commons had done violent execution vpon the Spanish Embassadour, if the kings authoritie had not resisted their furie. To these things were added the oportunitie of the estate of the Archduke, not so much that he letted not his subiectes to take pay against the Frenchmen, as for that he promised to giue sufferance and passage of victuals out of his countreys into the English armie.

It behoued the French king to omit no sortes of prouisions against so great preparations and dangerous threatening: by sea he furnished a strong nauie to encounter the Admirall of England, ^{Prouisions of the French against the king of England.} & by land he leauied men from all parts, labouring specially to haue as great a strenght of Launce-knights as he could. He had also afore made great instance to the Swissers, that since they refused to ayde him in the warres of Italie, at least, that they would so farre fauour him as to deliuer him a porportion of footemen to helpe to defend the Crowne of Fraunce. But they being wholly re- solued to protect and assure the Duchie of Milan, refused in any wise to minister to him, vnlesse he would estsoones returne to the vnitie of the Church: and giue vp the Castell of Milan which was not yet rendred: and also cancelling his rights and interests to that estate, he would promise to more to molest neither Milan nor Genes; limitations no lesse vnprofitable to the French king, best contrary to his honour, and preiudiciall to the soueraigne dignitie of the crowne of Fraunce. Likewise the French king, the more to terrifie the English, and make them more intangled with heir owne affaires, had called into Fraunce the Duke of Suffolke as Competitour and aspirant to the Crowne of England: a deuise little helping the purposes of Fraunce, and of great daunger to he race and progenie of the Duke, for that in reuenge of their dealing, the king of England by or- linarie course of the iustice of his Realme, cut off the head of his brother, who till then had bene olden prisoner in England, since the time that Phillip king of Castille sayling into Spaine, deliue- red him into the hands of the king his father. The French king also was not without hope to haue peace with the king Catholike: for that when the king Catholike vnderstood of the league made betweene the French and the Venetians, he began to distrust much of the defence of the Duchie of Milan, and sent into Fraunce one of his Secretaries to practise new offers: and it was belee- ued, that considering how much the greatnesse of Cesar & the Archduke might alter his govern- ment of Castille, he could not in good pollicie stand well contented with the embasing of the realme of Fraunce. Besides all these, omitting no oportunitie wherin occasion might be taken, the French king forgot not in these actions to stirre vp James the king of Scots his auncient confederate, to the end that he opening the warre vpon the frontiers of England, he might with more salicitie make defence against so many and mightie inuasions. The Scottish king was moued to this warre by the consideration of his proper interests, for that the aduersities of Fraunce could not but be dangerous to the crowne of Scotland, in which regard ioyned to the respect of consideration, he prepared himselfe to the action with all diligence, demaunding of the French king no other ayde then fiftie thousand frankes to leaue munitions and victuals. Neuerthelesse the French king was very slow in gathering together his forces and prouisions, both for that he had turned all his thoughts to the enterprise of Milan, and reposed not a little in the truce made with the king Catholike. Lastly, his accustomed negligence was no little impedimēt to the expedition of businesse, a vice most hurtfull to the affaires of Princes, to whom is seldome scene to returne the effect or fruite of their expectation, when they stand to temporise vpon euery new occasion, after the re- solution is set downe and things referred to action. And touching the king of England, he consu- med many moneths in measuring his proportions, in leauying his prouisions, in rating the state & maner of his payes, and in distinguishing the sortes of his souldiers and their fashions of armour & weapons, for that his subiectes hauing bene many yeares without warres, & no lesse chaunged the maner of warfaring, both their bowes & their other vsual natures of armes being become vnprofitable, he was constrained to make great prouision of forreine armours, artilleries, and munitions, and by the same necessitie to leaue as souldiers trained many bands of Launce knights and horsemen, the auncient custome of the English being to fight on foote: for these impediments the English armie passed not the seas sooner then the moneth of Iuly: and after had for many dayes run vp into the champaine countrey neare vnto Bollesme, they went to incampe afore Terwaine, a towne standing vpon the marches of Picardie, and in the region of those peoples whom the Latins call Morini. The person of the king of England passed the sea a little after, who had in his maine armie fise thousand horses of seruice, and more then fortie thousand footemen: An armie not more notable by the multitudes of souldiers and consideration of their valour, then most glorious by the presence and maiestie of their king, in whose person appeared at that instant, being in an age disposed and actiue, all those tokens of honour and magnanimitie, which rising afterwards to their full ripenesse and perfection by degrees of time, study, and experience, made him the most renowned and mighty Prince that liued in his age in all this part or circuite of the earth which we call Christendome. After the English were drawne into campe, which according to their custome they enuironed with trenches and with carts, and so rampired it with wood and other firme matter, and then planted it roundabout with artillery, that they seemed to be in a walled towne: they began to batter the towne of Terwaine in many places, and to make many mines, but they forbore to giue the assault, perhaps their prouisions being lesse then their vertue, though their valour was nothing inferiour to the report that went of them. The towne of Terwaine within was very well furnished with artilleries, and manned with a strength of two hundred and fiftie Launces, and two thousand footemen: which though it was a garrison very small in regard of the importaunce of the place, yet their daunger was no greater then their hope of succours: for that the French king was come to Amiens, to the end that by his nearenesse he might giue courage & comfort to those that were besieged, making great the difficultie to rescue the: he was very carefull to assemblé his army, which by true mustering was supposed to containe two thousand fise hundred launces, ten thousand Launceknights guided by the Duke of Gueldres, and ten thousand footemen leauied in the parts of his realme. The greatest affliction within the towne, was feare to want victuals, for that (except of bread) they had not sufficient prouision of any one nature, a want which perhaps made them more bold and busie then otherwise they would, and least the same necessitie might grow to a desperate extremitie, though they durst not come to triall of their generall forces, yet they forbore not to make practise of seruice, and vexed continually the English campe with the artillery, in which execution the great Chamberlaine of England was slaine, and one legge taken away from Talbot then Captaine of Callice. The daunger of Terwaine troubled much the king, but for that by common negligence of Fraunce, and the difficultie to leaue Launceknights, he was long ere he began to put order to his affaires, his whole army was not yet assembled: neither was he of minde (what aduersities soeuer fortune brought vpon him) to hazard the fight with the enemies, for that in loosing the battell, the whole realme and state of Fraunce had stood in manifest perill: he hoped also, that winter comming on, the which in those cold climats beginneth betimes, the enemies would be driuen to dissolue, the ill oportunitie & season of the yeare driving them fro the enterprise, which the feare of the enemies could not make them to leaue: & yet his army being assembled & his owne person remaining still at Amiens, he sent it forth to Aire neare to Terwaine vnder the gouernment of Monsieur Longuenille, otherwise called the Marquis of Rasselm, Prince of the bloud, and Captaine of an hundred Gentlemen of ordinaunce, ioyning with him in the charge Monsieur Palissa: their commission was, that eschuing all occasions to attempt the battell, they should see to the well reuictualling of the towns thereabouts, which till that time had bin ill furnished, being subiect to the same negligence that the whole seruice was, and withall to do what they could to put into Terwaine a succour of men and reliefe: a matter of it selfe very vneasie, and yet made more hard by the small agreement that was betweene the Generals, either of them attributing seuerally to himselfe the whole direction and gouernement, the one for his noblenesse and disceding, & the other for his long experience in warre. Notwithstanding, what by the necessitie of the time brooking no long delay, and what by the importunitie of them within the town, crying out for a succour of men, there was a strength of a thousand fise hundred launces that aduentured to approach the town on that side that was furthest remoued for the English. And albeit there was a regimēt of three thousand English bestowed at certaine passager to stop them, yet the artillerie of the towne executed so furiously vpon them, and the residue of the armie being vnprofitable to their rescuing, by reason of certaine ouerthwart trenches and ditches cast by the towne, that Captaine Frontailas ouercomming the perill by his vertue, got to the gate, and put into the towne a supply of lxxx. men at armes without horses as they had required: and afterwards with the same felicitie he retired with the residue of his companies, finding easie by experience the enterprize that was made hard by report, & ouercomming by his vertue the danger that without practise was holden desperat: he might vnder the same aduenture, haue put victuals into the towne, if he had caried any with him, his fortune and the state of the perill being all one.

By this experience the French Captaines were encouraged to make their approaches another day with a great quantitie of victuals, hoping in the same felicitie: but the English that tooke warning by the last example, had raised new fortifications on that side, to stop them, and on the other side, had sent out their horsemen and fiftene thousand Almain footemen to cut off their way: in so much that as they were vpon their returne, the fortune of the first aduenture taking from them all suspition, and being remounted vpon their little nagges of iourney that were led spare, as men beguiled with opinion of securitie, they were suddenly set vpon, euen in the greatest coniecture of their assurance and safetie, and as men being passed from a perill they feared most into a danger they doubted least, they suffered the terrour of the accident to take from them all resolution, & put themselves to flight without any resistance, loosing in that disorder three hundred men at armes, with whom were taken prisoners the Marquis of Rottelin, Captaines Bayard and Faiette, with many others of marke and name: Monsieur Palissa was also taken prisoner, but escaped away by aduenture, his pollicie no lesse fauouring his safetie, then his fortune. It was thought that if the English had taken the oportunitie and offer of that dayes fortune, they had in that action opened to themselves a way to be maisters of the whole realme of Fraunce: for that behind, stood a great battell of Launceknights which had followed the men at armes, who if they had bene shocked and ouerthrowen, it had bene with so great damage to the French armie, that it is certaine that the French king vpon the first newes beleeuing that they had bene broken indeede, would haue giuen so desperate a sentence of his own safetie, that he would looke how he might flye into Britaine. But there was difference betweene the intention of the English and offer of their fortune, for, after they had giuen the chase to the horsemen, hauing nothing of more studie and care in their minde then the conquest of the towne of Terwaine, they presented the French ensignes and prisoners before the wals: a spectacle which moued not a little the towne to despaire of succour: and ioyning to it the view and consideration of their other calamities, and the Launceknights withall murmuring to endure without hope the last extremity of victuals, they agreed to leaue the towne, the horses and liues of the souldiers saued, if they were not rescued within two dayes. And it is not to be doubted, that their holding out by the space of fifty dayes, was not a thing that greatly profited the Realme of France, who by the benefite of the long suffering of Terwaine, had respited to temporise and prepare against many other greater afflictions, which otherwise so mighty an armie of enemies would haue brought vpon them, euen to the shaking of the Crowne of Fraunce. A little before, Maximilian Caesar was come in person into the English armie, reuiewing and laying out those places wherein in his youth, he had with so great glorie ouerthrowne the armie of the French king Louis the eleuenth: who whilest he remained in the campe, the affaires of the warre tooke their chiefest direction and gouernement from him.

The French king was not onely trauelled with the English armies, but also with greater daunger, he had his vexations by the Swissers: for the communalities of those regions desiring with an vniuersall minde that the king should disclaime from all titles and rights which he pretended to the Duchie of Millan, wherein for that he did nothing, their hatred redoubled towards him, they had entred against him many actions of hostilitie, & set on fire many houses of priuate persons of Lucerna, whom they suspected to beare fauour to the affaires of the crowne of France: and proceeding continually against all men noted of like suspition, they had brought all the chieftaines and principals of them, to sweare to suffer all the pensions to go in common, and so falling into armes by publike order, they entred almost by heapes into Burgundie, their numbers being xx. thousand footmen, & a thousand horsemen. In which action they had certaine proportiōs of artillerie. Caesar, who, either according to his incōstancie, or for ieaiousie he had of the, refused to go either in person, nor withstanding he had promised both to the king of England, & to the French king.

drawne into this strength and power of warre, they went and incamped afore Dyon the chiefe towne of Burgundie, wherein was Monsieur Trimouille with a thousand Launces and sixe thousand footmen. These natures of commons and popular peoples, hauing some doubt of their Capitaines, who began already to communicate with the French, tooke vpon them the managing of the artilleries and fell to batter the towne, of whose defence Trimouille doubting much, he had recourse to the last remedies, and made with them a sudden accord without expecting any commission from the king, on whose behalfe he made this contract, to renounce all the rights and claimes he pretended to the Duchie of Millan, and to pay them sixe hundred thousand crownes within a certaine terme: for the obseruatiō of which couenant he gaue him foure ostages, persons very honorable and of great condition: and for the Swissers they were bound to no other promise then to returne to their houses, a matter which tyed them not to remaine for afterwarde friends to the French king, but left them at libertie to returne when they list to the inuasions of his kingdome. As soone as they were possessed of the ostages, they brake vp and dissolued their armie immediatly, alleaging for their excuse with the king of England, for entring into this couenant without his consent, that they receiued not in time conuenient, the money he had promised them. It was thought that this capitulatiō was the cause of the sauing of the whole realme of France, for that the taking of Dyon, had put into the hands of the Swissers a free power to run vp without resistance euen to the wals of Paris. And it was not vnlikely that the king of England passing the riuer of Somme, would haue taken the field to ioyne with them: a matter which the French could not let, for that neither the Duke of Guelldres being then come, nor in the armie aboute sixe thousand Launceknights, they were constrained to keepe themselves inclosed within townes. But the king was not a little discontented with the resolution, complaining not a little against Monsieur Trimouille, both for the summe of money he had promised, and much more that he had bound him to the resignation of his titles and interests, as an action of too great preiudice, and farre vnworthy his greatnesse and the glory of the crowne of Fraunce: for which cause albeir the daunger had bene great if the Swissers in their wrath had estloones returned to assaile him, yet reposing much in the approach of the winter, and in the difficultie that they could not reassemble so soone, and being withall resolute to runne all fortunes rather then to depriue himselfe of his rights in that Duchie (which he loued dearly) he determined not to ratifie the agreement: yea rather he began to propound to them new offers, which much lesse that they did hearkē vnto, seeing they did constantly reiect them, with these bloody threats, that if the ratification came not within a certaine time, they would cut off the heads of the ostages.

Terwaine being taken, whereunto the Archduke aspired by pretence of his auncient right, & the king of England chalenged it to be his by the iust prerogative of conquest and warre: Cesar and he fel to this point for the auoyding of discord, to cast downe the wals to the ground, notwithstanding such violence was forbidden by the capitulatiōs made with them of Terwaine: immediatly after, Cesar went from the armie, giuing this iudgement vpon the experience and triall he had scene, that in matters of warre the English were more resolute then well aduised, and lesse futtle and politike then well disciplined and trained. From Terwaine the king of England went to incampe before Tournay, a towne very strong and rich and of great deuotion of long time to the crowne of Fraunce, but so enuironed with the countreys of the Archduke, that it was impossible to the French to rescue it so long as they were not maisters of the field. The French king was not a little glad of this enterprise, fearing least the enemy caried with victorie and wealth, would transferre his forces into the body and parts of his realme of more importance: a feare which put him into no small perplexities: for, notwithstanding he had now areared a mighty army, wherein (besides the five hundred Launces which he had bestowed in garrison in S. Quintin) were two thousand Launces, eight thousand light horsemen Albanois, ten thousand Launceknights, a thousand Swissers, and eight thousand footmen of his owne nation: yet it was farre inferiour to the power and multitudes of the English armie, which, by the continuall flocking of souldiers, was (as the report went) resupplied to the number of foure score thousand fighting men. By the consideration of which inequality of forces, the French king who had no great hope to be able to defend Bolesine and those parts of the countrey that are beyond the riuer of Somme, which he feared the English would oppresse, looked how to defend Abeuille and Amiens, and the other townes that are vpon the riuer of Somme: his deuise was also to let them for passing the riuer, and so to remporise either until the cold season came, or else that the Scottish king in whom he hoped much, were readie to aduance and draw them from that warre: his armie marched all the meane while along the riuier of Somme, to let the enemies from winning passage. It was beleueed that the persuasions of Cesar were the cause of this enterprise of the English, for hope that if the towne of Tornay were takē, it might either the or at som other time diuolue into the power of his nephew to who it was thought it did appertain: perhaps it moued ypo a feare the armie had to be afflicted with wāt of victuals if they had bin in another place, or haply other places wherunto they might haue gone, had borne a more facility to be succoured by the enemies: but the towne of Tournay which was not manned but with bands of straungers and forreiners, and therefore of lesse expectation to be succoured, was so battered with artilleries in many feueral places, that after it had made a small resistance, it yeelded, vnder safetie of goods and liues: and to aduance an hundred thousand duckets towards the defrayment of the warre, and to defend them from pillage.

by the English.*

The fortune of the French men was no more gracious in other places, for that the Scottish king comming to battoll with the English armie vpon the riuier of Twede, where the Ladie Katherine then Queene of England was in person, was ouerthrowne with a verie great slaughter, the kings person being then slaine with one of his owne sonnes, who was Archbishop of S. Andrew with manie other Prelates and Nobles of that realme, and of the common souldiers more then twelue thousand bodies. After these victories about the end of October, the king of England leauing a strong garrison within Tournay, dismissed his horsemen and footmen of the Almaines, & so disposed himself to returne into England, reaping the great towne of Tournay as a fruit of his wars and great expences: for touching Terwaine whose walles he had throwne downe to the earth, the naked seat and resemblance remained in the power of the French king. One cause that made the king of England repasse the seas, was, that the season of the yeare taking away all oportunities to continue the warre in those cold regions, he held it a matter vnprofitable to nourish an armie there with so great charges: and another was, that he thought to take order for the institution & gouernment of the young king of Scots, who was in minoritie, and the sonne of his owne sister, the Duke of Albany being gone thither, who was also of the bloud of the same king.

By the returne of the king of England, the feare of the Frenchmen being taken away, their king dismissed all his armie except the regiments of Launceknights: he saw himselfe deliuered of the care of daungers present, but not of feare to fall into them againe the next yeare with farre greater difficulties: he gathered this iudgement by the behaiours of the king of England at his going away, who vsed many high threatnings against the Crowne of Fraunce, promising that he would giue it a greater shake the next sounner: wherein he began already to make new preparations to auoide the discommodities of his former delayes, & with more readinesse to open the warre as soone as the season of the yeare would suffer: besides the French king knew that Cesar had the same intention to annoy him, & feared withall least the king Catholike who with sundrie subtleties had excused himselfe of the truce made, least he shold wholly aliene the frō him, wold not also take armes with them: of this suspition he had great tokens by the discourse of a letter intercepted, wherein the king Catholike writing to his Embassadour resident with Cesar, & expressing an intention quite contrary to his manifest speeches, which testified an earnest desire to make warre against the infidels, & to go in person to recouer Ierusalem, he perswaded him to deuise diligently by what means the Duchy of Millan might be brought to Ferdinand their comon Nephew, yonger brother to the Archduke. In this perswasion he occupied this maner of encouragement, that the estate being rāged, it wold not be hard to reduce the residue of the regions of Italy to their deuotion, and with the same facilitie ioyned with his succours, Cesar might make himselfe Pope, whereunto he had alwayes aspired since the death of his wife, and being once possessed of that soueraignty, he should resigne to the vse and profite of the Archduke the Crowne imperiall: neuertheless he concluded that matters of so high nature and weight could not be led to perfection but with time and with occasions. Besides all these, the French king doubted nothing of the will of the Swissers, whose obstinacies he could in no wise moderate, notwithstanding he made them offers aboue their merit: & they were of new incensed more then before by the euasion of the ostages deliuered by M. Trimouille, who fearing the daunger of their liues for want of obseruation in the king, were secretly stolne away and fled into Germany: so that it was not without cause that he feared least by the occasion of so many other his aduersities, they would rise to assayle presently, or at least the yeare after, the countrie of Burgundy or Dauphine. These difficulties were partly the occasion that made him fall to agreement with the Pope for causes spirituall: of which agreement the principall article contained the absolute rooting out of the Councell of Pisa, which point was debated many moneths with verie great difficulties, specially for the regard of things done either with the authority of the same Councell, or against the maiestie of the Pope: such as it seemed verie vnworthie for the sea Apostolike to approue, and to cut them off there could not but happen right great confusion: so that there was a delegation of three Cardinals to deuise of some means by the which such a disorder might be met withall. This bred also one difficultie, that it seemed not conuenient to graunt to the king the absolution of penalties vnlesse he sued for it: whereunto the king would not consent, least by imputation his person and Crowne of Fraunce were noted of schisme: but at last the king was made weary with these perplexities, and no lesse ouerlaboured with the importunities and willes of the people of his realme; desiring with vniuersall affection to be reunited to the Church of Rome: but most of all he was stirred and moued by the deuotion of the Queene, to whom those controuersies were grievous. In which respects he determined to yeeld to the will of the Pope, and not without some hope, that vpon the reappearance of these quarrels the Pope would some way ioyne to his ayde; whereunto with great arte he seemed to expresse to haue a good intention: and yet a new complaint was added to the ancient iniuries, for that the Pope by a speciall writ, had commanded the Scottish king to attempt no damage or grievance to the Crowne of England: neuerthelesse in the viij. Session of the Councell of Latran, which fell in the latter end of the yeare, the French Agents in the name of their king, and protesting his commission, disclaimed from the Councell of Pisa, and stuck to the Councell of Latran: they promised besides, that sixe of those Prelates that did assist the Councell of Pisa, should go to Rome to do the like in the name of the whole French Church, and that others of the Clergie should come to dispute vpon the pragmatike, with intention to referre themselues to the declaration of the Councell, of which in the same Session they obtained full absolution of all things committed against the Church of Rome. These were the accidents and actions done in Italy, Fraunce, and England, in the yeare 1513.

In the beginning of the yeare following, Anne the French Queene passed from this life to a better, hauing scarcely tasted the sweet fruit of the vniō with the Church which she had so much desired: she was a verie vertuous & Catholike Queene, and for those parts her death was greatly sorowed of all the realme, & of her naturall peoples of Brittaine. When the realme of Fraunce was thus reduced to the obedience of the Church, and by that meane both the name and authoritie of the Councell of Pisa vtterly remoued: some of those that had feare of the greatnesse of the French king, began to stirre and feare least his power were too much embased: but specially the Pope, who notwithstanding he continued in the same desire that the Duchie of Millan should not be recouered by him, yet fearing least the king, made amazed with so great daungers, and remembring eftsoues the matters of the yeare past, would giue himselfe so daingly to accord with Cesar (with whose will was alwayes concurrant the mind of the king Catholike) and cōtract his daughter with one of the Nephewes of those two kings, induing her for a dowrie with the Duchy of Millan: he begā to perswade with the Swissers, that for too great hatred against the French king, they would not put him into necessitie to do a matter which should be no lesse prejudiciall to them then to him: He told them they were not ignorant of the ill mind that Cesar & the king Catholike bare to them, who if they obtained the Duchy of Millan by vertue of accord with the French King, it would be a matter no lesse to the daunger of their liberty and authority, then hurtfull to the prerogatiue of the Church, and perill to the whole state of Italy: That they ought to perseuer in their resolution, not to suffer the French king to recouer the Duchie of Millan, yea they ought also to take heed, least (as it often hapneth in the doings of men) to auoyd too much one extremitie, they fell not into another extremitie more hurtfull and daungerous: That to assure themselues more then need was, that that estate should not reuert to the French, they were not the cause to make it fall into the hands of others, with so much the more perill and ruine to all, by how much lesse they should be found able to make resistance to a farre stronger power then the greatnesse of the French king: That the common weale of Swissers hauing made notable their name and reputation in the actions of warre with so many glorious and worthie victories, was to make themselues no lesse famous & renowned by the practises of of peace: That they were to foresee presently the daungers that were to come, and to remedie them with wisdom & counsell, without suffering things to slide & fall into places, from whence they can not be drawne out & readdressed, but by armes and valour of the hand: That according to the testimony of dayly experience, it hapned often in warre that the valour of men was smothered by the too great power of fortune: That it was a better counsell for them, to moderate in some part the accord of Dion, specially the king offering them greater paiments, and promise to make truce for three yeares with the state of Millan, so farre forth as they would not constrain him to resigne his interests: which resignation being of greater consequence in apparance then in effect (for when oportunity shall returne to the king to reconquer it; the action of resignement shall be no other impediment to him then he list) things for that difficultie ought not to be reduced to so great a daunger. On the other side he aduised the French king with many working reasons to make election of the lesser ill, and rather to dispose himselfe to ratifie the accord of Dion, then to returne to the daunger of oppression by so many enemies in his realme the next sommer. That it was the office of a wise Prince to auoide the greater ill, and to embrace for good and profitable the election of the lesser: That it was contrarie to the wise gouernement of a king, to take himselfe out of one danger and disorder, to runne into another of greater importance and greater infamie: That it could be no honour to him to graunt the Duchie of Millan with so manifest a note of cowardize to his naturall enemies; who had pursued him with so manie deceits and subtleties: That it was neither rest nor securitie to him, by diminishing so much his owne reputation, to enlarge the power of such as conspired altogether to pull downe the Crowne of Fraunce: That himselfe was a good witnesse that he could not be assured of any promise, of any faith or oath that they make; a matter which he had well knowne by the experience of other times to his great harmes: That truly it was a hard matter to resigne his rights, but the infamie was so much the lesse, by how much a litle billet or writing made not his enemies more mighty: That since it had bene promised without his priuite or consent, it might be said, that it was not his deuise from the beginning, but in the execution he would be so much the more excused, being as it were constrained for the promise made by his people, to keepe somewhat his faith: Besides, the world doth know from how great and desperate a state of daunger, that accord at that time had deliuered the realme of Fraunce: That he allowed well that by other meanes and offers he laboured to induce the Swissers to his intention: And that touching his part, as he desired for the surety of his kingdome, that in some sort there were made an agreement betwene them & him, so in that action he would omit no good office of amitie and trauell to draw the Swissers conformable to his will; but if they would be obstinate, he exhorted him in grauitie & fatherly deuotion to obey time and necessitie, though not for other regards, yet not to take from him the excuse to depart from the alliance he had with his enemies. The king knew that those reasons were full of fidelity and truth, and yet he could not digest them without murmure, for that the Pope had cunningly mingled threats with perswasions: and albeit he confessed that his necessitie constrained him to make some resolution that might diminish the number of his enemies; yet he was at a point rather to giue himselfe vp to all daungers, then to resigne his rightes to the Duchie of Millan: whereunto besides his owne inclination, he was encouraged by the importunities and counsels of those of his Court, to whom albeit it was grieuous to follow the warres any more in Italy, yet respecting the dignitie of the Crowne of Fraunce, it was farre more intollerable to see their king so infamously constrained to disclaime his properties in the Duchie. There was discerned the same obstinacie in the Parliaments and assemblies of the Swissers: to whom notwithstanding the king made offer to pay presently foure hundred thousand Crownes, & eight hundred thousand a sundrie tearmes: and albeit the Cardinall of Sion with many other of their rulers inclined to accept those conditions, weighing the estate of the danger, if the French king shold ioyne with Cesar: & with the king Catholike: yet the commons of that nation increased in their generall hatred to the name of Fraunce, and made proud by so manie victories, tooke to themselves a confidence to defend the Duchie of Millan against all Princes knit in one strength: the authoritie of the Cardinall of Sion was much diminished amongst them, and their other chiefe rulers were suspected by reason of the pensions which they were wont to receiue from the French: matters which made the Cantons with more obstinacie to stand vpon the ratification of the accord of Dyon: and besides giuing themselves ouer to rashnesse and disobedience to counsell, they debated to enter of new into Burgundy, an action which the Cardinall and other Chiefestaines amongst them laboured to hinder, not only with manifest authority, but indirectly & with many sleights, deferring from one day to another that resolution. Therefore the French king standing neither offended with them, nor assured of them, forbore not to continue with the king Catholike the practise of the mariage, in the which (as before) the principall difficulty was, whether the Dam-sell should remaine in the power of her father in law, till time had made her able to the consum-mation of the mariage: for that the father retaining her, it seemed to Cesar, that he could in no sort be assured of the effect. The king was content to entertaine the difficulties that hapned in this action, for that he saw there was some hope that the brute of this match (which he diligentlie spread abroad) might to his profite mollifie the minds of others, by reason of the interests they had in it. The king Catholike sent to him Quintaine his Secretary, who in that negociation he had sent to him the yeare before: and he going afterwards by his consent to Cesar, returned est-soones to the French king: at whose returne, to the end the difficulties of the peace might be resolved with greater commoditie and respite, the king and Quintaine in the name of the king Catholike prolonged yet for another yeare the truce that had bene made the yeare before: the prolongation was vnder the same conditions that were before, sauing that they suffered a secret addition of this article, that during the truce the French king should not molest the estate of Millan: in which article Genes nor Ast had no comprehension. This condition, which the king concealed as much as he could, the king Catholike caused to proclaime it solemnly through all Spaine, a thing which made the world vncertaine which was most true, either the negatiue of the one, or the affirmatiue of the other. In the same couenant was reserved to Cesar, and the king of England, a respite of three moneths, to enter into the agreemēt: which albeit Quintaine did assure on both their behalves, yet touching the king of England there was no apparance, and in that he beguiled himselfe much: but for Cesar, the king of Aragon who alwayes stood resolved not to haue warre on the part of Spaine, had perswaded him that there was no better meane to compass the mariage that was sollicit. This prorogation of the truce aggrauated the Popes suspicion, that betweene those three Princes were either made already, or at a point to be made some conclusion of greater things to the harme of Italie: and yet for all that, not going from his first deliberation, that it would be a matter verie hurtfull to the common libertie to suffer the Duchie of Millan to diuolue into the power of Cesar and the king Catholike, and of no lesse perill to haue it recovered by the French king, he found it a hard matter so to temper and proceede in things, that the means which ayded one of his intentions, should not hurt the other, since one of the daungers came of the embasing and the feare, and the other of the greatnesse and suretie of the French king. Therefore to deliuer the king from necessitie to agree with them, he continued his perswasions to the Swissers (to whom the truce that was made was suspected) that they had reason to compound with him: and to the end to make to the king in alleuents the dis-cending into Italy more hard, he tooke more paines then euer he did to agree Cesar with the Senate of Venice: who for their parts iudging that to make truce, would be to assure the matters of Cesar in the townes that remained to him, stood resolved with a wonderfull constancie of mind: either to make an absolute peace, or to continue the warre, not retiring from so honourable resolution for any accident or ill aduenture whatsoeuer: for, besides so manie aduersities hapned in the warre, and the dispaire, that that yeare the French king would send no armie into Italy, they had against them this token both of the anger of heauen, and ill disposition of casuall accidents, which are vainly surmised to depend vpon the power of fortune, that in the beginning of the yeare a great fire kindled in Venice, which, beginning in the night at the bridge Rialto, was caried by the violence of the North winds, resisting all remedies of the diligence and trauell of men, and consumed the most rich and populous part of the citie.

But because the Pope shewed such forwardnesse to haue them accorded, there was est-soones made betweene the a new compromise in his owne person: which bare full power without limitation, and was not restrained to any time, and yet with a secret promise vnder his hand, to pronounce nothing but by the consent of both parties: and after the arbitration was giuen vp, he enioyned by writ both the one and the other to surcease from armes, an order very slenderly obserued by the Spaniards & Almains, for that those copanies of the Spaniards which were in garrison at Polesina & in Este, made pillage of the whole conntrie thereabout, and the Viceroy sent men to Vincenza, to the end to be in possession at the time when the sentence should be given. Besides these insolencies, Captaine Frangipan did many harmes in the countrey of Friull, and the Venetians not standing carefully vpon their guard, the Launceknights, by an intelligence with certaine banished men, tooke Marano a towne in Friull neare to Aquilea, & hath his situation vpon the sea. To encounter these doings the Venetians sent thither by land Baltazar Scipion, with a certaine proportion of souldiers, & Ierome Sauorgnano with many other bands of the countrey men, who being there incamped, and holding the towne strait by the army at sea, there came to the succours of the towne, five hundred Almaine horsemen, and a regiment of five thousand footemen: for whose comming those that were within the towne issuing out to assaile the Venetian companies, they were put to flight with a great slaughter of men, and no lesse losse of artillery, besides that with certaine ships they tooke from them a gally with many other vessels. After this victory the Almains tooke Monfalcon by force: and not many dayes after foure hundred horsemen & xij. hundred Launceknights that had bene at Vincenza, came as a strength to them of Marano, who ioyning with the other bands of horsemen and footemen newly come into Friull, ouerran the whole countrey. By reason of which oppressions, Malatesta Sogliano gouernor of the countrey with fixe hundred horsemen and two thousand footemen, together with Ierome Sauorgnano and two thousand of the countrey men, who were now withdrawne into Vdino, seeing neither by their valour nor by their fortune they were able to make resistance, passed on the other side of Liuenza, giuing succours where they could: but the Almains being deuided, one part of the tooke Feltro & occupied the whole countrey thereabout with roades and incursions: amid which insolencies the Venetians that commanded all the passages, charged certaine bands of them at Bassan where they kept no guard. And albeit they were lesse in number, yet they put them to flight & killed three hundred footemen of the five hundred that were there, and tooke prisoners two Captaines & many souldiers. The other part of the Almains was gon to incampe at Oss standing vpon the top of a sharpe mountaine, and after they had executed vpon the Cattle with their artillery, & giuen many vaine assaults, they hoped to carry it by besieging, hauing some assurance from them within of a want and necessity of water: but the benefit of the heauen remedied that want by the sudden falling of sundry great showers, whereupon they continued afresh the assault, but with so ill successe, that finding neither fruit in the assault, nor fauour in the siege, they leuiued their campe. These matters were not a litle grievous to the Pope, but the thing that troubled him most, was, that he could find no meane of agreement to content both parties: for that because of the continuall variation of things, the hopes changing according to the successe of the same, it fell out that when Cesar had consented to leaue Vincenza, keeping still Verona, the Venetians refused vnlesse they were repossessed of Verona: and when the Venetians much embased by their calamities, would be contented with Vincenza onely, Cesar on the other side, not satisfied with Verona, required also Vincenza. These difficulties made wearie the Pope, who though he supposed that his declaration would not be accepted, yet to shew that it was not long of him that they were not reconciled, he pronounced a peace betweene them, with this clause, that armes should be presently layd aside on all sides: he reserued to himselfe this power, to expresse within one yeare the conditions of the peace, wherein, as also in the surceasing of armes, the king Catholike should be comprehended: That Cesar should depose out of his hands Vincenza, and all else that he and the Spaniards possessed in the countries of Padoa and Trenisan: That the Venetians should do the like for Crema: And for other things, euery one vntill the publication, should hold what he possessed: That either party should ratifie his sentence within a moneth, and vpon the ratification the Venetians to pay to Cesar xxv. thousand duckats, and as much more within three moneths next: That if both parts did not ratifie, the sentence should be of none effect. He chose this manner of arbitrating and iudgement not accustomed, as the most indifferent not to displease neither side: and because there was no man had power to ratifie for the king Catholike, notwithstanding his Embassador gaue assurance of his consenting, he reserued to either party so much time to ratifie, as the commission and faculty to do it might conueniently require. But because the Venetians were resolute not to ratifie it at all, desiring that at the same time the conditions of peace might be pronounced, the sentence tooke no effect.

The Popes sentence touching the controuersie betweene Cesar and the Venetians.

In this time the affaires of the Venetians stood in good case touching the defence of Crema, which was afflicted within with plague and penurie, and without was besieged with the campe of the enemies: Prosper Colunno was come on the one side to Efeungia with two hundred men at armes, two hundred and fiftie light horsemen, and a strength of two thousand footemen: and on the other side was come to Vmbriana Silvio Sautolo with his guidon of horsemen, and a regiment of two thousand footemen. Both the places were not about two miles distant from Crema, from whence the souldiers made many sallies to skirmish with the enemies: who as they were in their lodgings at Vmbriana, neither making doubts, nor keeping guard, Ranse de Cere with one part of his companies that were within Crema, issued out one night, and gaue them a Camuesado in their lodging, when suffering the paines of their owne security and negligence, the most of them were put to flight, and many of their footemen past by the sword. This made Prosper retire with his companies, esteeming it little to his safety to remaine there, where the negligence of his fellowes had opened so manifest a gappe to his perill. A few dayes after, the occasion was offered to Ranse to passe the riuer of Adda by foard, by reason of the lownesse and shalownesse of the water, and hauing drawne ouer his companies at Chastillon Lodigiano, he stripped a regiment of fiftie men at armes that lay there, reaping no lesse prayes of these enterprises both happie and full of industry, then were due to him by iust merite vpon the vniuersall beginning: the reputation of his valour and celerity made him to be esteemed one of the principall Captaines in all the regions of Italy, wanting nothing to his worthinesse, that either nature or fortune could giue him. These doings drew the Venetians to a resolute counsell and courage to proceede to the reconquering of Friull, in which expedition they sent thither Aluiano with two hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horsemen, & seuen hundred footemen: as they marched along the high way of Portonovo, where lay part of the strength of the Almains, his light horsemen that scoured before, encountered out of the towne with Captaine Rissan an Almain, accompanied with two hundred men at armes and three hundred light horsemen, by whom at the first encounter they were repulsed; but Aluiano comming to the reskew with the residue of his companies, the skirmish was estoones recontinued with greater fury and danger, & no lesse doubtfull the issue, till Captaine Rissan being wounded in the face, was taken prisoner by Malatesta Sogliano. The chance of the fight threw the next calamity vpon the souldiers of Rissan, who seeking their safety by disorder and flying, retired in their calamity to Portonovo: but fearing they should fayle to defend the towne, that were not able to keepe the field, in their feare they fled from the place that earst they ran vnto for succour, abandoning the towne which immediatly was put to sacke, and many bodies of the countrey men slaughtred. After this Aluiano, in whom no one vertue was more commendable then his celerity, tooke the way to Osofo, which Frangipan had newly besieged with the other part of the Almains, who hearing of the comming of Aluiano, leuied their siege, notwithstanding they lost much of their baggage and artilleries, by a charge which the light horsemen gaue vpon their taile. By the same of these encounters, bringing alwayes with them their victories, almost the whole countrey of Italy became returned to the obedience of the Venetians: and Aluiano attempting a vaine enterprise vpon Goritia, retired with his army to Padoa, hauing by his owne certificate to Rome, subdued what by the sword and prisoners, two hundred men at armes, two hundred light horsemen, and two thousand footmē. But by reason of his departing, the number of the Almains being increased, they tooke of new Cromonio and Monfalcon, and constrained the Venetians to breake vp their siege from before Marano, where not many dayes before, Captaine Frangipan had bene taken by ambush and led prisoner to Venice: for the Venetians feeling supplies and succours to flocke, brake vp from thence in disorder, and as it were discomfited: and a litle after their estradiots being put to flight, Iohn Vetturio their assistant was taken with an hundred horsemen. These changes and alterations hapned oftentimes in Friull by the neighborhood of the Almains, who were not serued in that quarter with other souldiers then trayned and disciplined, and such as after they had ouerrun, and pilld those quarters, and that they perceiued the comming of the Venetian regiments, with whom many of the countrey ioyned, they retired immediately to their houses, returning alwayes to the seruice as occasion serued. The Venetians sent thither a new supply of companies, by reason whereof the Viceroy gaue order, that Alarson one of his Spanish Captaines, which lay betweene Este, Montagnano, & Cologno, should go to Friull with two hundred men at armes, an hundred light horsemen, & fife hundred footmen: but vnderstanding on the way that a truce was made in the countrey by reason of the haruest, he brake off his purpose and returned from whence he came.

Thus

Thus as the warres of Italy proceeded mildly and in an easie course, so also the practises of peace and agreement were not discontinued: for the French king being not altogether deprived of hope that the Swissers would consent to receive recompence of money in place of resignation of his interests and rights, sent to sollicite them in that point with great instance. But the Communalities were so farre estranged from the king and his affaires, that after they had compelled with many threatnings the gouernour of Genuea (when the ostages fled) to deliuer them as prisoner the president of Grenoble, whom the king had sent to that City to negotiate with them: they examined him with many torments, whether any of their nation receiued any increase of pensions, or intertaind secret intelligence with the French king: wherein no humanity nor iustification was sufficient to stop the course of their barbarous cruelty. Besides, the French king was not without suspicion, that the Pope, who for the diuersitie of his plots and intentions, was constrained to sayle with great warinesse amongst so many rockes, would secretly worke the Swissers not to couenant with the king without him: not that he doubted he would stirre them vp to make war, from which he dissuaded them so much as he could, but to remaine firme in the accord of Dion, or else for feare lest with this beginning they were brought to be separate from him. In these regards the king threatned that he would make hast to come to accord with the residue, for that he alone would not stand thrust out to the battery of the whole world: he was also wearie of the intollerable expences and insolencies of souldiers, for that hauing called into Fraunce twenty thousand Launceknights, whom he could not haue altogether, but when the king of England lay before Tournay, he would not send them backe againe, but retained them in Fraunce, to haue them ready for employment in due time according to occasion and necessity. These were they that did infinite harmes in his countrey, with whom his authority was little respected, that by force was not able to repress their insolencies. In these difficulties, and in so great confusion of affaires, the only matter that began to open to the French king the way to his surety and hope to repossesse his first power and reputation, was, the incredible discontentment that the king of England receiued of the renouation of the truce which his father in law had made: a matter contrary to his faith and promise many times reiterated, to make no couenant nor contract with the French king without his consent: he complained so much the more publikely of this, by how much it was the third time that his father in law had dallied with him, and therefore he began more and more to estrange his mind from the renewing of the war against the French. The Pope was not negligent to take the oportunity of the kings disposition, and began to worke with the Cardinall of Yorke to perswade his king, that contenting himselfe with the glorie he had gotten, and remembring what correspondencie of faith he had found in Cesar, in the king Catholike, and the Swissers, he would forbear to trauell any more with armes the Realme of Fraunce: which the Cardinall tooke vpon him, either for a feare he had that the French king (in case the king of England would inuade him) would make peace and parentage with Cesar and the king Catholike, as he alwayes threatned: or else he thought that peace ensuing betweene them, it were good for him to aduance himselfe as an actor, and win some fauour with the French king in an action which was not in his power to let. It is most certaine, that when the Pope was told that the French king would take armes against the Duchie of Millan, being once assured of the king of England: he answered, that he knew well enough the estate of that daunger, but on the other side was to be considered, the perill that might breede of the disunion of those kings: that in a matter of so great importance it was hard to ballance things perfectly, and to find a counsell that were wholly cleare from those dangers: That in all euent the Swissers would defend the Duchy of Millan: And lastly he answered that it was necessary in deliberations so vncertaine and difficult, to referre one part to the arbitrement of aduenture and fortune. Whatsoeuer was the cause, either for the authority of the Pope, or by the proper inclination of the parties, there began immediatly a practise of accord betweene the king of England and the French king: the motions and forespeeches of it were begun by the Pope with the Bishop of Yorke, and were with diligence caried into England, whither for that businesse the king sent the Generall of Normandy, but vnder colour to treat for the deliuey of the Marquis of Rhabelin: Assoone as he was come there was proclaimed a surceassing of armes by land onely betweene the two Realmes, so long as the Generall remained in England. The king of England inclination to peace was increased by the occasion of new iniuries: for where Cesar had promised not to ratify without him, the truce made by the king Catholike, he sent notwithstanding to the same king the instrument of ratification, and by a letter which he wrote to the French king, he ratified in the name of Cæsar, but retained the instrument the better to vse his artificiall senblaunces and demonstrations. Assooe as the negociation was begun betweene the two kings, the Pope desirous to purchase grace wch them both, sent by post into Fraunce the Bishop of Tricarò to offer him all his authority and faculty, and to that end he arriued in England by the sufferance of the sayd king. At the first opening of this practise for peace, there fell out many difficulties, for that the king of England demaunded Boleine in Picardy, with a great summe of money: but at last all the differences fell vpon the towne of Tournay, the king of England striuing to retaine it, and the French obiecting some difficultie: in so much as the king of England dispatched in post to the French king the Bishop of Tricarò, whom he charged, without imparting in what nature of particularitie consisted the difficultie, to declare to the king from him, that in regard of so great a benefite, he should not stand vpon so many futtle difficulties, but to consider that in a Prince reason should beare more imperie then passion. The French king, because he would neither do wrong to his Crowne, nor ill content his people, the towne of Tournay being verie Noble and loyall to the Crowne of Fraunce, caused the matter to be debated in full Councell, wherein was an assistaunce of the principall of his Court, who aduised him with one voyce to embrace peace, yea vnder the condition offered. And yet in that time the king Catholike did what he could to breake it, offering the king many plots and deuises, but specially to minister to him all his meanes and fauours to conquer the Duchie of Millan: but the aunswere being returned into England that the French king stood contented with the resolution of Tournay, the peace succeeded, and was concluded in the beginning of August betweene the two kings during their liues, and for one yeare after their death.

In the capitulation it was expressed that Tournay should remaine to the king of England, to whom the French king should pay fixe hundred thousand crownes, and that in such sort of distribution that the French king should make payment of an hundred thousand frankes every yeare, till the full payment was satisfied: That they should be bound to defend their estates mutually and reciprocally with ten thousand footemen if the warre went by land, and with fixe thousand onely if the warre were made by sea: That the French king should be bound to serue the king of England in all his affaires with twelue hundred launces, and the king of England likewise to minister to his seruices with ten thousand footemen: the expences to be defraied by either of them that should haue neede of the men: Both the one and other of them named the Scottish king, the Archduke, and the Empire: But Cæsar and the king Catholike were not named: The Swissers had a nominatiõ, but it bare a cõdition, that who so euer would defend against the French king, the estate of Millan, Genes, or Ast, should be excluded out of the dominatiõ. This peace which was made with a wonderful readinesse, was cõfirmed by the mariage of the kings sister of England with the French king, vnder condition that he should acknowledge to haue receiued foure hundred thousand crownes for her dowry. The contract or handfastings were made in England, where the king Catholikes Embassador was not in presence, for the great hatred the king of England bare to the king his maister. And euen vpon the conclusion and resolution of this peace, came to the Court of Fraunce the instrument of ratification which Cæsar had made, together with his commission and the king Catholikes, for conclusion of the mariage that was solicited betweene Ferd. d' Austriche and the second daughter of Fraunce not yet foure yeares of age: but the practise of that mariage vanished presently by reason of the peace that was now established: and the French king to satisfie better the king of England, gaue order that the Duke of Suffolke Capitaine generall of the Launceknights that were in his pay, should depart the dominions of Fraunce, in whom the honours and recompences that the king made to him ouercame all occasions of discontentment, the bounty and liberality to the one, being no greater then the affability and disposition of the other.

The Pope had also in this time made new aliances, for that according to his dissimulations, he wished on the one side that the French king should not recouer the Duchy of Millan, and on the other side he sought to entertaine the king and the other Princes as much as he could with sundry meanes: and therefore he had dealt with the king by the Cardinall S. Seuerin, who managed his affaires in the Court of Rome, that seeing the times suffered not to knit betweene them a more

great and more discovered alliance, that at least there might be layd a beginning and foundation, whereupon might be raised a hope to accomplish at another time a more strait intelligence: to those ends he sent him the particularities of articles. But the French king, notwithstanding he made demonstration to like well of the motion, did not answer so directly and speedily as was looked for: he was fifteene dayes in resolving, either for the impediment of other affaires, or that he expected some answer from another place, to the end to proceede according to the trayne of affaires, by which delaying the Pope entred into new capitulations for a yeare with Cesar and the king Catholike, which yet comprehended no other matter then the defence of their common estates: for the king Catholike was entred afore, not without cause into suspicion that he aspired to the Realme of Naples for Julian his brother, and had already entertained in that action some practise with the Venetians. This new confederation was scarcely established and concluded, when the French kings answer came. By it he approued all that the Pope had propounded, with this onely addition, that since he was to bind himselfe to the protection of the Florentines, of Iulio de Medici his brother, and Lawrence his Nephew, whom the Pope had aduanced to the administration of the affaires of Florence, that he would reciprocally be bound to the defence of the Crowne of Fraunce. But the Pope excused himselfe touching the action of capitulation with Cesar and the king Catholike, that seeing how long he deferred to make answer to a demaund so reasonable, he could not but enter into some doubt: and yet the confederation was but for a short time, & contained no matter preiudiciall to him, nor to hinder the perfection of the practise begun betweene them. These iustifications were accepted by the king, & so they passed the couenant, not by instrument authentike, to hold it more secret, but by a priuate writing subsigned by both their hands.

The peace betweene the king of England and the French king, was more sudden and easie then was expected, being vnlikely that so great hatreds redoubled by new iniuries, should with such facilitie be conuerted into amitie and alliance: haply the peace was not liking to the Pope, who as wel as others was perswaded, that there might grow betweene them rather a truce then a peace, or at least if it resolved to the nature of a peace, it would either intangle the king with harder conditions, or at least with obligation not to assaile the Duchie of Millan for a certaine time. But it brought incredible discontentment to Cesar and the king Catholike, who, as there is none euill in humane actions which hath not ioyned with it some good, so he assured notwithstanding that he receiued by it in his minde two contentments: the one, for that the Archduke his Nephew being out of hope to giue his sister for wife to the French king, and entring withall into distrust of the king of England, would be now compelled to do nothing without his counsell and authoritie: the other, for that the French king standing now in good possibilitie of children, the succession of Monsieur de Angoulesme was put in doubt, to whom he bare no little hatred, for that he nourished a great desire to restore the king of Nauarre to his estate: onely the Swissers gaue it out, that they reioyced all at that accord, notwithstanding they retained against the French king the same hatred they did before: the reason of their gladnesse grew of an opinion they had, that the French king being now at libertie, would take occasion to recontinue the warrè in the Duchie of Millan, by which meane they should estsoones begin to declare to all the world their vertue and their faith. And truly it was not to be doubted, that the French king, being now deliuered almost of all feare to haue warre beyond the Mounts, would not be touched with his old desire to reconquer the Duchie of Millan: onely it could not be discerned whether he would presently dispose himselfe to armes, or deferre it till the yeare following, for that the facilitie of the enterprise appeared to all men, but there was none that discerned any signe of preparations. In which vncertainty the Pope, notwithstanding that conquest was grieuous to him, stirred him vp not to deferre nor corrupt the present occasions: wherein he gaue him to vnderstand that all things were ill prepared to make resistance, both for that the Spanish armie was diminished and ill payd, the peoples of Millan reduced to great pouertie and straitnesse, and also none was able to aduance money to make the Swissers march. These perswasions caried so much the greater force and authoritie, by how much a little before the peace of the king of England, the Pope expressing a desire that the French king should recouer Genes, had giuen him a certaine hope to induce Ottavian Fregoso to compound with him. Assuredly the Pope in this action proceeded not with sinceritie and good meaning, which disposition moued in him as was supposed, for that seeing every one ill furnished, & no lesse doubting least the French would make that expedition without his counsell since he had his men at armes in readinesse, and many leauies of Launceknights at his deuotion, thought by that meane to preuent and winne his friendship: perhaps (and in this he proceeded with greater sutteltie) he was induced by the knowledge he had that the Emperour and the king Catholike were of opinion, that it was not lawfull to the French king to inuade the Duchie of Millan: an opinion which though they supposed to be true, yet the French king denied it, auowing that it was good in him, and he was not forbidden to take armes against the estate of Millan during the truce. By reason whereof, the Pope perswading himself that the king would not enter into the enterprise, thought he would expresse to him a good disposition of will, which also should serue him for excuse, if another time he required succours of him, and the matter succeeded according to his opinion: for, the king being resolved, either for that cause, or for his present necessitie of money, or lastly for the nearenesse of the winter, not to enter into armes afore the spring time, and making shew that he had confidence, that euen in that time the Popes fauour would not fayle him, he wrote answer to him, alleaging many excuses touching his deferring, but concealed the excuse of the truce which yet endured, and perhaps was the principall. Neuerthelesse he had desire to attempt the reconquering of Genes, or at least to succour the Lanterne, which the same yeare by his direction, had bin reuictualled many times with certaine proportions of victuals by the aduenture of sundry small vessels, who making as though they would enter the port of Genes, dissembled with the warders, and were profitable to them of the lantern. But at last the extremitie of victuals growing about all remedie, and no lesse diligence of the enemy to keepe them suppressed in that want, and their calamitie not able to temporise and expect any longer after succours, the garrison within, was driuen to yeeld it vp to the Genowais, who in their spite rased it from the foundations: a matter not a little displeasing to the king. And albeit the losse of this fortresse tooke wholly from the king all cogitations to vrge a present war against the Genowais, yet it diminished nothing his disposition to the action of Millan, whereunto he turned all his preparations, to inuade the yeare following that state with maine armies: he hoped that the Pope, both for the deuout intention he protected, and for the good disposition he had shewed in the negociations with the English and the Swissers, and lastly for that he had prouoked him to the enterprise, would ioyne with him & fauour the action, the rather for that he had made him many generall offers, and particularly had promised to ayde him to reconquer the Realme of Naples, either to the vse of the Church, or to the benefit of Iulio his brother: but there hapned new occasions for the which the king began to enter into some distrust of him. The Pope would neuer put end to the affaires that the Duke of Ferrara had with him, notwithstanding at his first aspiring to the Popedom, he had giuen him many faire hopes, promising to render to him Reggia, at such time as his brother the Cardinall should be returned from Hungaria: but he was more liberall to promise, then ready to performe, for that after the returne of his brother, he went alwayes in deferring with many excuses: and yet he forbore not to confirme to him the selfe same promises not onely with words, which might be vaine and vnassured, but by writing set out vnder the authoritie & testimonie of his name, in which he consented that he should take the reuenues of Reggia, as a degree to the whole which was to returne vnder his dominion: it was well knownen that the Popes intention was farre otherwise, dissembling in meaning the things he had simplie spoken with his mouth: his inclination and desire to occupie Ferrara were stronger then his promise and true meaning, whereunto happily he was caried by Albert de Carpie Cesars Embassadour & great enemy to the Duke, and also by the reasons of many others, setting before his eyes the glory of Iulio which was perpetuall, for that he had so greatly aduanced and augmented the dominion of the Church: and sometimes they preferred the occasion to bestow an honourable estate vpon Iulio his brother, who thirsting after too great things, and nourishing himselfe with hopes immoderate, had voluntarily consented that his Nephew Lawrence, should retaine at Florence the authoritie of the house of Medicis: so that the Pope being entred into these thoughts, obtained of Cesar who was alwayes needy of money, to deliuer to him in morgage the citie of Modona for fortie thousand duckats according to the capitulation made with him a little afore the death of the late Pope: he made his reckening to vnite that citie with Reggia, Parma, & Plasance, and to giue them in patronage or perpetuall gouernment to Iulio, adding to them Ferrara, if euer the occasion serued him to get it: he sought to do a thing by authoritie and fauour of times, which he could not do by equitie or lawfull course of iustice. But that maner of morgaging out the French king king into great suspicion, for that in his conceit it caried a manifest signe of straight alliance with Caesar, being also no lesse discontented that the Pope had giuen him money: whereof notwithstanding, the Pope excused himselfe, alleaging that Caesar had deliuered Modena to him for assurance of the inuacy which he had receiued of him afore. The king on the other side augmented his suspicion, for that vpon a victorie which the Purke got vpon the Sophy king of Persia, the Pope constituting it to the vniuersall danger of Christendome, wrote letters to all Princes, aduising the to depose armes amongst themselves, to resist or inuade the common enemies of the faith: he protested one thing vnder his letters, and practised another by operations secret, proceeding alwayes with faire apparances, and yet holding his intentions dissembled: but the matter that almost altogether disclosed his purposes, was, that he sent vnder the same shadow & pretence, to Venice, Peter Bembo his Secretarie, and afterwarde Cardinall, to dispose that state to agree with Caesar, towards whom the same difficulties continuuing that had bin before, the Venetians would not be wrought, but manifested to the French king the occasion of his comming: a dealing that did so much discontent the king, that the rather for that the Pope sought to depriue him of his succours at a time when he was ready to aduance armes, he renewed enmities with the king Catholike the ancient practices, & that either to the end the Pope should be touched with that feare, or at least if he were carelesse, to conclude absolutely: so hore he was about all other things in the expeditiō of Millan.

In those times there were not in any quarter of Italy other stirres or emotions, then against the Venetians, against whom were raised many secret ambushes and conspiracies: for, according to the testimonie of their Chronicles, certaine Spanish footemen faining to be fugitiues from the enemies campe, entred Padoa with mindes to kill Aluiano by direction of their Captaines, who hoped by the trouble and disorder of the people for the death of such a Captaine, they should be able with their campe to carie the towne: So different at this day are the stratagemes of war from the vertue of the auncients, who much lesse that they would suborne an instrument to so great a treason, but of the contrary hauing knowledge of it, they would lay it open to the enemies, to the end that by their vertue they might vanquish the infidelitie pretended: but the conspiracy being detected, the Magistrates committed the traitors to the due paines of their offence.

The Spanish armie, being now well diminished in numbers, lay incamped betweene Montagnano Cologno, & Este: and the Venetians, to the end to constraine them to returne to the kingdom of Naples, leauied an armie at sea, and made their Admirall or Captaine generall Andrew Gritti, whom they thought to send to inuade Pomilla: but for many difficulties that happened, that expedition went no further, being alsoone discontinued as it was thought vpon. Afterwarde the Spaniards came to the towne neare Vincenza, by the perswasion of the Almains that were within Verona, to the end to ioyne with them in an enterprise to wast and ouerrunne the corne of the Padoans. But after the Spaniards had taried in that place in vaine many dayes, being both reduced to a very small number, and not able to accomplish the promises vnder the which they had called them, they left there their enterprise to spoyle their corne, forbearing in such rashnesse to do a violence which would draw with it a greater reuenge then was the iniurie: and after they had got of the Almains xv. hundred footmen, they marched with seuen hundred men at armes, seuen hundred light horsemen, and three thousand five hundred Spanish footemen, to incampe before Citadella, wherein were three hundred light horsemen: they marched with great diligence all the night, & came to the place within two houres in the morning, & falling to batter it with their artilleries, they caried the towne the same day at the second assault: they made prisoners all the light horsemen that were there, and so returned to their campe lying within three myles of Vincenza, Aluiano making no resistance: he had receiued speciall commaundement from the Senate not to fight, and lay incamped vpon Brenta with seuen hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and seuen thousand footmen, and the place being strong by situation and defence, gaue him great oportunitie to vex the enemies with his light horseme. Neuerthelesse a little after, he retired to Barfollō almost afore the gates of Padoa, to the end to draw his army into a place of suretie: but the whole countrey being turned into spoyle & wast, by the pillages that were made by both the armies, the Spaniards hauing great want of victuals, retired to their first lodgings from whence they were come, leauing abandoned the Citie of Vincenza and the rocke of Brendola, which is about seuen myles from it. They relieued themselves with no other subsidies or paymētts, then with the taxes which they imposed vpon Verona, Bressia, Bergama, & other places thereabouts.

Vpon the retiring of the Spaniards, Aluiano bestowed himselfe with the armie betweene Batello and Padoa, the place being strong and proper: and there vnderstanding that there was within Este a very small & negligent garrison, he sent thither by night foure hundred horsemen & a thousand footemen, who being entred afore they were discerned, tooke fourescore light horsemen of Captaine Cornero, who saued himselfe in the Castell, and with that pray retired to the armie. But the Venetians hauing sent to the armie fresh bands of souldiers, Aluiano drew neare to Montagnano, and presented the battell to the Viceroy, who refused to accept it being farre inferiour in forces, and so retired to Polesina de Ronigno: an oportunitie agreeing to the courage of Aluiano, who hauing now no more impediments beyond Adice, made dayly incursions euen to the gates of Verona: the same so touching the Viceroy with the daunger of that Citie, that leauing within Polesina, three hundred men at armes and a thousand footemen, himselfe with the residue of the armie went to the defence of that Citie, disposing his forces not sufficiently according to the estate of his perils, but aswell as he was able according to the necessitie of the time.

Farre greater difficulties began to kindle towards Crema, which was almost besieged by the companies of the Duke of Millan bestowed in the townes and villages thereabouts: for the towne suffered great affliction of famine, great stroke of plague, great disorder of souldiers for want of pay, vniuersall lacke of munitions, with other particular prouisions which had bene many times demanded: aduersities which Ranse distrustful to be able no longer to sustaine, had made him almost to protest to the Venetians: & yet the same fortune following him with some fauour and countenance, he set vpon Silvio Saueila, whose strength was two hundred men at armes, an hundred light horsemen, and fiftene hundred footemen, and tharging him vpon the sudden, he so put him to discomfiture, that he fled to Loda onely with fiftie men at armes, seeking safetie rather at aduenture and by chaunce, then by confidence in his valour and prowesse. After this the Venetians reuiſtalled Crema the second time, and the Count Nicholas Scot put into it fiftene hundred footemen: in so much as both the forces and courage of Ranse rising increased, he entred a few dayes after the Citie of Bergamo, being called in by the townesmen, and the Spaniards flying to the Chappell. At the sametime also Mercurio and Malatesta Baillon tooke three hundred horsemen that were stragling without: but not long after, as Nicholas Scot went from Bergamo to Crema with fise hundred Italian footemen, he was encountred with two hundred Swissers, who ouerthrew his companies, and tooke him prisoner, & led him to the Duke of Millan, who caused his head to be stricken off. This losse of Bergamo awaked the Viceroy and Prosper Colonne, who went and incamped there with fise thousand footemen ioyned to the regiments of the Spaniards, and to the bands of the Duke of Millan: they planted their artilleries against S. Katherines gate, which though it made valiaunt resistance, yet Ranse being within, and seeing no possibilitie of long defence, left the towne to discretion, compounding to depart with the liues & goods of all his souldiers, but without sounding of trumpet, and with their ensignes wrapped vpon the Viceroy taxed the inhabitants of Bergamo at fourescore thousand duckats. But amid these actions and seruices at Crema and Bergamo, another exploit of greater worthinesse and more full of industry and celeritie, was executed by Aluiano in the towne of Ronigno, wherein was a garrison of two hundred men at armes Spanish, who thought themselves to stand in suretie, for that they had the riuer of Adice betweene them & the Venetian bands: Aluiano when was least doubt of him, cast a bridge neare the towne of Anguillaro, and by his industry and diligence made him a passage ouer the riuer, with a company of souldiers resolute and trayned, and no impediment of fluffe or baggage to hinder the enterprife, which was to be executed as much with celeritie as with valour. And as he was arriued at the towne, and had possessed the gate by the stratageme of a hundred footemen attired like paystants whom he had sent before vnder the colour and occasion of the market that was kept there that day, he easily made himselfe Lord of the whole, and tooke prisoners all the men at armes that he found there. In this enterprife he preuailed as much by pollicie as by vertue, which two properties in a man of warre are equally required: & turning neither the one nor the other into rigour nor bloud, he accompanied his valour with clemencie, and spared the liues of those whom his fortune & the course of armes offered to the edge of his sword. By reason of this aduenture, the residue of the Spaniards that were lodged at Polesina, retired into the Abbey, as to the strongest place in the countrey, and afterwarde leauing abandoned all Polesina and Legnagna, they fled towards Ferrara, carying with them more feare then hope of safetie.

safety. Immediately after the taking of Rouigno, Alusano marched with the army to Oppiano neare to Legnagno, whither he caused to be brought by the riuer certaine armed barks: & so he went on to Villacero neare to Verona, with this resolution, that if from that place he should not be able to take Verona, wherein was a strength of two thousand Spanish footemen, and a thousand Launceknights, at least he would keepe it in vexation and torment all the winter long: but being aduertised that an army of three hundred men at armes, five hundred light horsemen, and six thousand footemen of the enemies, were gone vp towards Legnagno, he came out of that place, fearing least they would either stop his victuals, or constraîne him to fight: he came within the view of them going towards Adice, which they passed at Albareto, with no small difficulty of victuals, by reason of the impediments which the light horsemen and the armed barks gaue them: and hearing thereof that the Spanish army after the recovery of Bergama, returned towards Verona, he determined to abide them no longer, for which cause he sent the companies of men at armes by land to Padoa, and passed in person by night by the riuer of Adice, with the footemen: he caried with him by water, the artilleries and baggage of the army, both to auoide the raines and mires which were great, and also for feare to be charged by the enemies to whom the waters that were then risen very high, gaue great impediments: and as soone as he had taken land, he retired with his accustomed celerity to Padoa, where the men at armes were entred two dayes before: afterwards he distributed his army betweene Padoa and Treuisa: and the Viceroy and Prosper Colonna, after they had sent their men to lye in garrison at Polesina de Rouigno, went vp to Isppruch to consult with Cesar vpon the estate of the affaires.

This yeare the countrey of Friull remained in tranquillity more then was wont for the taking of Captaine Frangipan, the only man that afflicted it more then any other: and therefore the Venetians knowing how much it imported them to retaine it, had refused to render it in exchange of John Pawle Baillon: he, for that solicitation had bene made at Rome to exchange him for Carnaiial, had got leaue of the Spaniards to go to Rome, giuing his faith to returne prisoner, if the permutation could not be agreed vpon: But for that during the treaty, it hapned that Carnaiial dyed, John Pawle affirmed, that by the benefit of the accident, he was at liberty, and so holding himselfe acquitted, he would no more returne to him whose prisoner he was. About these times and towards the latter end of the yeare, the families of the Adorney & Fiesquey entred Genes by night, by a secret fauor and working of the Duke of Millan, as was supposed: and albeit by conspiracy and intelligence they were come as farre as the pallace greene, yet their fortune being somewhat inferior to the valor of their enemies, they were chased out againe by Ottavian Fregoso, who going out against them euen vntill beyond the barriers accompanied with the footemen of his gard, fought valiantly in his owne person, and put them to flight: he was not otherwise wounded then in the hand, being recompensed (besides the honor of the victory) with the persons of Simbould de Fiesque, Ierome Adorno, and John Camilla of Naples, as his prisoners.

Amid these affaires of warre and seruice, it is not vnworthy of memory, to report that this yeare there were seene at Rome two Elephants, a nature of creatures which happily had not bene seene in Italy since the triumphs & publike playes of the Romaines. Emanuel king of Portugall sent to the Pope a very honourable Embassage, and withall; presented him with two huge and stately Elephants which his ships had brought by sea from India: their entring into Rome was celebrated with a very great concourse of people, some wondring at the strange forme and stature of the beasts, some maruelling to what vses thier nature inclined them, and some coniecturing the respects and purposes of such a present, their ignorance making their wonder farre greater then their reason.

But about those times the French king, who had other cares in his mind then pompes and spectacles, solicited all sorts of prouisions for the warre: and albeit he was determined resolutely to prosecute the enterprise of Millan, yet, desiring to be assured of the Popes will, he prayed him to declare himselfe in his fauour: wherein to draw him on the rather, he confirmed to him the offers he had made to him afore, assuring him for end, that if he were disappointed of his amity and the expectation of it, he would estoones ioyne himselfe to those conditions of Cesar, and the king Catholike, which he had already refused. In this demaund he debated with him the power of his kingdom, the strength of his confederations, and the proportion of succors promised by the Venetians: how at that time the forces of Cesar & king Catholike were smal in Italy, & how both the one and other were very needy of mony, and hauing no meane to pay their owne souldiers, much lesse that they were able to defraie the Swissers, who would not descend from their mountaines without good certainty of pay: That the popularity of Millan hauing proued the hard yoke of others, expected with an vniuersall desire the returne of the French iurisdiction: That the victory of Millan ought not to giue cause to the Pope to arme and band against him, both for that the greatnesse of the kings of Fraunce in Italy, and his owne authority, had bene in all seasons profitable to the sea Apostolike: And also standing alwayes contented with the things that of right appertained to them, they rose not higher into humors of ambition, nor once lifted vp their minds to aspire to the residue of Italy; a matter well testified by so many experiences: That the intention of Cesar & the king Catholike was far other, hauing aboue all other things thirsted after the whole Empire of Italy, & to subiect the regions thereof, either by armes, by alliances, or by pollicies: That they haue nourished a perpetuall disposition of mind, to reduce into thralldom, no lesse then other states, the sea Apostolike & the Popes of Rome; a desire which all the world knew to be very ancient & resolute in Cesar: That therefore, he wold at one time prouide for the safety of the Church, defend the common libertie of Italy, reestablish the greatnesse of the family of Medicis, & that he should not be curious to employ the present occasion, which wold not be eftsouenes presented, neither with the fauor of a better time, nor with the opportunity of better alliance then his. On the contrary, for Cesar & the king Catholike, there wanted no perswasions full of affection & efficacy, that he would ioyne with the for the defence of Italy: wherein was not forgotten to be alleaged, that if they conioyned altogether, they were able to chase the French king out of the Duchy of Millan, & their power was no lesse sufficient to defend it against him: That he was to remember the wrong that he had done to the king the yere past, sending mony to the army of the Swissers at such time as the French campe marched into Italy: Lastly that he had to consider that if the French king obtayned the victory of Millan, he would not be vnmindfull to reuenge all the wrongs he had receiued, and to assure himselfe of all dangers and suspitions to come. But the Pope was much more moued with the authority & offers of the Swissers, who, continuing in their first oblinacies, offered to command and defend with 6000 footmen the passages of the Mount Senis, of the Mount Geneure, & Finalo, receiuing one by the moneth 6000 florins of Rhein: and in case their payes might be aduanced to forty thousand florins by the moneth, they offered to inuade Burgundy with twenty thousand footmen. These perplexities made the Pope doubtfull in himselfe, & as feare withdrew him from the thing whereunto his will did driue him, so amid so many variations of mind, he deferred as much as he could, to declare his intention, giuing to euery one words and answers general. But being continually importuned by the French king, at last he made him this answer, that there was no person that knew better then himselfe, how much he was inclined to his affaires, being not ignorant with what affection he perswaded him to passe into Italy, at a time when he might haue victory without danger or great effusion of blood: That his perswasions, for that things were not kept secret as he had oftentimes required him, were now come to the knowledge of others, to the common detriment of them both: for that for his part, he saw himselfe in danger to be assailed by others, & that the difficulties were become the greater for the enterprize of the king, since others had giuen such order to their affaires, that he could no more enter into the victory but with manifest perill and lamentable slaughter of men: That the power and glory of the Turkes being newly increased by so great a victory and successe, it was neither conuenient to his condition, nor conformieable to the office of a Pope, either to giue fauor or counsell to Princes christened, to make war amongst themselues: and that therefore he could not otherwise aduise him, then to temporise & surcease, expecting some other facility & better occasion, which when it hapned, he should find in him the same disposition to his glory & greatnesse, which he hath so well discerned certaine moneths passed: an answer, which (albeit it did not in other sort expresse his conception) if it had come to the knowledge of the king, it had not only depriued him of all hope of the Popes fauor, but also haue certified him that the Pope would haue ioyned and banded against him, both with counsell and with armes: These were the accidents of the yeare 1514.

twelfth

But death, who bringeth with him this law and authority, to cut off the vaine counsels of men euen in their greatest hopes, was the cause that the warre so forward in apparence, burst not out to action with that speede that was expected: for, whilst the French king gaue himselfe ouer to behold too much the excellent beauty of his new wife, bearing then but eight years of age, age, nothing considering the proportion of his owne yeares, nor his decayed complexion, he fell into the rage of a feauer, which drawing to it a sudden fluxe, ouercame in one instant the life, that nature gaue quer to preserue any longer; he dyed the first day of the yeare 1515, a day of memory for the death of so great a Prince: he was a king iust and much beloued of his peoples, but touching his condition, neither afore he was king, nor after he had the Crowne, he neuer found constancy or stability in either fortune: for, rising from a small Duke of Orleance with great happinesse to the Crowne, & that by the death of Charles yonger then he, & two of his sons, he conquered with a very great facility the Duchy of Millan, and the kingdom of Naples, and almost all the residue of the regions of Italy being gouerned for many yeares by his direction: he recouered with a very great prosperity, the state of Genes that was in rebellion, and vanquished with no lesse glory the armies of the Venetians, being in person at both those victories. But on the other side, euen when he was in youth and best disposition of body, he was constrained by king Louis the xj. to marry his daughter, that was both barren and deformed, & yet could neuer get the good will nor countenance of his father in law: and after his death, such was the greatnesse of the Lady of Burbon, that he could neuer get the institution of the new king being then in minority, being almost compelled to retire himselfe into Brittaine: where being taken in the battell of S. Aubin, he liued two yeares in the calamity of a prisoner. To these afflictions may be added the siege & famine of Nouaro, the many discomfites he had in the Realme of Naples, the losse of the estate of Millan, Genes, and all the townes which he had taken from the Venetians: and lastly the grievous war he had in Fraunce against very mighty enemies, his eyes beholding into what lamentable perils his Realme was brought. Neuertheless afore he died, it seemed he had conquered all his aduersities, & fortune shewed good tokens of her reconciliation, both for that he had defended his kingdome against mighty enemies, & also established a perpetuall peace, & aliance with the king of England, with whom by how much his amity was great and assured, by so much it gaue him hope to be able to reconquer the Duchy of Millan.

After Louis the xij, ascended to the Crowne Francis d'Angoulesme, who was the next heire male of the blood royall, & of the same line of the Dukes of Orleance: he was preferred to the succession of the kingdom before the daughters of the dead king, by the vertue & disposition of the law Salike, a law very ancient in the Realme of Fraunce, which excludeth from the royall dignity all women, so long as there is any issue male of the same line. The world had such a hope in his vertues, & such an opinion of his magnanimity, & such a conceite of his iudgement & wit, that euery one confessed that of very long time there was none raised vp to the Crowne with a greater expectation: he was made the more agreeable to the fancies of men, by the consideration of his age, bearing the but xxij. yeres, his excellēt feature & proportiō of body, his great liberality, & general humanity, together with the ripe knowledge he had in many things: but specially he pleased greatly the Nobility, to whom he transferred many singular & great fauors. He tooke vpō him together with the title of the French king, the name of the Duke of Millan: a dignity which he sayd, appertained to him not only by the ancient rights of the Dukes of Orleance, but also as cōprehended in the inuestiture that was made by Cesar in the treaty of Cambray. Besides, there liued in him the same desire to recouer it that died with his predecessor: whereunto not only the working of his owne inclination, but the perswasions of all the Noble yong Gentlemen of Fraunce did induce him, no lesse by the memory of the glory of Gaston de Foix, the for the monumēt of so many victories as the kings reigning next afore had obtained in Italy: and yet (not to warne others afore the time not to prepare to resist him) he dissembled his desires by the aduise of his graue counsellors, & in the meane while fell to practise the amities of other Princes: from whom were sent to congratulate with him many Embassadors, whom he receiued with countenance affable & gracious, but specially the Embassadors of the king of England, who desired to continue with him the amitie begun with his predecessor, the iniuries he had receiued frō the king Catholike being yet fresh in memory. There came at the same time an Embassage from the Duke of Austrich, whereof the Lord of Nausan was chiefe, & in this Embassage, for the regard of the Earle of Flānders, whereof the kings of Fraunce are soueraignes, were discerned demonstratiōs of great submissiō, in acknowledging of superiority. Both the one & the other of these Embassages had a ready & happy expectation: for touching the king of Englād, the cōfederatiō betweene him & the late king was cōfirmed vnder the same cōditions so long as either of the should liue, reseruing a respite of iij. yeres for the Scottish king to enter in it: and for the Archduke, many differēces ceased, which many men supposed would haue giuen great impediments to the action of the peace: but the Archduke being now in full maority, & newly taken vpon him the government of his estates, was drawne to the peace for many causes: first for the instance of the people of Flanders, who would in no wise haue war with the Realme of Fraunce: secondly for a desire he had to be assured of such impediments as might be opposed against him by the French in the succession of the Realme of Spaine, where the death of his grand father shold happen: and lastly for that he thought it too great a danger, to dwell without any league of amity in the midst of the powers of England and Fraunce being conioyned together. And on the other side, the king desired greatly to take away all occasions that might restrain him to be gouerned by the authority & counsell of his grandfather, either by the fathers or mothers side: so that at last there was enacted betwene them in the towne of Paris, a perpetual peace & confederatiō, reseruing faculty to Cesar & the king Catholike (without whose authorities the Archduke contracted) to take their place in this peace within three moneths. In this capitulation was promised the accomplishment of the mariage betwene the Archduke & Lady Renee daughter to king Louis, solicited so many times before: & that the king should endue the mariage of Lady Renee with sixe hundred thousand crownes and the Duchy of Berry in perpetuity aswell for her children as for her. This dowry, in respect of her insufficient age at that time, shold be assigned to her assoone as she shold come to the age of ix. yeres, vnder this conditiō notwithstanding, that she shold renounce al rights of inheritance either by the father or mother, & namely such as might appertaine to her of the Duchy of Millan & Brittaine: that the king should be bound to ayde the Archduke with men & ships to go to the kingdom of Spaine, after the death of the king Catholike. At the request of the king, the Duke of Guelares was also named: & as some write, besides the matters afore rehearsed, it was agreed that in both their names ioyntly, Embassadors shold be set to the king of Aragon, to require him to publish the Archduke Prince of the realmes of Spaine, such is the title of him to whom the succession appertaineth: That he would render the kingdom of Nauarre, & abstaine fro the defence of the Duchy of Millā. Here it is not to be doubted, that both these two Princes making this confederation, looked not more to the present comodity that appeared, then to the obseruation of the same in time to come: for what foundatiō could be layd vpon the mariage that was promised, the Lady Renee beeing as yet scarcely foure yeares? And how could it please the French king that that damsell should be the wife of the Archduke, who (her eldest sister being the kings wife) had her action prepared vpon the Duchy of Brittaine? for that the Britons desiring once to haue a particular Duke, at such time as Anne their Duchesse married the second time, agreed that the Dukedome shold appertaine to the youngest of the children and descendants of her, if the eldest were preferred to the Crowne of Fraunce. In like sort the French king treated with the king Catholike to prolong the truce made with his predecessor, but to leaue out this condition not to molest the Duchy of Millan during the truce: he hoped he shold afterwards compound easily with Cesar. By which reason he kept in suspence the Venetians, who offered to renew the league made with his predecessor, wishing that he were in his liberty to accord with Cesar against them. But the king Catholike, notwithstanding he stood still possessed of his desire not to haue warre in the frontiers of Spaine, considering how great suspition the prolongation of the truce might giue to the Swissers, which might also be the cause that the Pope, who till then had bene in doubt, might turne to the French amity, refused at last to prolong the truce, but vnder the same conditions it had bene renewed with the last king: so that the Pope, shut out of that hope, and lesse expecting to contract with Cesar against the will and counsels of that king, reconfirmed with the Senate of Venice the league, in the same forme it had bene made with his predecessor. Now there remained the Pope & the Swissers: Touching the Swissers he required that they would admit his Embassadors, but they refused to giue the safe conduct, vsing the same rudenesse they had done before. And for the Pope, vpon whose will depended wholly the Florentins, he required no other thing of him, then that he would keepe him out of all bond, to the end that when by the traine of affaires he shold be counselled to resolue, it might be in his power to make choyce of the better, perswading him that he shold neuer find in any, either for his owne particular or for the aduancement of his house, a greater amitie, a more assured faith or more honourable conditions.

After the king had layd these foundations for his affaires, he beganne with great care to leue provisions prouisions of money, and to increase the bands of his men at armes to the number of foure thousand: he published that he made those preparations, not of intention to make war for that yeare, but onely to make head against the Swissers, who threatened him to inuade Burgundy or Dauphine, if he would not accomplish the covenants made at Dyon in the name of the late king. Many beleueed him in the semblances he made, th^o rather for the example of the kings of Fraunce, who haue alwayes forborne to entangle the first yeare of their raigne with new warres: but that coniecture caried not such impression in the minds of Cesar and the king of Aragon, to whom the kings youth was suspected, and the facilitie he had (more then other kings) to commaund the forces of the kingdome of Fraunce, and the loue of his people opening a way and readinesse to all that he would desire. Besides, they were not ignorant of the great preparations that king Lewys had left, the same making demonstration, that seeing he was assured of the king of England, he did not of new determine to make warre, but rather did entertaine and recontinue the plot that was laid before. Therefore because they would not be taken vnprovid^d, they fell to sollicite a confederation with the Pope and with the Swissers: but the Pope entertaining both parties with words gracious, and studying to nourish them all with diuerse hopes, deferred still to make any certaine declaration. And touching the Swissers, their former hatreds did not only still continue, but by time were made greater by increase of occasions, for that the causes that had taken their beginning of griefes publike, both for the deniall of the augmentation of their pensions, for the calling of Launceknights to the kings pay, and for the disdainfull and iniurious words deliuered against their nation, were redoubled and reincreased of priuate sorowes, displeasures, and ambitious desires: the same rising both vpon an enuy which the Commons bare to many particulars receiuing gifts and pensions of the King, and also for that those factions that most hotly objected themselues against such as followed the French amities, which commonly were called at that time Gallizzanti, being by that meane aduanced with the fauour of the Commons, into reputation and greatnesse, feared a diminution of their authority, if the common weale were of new reallied with the French: in so much that the counsell and disputation of affaires passing, not in a course of publike zeale, but with ambition and diffentions ciuill, and these bearing more credit then the Gallizzanti, it was obtained that they should refuse the vnreasonable offers of the French King.

In this disposition of minds and affaires the Embassadors of Cesar, King of Aragon, & Duke of Millan, assembled and met afore the Swissers, and contracted with them in the name of their Princes, a confederation for the defence of Italy, reseruing a respite for the Pope to enter, vntill the Monday of the lent following. In this capitulation it was agreed, that to compell the French King to disclaime all his rights & interets in the duchy of Millan, the Swissers receiuing monethly of the other confederates thirty thousand duckets, should inuade either Burgundy or Dauphin: & the King Catholike with a mighty army should make strong war vpon the realme of Fraunce, either vpon the side of Parpignan or Fontaraby. By these inuasions the confederates pretended, that the French King compelled to applie to the defence of his owne realme, should haue no opportunitie to molest the Duchy of Millan, though he had made a resolution agreeable to his will: this deliberation of the King was kept secret vntill the moneth of Iune, but at last, such was the greatnesse & care of the feuerall preparations, that they could no longer dissemble so great & apparent stirres. The prouisions of money were great and vniuersally reached to all the parts in the realme, he leauied many bands of Launceknights, he caused to be drawne towards Lyon great store of artilleries: & had lately sent into Gusen to leauy ten thousand footmen from the marches of Nauarre, vnder Peter of Nauarre, who was newly entred into his pay: this was the reason that he ioyned himself to the French seruice, the King of Aragon was discontented with him, & charged him most of all others with the ill successe of the battell of Rauenna: he wold not pay his ransom that was rated at 20000 duckets, which the late King had giuen to the Marquis of Rottelin to recompence in some part the hundred thousand Crownes which he had paid in England for his ransom: but the new King electing him to his seruice, defrayed his ransom at his first comming to the Crowne, & tooke him into his pay: which yet the said Peter of Nauarre wold not accept, til, for the safety of his honor, he had sent to the King of Aragon to excuse himself, that being abandoned of him, he gaue place to necessity, renouncing notwithstanding the estates which he had giue him in the kingdome of Naples. By this time it was manifest to all the world, that those preparations tended to make war vpon the Duchy of Millan, & that the king determined to go thither in person: so that the king began in demands and speeches disclosed, to require the Pope to ieyne with him, wherein he vsed besides, manie other instruments and perswasions, by the meane of Iulian his brother, who had newly taken for wife Hilberia sister to Charles Duke of Sauoy, & aunt to the king by the mothers side, his dowrie being assigned to him vpon the hundred thousand Crownes which the Pope gaue him. This gaue the king some hope that the Pope respecting the alliance, would be readily inclined to embrace his amitie, and the rather for that he hauing before treated with the king Catholike to marrie Iulian with one of his parêts which was of the house of Cardona, it seemed he had preferred that alliance to the other, more for his owne regard then for other reason: he doubted not also that Iulian would not willingly help forward for desire to get by that meane some estate, by the which he might furnish the expetices conuenient to so great a marriage, and withall the better to establish the perpetuall gouernment which the Pope had newly giue of the cities of Modena, Reggia, Parma, & Plaisance: which being not supported by the fauor of mightie Princes, he had litle hope to be able to keep the after the death of his brother. But the king began euen now to fall frō his hope, both for that the Pope had transferred to the king of Aragon for two yeares the moneys & collections called the Croissards of the realme of Spaine: whereof it was thought, he would draw by way of contribution about a million of duckets: and also for that he heard with great inclination Alberto Carpy and Ier. Vich Embassadors of Cesar and the king Catholike, who did not onely keepe almost alwayes about him, but also it seemed the Pope did communicate with them all his counsels: neuertheless the Pope entertained the king in suspence, both giuing good words, and shewing sound intention to those that negociated for the king, but alwayes without any resolution: as one that desired about all other things that the Duchie of Millan should not be possessed by forraigne Princes: therefore the king, whom it imported to be better assured of his intention, addressed to him new Embassadors, amongst whom was William Buda of Paris, a man in science of humanitie either Greeke or Latine, of most absolute and onely erudition of all the learned men of our time: afterwards he sent to him in the same Legation Anth. Maria Paluioism, a man verie acceptable to the Pope, seeking to omit no meane wherein might be any oportunitie to aduance his purpose: but all was labour lost, for that before his coming, euen from the moneth of Iuly he had very secretly contracted with the others for the defence of the estate of Millan: notwithstanding seeking to keepe couered that resolution untill the necessity of affaires constrained him to declare himself, and desiring withall to publish it with some excuse: sometimes he required the king to cōsent that the Church might retain Parma & Plaisance, & somtimes he preferred other demands, to the end that any one of the things which he demaunded being refused, it might appeare that necessitie more then will, had caried him to knit with the kings enemies: and at that time, distrusting not to be denied of some one of those things which altogether he would not prefer without some honest colour; he made diuerse answers doubtfull, futtle, & irresolute. But as for the doings of mortall men there is reserued in the infallible iustice of God an equall measure and like proportion of recompence, so there were others that vsed towards him the same sleights and futilities wherewith he abused the king: for Ostauian Fregosa Duke of Genes, fearing on the one side the great preparations of the French king, and on the other side holding for suspected the victorie of the confederates for the inclination of the Duke of Millan and the Swissers to their aduersaries, had made a very secret cōtract with the French king by the mean of the Duke of Bourbon, and yet verie firmly assured the contrarie to the Pope, both in the time of the action, and after it was resolved: yea, because Ostauian was one of the ancient friends of the Pope, and of his brother Iulian, to whom they had borne no small fauours at such time as he was created Duke of Genes, the Pope did so simply beleeeue him, that the Duke of Millan suspecting things for the rumours and brutes that went, and determined to inuade him with foure thousand Swissers already come to Nouaro, together with the faction of the Adorney and the Fiesquey, the Pope was the cause that the enterprise brake and passed no further.

Ostauian Fregosa Duke of Genes cōpōnds with the French king.

This was the capitulation of Ostauian Fregosa: That the towne and iurisdiction of Genes should be rendred to the king, together with the castle: That Ostauian should beare no more the name of Duke, but take vpon him the name of perpetuall Gouernour of Genes for the king, with power to dispose the offices of Genes: That the king should giue vnto him 20 hundred men at armes, the order of Saint Michael, and a yearely pension during his life: That the king should

Should not recdifie the fortresse of Codisa verie hatefull to the Genowayes, and should also re-continue and graunt to the citie all those capitulations and priuiledges which had bene reuerfed and burned by king Louys: That he should giue a certaine proportion of Ecclesiastike reuenues to Pederico Archbishop of Salerno, and bother to Ostauian, and to himselfe certaine places in Prouence, if euer it hapned that he were chased out of Genes. Whē these matters were spread abroad, it was not hard for Ostauian to iustifie his resolution, for that it was discerned of all men, that he had great reason to feare the Duke of Millā & the Swissers: the only thing that was noted in him, was, that he had so many times denied the truth to the Pope, of whom he had receiued so many benefites, and had broken his promise and faith, in entring into couenants without his priuie: and yet in a long letter which he wrote to him afterwards for his iustification, he discoursed at large with great care and humilitie, the causes that had moued him, together with all the excuses wherin he might reasonably defend his honour and the propertie of the action: he told him nothing was done in despising the respect and deuotion which he owed him, acknowledging in his person the full maietie of Pope, and his chiefe raiser and aduancer: his conclusion was, that it would be more hard for him to be iustified, if he wrote to persons priuate, or to any Prince, that measured the affaires of estate according to regards priuate: but writing to a Prince wiser aboue all others of that time, and to whose wisdom it was seene he could not otherwise saue his estate, that it was matter superfluous to offer excuses to him that so well vnderstood and knew what was lawfull to Princes, or at least what they were wont to do, not only when they were reduced to those necessities, but also when they went about to increase or make better the conditions of their estate.

But by this time matters were wrought from words & counsels to deeds & execution: for the king that was now come to Lyons accompanied with the whole presence of the Nobles of Fraunce & Dukes of Lorraine & Gueldres, cauled to march towards Italy his power, which was the most mightie & flourishing armie that had bene seene of long time: he stood assured to haue no troubles beyond the Mounts, for that the king of Aragon, who fearing at first least so great preparations might be turned against him, had armed his frontiers, and perpetually vnitied the realme of Naples to the kingdome of Castille, to make those peoples more readie to defend it: and as soone as he had credible vnderstanding, that the warre should be made in Italy, he dismissed all the companies he had leauied, holding no more reckening of his promise made that yeare to the confederates to make warre vpon Fraunce, then he had done of all other couenants and contracts made to them the yeares before: so ready he was to be caried by occasions, and so light to lay downe his faith and word, more to the profite of his affaires, then preservation of his reputation and honor.

At the brute of the descēding of the French king, the Viceroy of Naples, who hauing bin many moneths as it were in truce with the Venetians, & now come to the country of Vincenza, to draw neare to the enemies that lay incamped in a verie strong place neare Vincenza: remoued his army to Verona, to go (as he said) to the succours of the Duke of Millan: and the Pope dispatched into Lombardy his companies of men at armes, with the regiments of the Florentines, vnder the gouernement of his brother, chosen Captaine of the Church, to minister likewise to the aide of Millan, according to his resolution not many dayes before with the other confederates. Neuerthelesse he forbare not to preserue in his faire shewes and semblances, making the world to beleue that he sent out that strength only for the gard of Plaisance, Parma, and Reggia: wherein he had so cunningly proceeded with the Embassadors of Fraunce, that the King now doubting no more to fall to agreement with him, had dispatched from Lyons to his Embassadors, a new commission, with authoritie to conclude, consenting that the Church should remaine possessed of Plaisance and Parma vntill he had satisfied it with such a recompence as the Pope should hold himselfe contented. But all these remedies were but cures vnperfect, whose sores burst out after againe: they were shadowes whose bodies were farre off, yea they serued for nothing, for those causes that hereafter shall be expressed: for it was a destinie set downe that the defence or losse of the Duchy of Millan should be excuted only with the danger & bloud of the Swissers, who not staying for any impediment or small quantity of money in prest, descended by such heapes and trowpes into the Duchie of Millan, that their armie there was aboute twentie thousand, of whom tēue thousand were drawne neare to the mountaines. It was a counsell taken Frenchmen.

This counsell of the Swissers troubled greatly the mind of the king, who afore had promised to himselfe an assured victorie by the greatnesse of his forces, not remembering that the successe of warre respecteth other considerations then the multitudes of souldiers: he had in his armie two thousand fiue hundred launces, xxij. thousand Launceknights led by the Duke of Gueldres, ten thousand footmen of Peter Nauarre, eight thousand Frenchmen, and three thousand labourers that were paid according to the rate of the other footmen. The king considered with his Captains that in regard of the valour of the Swissers, it was impossible to driue them from those straight and strong passages, but with a farre greater number: and yet considering the nature of those straights, so great numbers could not be but hurtfull to the seruice: and much lesse in so litle time could they do any thing of consequence, and least of all be able to nourish any long season so great an armie in a countrey so barraine, notwithstanding there was continuall traffike of victuals to the mountaines. Amid these difficulties, some of the Captaines that were of opinion rather to diuert and draw them away then to set vpon them, gaue counsell to send out eight hundred Launces through Prouence, and Peter Nauarre by sea with his ten thousand country men, which should all ioyne together at Sauonne: others were of aduise that to go so farre about were to loose too much time, that it would weaken the armie, and increase too much the reputation of the enemies, who would not doubt to boast that they had not the courage to encounter with them: so that it was resolued, that not retiring so much from that straight, they should assay to passe by some other way, that either was not kept by the enemies, or at least not so strongly defended: and that Emard de Prio with foure hundred Launces and fiue thousand footmen should take the way to Genes, not in hope to draw them downe from their mountaines, but to make warre vpon Alexandria and the other townes beyond Paw.

There be two wayes in the Alpes that leade ordinarily from Lyons into Italy, the one is called Monfane (a mountaine within the iurisdiction of the Duke of Sauoy;) it is the shortest way, the straightest way, and most beaten way: the other is called the mount Geneure within the gouernment of Dauphine, a way longer then the other, and leades by crookings and turnings to Grenoble: both the one and the other falleth into the way of Susa, where the plaine beginneth to enlarge: but the French armies are alwayes wont to passe by the mount Geneure, notwithstanding it be a way somewhat longer, because it hath a facility of passage, & more cōuenient to draw the artillery. The Swissers that were careful to keep those two passages & the other paths therabouts, were lodged at Susa, the cause was, that the passages which be lower drawing towards the sea, were so straight & steepe; that it seemed impossible to draw any artillerie, being verie hard to passe thither the horses of so great an army. On the other side Triunlce, to whom the king had giuen that charge, being followed with verie many pyoners, and hauing about him men painefull & experienced to draw artilleries, whom he sent to search the places that were there, went sounding the passages, if he could find libertie of way without impediment of the Swissers: by which occasion, the armie that for the most part was disperfed betweene Grenoble and Briançon, marched slowly, expecting what should be determined, whereunto there was a constraint by a necessitie to abide the prouisions of victuals.

The king of About this time the king of England sent a Gentleman to the French king, who was now departed from Lyons, to tell him on the behalfe of his king, that he ought not to passe into Italy for feare England sends to trouble the vniuersall peace of Christendome. The cause of so great variation and change of to the French that king was, that he was iealous of the alliance betweene Fraunce and the Archduke, fearing king not to least the affaires of that Crowne would take a course too happie: in which considerations he began passee into Italy afterwards to giue willing care to the Embassadors of the king Catholike, who with continuall reasons put into his mind, how hurtfull the greatnesse of the French king would be to him, in whom he could not hope for any other affection then of an enemy, as well for the naturall hatred of that nation, as for his late actions of war and hostility done against him: but the thing that most moued him, was the emulation and enuie of his glorie, which he thought would be raised to too high degrees if he wonne the victory in the state of Millan: he thought in himselfe, that notwithstanding he found his kingdome in rest, and verie populous for the long peace it had had liued in, together with a great masse of treasure which his father had gathered, yet he neuer had the courage till within certaine yeares, to inuade the Realme of Fraunce, alone and enuironed with so many enemies, and broken with so many aduersities: That now the French king, somewhat younger then he was, at such time as he came to the crowne, albeit he found his kingdome ouerweared and made poore with so many warres, durst yet in the first moneths of his raigne, go to an enterprize, for the which so many Princes were banded against him: That touching him, with all his huge preparations, and so many occasions, he had not brought into England any other profite then the Citie of Tournay, and that with expences intollerable and infinite: But the French king would returne with great glory into his kingdome, bringing with him the conquest of so braue a Duchie, and would open the way, and haply take the occasion afore he retired his armie out of Italie, to inuade the Realme of Naples. These were the motions that easily renewed in his mind his auncient and naturall hatred: but for that he was not at that time prepared to giue impediment to the French king with armes (wherein haply he sought some occasion and colour) he thought good to send him this message. The king nor his army forbore not for al that to march, taking their way from Lyon to Dauphine, where he met with the armie of the Launceknights, otherwise called the blacke bāds, guided by Robert de la Marche, together with all the regimēts of low Almaines, so greatly esteemed for their valour, their faith, and loyaltie, which they had alwayes shewed in the French seruices.

At this time Iohn la Trinuice aduertised the king that his artilleries might be caried ouer the Mounts, neare the Alpes of the sea descending toward the Marquisdome of Saluzze: he wrote that the passage was full of many difficulties, but yet the strength of men & instrumēts would make that easie which by nature was hard: and because on that side, neither on the tops of the Mountaines, nor in the entry of the vallies, there was no gard, he perswaded the king that it was better to assay to overcome the difficulties of mountaines and the straitnesse of vallies (an action with paine, but not with daunger of men) then to aduenture to winne the passages from the Swissers, whose valour was not more terrible then their obstinacie, being desperate either to vanquish or lye. Besides, the armie could not stay there many dayes, if any resistance were made, for that no power or preparatiō was able to bring through places so impassable & barreine, sufficient prouisiō of victuals to feede so many mouthes. This counsell was allowed and followed, and immediatly he artillerie that lay in a place conuenient to be turned on all parts, began to march that way. And as Trinuice had aduertised the king that the difficultie to passe the artilleries was very great, so also he sayd the experience would be found harder, when it was put to action and triall: for first they must of necessitie mount vpon very high and sharpe mountaines, and that not without extreme difficultie, both for that there was no oportunitie of pathes or wayes, nor yet so much argenesse of roomth as the artilleries contained, but such as was made by the ayde of the pyoners from hand to hand. There were many of those labourers that marched before, whose seruice was ready, sometimes to breake downe and enlarge the straites, and sometimes to digge vp the hillocks and lumpes of earth that gaue impediment to the passage of the artilleries: from the tops of those mountaines they descended by broken cliffes, whose onely aspect gaue feare to the beholders, into most deepe vallies of the riuer of Argeniero. By the difficultie of these cliffes oftentimes the artilleries could not be sustained, neither with the horses that drew them, whose number was great, nor with the shoulders of the labourers that guided the, & therefore very often they were driuen to dismount them, and in fastning them to great cables, they found a way to make them descend by the hands of the footemen, whose readinesse in these painefull actions, was nothing inferiour to the greatnesse of the trauell. The labour ceased not when they had overcome the first mountaines & the first vallies, for that they found others, which of necessitie they must passe with the same difficulties. At the last, about the end of fise dayes, the pollicie of the leaders and paines of the labourers opened a way for the artillerie through the mountaines into the enlarged places of the Marquisdome of Saluzza: but with such hardnesse and importunitie of trauell, that if either they had encountred any resistance, or the Mountaines had bene couered with snowes as they were wont to be the most part of the yearē, it is most certaine that they had takē in vaine so great trauell. The matter that deliuered them from the resistance and impediments of men, was the opinion and perswasion of the troublesome & impassable mountaines, which abusing the Swissers with security, made them to lodge without suspicion at Susa, carefully garding and watching the places which of necessity must be passed by such as descend the mount Senior Geneura, or the mountaines adioyning to the: & the season of the yeare, being then vpon the tenth of August, had taken from them the impediment of snowes which were already melted. At the same time passed the men at armes and bands of footemen, not without the same difficulties, some by that way, and some by the passage called la Dragoniera, and the residue by the high tops of the rocke Perotta & Cunie, passages more lower towards Prouence. By these passages Monsieur Palissa passed, to whom an occasion was offered to do an act worthy of memory: he departed from Singlaro with foure cornets of light horsemen, and after he had marched long with great diligence by the guiding of the countrey men, he arriued without any suspicion at Villafranco, a towne seuen myles from Salsissa, and of the which goeth a greater fame and reputation then the qualitie of the towne requireth, for that the head of that notable riuer of Pau riseth out of a place very neare it: in that towne lay lodged with his companies, Prosper Colonno, doubting no daunger by the far distance of the enemies, in whom he feared not that diligence and celeritie, which himselfe being of nature slow and heauie, had not wont to vse: some suppose that he meant the same day to depart and ioine his strength with the Swissers: a matter wherein he might in some sort abuse his carefulnesse. But what propertie of destinie soeuer did guide him, it is sure that as he was set at the table at dinner, the bands of souldiers of Palissa arriued, being not discerned of any, till the certainty of the perill tooke away all their pollicie to auoyd it: they were vpon the counterscarpes of his lodging, afore he could be perswaded that they were come: so profitable is celeritie in an enterprise, and so effectually sudden feare against enemies surpriseth: he was holpen in this action (besides his industry and speed) by the townesmen, with whom Palissa thirsting after so goodly a pray, had first secretly conspired, and by their aydes was seased vpon their scouters and sentinels: so that Prosper Colonno a Captaine of so great name, and in whom aswell for his authoritie in gouerning an armie, as for the credite he had in the Duchie of Millan, rested no small importance for this war, was made prisoner the xv. day of August, far otherwise then appertained to his ancient glory: Peter Alargano a Romaine was companion with him in this fortune, together with part of his companies, and the residue at the first brute fled in their feare to diuerse places.

The descending of the French armie ouer those inuincible passages, together with the calamitie of Prosper Colonno, chaunged the counsels of euery one, and confused wholly the estate of all affaires, kindling new dispositions in the mindes of the Pope, the Viceroy, and the Swissers; for the Pope, who was constantly perswaded, that the French king could not passe the Mounts for the impediments of the Swissers, and reposing no lesse in the vertue of Prosper Colonno, was now galled and grieued in courage, commanding his Nephew Laurence Captaine generall of the Florentines to march but slowly: To him he had giuen charge to leade the armie into Lumbardu, for that Julian his brother was constrained to abide at Florence by the occasion of a long & painefull feuer: this Laurence being come to Modena three dayes after the aduenture of Prosper, tooke occasion to recouer the rocke of Rubiero that had bin occupied by Guido Rangon, for the which he payd him at last two thousand duckats, and consumed many dayes in the countrey of Modena and Reggia. Moreouer, the Pope hauing recourse to his accustomed practises, dispatched very secretly to the French king, Cintio his familiar friend, both to excuse himself of things that had bene passed till that day, and also to begin, by the meane of the Duke of Sauoy, to sollicite to compound with him, to the end that by that beginning he might haue more felicitie to passe further, if the defence of the Duchie of Millan fell not out well. But the Cardinall of Bibienna with certaine others, carried more by their priuate passions, then by the respects & interests of their Prince, induced him to take a counsell more constrained and sudden: for they told him there was daunger, for the reputation of the succeffe and fortunes of the French, and haply by the perswasions & ayde of the king, the Duke of Ferrara would not now stirre to recouer Modena and Reggia, and also the Bentinoleis, to repesse their estate in Bologna: and therefore as amid so many other trauels and perplexities, he should finde it a very hard matter to contend against so great a number of enemies: so, it imported him much more both in safetie and discretion of counsell, to labour to winne them with some propertie of benefite, and in all chaunces and chaunges, to make them his assured friends, dissembling the remembrance of iniuries past, till time brought about a better opportunity to reuenge. They aduised him to reestablish the familie of the Bentinoleis within Bologna, and to restore to the Duke of Ferrara, Modena and Reggia: a counsell which he had presently sently put in execution, had it not bene for the contrary working of Iulio de Medicis Cardinall and Legate of Bologna, whom the Pope had sent thither to the end that in so great accidents, he might sustaine things on that side, and remaine as it were a moderator and counsellour of the youth of Lawrence: he was touched with the displeasure of the infamie that would haue fallen vpon the Pope by a counsell so full of cowardise, which no doubt would haue bene greater then had bene the glory of Iulio; in getting to the Church so great a iurisdiction: he was also moued with griefe, that it would make infamous the memorie of his legation, wherein being scarcely in the first action, he should restore Bologna the principall Citie of the whole Ecclesiastike state, into the power of her auncient tyrants, abandoning to pray & spoile so great a nobilitie, which in fauour of the Apostolike see had openly conspired against them. In these respectes he dispatched an expresse messenger to the Pope, whom with reasons & with requestes he brought againe to a counsell more honorable and safe. Norwithstanding this Iulio was a bastard; yet he was made Cardinall by Leo in the first moneths of his Pontificacie, following the example of Alexander the sixt in the effect, but not in the manner: for Alexander at such time as he created Cardinall, Cesar Borgia his sonne, made to be proued by witnesses that deposed the truth, that his mother at the time that she was conceiued of him, had a husband, inferring thereupon according to the opinion of the lawes, that the sonne was to be iudged to be begotten rather of the husband then of the adulterer. But touching Iulio, the witnesses preferred the grace and fauour of men afore the truth, for that it was deposed that the mother of whom he was begottē, being yet a maide & not married, & afore she deuided her body to the deuotion of Iuliano, had of him a secret consent to be his wife.

These new accidents were likewise the cause that the Viceroy behaued himselfe farre otherwise then he would haue done: for, being not yet departed from Verona, both for that he could not make his souldiers march without money, and also expected new companies promised by Cesar who was now come to Yspruch, to the end to leaue sufficient garrison within Verona and Brescia as neede required, he began with these and other excuses to temporise and deferre, to see what might afterwarde happen to the Duchie of Millan.

These matters also moued the Swissers, who retired to Pignorolo immediatly after the descending of the French armie: and albeit vnderstanding afterwarde that the King who was passed the mounts, mustred his people at Thurin, they were gone to Cyua, and had taken it and sackt it, onely for that they were refused victuals, doing the like at Vercelly almost afore the kings eyes being at Thurin: yet being at last drawne into Nouaro, and those factions of them that were not so farre estranged from the French amities, taking courage and disclosing themselves more and more in their aduersities, they began to treat of composition with the king.

About this time, those regiments of the French which marched by the way of Genes, with whom were ioyned foure thousand footemen waged by the Genowayes, by the working of Octavian Fregosa, became Lords of the whole countrey on this side Pau, seizing first vpon the towne of Castellaccio, Alexandria, and Tortono. And the king that by this time was come to Vercelly, & had there the first aduertisement that the Pope was declared against him, which the duke of Sanoy signified in his name; a matter which albeit did much vex & discontent the king, yet not suffering counsell & iudgement to be troubled with anger or disdaine, & because he would not kindle him to the vttermost, he caused to be proclaimed publicly, as well through his armie, as amongst the regiments that had taken Alexandria, that no man should molest or inuade in any sort the lands of the Church. The king remained many dayes at Vercelly expecting the issue of the parley with the Swissers, who though they entertained the practise, yet on the other side they shewed themselves full of varietie & confusion: for at Nouaro where they were, they began to fall into tumult, taking their occasion vpon the breach of the king of Aragon, for that the payes he had promised were not yet come. They tooke also by force from the officers of the Pope, the money he had sent to be orderly distributed amongst them, & in the same fury they departed from Nouaro, with intention to returne into their countries: a matter which many sortes of them did require, who hauing spent three moneths in the spoiles of Italie, & now laden with money & booty, desired to couey in safety to their houses, the riches they had gottē: they were no sooner gone out of Nouaro, then the money which was due for the king of Aragons portion, was sent: and albeit they rauished it from the officers, & by violence made themselves possessed of it, yet weighing the infamies that followed for the most part such insolent and rash dealings, they eftsouones turned their furie into discretion, and restored both the one and the other summes to receiue them orderly at the hands of the officers. Afterwardes they went to Galero, expecting another strength of twentie thousand footemen which was sayd to be newly arriued, and three thousand went with the Cardinall of Syon to be employed for the gard of Pania. By which occasion the king (whose hope of agreement did diminish for these variations) departed from Vercelly to go to wardes Millan, leauing within Vercelly with the Duke of Sauoy, his bastard brother, Monsieur Lawtrech, and the Generall of Mil-lan, to continue negociations begun with the Swissers. And because after the departing of the Swissers out of Nonaro, he had got the towne, he left the Castell besieged, which feeling the execution of the artilleries, yeelded within few dayes, reseruing the liues & goods of those that kept it. Afterwardes the king to whom Pania yeelded, passed the riuer of Thezin, and the same day Iohn la Trinuice ranne vp with a part of his companies to S. Christophers neare to Millan. Afterwardes the confidence of his valour caried him vp euen to the suburbes of the gate of Thezin, hoping to be receiued by them of the towne, who ill contented with the pillages and ransoms of the Swissers, desired to returne vnder the iurisdiction of the French: he saw also a more facilitie in this enterprise, for that the towne was naked of souldiers. The people of Millan had a great feare of the Swissers, and the memorie was yet greene of the afflictions they had suffered the yeare before, when they mutined in fauour of the king, the Swissers being retired from Nonaro: the same restraining them now to better counsell, and to temporise and expect the issue of things, notwithstanding they wished the victorie to fall vpon the king. Therefore they sent to Trinuice to desire him to passe no further, and the next day dispatched Embassadours to the king being at Bussaloro, to beseech him, that resting contented with the disposition of the people of Millan well inclined to his crowne, and ready to giue victuals to his armie, he would not demaund of them a more manifest declaration: a matter which would aduance nothing for the substance of the warre, no more then it had serued or ayded the yeare before his predeceffour, but brought vpon them great domages. They wished him to march and stand assured that the towne of Millan should be ready to open their gates to receiue him, at such time as he should be maister of the field. The king receiued them with good countenance and affabilitie, and albeit at the first he was displeased that they had not receiued Trinuice, yet he answered now that he was contented to be conformable to their demaundes. From Bussaloro the king marched with his armie to Biagressa, and whilest he remained there, the Duke of Sauoy, after he had giuen audience to twentie Embassadours of the Swissers sent to him at Vercelly, and going afterwardes to Galero accompanied with the bastard and other deputies for the king, contracted a peace with the Swissers in the kings name vnder these conditions: That there should be betweene the crowne of Fraunce and nation of Swissers a perpetual peace during the kings life & ten yeares after his death: That the Swissers & the Grisons should make restitution of those vallies appertaining to the Duchie of Millan which they had occupied: That they should acquite that estate of a bond to pay yearely a pension of forty thousand duckats: That the king should indue Maximilia Sforce with the duchy of Nemours with a yearely pension of twelue thousand frankes, a company of fiftie Launces, and a wife of the bloud royal: That he should restore to the Swissers the yearely pension of fortie thousand frankes, and defray the pay of three moneths to all the bands of Swissers that were already in Lombardie or on the way to come thither: That he should pay to the Cantons (at termes and times) the fixe hundred thousand crownes promised in the accord of Dyon, and three hundred thousand for the restitution of the vallies: That he should entertaine continually in his pay foure thousand of them. In this peace they named by common consent the Pope, so farreforth as he would render Parma and Plaisance: also they comprehended the Emperour, the Duke of Sauoy, and the Marquis of Montferat, without making any mention at all of the king Catholike: the Venetians, nor any other Italiā. But this peace was made and broken almost in one day, by the comming of new bands of Swissers, in whom for the memorie of their victories past, was a settled hope to carie from that war no lesse quantities of spoyles & riches, then the wealth which they saw their other countrey men loaden withall. And for that cause much lesse that they would heare speake of the peace; but of the contrarie, to dissolue and breake it, they refused to restore the vallies: in so much as the first bands being not able to retire them from these furies, five and thirtie thousand drew to Monso to lye in the suburbes of Millan, Alberto Perro a notable Captaine being gone from them with many ensignes along the way of Coma, which way the king altogether left free and open. Thus the

the peace being no sooner made then broken, things returned to the same difficulties they suffered before, yea they brought with themfarre greater doubts for the new armies and forces that were approached neare the Duchie of Millan: for, the Viceroy leauing for the gard of Verona Marke Anth. Colonne with an hundred men at armes, and sixe hundred light horfmen, and within Bressia twelue hundred Launceknights, was come, at last to lodge vpon Paw neare to Plaisance, hauing in his armie seuen hundred men at armes, sixe hundred light horfmen, & sixe thousand footmen, with a bridge ready prepared to passe the riuer. And to leaue him no occasion to complaine, Laurence de Medicis hauing with great watch & gard remained many dayes at Parma with the armie, was come from thence to Plaisance: the army contained at that time seuen hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horfmen, & foure thousand footmē: he had sent afore a troupe of foure hundred light horfmen to the Swissers during the negociation of the accord: a band which he appointed at their request to serue them to fetch in victuals, and were guided by Mucio Colonne and Lodowike Count de Perillano, the one a Captaine of the Church, & the other a Commander for the Florentines: he aduanced that expedition not so much for any desire he had to aid the cōmon cause, as to giue to the Swissers no occasion to comprehend the Pope within the peace if they accorded with the French king. On the other side Bartlemew Aluiano, who had sent word to the king that he would so intangle the Spanissh armie that they should haue no meane to hurt him, as soone as he vnderstood the Viceroy was departed from Verona, went from Polesina, & passing the riuer of Adice, he marched all along Paw with 900 men at armes, 1400 light horfmen, and 9000 footmen: he drew with him sufficient prouisions of artillerie, and was vpon the wals of Cremona with a speed & diligence contrary to the custome of the Captaines of our time, and wherin Aluiano himselfooke such glorie, that in his vaunting he would oftentimes lay it in comparisō with the celerity of Claudius Nero, when, to make head against Asdruball, he led the swiftest part of his army vpon the riuer of Metauro. Great is the moment of celerity and speed in enterprise, and oftentimes is more effectuell to the benefite of the seruice and reputation of the leaders, then either the multitude or courage of souldiers.

But in this sort the state of the warre was not only diuerse and variable, but also confused and intangled: on the one side was vpon the confines of Millan the French king with an armie appointed and furnished, and by this time was comie to Marignan to giue facilitie to Aluiano to ioine with him, and to let the vniting of the Ecclesiastike and Spanissh companies with the enemies: and on the other side lay a gallant armie of xxxv. thousand Swissers, which was a force of footmen full of valour, and neuer yet had passed vnder the victorie of the French. The Viceroy kept along the shores of Paw neare to Plaisance, and vpon the high way that leades to Loda, hauing a bridge ready dressed to passe the riuer and to ioine with the Swissers: Laurence de Medicis was within Plaisance with the regiments of the Pope and the Florentines, and all to ioine with the Viceroy to the same ends: and Aluiano a circumspect and resolute Captaine, lay with the Venetian armie vpon the territories of Cremona, almost vpon the banke of Paw: his purpose was to aide the French king, either by ioining his strength with him, or in drawing away the Church & Spanissh regiments. The citie of Loda which standeth in the midst betweene Millan and Plaisance, and of an equall distance from them both, stood abandoned of all parts: only it had bene sacked before by Ranſe de Cere entring as a souldier to the Venetians, who for quarrels rising betweene him and Aluiano, had afore, what with protestations, and what with threats, got leaue of the Senate, and was entred into the Popes pay with two hundred men at armes, and two hundred light horfmen: but for that his souldiers could not follow him with that speed, by reason the Venetians would not suffer many of them to depart from Padoa where they lay, he went from Loda to fill vp his numbers with those companies with the which he had serued. The Cardinall of Syon also amazed with the practises which his nation held with the French king, & no lesse doubting the estate of the citie of Millan, was fled from Plusance with a thousand Swissers & with part of the regiments of the Duke of Millan: afterwards he went to Cremona to sollicite the Viceroy to march on: he tooke the way of Millan before that side was occupied by the French king; and left certaine of his companies for the gard of Loda, who as soone as they heard that the French king was come to Marignan, abandoned the place, their feare being greater then their perill. But whilst the Viceroy lay vpon the riuer of Paw, & before Lau. de Medicis came to Plaisance, Cintio whom the Pope sent to the French king, was taken by the souldiers of the Viceroy: & albeit he found about him letters & briefs of credit, yet he let him go as soone as he was take, for the reuerence he bare to him that sent him, entering notwithstanding into doubt, that the hope was vaine that had bene giuen him, that the Church army ioyning with him, would passe the riuer of Paw. This doubt was increased by this occasion, that at the same time Laurence de Medicis was detected to haue sent secretly to the French king one of his men: which he did either of his owne counsell, or by commaundement of the Pope, to be excused in that he led the army against him: wherein he protested that albeit he were constrained by a necessity to obey the Pope, yet without incensing his vnkle, or staining his owne honour, the king should find in him a ready deuotion to labour to satisfie him, a thing which he had alwayes sought, and now more then euer did desire to expresse it.

As soone as Laurence was come to Plaisance, there began a disputation betweene the Viceroy and him, with others that sate with the in counsell, whether it were best to passe ouer the riuer of Paw in one strength to ioyne with the Swissers: amongst them were occupied diuerse reasons according to the diuersitie of their affections, there being litle conformity of counsell, where was so great variety of will & disposition: such as perswaded to passe the riuer, said there was no reason to dissuade the from going into Loda, for that being there, both they should let Aluiano for ioyning with the French armie, & for their owne parts, they should haue good oportunitie to knit with the Swissers, either in going to Millan to seeke the, or else the Swissers drawing to meet them: and if their lingring left time to the Frenchmen to get it (as the brute went they would) being already vpon the way betweene Loda and Millan, the French should haue vpon their backs their armies ioynd together, a matter which would put the in paine & danger: euen so perhaps it would not be hard to find meane to ioyne with the Swissers, notwithstanding they should be driuen to make a greater circuit: They reasoned that this resolution was profitable to the enterprize, and necessary to take from the Swissers all occasions of new practises of accord, and no lesse conuenient to increase their forces against so great an armie as they had need, and namely of horsemen: That besides these respects the faith and honour of the Pope and the king Catholike required it so, both for that the capitulations bound them to succour the estate of Millan, and also they had often promised no lesse to the Swissers, who being disappointed, might perhaps of assured friends take occasion to become dangerous enemies: Lastly, that necessity would it so, for the interest & regard of their owne estates, for that the Swissers either loosing the battel, or making accord with the French king, there would remaine no force in Italy able to stand against his victorie, or to let him from spreading the wings of his fortune ouer the whole estate of the Church, euen to the posternes of Rome. To the contrarie of this opinion was reasoned by others, that it was not credible that the French king had not already sent a strength of souldiers to Loda, and if it were so, the estate of the perill would driue their companies to retire with shame, and haply not without losse of bloud, since they stood subiect to haue at one time the French on their backs, and the Venetians in flanke: withall they could not repasse the bridge without confusion and long tract of time, which would bring great infamie to their valour, and by the property of the action transferre to the aduersary the glorie they sought to appropriate to themselves: That in matters of enterprize it imports Captaines to make conference of the perill and the price, of the time and the place, and of the necessity and their proper wils, to whom by all lawes, examples, and experience of men of warre, it can be no infamy to refuse the attempt that brings not with it the oportunitie of time, place, necessity, and recompence. But be it that Loda were abandoned, and that there were libertie for them to take it, what profite could grow by the enterprize? how could they lay their plot either to meet with the Swissers, or the Swissers to ioyne with them, so mighty an armie lying obiected against them betweene Millan and Loda? Besides, it might fall out not to be a counsell assured, to put into the hands of a nation so rash and vnreasonable, all the forces of the Pope and the king Catholike, seeing there were factions amongst them, the greatest part hauing made peace with the Frenchmen, and stood in diuision with their fellowes. At last it was resolved, that the first day both the armies should passe ouer Paw without anie baggage or cariage, leauing sufficient garrison within Parma & Plaisance, for feare of the Venetian armie, whose light horsemen euen at that time had made incurfions and pillages through the countrey. But as in all actions are found many impedimets, where either is emulation of men, or variety of will, so this resolution was not sincerely executed by either of the parties, for that in particular, both seeming to haue an equall will to passe, they laboured to lay the fault one on another, and neither of them to touch the daunger: for the Viceroy that was already entred into suspicion for the going away of Cintio, and no lesse acquainted with what cunning the Pope proceeded in his affaires, was of opinion, that his ill will was that Laurence should passe no further: & on the other side Laurence considering how hardly the Viceroy was drawne to commit his armie to the power of fortune, gaue of another the same iudgement that others gaue of him. In the afternoone the Spanish bands began to passe the bridge, whom the Church armie was appointed to follow with speed; but by reason of the night that came vpon them, they deferred by necessity vntill the morning following, when they did not only not passe, but also the Viceroy retired with his armie on this side the riuier, being aduertised by a scout of foure hundred light horsemen sent out from both the armies to espie the enemies and their doings, that an hundred French launces were entred into Loda the day before: this made the Viceroy & Laurence to returne to their first lodgings, which gaue oportunity to Aluiano to march with his army to Loda.

Euen about this time the French king dislodged from Marignan to lodge at S. Donato, and the Swissers retired to Millan, one part whereof not willing to heare of warre, and the others nothing inclined to peace, there arose oftentimes amongst themselves counsels and tumults: and being one day drawne into an assembly & vniuersall presence, the Cardinal of Syon no lesse great for his authoritie and place, then agreeable to the people for his affabilitie and easinesse, began with words full of affection and vehemencie, to encourage them to issue out the same day and set vpon the French king: He willed them to consider what harmes delays drew with them, specially whē was concurrence of oportunitie & occasion: He willed them not to stand so much vpon the number of horsemen and artilleries of the enemy, as by so base a feare to diminish the memorie of the ancient valour of the Swissers, and the perpetuall victories which they had obtained against the Frenchmen: It is (saith he) farre from the glorie and merite of our nation, who hath passed through so many paines, vanquished so many perils, made sacrifice of so much blood, and triumphed in so many victories, to loose in one day so great a glorie, and leaue to the enemies, whom we haue so often vanquished, the reputation of so many our former merits: These be the same Frenchmen who being ioyned with vs haue obtained so many victories, but going separate to the warres without our armes & forces, haue become a miserable pray to others: when there was society and fellowship betweene vs, their name ran gloriously through the world, and that much more by our valour then by their owne fortune; they were the shadowes, and we the bodies; they the birds, and we the Eagles, through whose power peoples and regions were subiect to them: but without vs what haue they done worthy of memorie? what haue bene their fortunes? where are erected their pillars of perpetuall praises? what are shadowes when they are separate from their bodies? They are the same who a small army of ours ouerthrew the last yeare at Novaro with so great name and glorie: They be the same to whom our vertue brought so much astonishment, and their owne cowardise so great confusion, that euen in their ouerthrow and calamitie they areared vp to the heauens the name and reputation of the Swissers: Suffer not your selues to forget that those small companies of ours that preuayled at Novaro, had neither horsemen nor artilleries, and yet not esteeming the perill present, and lesse expecting the succours that were to come, they ran with Captaine Motin (the glorie of our nation) to charge the French men euen in their tents and lodgings, and winning with incredible valour their artilleries, they slue of them and the Launceknights, so many bodies as they had weapons and armes to vse the: an example sufficient to perswade you, that now they wil not haue the courage to abide an army of forty thousand Swissers; a power able to meet in the field with the whole residue of the world ioyned in one strength. The remembrance of calamities past makes fearfull alwayes after the minds of those that were vanquished, and though amongst men there is a naturall emulation and desire of reuenge, yet to hearts once daunted it is a peculiar condition to settle in despaire, and not to aduenture to recouer remedie where they receiued their harmes, as we reade they do that are wounded by Scorpions, Doubt you not but the examples past of your prowesse, and the experience of your euerlasting valour, will make them now flie afore you, euen at the first noyse of your coming, as the sillie fowles that make a verie faint and weake wing when they heare the belles of the Faulcon. They haue not drawne so neare Millan by any confidence they had in their owne vertue, but onely through a hope they haue in your diuisions: The person

 "hope to be able to make resistance against them? To what end are we descended into Lombar-
 "dy? why haue we taken into our protection the walles of Millan, if we haue feare to go charge
 "our enemies? To what infamie will be interpreted the braue words, and proud threats which "we haue vsed all this yeare, both vaunting that we would descend into Burgundy, and reioy-
 "cing of the accord of the English king, and the Popes inclination to confederate with the French
 "king, wherein we esteemed our glorie would be so much the greater, by how much all those "great Princes were ioyned in conspiracie against the state of Millan. It had bene better we had "rested contented with the termes of our ancient renowne, and neither enjoyed the yeares be"fore so many honourable victories, nor chased the French out of Italy, then now with an v-"niuersall cowardise to deceiue the expectation of all men. Now is the world to iudge, whether
 "our vertue was the cause of our victorie at Nonaro, or our fortune. If we shew our selues feare-
 "full of our enemies, euerie one will ascribe to aduenture and chaunce the victorie which we got
 "with our incredible valour and resolution: but if we expresse the same vertue, we cannot but "draw with vs the same successe we did before, fortune hauing no interest in those actions whose
 "course is guided wholly by a resolute valour, no more then the Moohe can challenge any other "property of light then such as it pleaseth the Sunne to impart to her: so shall we confirme the ex"pectation of the world, so shall we be redoubted and feared by the nations and peoples of the age
 "present, so shall we be recommended and wondred at by the worlds and posterities to come,
 "and so shall we make the reputation and merite of the Swissers be raised aboue that great name
 "and monuments of the Romaines, for that it is not read of them that they haue euer vsed such a "resolute hardinesse, nor wonne victories with so great valour, nor neuer without necessitie set
 "vpon their enemies with so great disadvantage: but of vs may be read the battell we gaue neare
 "to Nonaro, where, with a few souldiers, without artilleries, and without horsemen, our valour
 "put to flight a mighty army, not onely furnished of all forces and strength necessarie, but also "guided by two most notable Captaines, the one the most flourishing in all Fraunce, and the "other the floure of Italy: we shall leaue behind vs also the memorie of the encounter at S. Do-
 "nato, executed on our parts with the same difficulties, & against the person of a French king, & so "many huge bodies of Launceknights, who by how much they are many in number, by so much
 "will they fill and satisfie our hatred; and by how much in this action we shall for euer depose the "name of their armes and discipline, by so much shall we passe them and their fortunes into a per"petuall subiection, neuer after to hold vp their heads, or once to lay themselues in comparison "with the Swissers in matters concerning warre and armes. It is contrarie to the reason and
 "iudgement of warre, that we should stand to temporize and expect, seeing it is almost impossi"ble for many difficulties, that we should be succoured by the Viceroy, or the bands of the Church,
 "yea their impediment ought to be more agreeable to vs then their comming can be necessa-
 "rie, for that entering into the execution alone, the glorie will be particular to vs, and the spoyle
 "and wealth of our enemies armie, a most plentiful reward of our victorie: Much lesse that Cap-
 "taine Motin would communicate his glorie to strangers, seeing the greatnesse of his courage
 "could not suffer participation euen with his owne companies and countrey men. Let not vs then "esteem so basely of our valour and hardinesse, that though they may conueniently ioyne with "vs, yet we will not expect to communicate so great honour and merite to strangers. The repu"tation of the Swissers cannot endure, nor the estate of affaires requires not that we deferre anie
 "longer or stand vpon any more counsels & resolutions. It belongs to cowards to whom daun-
 "gers are fearefull, to consult and spend time in counsell, and not to a nation of such warlike minds
 "as we beare, to whose glorie it appertaines to make triall of the enemy as soone as he is disclosed.
 "In matters of action oportunitie cannot brooke delays, neither can it be good to take counsell
 "after the occasion be fully ripe and offered: Let vs then take the field, and vnder the wings and more time to aduance our Ensignes and satisfy our thirst with the bloud of those, who by their ambition and pride seeke to subiect the whole world, but by their cowardise are left alwayes an infamous pray to many.

These speeches gaue great incouragemēt to the Swissers, who, ioyning to the exhortation the remembrance of their ancient valour & felicity, armed themselues : and asloone as they were issued out of the gate towards Rome, they fell into aray & order, & albeit the day was almost spent, yet they marched with their squadrons towards the French army, vsing such shoutes & cries, that to such as knew not the cause, it was a reasonable perswasion that they had obtained some glorious victory: The Captaines encouraged the souldiers to march, and the resolution of the souldiers was such, that they put their leaders in remembrance that at what hower soeuer they came neare the campe of the enemies, they should giue the signe of the battell, assuring them that that was the day wherein they would couer the field with dead bodies, and vterly rase out the name of the Launceknights, & namely of such, who prophesying of their death, bare blacke Ensignes; and as in this estate of furie and resolution of mind, they were come neare the place where the Frenchmen lay, albeit there remained not two howers of day, yet they began the battell, and with a desperate courage charged the artilleries and fortifications of the enemies, breaking and dispersing at this first charge, the bands that made head against them, and with their incredible valour won one part of the artilleries: But what with the horsemen bringing on a great part of the army, and the presence of the king inuironed with squadrons of valiant Gentlemen, their great furie was somewhat abated. Neuerthelesse a cruell fight began betweene them, which, with diuerse chances, and to the grieuous losses of the men at armes of Fraunce, who were broken, continued till foure howers within night, diuerse French Captaines lay dead on the ground, and the king himselfe receiued many wounds with a pike: such egearenesse of mind remained in both parts, that their bodies being no more able to manage the weapons which the reuenge of their hearts put into their hands, they separated and fell off from the fight both without sounding of trumpet, and commandement of their Captaines. The Swissers remayned incamped in the place, expecting the next sunne or day light, neither partie offending the other, as if there had bene a secret truce betweene them: the Cardinall caused the campe of Swissers to be reuictualled from Millan whilst their bodies tooke rest, adding such property of helpe as he could, being the author of the enterprise. And to this first felicity of theirs, was ioyned a generall brutethoroughout all Italy, that the Swissers had put to flight the army of the Frenchmen, with many other rumors giuen out to discourage the French, and confirme their owne side. The French king consumed not vnprofitably the residue of the night, for, knowing the groutnesse of the perill, he laboured to raunge his artilleries into places conuenient, to reassemble his horsemen, and put in order his squadrons of Launceknights and Gascons: he performed in his owne person, all things that could be required of a king, of a Captaine, of a man of warre, and of a mind whose resolution was greater then the estate of the danger. By this time it was day, and at the beginning of the sunne, the Swissers, who did not onely despise the French army, but also (in the opinion of their valour) seemed to disable the whole forces of Italy knitt together, recontinued their charge vpon the enemies with the same furie and rashnesse they went to it ouer night: but they were receiued of the French with greater valour, with better order, and with more discretion, they were subiect to a bloody charge of the horsemen, and suffered slaughter both in front and in flanke. Besides, at the rising of the Sunne came Aluiano, whom the king had sent for ouer night, bringing with him his light horsemen and the most speediest part of his army: he arriued at such time as the fight was most close and furious, and all things reduced into greatest trauell and daunger: and hauing the residue of his regiment marching to good purpose and time, he entred furiously vpon the backes of the Swissers, who, notwithstanding they maintayned alwayes the fight with one valour and resolution, yet seeing the desperate resistance that was made, & the Venesian army that was now ioyned, they began so to doubt of the victory, that after the Sunne had shined many howers vpon the earth, they founded the retrait, & charging vpon their shoulders the artilleries they had brought with them, they cast about their squadrons, and retired: They obserued their accustomed order in their retiring, and so ordered their march towards Millan with so great terror and astonishment of the French, that of the whole army there was neither horsemen nor footmen that durst breake out to follow them: onely there were two companies of their souldiers who being fled into a grauge, were burned within the house by the Venetian light horsemen: the residue of the army returned to Millan, not breaking one ioate of their order, and retaining in their appaſſance and countenance, one conſtant and perpetuall aſſurance: ſome ſay that they cloyed fifteene peeces of great artilleries which they won at the firſt charge, or that they had no oportunitie to cary them to their campe.

All men are of opinion, that there hath not bene ſcene in Italy of long time a battell of more fury and greater terror, for that, what by the deſperate valor with the which the Swiſſers beganne the charge, and alſo for the darkeneſſe of the night which led all men in error, the order of the whole army being confuſed, and the fight ſo mixed, that there could not be ſcene or obſerued any ſigne or commandement, all things were wholly referred and ſubiected to fortune: The king, whoſe perſon was not without many and manifeſt dangers, was able to diſcerne that his preferuation and ſafety came more by his owne vertue and by chance, then by the ſuccours and ayde of his people, from whom he was oftentimes ſeparate, ſometimes by the confuſion of the battell, and ſometimes by the troubles and obſcurities of the night: ſuch was the diſcourſe and ſtate of this conflict, that Trinuſce (a Captaine of great triall and experience of things) affirmed that this battell was fought by Gyants and not by men, and that eightene battels whetein he had bin an executioner, were but combats of litle children, in compariſon of this. It is not to be doubted, but that (without the ayde of the artilleries) the victory had remained to the Swiſſers, who, entering at the firſt charge into the fortifications of the French, and recouering from them the moſt part of the artilleries, had alwayes won further into their campe. Beſides, the comming of Aluiano was to great purpoſe for the French, for that comming freſh to the fight when the battell was moſt doubtfull, he redoubled the courage of the French, and gaue terror to the Swiſſers, ſuppoſing that the whole Venetian army was with him. Touching the number of the dead bodies, if euer it was vncertaine in a battell (as it hapneth almoſt alwayes) it fell out moſt vncertaine in this, men ſpeaking diuerſly, ſome by paſſion, and ſome by error: ſome make reckening of foureteene thouſand Swiſſers to be ſlayne, ſome ſet downe but ten thouſand, and others that haue a more moderate iudgement, affirme there were but eight thouſand left on the ground, yea ſome would haue them reduced to a number of three thouſand, and all bodies of baſe place: on the French part in the encounter that was giuen ouer night, were ſlayne Francis brother to the Duke of Burbon, Monsieur d'Imbertcourt, the Prince of Tallemount ſon to Monsieur Trimonille, Monsieur de Boyſ nephew to the Cardinall of Amboſe, the Count of Sancerre, Catelarch of Sanoye, Buſſy of Amboſe, and Mony Enſigne-bearer to the kings band: all perſonages of marke, either for their nobleneſſe and greatneſſe of eſtates, or for the honorable places they managed in the army: and touching the generall numbers of dead bodies, ſome refer them to fixe thouſand, and ſome reckon them to three thouſand, amongſt whom were certaine Captaines of the Launceknights, ſundry men making ſundry accompts for the cauſes and reſpects aforeſayd.

When the Swiſſers were retired to Millan, they fel into great diſagreemēt & cōtrouerſie, ſome willing to accompliſh an accord with the French king, & others perſwading to continue the defence of Millan: wherein as there was amongſt them partiality and faction, ſo euery one had his particular reaſon and opinion. Thoſe Captaines that afore had ſolicited the accord, ſought now a cauſe leſſe diſhoneſt to breake vp, requiring money of Maximilian Sforce, which they knew he was not able to aduance: but all the bands of footemen at the perſwaſion of Roff their Generall, departed the day following to returne to their countrey by the way of Coma: they left in the Caſtle fifteene hundred Swiſſers and fixe hundred Italians, and gaue hope to the Duke that the ſame bands and regiments, would returne ſpeedily to his ſeruice, & giue reſcue to the Caſtle; with this property of hope, Maximilian Sforce accompanied with Iohn Gonzago, & Ierome Morono with other Gentlemen of Millan, incloſed himſelfe in the Caſtle, after he had with great difficultie conſented that his brother Francis Duke of Bary ſhould go into Germanie. The Cardinall of Sian tooke his iourney towards Caſar to ſolicite for ſuccours, giuing his faith to returne to the ſeruice with expedition.

Thus was the City of Millan abandoned and giuen vp to the French king, neither their valor nor thir fortune being able to miniſter any further protection amid ſo many hard aduerſities: and as it is a courſe ordinary in humane chances, that one infelicity neuer comes alone, ſo, beſides their ſubiection, they ſuffered this property of calamity, to pay to the king ſuch quantities of treaſure and and mony, as it pleased him to impose vpon them: only his person forbore to enter the towne so long as the Castle held good for the enemies, holding it a matter vnworthy the maiesty of a king, to make his entrie into a towne which was not wholly and absolutely in his power. In the place where he had won the battell, he caused Maïses to be song solemnely for three dayes: the first was to thanke God for his victory: the second to pray for the soules of those that were slaughtered in the battell: and in the third he made supplication for peace, and in perpetuall memory of his victory, he built in the same place a Chappell of deuotion. Immediately vpon the brute of this battell all the townes and Castles of the Duchy of Millan followed the fortune of the victory, except the Castles of Cremona and Millan, to the which was appointed Peter of Nauarre, who assured that he would cary it in lesse then a moneth: a matter that seemed vnreasonable in the opinion of wise men, both for that the Castle bare good fortifications, and also for the plentifull proportion of all things necessary for defence, yea hauing within it a resolute garrison of two thousand men of warre.

The Viceroy recgiuing aduertisement of the French victory, remained a very few dayes in the place where he was incamped, and that more by necessity then by will, hauing no reason nor opportunity to remoue his army for want of mony: but being at last refurnished with some litle proportion, and borowing besides of Lawrence de Medicis fixe thousand duckats, he brake vp and withdrew to Ponto de Nuro, with intention to go to the Realme of Naples: for, albeit the Pope vnderstanding what was hapned, had in the beginning represented to the world the constancy of his predecesor, hauing withall, the Embassadors of the confederats to perswade him to make head against fortune, and to labour either to hold the Swissers in good disposition, or at least vpon their reuolting, to take in their places the Launc knights: yet he discerned that it could not be, but that the remedies and prouisions would fall out too slow for his perils, and that he should be the first that should suffer: for that though the respect and reuerence of the Church held the king from molesting the state Ecclesiastike, yet he could not beleue, that it was able to containe him from assailing Parma and Plaisance, as members depending of the Duchy of Millan, and much lesse hold him from molesting the state of Florence; a matter wherein all regards did cease, and for the which he would thinke himselfe as deeply offended as if violence were directly offered to the state of the Church. It was not without cause that he feared these inuasions, for that the king had already giuen order to cast a bridge ouer the riuer of Paw neare to Pauia, to send to take Parma & Plaisance, and afterwards, if the Pope refused his amity, to proceede by the way of Pontresino to chase the Medices from the towne of Florence. But amid these deuises and preparations, the Duke of Sanoy and the Bishop of Tricarico the Popes Nuncio, by commission of the Pope, treated with the king, who was not without vehement desires to be accorded with him, fearing perhaps new alliances to be made against him, and bearing a wonderfull reuerence and inclination to the sea Apostolike for the terrour that was thorough the whole Realme of Fraunce by reason of the persecutions receiued by Pope Iulio. In these respects there was concluded betweene them a present confederation for the defence of the states of Italy, wherein was particularly expressed, that the king should take vpon him the protection of the person of the Pope, the state of the Church, Iulian & Lawrence de Medicis, & the estate of Florence: That the king should giue an estate in Fraunce & pension to Iulian, & to Lawrence a pension & a cōpany of fifty Launces: That he should consent that the Pope might giue passage to the Viceroy through the states and iurisdiction of the Church, to returne with his army to the kingdome of Naples: That the Pope should be bound to make depart out of Verona, the souldiers he had there, & withall, to countermand the companies sent to the succours of Cesar against the Venetians: That he should giue vp to the French king the cities of Parma and Plaisance, and in recompence thereof, the king to agree, that from thence forward the Duchy of Millan should be bound to leauy for his vse the salts of Cerua, a matter of great profit to the Church, & wherein the Pope had already agreed with the Duke of Millan in the confederation he made with him: That there should be made an arbitration and compromise in the person of the Duke of Sanoy, to iudge whether the Florentines had broken the confederation made with king Louis, and if they haue offended that way, then he to haue power to impose such penalty as they haue deserued: This the king sayd he demanded more for satisfying of his honour, then for other respect.

As soon as this conclusion was made, the Bishop of Tricarico went to Rome in post to perswade the Pope to ratifie it, and Lawrence de Medicis to giue occasion to the Viceroy to depart the sooner, withdrew to Parma & Reggia the companies that were within Plaisance: touching himselfe, he went to the king to obtaine his good grace and fauor, and to perswade him that in all estates of times and chances of things, he would depend vpon, vsing in that office or offer of Court, the aduises of his Vncle which were more full of suttlety then of good meaning. It was much ado to induce the Pope to this ratification, for that it brought no litle displeasure to him to loose Parma and Plaisance: he could willingly haue temporised to see what the Swissers would first determine, who hauing called a Parliament at Surich (the principall Canton of the whole nation, and most enemy to the French) debated to giue rescue to the Castle of Millan, notwithstanding they had abandoned the vallies and the townes of Bellinzone and Lugarno, but not the Castles. Neuerthelesse the king obtained the Castell of Lugarno, in corrupting the Captaine with fike thousand crownes: onely the Grisons would not abandon Chiauanna: at last the Bishop of Tricarq laying afore him the daunger least the king would inuade Parma and Plaisance, and send men of warre into Tuscane, and making great terror of the harmes that the Swissers had receiued at the battell of Marignan: the Pope was content to ratifie the peace, albeit vnder this moderation, that neither he nor his Agents should be bound to giue vp into the kings hands Parma and Plaisance, but by leauing them voyde of men and officers, to giue liberty to the king to enter vpon them: That the Pope should not be bound to leaue his people from Verona, for that he would not commit such a property of iniury against Cesar: and yet he promised to do it vpon the next conuenient occasion: Lastly that the Florentines should be holden absolued of the pretended breaking of the league. The accord bare also that the king should not take vpon him the protection of any vassall or subiect of the estate of the Church, and that not onely he should not hinder the Pope as their supreme Lord, to proceede against them with correction, but also he should be bound to minister ayde to him in that action when necessitie required. Moreouer it was debated that the Pope and the French king should haue an enteruiew together in some place conuenient; a matter offered by the king particularly, but desired indifferently by them both: the king sought it, the better to establish that amity, to assure the estates of such his friends as he had in Italy: and lastly for that he hoped with his presence, and offering great aduancements to the Popes brother and nephew, to win of him his consent to inuade the Realme of Naples; a matter which was one of his greatest desires: The Pope wished this enteruiew, to the end that with that office and obseruance very proper to win grace & amity with euery one, to entertaine the king whilest he stood in so great fortune & prosperity. Many thought not well of this deliberation, as an action vnworthy of the maiesty of a Pope, & that it more appertained to the king, desiring to haue conference with him, to go seek him & do reuerence to him at Rome: but the Pope gaue it out that he was so much the more ready to cōdiscend to this meeting, by how much he was desirous to induce the king not to molest the Realme of Naples during the life of the king Catholike, who to the iudgement of man could not liue long, for that it was more then a yeare since he was ill disposed,

Peter Nauarre afore the Castell of Milan.

In this meane while Peter of Nauarre was labouring to cary the Castle of Millan, and hauing won a murdring house vpon the Castle ditch which on the flanke side had his prospect vpon the gate of Coma, and afterwards approching nearer the ditch and the Castle wall by the helpe of pauisses and Engines of wood, he began to worke a myne within the sayd ditch: and when he had remoued the defences, he began to labour more mynes, taking away with the helpe of his Engines a great paue or space of the wall on the flanke of the Castle, and applyed his hookey and Rammes to make it fall at the same instant that he put fire to his mines: matters which albeit in common iudgement seemed not sufficient to cary the Castle but with great difficultie and long time, & that there was good intelligence that the Swissers by the resolution of Zurich, prepared to succour it: yet a practise being begun betweene John Gonsago the Duke of Millans Captaine which was within the Castle, & the Duke of Barbon his parent, le. Morono, with two other Swiss Captaines interposing also in the action, the resolution was concluded the fourth day of October, not without a wonderfull maruell of all men: le. Morono was specially blamed for this conclusion, for that either through feare, which was naturall in him, or for want of faith which was neuer imputed to him; he had vsed his authority to perswade the Duke to agreement: neuerthelesse he excused himselfe vpon certaine controuersies and mutinies hapned betweene the footemen of the Swissers and the Italians. The Articles of the accord were, that Maximilian

Sforce

Sporce should immediatly giue vp into the hands of the French king, the Castels of Millan and Cremona. That he should depose himselfe of all rights and interetts which he had in that estat: That he should receiue of the king, a certaine proportion of money to pay his debts: That he should go into Fraunce, where the king should indue him with a yearely pension of thirtie thousand duckats, or procure him to be made Cardinall with the same reuenue: That the king should pardon Galeas Viscount with certaine other Gentlemen of that Duchy who had followed the seruice of Maximilian: That he should distribute amongst the Swissers that were within the Castell, fixethousand crowns: That he should confirm to Ioh. Gōzago the goods that he held in the estate of Millan by the gift of the Duke, & enlarge his liuing with some yearely pensio: That he should in like sort ratifie to Morono, as well the goods that appertained to him in propertie, as others that he had of the Dukes gift, together with the offices he exercised, & should make him Maister of requests of the Court of Fraunce. Vpon the publication of this accord, Maximilian surnamed the More according to the name of his father, departed out of the Castell, & went into Fraunce: he said it was a sweet aduersitie that brought with it prosperitie, for that by that exchange of fortune, he was drawne out of the seruitude of the Swissers, the ill dealings of Cesar, & the deceits of the Spaniards. In this alteration also men seemed more to allow of the working of fortune, that she had so speedily deposed him from such a degree, then that afore she had exalted a man, who, for his incapacitie, inconstant thoughts, and most fowle maners of life, was vnworthy of all greatnesse.

Afore the Castell of Millan was restored, there were sent to the king as Embassadors from Venice, these foure of the most principall and honorable of the Senate Ambo. Grumani, Dominike Treuisan, George Cornara, and Andrew Gruti: their comming was to congratulate with the king of his victorie, and to beseech him by the vertue of the capitulations of the league, to ayde them to recouer their townes: an enterprise wherein they had no other impediments then the forces of Cesar, and the Popes regiments that were within Verona vnder the charge of Mark Antho. Colonne: for, the Viceroy after he was gone fro off the marches of Plaisance, & had reposed some few dayes vpo the frontiers of Modena expecting the Popes ratificatio to the accord with the French king, he withdrew with all diligence to the realme of Naples by the way of Romagnia. Vpon the relation of these Embassadors, the king gaue speedie order that the bastard of Sauoy & Theodor Triulce should go to their succour with fixe hundred Launces and seuen thousand Launce-knights: who, whilst they deferred to march and depart, either that they temporised to see what would come of the Castell of Millan, or that the king had a meaning to send out the same bands against the Castell of Cremona, Aluiano drew with his armie towards Bressia, for, the Venetians would not consent that he should follow the Viceroy, for that they desired to recouer Bressia and Verona (if it were possible) without forreine succors. But because that citie was newly resupplied with a thousand Launceknights, and Bergamo also rendred to the Venetians many dayes before, Aluiano resolved to go first to besiege Verona, as being the least fortified, and hauing there greatest commoditie of victuals, and withall for that Verona being taken, the action of Bressia would be easie, the situation bearing no oportunitie of succours by the Almanes: onely he forbore to giue beginning to his enterprise for feare least the Viceroy and the Popes bands that were in the countreys of Reggia and Modena should repasse ouer Paw at Ostia, to rescue Verona: but being deliuered of that suspicion by the going away of the Viceroy, he fell into another impediment of sicknesse, whereof he dyed in the beginning of October at Queda in the countrey of Bressia, ha-

uing not yet threescore yeares of age. The Venetians receiued great displeasure for his death, but greater was the sorrow of the souldiers, who being not satisfied with the remembrance of him, kept publikely in the armie his body by the space of fixe and twentie dayes, carying it about with them with very great pompe, at such time as they marched: and when he should be conueyed to Venice, Theodor Triulce would not suffer that as he was caried by the marches of Verona, they should demaund safeconduict of Marke Antho. Colonne, saying, it was not conuenient that he who in his life had neuer feare of his enemies, should now in his death demaund the thing by petition which afore they durst not denie him of duetie: he was buried at Venic. by publike order & with great ceremonies in S. Stephens Church, where yet remaineth the monument of his sepulcher, and in perpetuall remembrance of the merites and vertues of his life, was pronounced by a very eloquent young Gentleman, a funerall Oration: he was a Captaine in all mens opinion of great resolution and courage, and an assured executioner of things determined: and yet either by the malice of fortune, who hath no small imperie ouer enterprises, or for that he was sudden in counsell, a principall enimie to the valour of men, he receiued many foiles by his enemies, yea it is thought he neuer obtained victorie when he was Generall of an armie.

By reason of the death of Aluiano, the French king (not being required by the Venetians) gaue to them for Gouvernour of their armie, Trinulce, whom they so much desired, as well for his experience wherein he was well confirmed, as for his reputation in the science of warre, for the which they had him in no small opinion: but most of all for that by the common inclination of the faction of the Guelfes, there had bin alwayes a settled amitie and good will betwene him and that common weale. Whilest he went to the armie, to take his charge, the Venetian bands tooke Pesquero, and ouerthrew a little before the enterprise, certaine troupes of horsemen, and three hundred Spanish footemen that went to their rescue, recovering also Asolo and Lono, which the Marquis of Montua had abandoned. As soone as Trinulce was come to the armie they besieged Bressia at the instance of the Senate, notwithstanding it seemed a matter of great difficultie to carie it without the French armie, both for that the towne was strong and well manned with a crew of two thousand footemen as well Launceknights as Spaniards, & also for that a great number of the Guelfes had bene constrained to go away, the winter also drawing on, and the season much disposed to raine and stormes. Neither did the issue and successe of the matter beguile the iudgement that the Captaine gaue of it: for as they had begun to do execution vpon the wals with their artilleries, which they had planted vpon the brinke of the ditch, on that side where issueth the small riuer of Garzetto: so they that were within making many sallies, brake forth at last with fiftene hundred Launceknights and Spaniards, to charge the gard of the artillerie, which was an hundred men at armes and sixe thousand footemen: and beating them also with the shot that for that end was arraunged vpon the towne wall, they put the easily to flight, notwithstanding that John Paul Manfron with thirtie men at armes sustained somewhat their furie: in this action they slue two hundred bodies, burnt the powders, and drew into Bressia ten peeces of artilleries. For the harmes of this disorder, Trinulce thought good to retire and incampe more at large, expecting the comming of the Frenchmen: in which minde he withdrew to Coccio, which is ten myles from Bressia, the Venetians looking in the meane while to make new prouisions of artillerie and munitions. But as soone as the Frenchmen were come to the campe, returned to besiege the towne, and began to batter it in two sundry places on that side of the gate of Piles towards the Castell, & also on that side of the gate of S. John: in one of which quarters the Frenchmen were incamped, and after they had giuen leaue to the Launceknights, for that they refused to do seruice against the townes of Casals obedience, Peter of Nauarre arrived at the campe with fife thousand Gascons & Frenchmen: and in the other quarter lay with the Venetian regiments, Trinulce, in whom rested almost the whole superintendencie of those affaires, for that the bastard of Sauoy being fallen into sickness, was gone from the armie. When they had battred the wall, they followed not with the assault for the sundry rampiers and fortifications which the valour of the defendants had made to resist their violence: onely Peter of Nauarre hauing recourse to his accustomed remedies, began to vndermine and sinke the wals. About this time Marke Antho. Colonno issuing out of Verona with sixe hundred horsemen and fife hundred footemen, encountred in the plaine John Paul Manfron and Marke Antho. Buo, who were bestowed in garrison within Valeggio with foure hundred men at armes and foure hundred light horsemen, he ouerthrew them, and in the skirmish was taken the sonne of John Paule, his horse being killed vnder him, and his father fled for his safetie to Goieto: immediatly after which expedition, Marke Antho. occupied Legnagno, where were taken prisoners certaine Gentlemen of Venice. At last the difficulties to take Bressia being more and more redoubled, both for that the mines employed by Peter of Nauarre did not answer the hopes that had bene giuen, and also for an expectation of eight thousand footemen to come out of Germanie, which the Captaines that lay about Bressia had no confidence to be able to hinder: the Venetians to couer someway the ignominie of their retraite, were contented to agree with the defendants of Bressia, that if they were not succoured within thirtie dayes, they would abandon the Citie, and go out of it with their ensignes displayed, their artilleries, and what else appertained to them; a promise which euery one knew would serue to no purpose for the assurance they had of succours: onely it was a thing profitable to them of Bressia, to be deliuered in the meane while from aduersities & afflictions. Afterwards the Venetians put eight thousand land footmen within Bre, a towne subiect to the Counts of Ladrono, but as soone as they heard the Launceknights marched (to whom the Castell of Anso was redred) they retired cowardly to the armie, the Captaines themselves shewed no greater resolution and courage, who fearing to be charged at one time both by those bands, and the defendants of Bressia, and also by Marke Antho. Colombo with the regiments that were within Verona, retired to Gueda, whither they had sent afore (being assured of that accident) their greatest sortes of artillerie and almost all their baggage, and the Launceknights that entred into Verona without impediment, returned into Germanie, after they had refurnished it of victuals, and reenforced the garrison.

During these accidents and enterchaunge of affaires, the Pope and the French King had agreed vpon an enteriuew at Bologna: a place which the King accepted afore Florence, because he would not be farre removed from the Duchie of Millan, and chiefly for that the Duke of Sauoy managed continually the negociation of accord betweene him and the Swissers. But some thought he made election of that place, for that in passing into Tuscane he should be constrained to leade with him a great trayne of souldiers, to the end he should not enter into Florence with a lesse pompe then did the late King Charles before him: for dressing of which pompe, it behoued him to spend certaine dayes in deferring a matter by so much more grieuous and intollerable to the king, by how much (besides generall respectes) it would breede occasion to make him retaine yet longer the whole armie, whereof albeit the expences were great, yet made he no reckening nor resolution to send away any part of it, so long as his person remained in Italie. Thus the Pope entred into Bologna the eight day of December, and after him the king made his entry within two dayes, and to receiue him, were gone to the confines of the countrey of Reggia, the Cardinals Fiesquo and Medicis, Legates Apostolike. The king entred without many bands of souldiers, and with no great trayne of Court and Courtiers, and being conueyed according to the maner of kings into the publike Consistorie afore the Popes presence, he offered in his own person (his great Chancellor deliuering the speech for him) the obedience which till then he had not protested. They were lodged three dayes together in one pallace, shewing one to another right great and manifest tokens of good will and amitie: they confirmed at this meeting with wordes and promises, the obligations and contractes passed afore, and debated besides, of many things touching the Realme of Naples, which for that the king was in no readinesse to assaile at that time, he contented himselfe with the great hope and assurances which the Pope gaue to fauour him in that enterprize, either as soone as the king of Aragon should dye, who in reasonable iudgement could not long liue, or when the confederation which he had with him should be ended, which yet had continuance of sixteene moneths. The king also besought the Pope to redre to the Duke of Ferrara, Modena and Reggia, whereunto he condescended so farre forth as the Duke repayed xl. thousand duckats which he had giuen to Cesar for Modena, and withall, make recopence for such summes of money as he had disbursed in expences for both the Cities. Lastly the king was a suter for Frauncis Mario Duke of Vrbis, who being waged and intainted by the Church with two hundred men at armes, and appointed with Iulian de Medicis to go to the armie, and afterwards that charge being transferred to Lawrence, by reason Iulian was sicke, he refused to go thither, alledging he would not accord to Lawrence that which against his dignitie he had suffered for friendshipss sake in Iulian, to beare the place of a simple Captaine & subiect to the authoritie of another, & that in the armie of the Church, wherein he had ruled so oftentimes as Generall and soueraigne Commaunder of all. Moreouer he reuoked those souldiers in his pay that were on the way, notwithstanding his promise to send them on to the seruice: he had also secretly compounded, or at least was in action of composition with the French king: like as also ever since the kings victory, he had not ceased by special working to kindle him against the Pope, who taking the occasion of those iniuries, and casting by all his deuises to make fall to his house that Duchie, refused to the king his demaund, reducing to his remembraunce by sweete wordes, of what consequence it would be for the affaires of the Church, to giue boldnesse to his subiectes to rebell by so hurtfull an example. These reasons induced the King to conforme himselfe to the Popes will, notwithstanding in regard of his honour, he would gladly haue purchased safetie for him that was fallen into daunger for being faithfull to his seruice: whereunto he was persuaded by many of his Councell & most of his Court, who vnder the example of the late king, proued how vnwise a counsell it was to giue heart and countenance to the Duke Valentino is to opresse the inferiour Lords of Italie; a matter that made him rise into that estate of greatnesse, that if God had giuen longer life to his father Pope Alexander, his ambition could not haue bene verie preiudiciall to the affaires of Fraunce. The Pope promised to giue the king power to leaue the tenth part of the Church reuenues of the Realme of Fraunce for the arrearings of his armie, and gaue also his consent that the king should haue the nomination of benefices, which alwayes afore hath appertained to Colledges & Chapters of Churches; a matter that fell out much to the profit and purpose of the kings of Fraunce, not onely hauing by that meane the facultie to dispose at their owne arbitration and will many rich benefices, but also the annates of the French Churches, should afterwards be payed to the Pope according to the true value, & not as the auncient taxations being far lesse required. Wherein the Pope found himselfe deceiued, for, when his Deputies and Commissaries for the Realme of Fraunce, sought to proceede against those that concealed the true value, they could finde no prooffe nor testimonie, and much lesse haue meane to execute against the parties, so that dispatches went out according to the old rates. The king for his part promised not to take into his protection any of the Cities of Tuscane: and albeit afterwards he required to haue libertie to protect the people of Lucqua, who offered him fife and twentie thousand duckats, saying, he was bound to that protection by the obligation of his predecessour, yet the Pope would giue no consent, but promised for his part that he would forbear to molest them in any sort. Lastly they agreed by indifferent consent of them both to send Frier Giles General of the Augustins and an excellent Preacher, to Cesar in the Popes name, to dispose him to render to the Venetians, Bressia and Verona, taking a recompence of money: and so vpon the expedition of these matters, but not set downe by writing, except the article for nomination of benefices and payment of the Annates according to the true value, the Pope in fauour of the king pronounced Cardinall Adrian de Bosie, brother to the great Maister of Fraunce, and of the greatest authoritie with the king and in the generall gouernment. Then the enteruiew brake vp, the king departing from the Pope very well contented and in great hope to haue him his perpetuall friend, who for his part expressed no lesse with all reasonable demonstrations, but in his minde he nourished other impressions: for that both it was a matter no lesse grieuous to him then afore, that the Duchie of Millan should be possessed by the French king, and Parma & Plaisance restored, and also that the Duke of Ferrara should be ctsloones reinuelled in Modena and Reggia. And yet all these not long after turned to vanitie and smoake, for that the Pope being gone from Bologna to Florence, and remaining there about a moneth, had receiued of the Duke promises of the money that should be payd asloone as he should enter into possession, & being there set downe in writing by common consent the instruments that were to passe betweene them, the Pope neither denying nor accomplishing, but interposing many delays and excuses, refused to giue perfection to things.

The French
king returneth into Fraunce.

The king being returned to Millan, dismissed his armie except seuen hundred Launces, sixe thousand Launceknights and foure thousand Frenchmen such as they call aduenturers, whom he left the gard of that estate. And for his owne person he returned into Fraunce with great speed about the first beginning of the yeare 1516, leauing behind him as his Lieutenant, Charles Duke of Bourbon: he thought he had left his affaires in Italie in good estate of suretie, both for the alliance newly contracted with the Pope, and also for that about that time, he was newly compounded with the Swissers, who, notwithstanding the perswasions of the king of England, to haue the to reenter into armes against the French king renewed with him the alliance, by the which they bound themselues to furnish alwayes for his seruice and at his pay, both in Italie and out of Italy, for defence and offence, and against all nations, such numbers of footemen as he would require, and that vnder their vniuersall name and publike ensignes: onely they excepted to beare armes against the Pope, the Empire, and the Emperour. And on the other side, the king confirmed to them of new their auncient pensions, with promise to pay them within a certaine time the sixe hundred thousand duckats agreed vpon at Dyon, with three hundred thousand if they gaue vp to him the villages and vallies appertaining to his Duchie of Millan: a matter which the fife Cantons that possessed those places, refusing to do, as also to ratifie the accord, the king began to pay to the other eight Cantons that part & portiō of the money that appertained to the: who accepted it, but vnder this expresse condition, that they should not be bound to take his part against the fife Cantons.

About the beginning of this yeare, the Bishop Petrucchio an auncient seruant to the Pope, chased chased out of Sienna by the Popes aide and somehelpe from the Florentins, Borgueso son to Pandolfo Petrucci his cosin, and impatronised himselfe vpon the place, the authority and gouernement remaining by equity in the possession of his sayd cosin: the Pope had two respects inducing him to this action, the one, for that that City standing betweene the estate of the Church, and the dominion of the Florentins, was gouerned by a man wholly at his deuotion: the other was, & much more particular and mouing, for that he hoped with the fauour of some good occasion, to make it fall into the gouernour of his brother or his nephew, wherein he doubted nothing of the Bishops consent, hauing already framed him tractable to all his desires and ambitions.

The warre continued kindled betweene Cesar and the Venetians, who for their partes desired to recouer by the ayde of the French king, Bressia and Verona: but for other places and regions of Italy, things seemed to stand in a peaceable estate: only there began to burst out motions of new Wirres that were pushed on by the king of Aragon, who fearing least the greatnesse of the French king would bring some aduersities to the realme of Naples, dealt with Cesar & the king of England, to recontinue the warre: a matter not only of no great difficulty and hardnesse to draw Cesar vnto, being both desirous of innouation and new things, and also was not able easily to keepe the townes which he had taken from the Venetians: but also it was fully concluded and agreed vnto by the king of England: the remembrance of the late infidelity and breach of promise of his father in law, being of lesse power in him, then either his present emulation or ancient hatred against the Crowne of France: besides, he was enuious, that the Scottish king being in minoritie, should be gouerned by people of his appointment, or any way depending on him.

These matters had bene followed both with better counsell, and greater forces, if during the negociation, the death of the king of Aragon had not hapned, who, after he had bene vexed with a long indisposition, died in an inferior village, called Madrigalege, as he went to Senile with his Court: he was a king excellent in counsell, and so furnished with all other properties of vertue, that he bare no occasion or matter of reprehension, if he had bene constant to keepe his promises: for, touching the imputation of niggardnesse or the report that went of him to be strait in expences, it was proued vnture by the testimony and discouery of his estate after his death, leaving behind him no amasse of treasure, notwithstanding he had reigned xliij. yeares. But it hapneth oftentimes by the corrupt iudgement of men, that in a king prodigality is more praised, though the raking and oppression of subiects be ioyned to it, then a sparing straitnesse, wherein is nourished an orderly abstayning from taxing the goods of others. To the excellent vertues of this Prince, was ioyned a most rare, and perpetuall felicity during the whole course of his life, excepting only the death of his onely sonne: for, the accidentes of his wiues and his sonne in law, were the cause that he kept his greatnesse vntill his death, and the necessity to depart with Castille after his wiues death, was rather a sport then a blow of fortune. In all other things he was right happy: for, being second sonne to Iohn king of Aragon, he came to the Crowne by the death of his elder brother: he aspired to the kingdome of Castille by Issabell his wife: he subdued the Competitors of the same kingdome, & expelled them: he made a conquest of the Realme of Granado, which the enemies of Christian faith had vsurped almost eight hundred yeares: he annexed to his Empire, the Realmes of Naples, and Navarre, and the principallitie of Orano, with many other places of importance vpon the coast of Affriqua: he bare alwayes the victory and vpper hand of his enemies: he almost cloaked his ambitions and couetousnesse with an honest zeale to religion, and an holy affectio to the common-weale, wherein fortune appeared manifestly conioyned with industry. About a moneth afore his death, dyed the Great Captaine, both absent from the Court, and ill contented of the king: and yet the king gaue order, that in remembrance of his valour, there should be done to him both in the Court & through the whole parts of the Realme, those honors that haue not bene vsed to be done, but at the death of kings; a matter plausibly accepted and executed by all his subiects, who omitted no sort of reuerence or celebration to the name of the Great Captaine, making him singular in liberality, in counsell, in discretion, and for knowledge in warres and martiall science, excelling all the Captaines of his time.

By the death of this king, the French king entred into a new courage to adresse an enterprise against the Realme of Naples, to the which he was in mind to send forthwith the Duke of Burbon with an army of eight hundred Launces, and ten thousand footemen: he seemed to repose much in the oportunitie of the time, for that the kingdome being in some tumult^r vpon the death of the king, and ill prepared for defence, he perswaded a facilitie of conquest, specially for that the Archduke could not come thither in time conuenient to succour it: and he doubted nothing of the Popes fauour, both for the hopes hee had giuen him at the enteruiewe of Bologna, and in regard of the alliance contracted with him, and also in consideration of his proper interest, as though hee should be iealous of the wonderfull height and greatnesse of the Archduke, heire present to so many kingdomes by the death of the king Catholike, and expected successour of Cesar: he hoped besides that the Archduke would giue him no great impediment, knowing howe harmefull might be to him his ill will touching the Realmes of Spaine, but specially for the regard of the kingdome of Aragon, whereunto many of the same familie had aspired; if their power had beene as great as their right: for albeit in the life of the late king and Issabell his wife, it was interpreted in an open and generall Parliament of the whole Realme, that the auncient constitutions of that kingdome, which admit not women to the succession of the Crowne, were not preiudiciall, against the issue males borne of them, when in the line masculine was to be found neither brother, vncler, nor nephew of the dead king, nor any other that was more nearer to him then they that were descended of the womans side, or at least in equall degree: and that for that reason it was declared, that after the death of Ferdinand, the succession appertained to the Archduke Charles, wherein was brought for example, that after the death of Martin king of Aragon dying without issue males, by the sentence of the Iudges deputed to that matter through the whole kingdome, was preferred Ferdinand Graundfather to this Ferdinand, notwithstanding he came of the womans side, afore Count Vrgello and others ioyned to Martin by masculine line, but in degree and property of descending, further off then Ferdinand: yet the people nourished amongst themselves a secrete complaint and controuersie, that in that interpretation and declaration, the power and authority of Ferdinand and Issabell was of more force, then the law of iustice and equity. In this did the interpretation seeme vniust to many, that the women being excluded, such as descended of them might bee admitted, and withall, that in the sentence giuen to the behoofe of the old Ferdinand, the feare of his armes ruled more then reason.

These matters being layd open to the French king, and withall, that the peoples of the prouince of Aragon, Valence, and the Earledome of Catlonia (all these are comprehended vnder the kingdome of Aragon) stood desirous to enioy a king proper and particular: He hoped that the Archduke, not to endaunger so great a succession and so many estates, would not at last be straunge or hard to leaue vnto him the kingdome of Naples vnder some reasonable composition. In the which time, for the better preparing of this enterprise, and because he would insinuate by benefites, aswell as preuaile by forces, he sought to set at libertie Prosper Colonne, vpon whom was imposed a raunsome of fife and thirtie thousand duckats, whereof the king procured him to be pardoned of the one moytie, vpon payment whereof he was released. By which property of fauour the world was induced to beleue, that Prosper had made secrete promise not to beare armes against him, yea haply to ayde him in the warre of Naples, albeit with some limitation or reseruing of his honour.

Albeit the kings minde was occupied with these thoughts, and that he had now determined to deferre no longer the action of armes and forraine warre, yet he was driuen by new accidents to turne his mind wholly to looke to his owne defence: for that the Emperour hauing receiued an hundred and twenty thousand duckats, according to the former negotiation begunne with the king of Aragon, he made preparation (as he had accorded with the sayd King) to inuade the Duchy of Millan, after he had once giuen succours to Verona and Bressia. For the army of the Venetians (commaunded by Trinulce, who was made Gouvernour when the other Trinulce was returned to Trieste) lying encamped within sixe miles of Bressia, suffered their estradiots to make incursions thorough the

the whole countrey: and one day being charged by those that were within the towne, and either party running to their rescue and succour of their friends, they repulsed them and draue them beater into Bressia, hauing long fought for the victory, in which conflict they slue many, & tooke prisoner the gouernours brother of the City. Not many dayes after Monsieur de Lawtrech General of the French army, and Theodore Trmulse hauing espiall that a strength of three thousand Launceknights came to Bressia to conduct the money sent for the pay of the souldiers, sent out to hinder their passage at the Castle of Anso, Ianus Fregoso and Iohn Conrado Vrsin, with certaine hands of both the armies: they put the Launceknights to flight, and made slaughter of eight hundred of them, the residue carying away the money, found safety by flying to Lodrono. Afterwards the Venetians sent a regiment of two thousand five hundred footemen into Sand-valley to fortifie the Castle of Anso, who burnt Lodrono and Astoro. Thus were they in Bressia maruelously trauelled, whose aduersities and straitnesse bearing suspition least they would giue vp, compelled Cesar to aduance and march: he tooke his way by Trem to Verona, hauing in his army five thousand horsemen, fifteene thousand Swissers sent to him by the five Cantons, and ten thousand footmen aswell Spanish as Launceknights. By reason of which marching comming on both in a maner, in a number, and by a way contrary to expectation, the French army and the Venetians, leauing sufficient garrisons within Vincenza and Padoa, went to Pesquero, mrying a mind to stop *Cesar*s passage at the riuier of Mince: but (as it often hapneth in matters of enterprise) the execution did nothing aunswere the counsell: for that when they sawe the enemies approach and come on, they wanted the courage to performe in the field the thing which they had so brauely promised vnder counsell in their pauillions, but, hauing passed Oglia, they retired to Cremona, omitting the oportunity, with the losse of reputation, which in the enemy encreased together with a new courage and resolution. But Cesar, either caried by an vndiscret counsell, or pushed on by an euill fortune, encamped before Afelo, which was garded by a hundred men at armes, and foure hundred footemen of the Venetians: there he consumed vnprofitably many dayes, wherein it was thought that the respite which he gaue to the enemies in that delay, tooke from him the oportunity of the victory. Alsoone as he brake vp from before Afelo, he passed the riuier of Oglia at Orcinono, and the enemies leauing in Cremona three hundred launces & three thousand footemen, retired on the other side the riuier of Addo, with intention to stop his passage. By whose retiring leauing the peeces there abandoned, all the countrey betwene Oglia, Paw, and Addo, was at the deuotion of Cesar, except Cremona & Crema, whereof the one was garded by the French, & the other kept by the Venetians. The Cardinall of Syon with many of the banished people of the Duchy of Milan, followed Cesar, together with Mark. Anthonie Colonne, who marched with two hundred men at armes of the Popes pay: a matter which gaue so much the more feare to the Frenchmen, by how much their greatest hopes were reduced thither, if ten thousand Swissers who had bene payed for ten moneths made any more tarying to march. After Cesar had passed the riuier of Oglia, he drew neare to the riuier of Addo to make his passage at Pisqueton, but finding many difficulties to passe in that place, he came to Rinolco, the Frenchmen lying at Casciano on the other side the riuier, who for that the Swissers were not come, and that the riuier of Addo had many foordes that yeilded facility of passage, retired the day after to Millan, not without matter of infamy to Monsieur de Lawtrech, who had written to the king that he would stop *Cesar*s passage at that riuier. But Cesar finding no impediment to resist his passage there, ioyned diligence to his fortune, and finding mens minds inclined to his victory, he had the City of Loda rendred to him forthwith: and being within a few miles of Millan, he sent an Herald to summon the towne, threatning the inhabitants, that if within three dayes they expulsed not the French army, he would deale worse with them then did Federike Barbarosso his predecessor, who not satisfied to waste and burne Millan, caused salt to be sowed and strawed about in memory of his anger and their rebellion.

The French men that in great feare were retired to Millan, fell amongst themselves into great debates and diuersity of counsels: some were of opinion to abandon Millan, both for that in the needes was no possibility of resistance against so mighty enemies, and withall they had no great confidence in the comming of the Swissers, notwithstanding they knew they were already vpon the way: besides, they had aduertisement that the Cantons either had already ordered, or were at point to commaund, that the souldiers of the Swissers should depart from the seruice of both the one and the other, which direction it was thought credible and likely that those bands that were vpon the way, would be more ready to obey then they that were in the seruice of the enemy. Others gaue aduise not to leaue the seruice, esteeming it too great infamy to leaue forsaken in perill and aduersity, those friends that had reposed and layd vp in them the whole confidence of their safety and protection. They alleaged a better hope in the rescye of the Swissers, and their owne ability to defend Millan, giuing a resolute counsell to sticke to the defence of the towne, and for their better surety they willed to keepe retayned in Millan all the footemen, and eight hundred Launces, making distribution of the others together with the Venetians and the light horsemen, into places adioyning, to keepe and cut off victuals from the enemies. The variety of opinions was no small impediment to the present seruice, their daunger and necessity being more importunate, then their counsels resolute, or their confidence assured. Neuerthelesse the first counsell had bene followed, had it not bene for the contrary working and perswasion of Andrew Grutti and Andrew Treusian, Venetian commissioners, who obtayned by their authority (for otherwise they could win nothing) that a cowardly haste should not carry them further then the reputation of valour and counsell appertayning to men of warre and seruice. In the action of which perswasions newes came, that the day following Alberto Peter would be in Millan with tenthousand Swissers and Grisons; a matter that breathed new minds and courages in them, and yet hauing no confidence to be able to defend the suburbs, they burnt them by the counsell of the Venetian commissioners, who aduised them to that violence, either for that they supposed it necessary to the safety of the towne, or else vnder that occasion they sought to satisfie the auncient hatred remaining of long time betweene them of Millan and Venice: they both expulsed out of the City, and also retained vnder good gard, many of the chieftaines of the Gebelin faction, as inclined to the name of the Empire by the care and labour of those houses, and for that there were in the army many of the same partiality. In this meane while Cesar encamped with his army at Lambra two miles from Millan, where he had no sooner setled his campe to the terror of the towne, then the expected supply of Swissers entred for the defence of it. Besides the suddennesse of their comming, which in cases of rescue is of no small importance, their readinesse and disposition to fight, amazed not a little euen those that afore seemed to stand in assurance of the victory: they gaue a new life to the discouraged minds of the Frenchmē and no lesse feare and terror to Cesar, who looking into the auncient hatred of that nation to the house of Austrich, and comparing with his present estate, the accident hapned to Lodowike Sforce hauing Swissers in his army, and the French army his enemies, began to feare least they wold ioyne him to that lamentable example: he saw it was likely that they would sooner practise infidelity and treason against him for the difficulty he had to pay them, then against the Frenchmen, to whom was wanting no money to pay their wages, nor to corrupt their minds: wherein this was one matter that confirmed him in his doubt, that Iames Staffler Generall of the Swissers, had asked him his pay with great arrogancie: which neuerthelesse was deferred, besides many other difficulties, because the treasure that was sent to him out of Germanie, was restrayned by the Spanish regiments that were within Brescia, to satisfie so much of their payes as were due. So that in the consideration of these obiections and doubts, together that the danger was nothing inferior to the feare, Cesar brake vp his campe and retired towards the riuier of Adda, his negligence taking from him the glorie of the victory which fortune and oportunitie seemed to prepare for him: for, if he had made his approches to Millan but three dayes afore (a time which he vainely consumed afore Aolo) the Frenchmen that liued in great doubt and incertainty of the comming of the Swissers, had returned beyond the Mountes. Besides, if he had not so soone discamped, either the Frenchmen, not reposing fully in the Swissers, for the respects of their countrey men that serued in Cesars campe, had followed their first counsell, or else the Swissers taking their excuse vpon the commandement of their superiours, would haue abandoned the Frenchmen. Cesar passed the riuier of Adda, and was not followed of the Swissers, who remayned at Loda, protestting that if their payes came not within foure dayes, they would depart and leaue his seruice. But Cesar making his aboade vpon the territories of Bergama, gaue them continuall hopes to be satisfied, for that he expected a new supply of money to be sent him out of England: he threatned to draw backe his forces againe to Millan, which estloones reconti-

rued the doubts of the Frenchmen, who now more then euer stood incertaine of the fidelitie of the Swissers, for that besides they had willingly foreshewed their comming, with protestation that they would neuer lift vp their weapons against their countrey men in the other campe, there was come to them a commaundement from the Cantons to forsake the pay of the French men; in so much as there were two thousand of them that went away, leauing behind them great feare least the others would follow their example, notwithstanding the Cantons had assured the king that they had giuen secret commaundement to their footmen to the contrarie. At last Cesar, after he had leauied vpon the towne of Bergama an impost of sixteene thousand duckets, & was gone towards Crema vnder hope of an intelligence, returned estloones vpon the territories of Bergama without doing any thing, and determined to withdraw himselfe to Trent. He communicated with the Captaines of the armie his deliberation, assuring them that his principall intention was to giue order for money which he meant to leaue of men, with the which, and with the treasure of England that was vpon the way, he would make a short returne, desiring them to temporize and expect with him so good preparation: and they hauing sacked Loda, and forced the castle without artillerie, retired to Guaradadda for want of victuals, after they had also made pillage of the towne of S. Ange. After the departing of Cesar, there was some hope that the Swissers, with whom was ioyned the whole armie at Romano, would estloones passe the riuier of Adda, the rather for that the Marquis of Brandebourg was come to the campe, and the Cardinall of Syon to Bergama with thirty thousand duckets which the king of England had sent: for feare whereof, the Duke of Burbon whom almost all the Swissers and the Venetian souldiers had forsaken, was come vpon the shoares on the other side the riuier to make resistance: but the thoughts of the enemies were sodainly changed, for that the Swissers, the mony not suffising to satisfie their whole pay, disperfed and returned into their countrey by the vallie of Voltolina. And for the same cause a regiment of three thousand footmen, part Spanish and part Dutch, came and rendred themselves to the campe of the Frenchmen and the Venetians, who being passed the riuier of Adda, had not ceased to traueil the enemies with sundrie incursions, and to skirmish with them with diuers fortunes and accidents: sometimes the Frenchmen had the worse, who in a hot skirmish made neare Bergama, lost about two hundred men at armes: & sometimes the aduersity fell vpon the contrary part, of whom in a like encounter fell into the fortune of a prisoner Cesar Fieramosquo: the residue of the armie drew neare to Bressia, hauing receiued in prest a ducket for euerie man: but for the impediments that the light horsemen gaue them, Marke Anth. Colonne entred into Verona with the Launceknights and certaine bands of Spanish footmen, and all the others separated themselves.

This was the end of the mouing and marching of Cesar, wherein the French king had no small suspicion of the Pope, for that hauing summoned him according to the bond of the league made betweene them, that he should send to the defence of the estate of Milan five hundred men at armes, or at least draw them neare the confines, and withall to wage three thousand Swissers according to his offer made to Anthonie Maria Paluozin, which the king charged him withall. The Pope made but cold answers touching the waging of Swissers, and taking an occasion to excuse himselfe, that his men were in ill appointment, he promised to send him bands of the Florentines, who with certaine of his souldiers marched very slowly towards Bologna and Reggia. The king suspected more and more that he did communicate with the comming of Cesar, both for that as soone as he knew he was entred into Italy, he created Legate with him Bernard Bibiena Cardinall of Saint Maria in Porzio, who bare alwayes a setled emulation to the French, and was accustomed to impugn the proceeding of their affaires with the Pope: and also for that he suffered Marke Anthonie Colonne with his regiments to follow Cesar's armie. But howsoeuer the king was iealous of the Popes priuity in this action, or by what humours he ranne in coniecture against him for his consent to the emotion, it is most true that touching his proper interest, the Pope was not a little aggriued with the descending of Cesar with so great forces, fearing that if he caried the victorie, he would aduenture to oppresse all Italy, according to his ancient inclination: neuertheless, what for the impression of feare, and that such maner of proceeding was conformable to his nature, he dissembled his thoughts, labouring to make himselfe as little hatefull as he could to either parties: that was the cause why he was bold to call home againe Marke Anth.

and durst not send to the king the succours he had promised: That he had created a Legate with Cesar, and on the other side, Cesar being departed from Milan, the Legate vnder a colour of sicknesse stayed at Rubiera, to see afore he passed further, what would be the issue of such an enterprize: and afterwards, to settle and quiet the kings mind, he thought good that his nephew Laurence (continuing in the same demonstration to depend of the king that he shewed when he went to him at Milan) should giue him money by the Florentines to pay three thousand Swissers for one moneth. But albeit the king accepted this money, yet (disclosing by tokens that he knew the Popes drifts) he said, that since he was alwayes against him in warre, and the alliance made with him serued him to no vse in times of daunger, he would esstoones make a new consideration, wherein he would be bound but in peace and in seasons of surety.

recouer Bressia

As soone as the armie of Cesar was disperied and separate, the Venetians (without tarying for the Frenchmen) approached Bressia by night, thinking to scale the wals: they had confidence in this enterprize by the small strength of men that was within, since there remained no more but six hundred footmen Spanish, and foure hundred horsemen, but both their ladders being shorter then was necessarie to that seruice, and the valour of the defendants beguiling their expectation, their attempt drew with it no successe. Afterwards arriued the French armie vnder the charge of Odet de Foix whom the king had newly created his Lieutenant in the place of M. Bourbon, who of his owne motion had willingly resigned that gouernement into the kings hands. These armies assailed Bressia with artilleries in foure places, to take from the defendants all reasonable possibilitie to make resistance against so feuerall executions: and albeit the valour of the defendants contending against their fortune, made good resistance so long as they had hope that a regiment of seuen thousand footmen of the countrey of Tyrol, being come by Cesars commandement to Montagnana, should passe further: yet, both that rescue being disappointed for the impediments which the Venetians bestowed in the castle of Anfo and other passages, and also the defendants not willing to abide the assault which was to be giuen the next day (a great pane of the wall being already beaten downe to the ground) the souldiers couenanted to leaue the towne and castle only with their goods saued, if they were not rescued within a day.

About these times the Pope preparing to take by armes from Frauncis Maria de la Rovere, the Duchie of Vrbyn, began to proceede against him with censures and Church-paines, causing to be published an admonition, wherein was expressed, that being in the pay and wages of the Church, he had refused those regiments of men for the which he had receiued pay, & was secretly compounded with the enemies: That long time before he had killed the Cardinall of Pania, of the which he was absolved by grace and not by iustice, and had executed many other murders: That in the greatest heat of the warre betweene Pope Iulio, to whom he was nephew, subiect, & Captaine, he had sent Baltasar de Chastillon to take the Kings pay: And that at the same time he had denied passage to certaine bands that marched to ioyne with the armie of the Church, & in the iurisdiction which he possessed as freeholder to the Sea Apostolike, he had pursued the souldiers of the Church that fled from the battell of Rauenna. The Pope was determined many moneths before to make warre vpon him, whereunto, besides all late and greene iniuries, he was pushed on by a disdain in that he refused to aide himselfe and his brother to returne to Florence: and yet he was somewhat retained by a shame that he had to persecute the nephew of him, by whose meane the Church was risen to such a greatnesse, but much more at the contemplation of his brother Iulian, who in the time of their exile hauing remained many yeares in the Court of Vrbyn, both with Duke Guido, & after his death with the Duke reigning, could not endure to see him deprived of the Duchy, wherein he had receiued entertainment, fauor, & honour. But Iulian was no sooner dead of a consuming disease at Florence, & the great stirres of Cesar being vanished and turned into smoke, then the Pope at the perswasion of his nephew Laurence and his mother Alfonsina thirsting after that estate, resolved to defer no longer the oppression which he had determined with no lesse iniury then infamy: he was not ashamed to allege for excuse of his ingratitude (which many imputed to him for reproch and slander) not onely the trespasses he had receiued by him, and the penalties which the rigour of the lawes impose vpon a subiect that offends in contumacie against his Lord, or a Captaine who contrarieto his bond denieth to leade the men for the which he is waged and entertained: but also he brought in this consideration, that it was to him a matter very iealous and daungerous, to endure in the intrals of his estate, man who by how much more he had begun already to offend him without all regard to faith and honour, by so much more it was certaine that whensoever a greater occasion did offer, he would not be lesse ready or apt to do the like hereafter, confirming his first illes with other examples of the same nature. The discourse of that warre was this. As soone as Laurence shewed himselfe vpon the frontiers of the Duchie, and displayed his armie, compounded vpon the souldiers and subiects of the Church and the estate of Florence, the Citie of Vrbino with other townes of that iurisdiction made a voluntarie rendring to the Pope, the Duke that was then retired to Pejera, giuing them election to saue themselves, since he had no abilitie to defend them: and as soone as the armie drew neare, Pejera followed the example of Vrbino, the cowardise of the Duke concurring with his infelicities: for notwithstanding there was a garrison of three thousand footmen, the towne mightie in fortifications, and had the sea at deuotion, yet the Duke leauing within the Castle Tranquillo Mandolfo in whom he much reposed, tooke his way to Mantua, whither he had sent before his wife and sonnes: some supposed that his retiring thither came vpon a suspected confidence he had in the souldiers, of whom the greatest part was vn Timer: but some are of opinion, that his impatience for the absence of his wife, was the cause of his going thither, vnder which pollicie he excused his feare with loue. It is a true saying that aduersities haue a swift course, and fortune to make her mutabilitie wonderfull, can heape in one day all the chaunces of a world: for except the Castles of Sinigalo, Pejera, S. Leo, and Mandolo, the whole Duchie of Vrbino and Pejera was educed in foure dayes to the obedience of the Church: but the Castle of Sinigalo made no delay to follow the course of the victorie, as also the strong castle of Pejera after it had bene two dayes executed with artilleries, compounded to giue vp if within twenty dayes it were not rescued, so far forth as during this time of truce or expectation of succours there were no casting of rampiers nor other sort of fortifications: which condition being ill performed, was the cause that Tranquillo receiuing no rescue within the time appointed, refused to deliuer it vp: and beginning a fresh to recontinue the warre, he made new sallies and actions vpon the enemy without, which made his destiny the harder, for that the battery beginning to play with greater furie, the souldiers within the Castle preferring their owne safety afore the will of Tranquillo, drew into mutinie against him, and deliuered him vp into the hands of the Captaines, who condemned him to be hanged for his promise breaking. Not many dayes after was rendred the castle of Mainola, a place verie necessarie to besiege S. Leo, for that it is but a mile distance, and hath his situation directly opposite: and they bestowed about S. Leo two thousand men, to the end to keepe it besieged: and albeit for the strong situation there was no hope to carie it but by the last necessitie, which is hunger; yet it was surprisid within three moneths by an inuention of a maister Carpenter, who climbing by night by the benefite of a verie long ladder vp to a cliffe or dependant supposed to be most inaccessible of all that mountaine, he tooke away his ladder, and remaining there all the residue of the night, he began at the first appearing of the day, to climbe higher with certaine fastening instruments of yron, and got at last with great aduventure to the top of the mountaine, and so descending againe, and with his yron instruments making easie certaine of the places that were of most difficultie, he returned the night following to the campe by the help of the same ladder that caried him vp: he declared to the Captaines that the mountaine was accessible, and that in the enterprize the daunger was greater in opinion then in aduentering, in so much as a night was appointed when he was sent thither with the same ladder that he first vsed: and as it was reasonable that he should be guide of the action, that was the first author of the inuention, so there were committed to him an hundred and fiftie footmen of choise, with whom staying vpon the said cliffe or dependant, they began at the opening of the day (for it was impossible to climbe higher by night) to mount vp those verie hard & straight places, esteeming nothing of the perill when they considered what glorie was in the aduventure: with this labour about thirtie of them overcame the difficultie of the place, and got vp to the top of the mountaine with a drumme and sixe Ensignes: and hiding themselves vpon the ground to expect their companions that were climbing, when the watch then breaking vp, espied them as they lay in ambush vpon the earth, and gaue the alarme, when the souldiers being now disclosed, not tarying for their fellows, gaue the signe to the armie in the campe, who according to good direction tooke knowledge of the successe of the climbers, & with great store of ladders offered a present assault to the mountaine in manie places: their chiefe reason in this assault was to draw away those that were within, who after they had somewhat serued the places they were appointed vnto, & descrying already vpon the plaine of the mountaine fixe ensignes aduanced, they ran to inclose themselves within the castle that was hewed out of the mountaine, hauing now more feare of their liues then confidence in the inuincible strength of the place: The residue by this time being climed vp to the top of the mountaine, they began to command the whole place, opening the way to others, that as yet with great paine and difficultie were labouring to win the top of the hill. But the resolution of the climbers being farre aboue the valour of the defendants, in whom also the sodainnesse of the fortune redoubled their feare, the mountaine became a reward to the labours of those that had aduentured to climbe it, when the Castle also well provided of all things to hold out, sauing of valour and fidelitie, yeelded the second day. In somuch that vpon the conquering of this estate, which together with Pesera and Sinigalo separate members from the Duchy of Vrbino, was not worth in reuenue aboue xxy. thousand duokets. The Pope pursuing the processe he had begun, published sentence, and deprived Franciscotomaria, and in the Consistorie inuested his nephew Laurence: wherein for a more able and sufficient confirmation of his doings, he annexed to the Bull which he dispatched for that action, the subscribing of the proper hands of all the Cardinals, sauing of Dominike Grimani Bishop of Vrbino, and an ancient friend to the Duke, who would not be concurrant in so manifest a wrong, & for that cause fearing the Popes indignation, he departed afterwards from Rome, whither he neuer returned so long as he liued.

The French king was discontented with the oppression of the Duke of Vrbino, the rather for that he suffered priuation of his estate for being confederate with him: but he stood much more displeased for many other things that the Pope did: for Prosper Colonne abiding at Basseta a town of the Paluosiens, at such time as he was returned from Fraunce, and afterwards being come to Modena for feare of the Frenchmen, whither likewise was retired Ier. Morono, who also stood in doubt of the, for that contrary to their promises they had commanded him to go into Fraunce: there was conspiracy whilest Prosper lay at Modena, and afterwards at Bologna, to surprise secretly some place of importance in the Duchy of Millan, by the working of some of the banished men. In this practise was also concurrant Mucio Colonne, to who the Pope hauing priuity in these actions, had granted harbour for his bands of souldiers vpon the territories of Modena. Moreover the Pope had perswaded the king Catholike (for so was the Archduke called since the death of his grandfather by the mother side) to make no new conuentions with the French king. And on the behalfe of the Swissers, Emius Bishop of Verulo and the Popes Nuncio, to who afterwards euen in his latest yeares was transferred the creation & dignity of Cardinal, stirred vp the five Cantons to follow the amity of Cesar, besides many other offices displeasing to the king. So that concurring also at the same time a practise between Cesar (who remaining between Tret & Ispruch, terrified the French men more with demonstrations then with effects) and the king of England, and the Swissers to make a new inuasion vpon the Duchie of Millan, the French king suspected that these matters were wrought with the will and priuity of the Pope, whose euill affection also appeared in other actions, making many exceptions & difficulties to confirme vnto him the tenth of the benefices of the realme of Fraunce, which he had promised him at Bologna. And yet (so great is the respect and maiestie of a Pope) the king so laboured to appease him with offers and offices, that albeit after the departure of Cesar he had determined to molest Mirandola, Corpy, and Correge, as townes imperiall, to the end to make some leauies of mony of them, yet he forbore from all action, in regard of the complainings of the Pope, who had receiued afore into his protection the Lords of those townes. Moreover, the Moors of Affrica commaunding the sea inferiour with many vessels, he offered to send him for the surety of those seas, his nauie of ships, which Peter of Nauarre armed at Marseilles by his consent, for the inuasion of the streames and creeks of Barbary, with a strength of 6000 footmen: but notwithstanding all these offers & obseruances, the Pope perseuered in his opinion, & as sometimes he would vse deniall, and sometimes occupy excuses, yet he wold neuer so much as consent to that demand the king had made to him with great instance to call out of Switzerland the Bishop of Verulo, & much lesse wold he remove Mucio Colonne from the territories of Modena (where he fained he remained of his own authority) vntil by the departure of Prosp. from Bologna & all that practise dissolued into smoke, there was no more necessity of his abiding there: only the breaking vp from thence was a matter of great aduersity to Mutio, for that entring afterwarde by night into the towne of Ferma with the forces of the Colonnos, and with certaine bands of footemen Spanish, as he was busie in sacking the Citie, he receiued a blow, whereof he dyed within few dayes after.

In this estate of affaires, and the Senate of Venice making instance for the recouerie of Verona, Monsieur Lawtrech with his armie of sixe thousand Launceknights whom the Venetians agreed to pay for that enterprise, came to the riuer of Adice, to the end to passe to Vsolinguo, and so to incampe afore Verona together with the Venetian army: but what by the rumour of the comming of the Swissers now redoubled, and the suspition recontinued of the being of Prosper Colonne at Modena, where also remained the Cardinall of S. Maria in Portico, he retired to Pesquero, not without the complaints of the Venetians, making distribution of his bands both on this side & beyond the riuer of Mancia. And notwithstanding the sayd suspitions were ceased, & that from Verona a regimēt of two thousand footmen both Spanish & Launceknights, were gone to the pay of the Venetians, & more did go dayly: yet he remained in that place more then a moneth, expecting (as was sayd) both a new prouision of money out of France, & a greater proportion of artillerie, munitions & money frō the Venetians. But the true cause of his temporising, was, to obserue what would be the issue of the treatie betweene his King & the king Catholike: for the Frēch king knowing how much & how necessarily his amity did import the king Catholike, both to remoue the difficulties of his passage into Spaine, and to assure him of the obedience and iurisdiction of his kingdomes, he seemed not content with the matters that had bene agreed vpon afore at Paris, but deuised both to impose vpon him more harder conditions, and by his working to haue peace with Cesar, which he could not bring to passe without rendring Verona to the Venetians. And touching the Spanish King, whose minoritie hauing not aboue fiftēne yeares, was wholly gouerned by Monsieur de Chenres, he refused not to apply his deliberations to the present time and necessitie of things: by reason whereof, on the part of the French King were sent to Noyon the Bishop of Paris, the great Maister of Fraunce, and the President of the Parliament of Paris: and for the King Catholike were Monsieur de Chenres, & the great Chauncellour of Cesar. In which respite or intermission, the rigour of armes & hostility (as is the custome of warfaring of our time) was continually employed against the poore paystants and countrey men, Monsieur de Lawtrech lying still to see what would come of the negociation: for, by the benefite of a bridge which he had builded at the village of Monzarban, he began to cut downe the corne of the country of Verona, & gaue liberty to his light horsmen to make incursions in all places: he sent also one part of his armie to incampe vpon the lands of the *Mantuan*s, making hauocke of the commodities of that countrey, with so vniuersall & generall damage, that to redeeme their harmes together with the retiring of so dangerous an enemy, the Marquis of Mantua was contented to contribute to him twelue thousand crownes: and the souldiers of Verona executing dayly hostilities vpon the territories of Vincenza and Padoa, put to sacke the wretched Citie of Vincenza. Afterwarde Monsieur de Lawtrech bearing compassion to the great complaints of the Venetians, passed the riuer of Adice by a bridge which he caused to be set vp at Vsolinguo: and afterwarde hauing made a great pray of the countrey (for it was neuer thought that the armie would passe on that side) he drew neare to Verona to besiege it, winning Chiusa in the meane while by the ayde of the countrey men, to make more hard the passage of succours that were to come out of Germanie. Neuertheless the same day that he approached to Verona, the regiments of Launceknights being now three moneths since they had bene entertained with the money of the Venetians, either of their voluntarie will and motion, or by the secret subornation of Cesar, protested openly, that they would not serue at the siege of a towne possessed by Cesar, and wherein the French King had no principall interest. By which mutinie, drawing with it a suspition of greater conspiracies, Monsieur de Lawtrech repassed Adice, and incamped a myle from the wals of Verona, to whom the Venetian army went, to ioine with him, not supposing it sufficient for their suretie to remaine on the other side the riuer, though their armie contained a strength of fīue hundred men at armes, fīue hundred light horsmen, and foure thousand footmen.

About this time the deputies of those two Kings passed capitulations in this sort in the towne Capitulations of Noyon: That there should be a perpetuall peace betweene the French King and the King of Spaine, with the like confederation for the defence of their estates against all the world: That the French king & king Catholike French King should giue in mariage to the king Catholike his daughter being then but one yeare of age, and he to indue her for dowrie with the rights which he pretended to appertaine to him in the kingdome of Naples, according to the partition made afore time betweene their predecessors: but vnder this couenaunt, that vntill she bare an able to be married, the King Catholike should pay to the French King an hundred thousand crownes yearely to helpe to defray his expenses: That if she dyed before the mariage, and the King should haue another daughter, then he to bestow her likewise vpon the King Catholike with the same conditions: and in case he had no other daughter, then to giue him to wife Madame Renee, who had bene promised to him in the capitulation made at Paris: That in case any of those wiues dyed in mariage without children, then that part of the kingdome of Naples to reuert to the Crowne of France: That the King Catholike within a certaine time should restore the realme of Nauarre to his auncient king, & in not performing it, it should be lawfull to the French king to ayde him to recouer it: but vnder this charge (as the Spaniards affirmed afterwarde) that the King of that state should first communicate with him his rights: That Cesar might enter into the peace within the terme of two moneths, and if he did enter into it, it should be lawfull to the French King to ayde the Venetians to recouer Verona: which Citie, if Cesar deliuered vp into the hands of the King Catholike with power to giue it frankly and absolutely to the French king within sixe weekes, to dispose of it as he thought good: that he should pay him an hundred thousand crownes, and the Venetians as much, whereof the one part to be payd vpon the conignation, and the other within sixe moneths, and also to remaine acquitted of three hundred thousand crownes which he had receiued of the King Lewis whilest they were in confederation together: That in that case there should be truce for xviij. moneths betweene Cesar and the Venetians: That to Cesar should remaine Rina de Trenta and Ronera, with all that he possessed then in the countrey of Friul: and that the Venetians should continue to hold the places which at that time they held of Cesar vntill the Frēch & Spanish kings had determined the differences that had bene entertained betweene them for their confines and limites: for resoluing whereof, both the one and the other of the parties named the Pope. Notwithstanding the accord made at Noyon, the Venetians ceased not to stirre vp Monsieur de Lawtrech to besiege Verona, desiring to recouer it by armes, both for that they were vncertaine whether Cesar would accept the peace, and also to cut off the proportion of money which they were to pay. But touching the French King, the way of concord and peace was more agreeable to him then the meane of armes and force, his desire to haue vnitie with Cesar drawing him about all other respects: and yet Monsieur de Lawtrech refused not to consent to their will, hauing now no more reason of excuse, both for that the Venetians had made great leauies of souldiers, and fulfilled all other prouisions demaunded by him, & also for that the Launceknights refused no more to go thither together with the others: so that the armies passed scuerally ouer the riuer of Adice, the one by the bridge that was builded aboue the Citie, the other by the benefite of another bridge set vp for the time beneath the Citie. One part of the artillerie of the French armie that lay incamped at Tomba, was planted before the gate Santa Luce, and the other with the Launceknights was bestowed at the gate S. Massina. They made choice of those places for their artilleries, to the end to do execution all together on that part where the wall betweene the Citie and Citadell meeteth conioyned with the wall of the towne, by which deuise hauing meane at one time to make entrie into the Citie and the Citadell, the defendants within should be constrained to deuide themselves into two parts for the regard of the wall in the middest. The Venetian armie passed beneath Verona in the field of Mars, and remained incamped at S. Michaels betweene the riuer and Cannell, both to leaue and remoue the defences of that place, and also to beate the gate called the Bishops gate, which was a place of most weaknesse and least armed. The two first dayes the defences which were of great strength and beat flanking, were beaten downe by the artilleries, but with greater difficulties on the quarter of the Venetians, to whom it was no small labour to batter the defences of the three bastillions. But as soone as they were battred, both parts began to execute the wall with xviij. peeces of great artilleries, and fiteene smaller peeces of batterie, either army hauing throwen downe the third day twentie fadomes of the wall, not forbearing to batter still to make the breach and entrie the larger: and yet the Venetians on whose side the wall was most weake, notwithstanding they had almost reuerfed all the bastillions and rampiers, had not yet wholly remoued all the defences within that played in flanke, because they lay so low and almost within the ditch, that either the bullet went ouer them, or else was grazed in

in the earth afore it came there. Moreouer at the same time they vndermined the wall, which though they had vnderfet and stayed with props, yet it beguiled the deuise of the doers, and fell down before the time appointed by the Captiues. There was within Verona a strength of eight hundred horsemen, siue thousand Launceknights, & xv. hundred Spaniards vnder the gouernment of Marke Antho. Colonne, who had now exchanged the wages of the Pope for the pay of Caesar. This garrison omitted nothing that might tend to the strengthning and repairing of the rampiers, and standing carefull to do all other things for the valiaunt defending of the place, they expressed vniuersally a wonderfull resolution and courage of minde, and particularly was performed an honourable example and office of Marke Anthonie Colonne, who receiuing a sleight hurt in his shoulder by a shot, forbore not for all that to offer his body both day & night to all paines & dangers. By this time the artilleries planted by the Frenchmen in foure places against the towers betweene the gate of the Citadell and the gate of Santa Luce, had made so great and many ruines, that every breach was able to receiue souldiers in order. The artilleries of the Venetians had aduanced so much, and almost done no lesse execution, and yet Monsieur de Lawtrech demaunded new artilleries to make the breach the greater, embracing readily all occasions that offered to deferre the action contrarie to the will of the Venetians, who cried to giue the assault. He made helping to his delays this accident; there came to the armie by the plaines of Verona, eight hundred barrells of powder, together with many other natures of munitions drawne by Cartes, and what by the straitnesse and importunitie of the place, and emulation of the diuers struing to enter one afore another, the chafing and violent mouing of the wheelles bred to a fire, whose heat embraced the powder, and so consumed the Cartes with the cattell that drew them. Moreouer there was this increase of difficultie to those that were besieged, that in the Citie so many moneths afflicted by the enemies that kept it alwayes straitly enuironed, the store of victuals began to diminish, and no hope to be resupplied, but in very small quantitie, and that by stealth, vsing the pathes of the mountaines for the comoditie of that poore reliefe.

But as the affaires of Verona stood in these termes, there came to the rescue of that Citie a regiment of nine thousand Launceknights sent by Caesar, who arriuing at Chiusa, tooke it by composition, and made themselues Lordes of the Castell of Cornaro, which is a peece standing vpon the next hill to Adice drawing towards Trenta, and commaunded many times by both the parties in the warre betweene Caesar and the Venetians: Monsieur de Lawtrech either fearing in deede, or dissembling to be amazed at the new supply of Launceknights, leauied his campe against the mindes of the Venetians; and retired his armie to Villefranch, carying with him one part of the Venetian regiments, and the other part vnder Iohn Paule Mansfon withdrew to Roseta beyond the riuer of Adice by a bridge prepared for their passage: in so much as the Venetians hauing now no further confidence to carie Verona, sent all their great artilleries to Bressia: and the Launceknights without any impediment incamped at Tomba, where the French armie was lodged afore, one part of them entring into the Citie, and the other part remaining without, which returned after Verona was reuiuicualled. There remained for the gard of Verona a strength of seuen or eight thousand Launceknights, for that the most part of the Spanish bands that could hold no agreement with them, were passed to the Venetian campe vnder Colonell Maldonato. And in common iudgement, that rescue or succours was of smal moment, for that they brought not with them other store of money then xx. thousand Florins of the Rhem, which the king of England had sent, and during the time of their tarying there, they consumed so much victuals, that it was almost equall to that quantitie which they had brought with them.

By reason of those bands that were retired to Villefranche, from whence they committed manifest haucke and spoile vpon the parts of Verona and Mantua, the Venetians were compelled, least the Frenchmen, who no commaundement that was made to them on the kings behalfe could make to stay, should depart to their garrisons, to take order that the Citie of Bressia should wholly furnish them of necessary victuals; an expence rising to aboue a thousand crownes a day.

At last things began to incline manifestly to peace, for that it was knowen that Caesar (notwithstanding his former solicitation to his sonne in law not to compound with the French King) preferring the couetousnesse of money afore the hate he bare naturally to the French, & also afore his auuncient ambition to make himselfe Lord of Italie, had not onely accepted and ratified the peace, but also determined to reder Verona according to the forme of those conuentions: fro this succeeded another matter to the benefite of the French King, that all the Cantons of Swissers seeing armes and hostilitie depose betweene Cesar and the King, were contented to compound with him as the Grisons had done before, in which action Galeas Viscount did what he could, who being banished and a rebell protested by the King, wonne of him by this meane libertie to returne into his countrey, restitution to all his goods, and recompence of many graces & honours. The composition was, that the king should pay to the Swissers within three moneths an hundred and fiftie thousand duckats, and from thence forward an indument of perpetual yearly pensions: That the Swissers should be bound to deliuer to his pay by publike decree so often as he should demaund, a certaine number of footemen, wherein notwithstanding the proceeding was diuerse, for that the eight Cantons were bound to furnish that proportion, whensoever he should enter into any enterprise to offend the estates of another, and to the fise Cantons the couenant bare no other obligation then for the defence of his proper estates: That it should be in the power of the Swissers to render to the French King the Castels of Lugan and Lugarno, which be passages of great strength, and of no lesse importance for the surety of the Duchie of Millan: and in case they would make restitution, the King to pay to them three hundred thousand duckats. But they rased them to the ground immediatly vpon the making of the composition. This was the discourse of things in Italie in the yeare a thousand five hundred & sixteene: But in the beginning of the yeare following, the Bishop of Trente, who was come to Verona, made offer to Monsieur de Lawtrech to deliuer vp that Citie to the French King within sixe moneths according to the contents of the capitulation, seeing he held it in the name of the King of Spaine. But there remained this difficultie whether the terme should begin from the day of the ratification of Cesar, or from the time it was acknowledged that Verona was holden by the King Catholike: and vpon this albeit there passed a disputation for certaine dayes: yet for that the garrison of footemen that were within Verona drew to mutinies vpon the demand of money, the Bishop of Trente was constrained to follow those affaires with a greater hast: and therefore taking the beginning from the day that he had receiued comission from Cesar, he agreed to deliuer vp Verona the fifteenth day of January: at which day he passed the assignement to Monsieur de Lawtrech, who receiued it in the name of the French king, the sayd Bishop receiuing of the Venetians the first fiftie thousand duckats, together with the fiftene thousand, which by the capitulation they were bound to pay to the garrison in Verona, and also assured fidelitie & promise of Monsieur de Lawtrech to see drawne to Trente the artilleries that were within Verona. Monsieur de Lawtrech at the same instant redeliuered the Citie ouer in his kings name to the Senate of Venice: Andrew Gritti standing then as Deputie & assigney to that state. Great was the gladnesse of the nobilitie and whole communitie of Venice, for that after so long and daungerous a warre, drawing with it so many calamities and expences, they had reclaimed to the generall body of their dominiõ, so principall a member, esteeming the reward of the warre farre aboute the burden and charges of the same, although by the report of such as haue written of their doings, they consumed, during all the warres they made since the league of Cambray, fise millions of duckats, whereof they leauied fise hundred thousand of the sale of offices: lastly the inhabitants of Verona reioyced no lesse then the residue, together with all other Cities and iurisdickions subiect to their common weale, hoping now to be deliuered and dispenced withall from so many afflictions, which so long a warre had throwen vpon them, sometimes by the one armie and sometimes by the other.

THE THIRTEENTH BOOKE OF THE historic and discourse of Guicciardin.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Duke of Vrbini makes an enterprize to reconer his estate out of the hands of Pope Leo. The French king makes a league with the Pope. The conspiracie of Cardinall Petrucci against the Pope is discovered. Charles king of Spaine is chosen Emperour. Martin Luther writeth against the Pope. The Pope puts Iohn Paule Baillon to death.

Insomuch as all armes & hostilities were now surceased between Cesar and the Venetians, & in the French king all occasions restrained to make warre against Cesar or the king Catholike, it seemed that to the regions of Italy, afflicted with so manie calamities and trauels of warre, was now appointed a time of rest and tranquillitie: wherein these were the reasons that the Swissers (a mightie instrument to any that sought to innouate & trouble things) seemed now reclaimed to their ancient amitie with the French king, and yet bare no minds estranged from other Princes: that in the accord made at Noyon, was declared such a hope, that to establish a greater alliance betweene the two kings, there was working to draw them to an enteruiew at Cambrai, whither were gone to that end Monsieur de Cheures, the great Maister of France, and Robertet. Lastly, there was expressed no lesse readinesse on the part of Cesar, who, besides the rendring of Verona, sent two Embassadors to the French king, to solemnize and confirme the peace: so that it was a iudgement accompanied with his iust cause and reasons, that by the benefite of peace and concord betweene so mighty Princes, would be dissolued the seeds of all quarrels & disagreemets in Italy: But as there is no certaintie in the counsels of mortall men, so is there lesse expectation of their worldly euent: for, men and their doings standing subiect to the law of nature and destinie, haue no other liberty then to deeme and debate, and to God alone is referred all power of disposition and execution, since he is able to gouerne & commaund all things by the same power wherewith he hath created them of nothing. Insomuch as in this action of Italy, either for the infelicity or destinie of the countrey, or for that the vniuersall iurisdiction was deuided into so many seuerall principalities and states, it was almost impossible that it should suffer anie dispensation of miseries, by reason of the diuersitie of willes and interests of such as had it in hand: for scarcely were laid aside armes and hostilitie betweene Cesar and the Venetians; yea the Citie of Verona not yet resigned, when were disclosed tokens & beginnings of new tumults: and of these was the breeder and conspirator Franciscomaria, who had practised and drawne to his faction, such bands of Spanish footmen as had serued both within Verona and afore Verona: beginnings of new troubles. he perswaded them to follow him to the reconquering of his estates, out of the which the Pope had expulsed him the same sommer: a matter wherein he found small difficulties, for that to soldiers forreiners and mercenarie, accustomed in the time of warres to sacke townes and to make pray and spoile of countreyes, there was nothing more contrary then peace, wherunto they saw all the affaires and inclinations of Italy disposed at that instant.

There drew to him about fiftethousand Spanish footmen, whereof was chiefe one Naldomato, a man of the same nation, & of long experience in manie warres: and to this regiment was ioyned a strength of eight hundred light horsemen, led by Federike Bossolo, Gaioso a Spaniard, Suechar a Burgonian, Andrew Bue and Constantine Boccalo Albanois, all Captaines of name & make, & especiallie esteemed for their knowledge in wars. Amongst the he that bare the greatest reputation, whether it were for the noblenesse of his house, or for the honorable degrees in warre.

which he had borne from his youth, was Federike Gonzaguo Lord of Bossolo, who haply was one of the greatest parties to perswade this enterprize, being no lesse moued by an ambition to make greater his merits and praises by new warres, concurring also the amity which he had with Franciscomaria, the through an ancient & settled hatred which he bare to Laurence de Medicis, chiefly for that at such time as was transferred to Laurence the charge of all the armies of the Church and the Florentines, by reason of the sicknesse of Julian his Vncle, he had denied to make him Captaine generall of the footmen, an estate which Julian had assigned to him afore. This armie standing only vpon bodies and numbers, was lame in all other proportions & prouisions: for they had neither resort of money, assistance of artilleries, nor any strength of munitions, & except their horses and armour, they wanted all furnitures accustomed to follow armies: only they bare estimation more by their vertue then through anie other abilitie or means to sustaine the war. They departed to go to the state of Vrbino the same day that the citie of Verona was giuen vp to the Venetians: a matter which troubled not a litle the Pope after he had receiued aduertisement; for he considered the qualitie of the armie, which was to be feared, both for the hatred of the Capitaines, and vertue and reputation of the Spanish footmen; and he was not ignorant with what inclination the peoples of that Duchy fauoured Franciscomaria, hauing long liued vnder the easie gouernement of the house of Montefetro, the affection wherof they had transferred to him, as to one that had bene trained and nourished in that Duchie, & bred of a sister of the Duke Guido: besides, it grieved him not a litle that he was to maintaine warre against an army, which hauing nothing to loose, could leaue no reward to his victorie, & marching only vpon desire of pray and pillage, drew with them a miserable expectation of profit, bringing nothing to the war, but what they hoped to get by the chance & fortune of the war: he doubted also, least the sweet desire of gaine (which for the most part carrieth mercenarie souldiers to the fight) would draw such others to ioyne to their factiō, as by the mean of the peace were vtterly excluded from action: but the matter that most troubled his mind, was a fearfull suspicion that the French king did communicate in this conspiracie: for, both he knew that the king was displeased with the warre made against Franciscomaria, and was no lesse touched in his conscience with the consideration of causes that he had giuen him to be ill contented of him: he knew also he had not obserued the confederation made after the conquest of Millan, at the time when Cesar descended into Lombardy: he considered that after he was returned to Rome, he sent him a Bull touching the collation of benefices in the realme of Fraunce and Millan, much different from the conuention made at Bologna, which for the shortnesse of the time was not then subsigned: this Bull the king would not accept, both for that it bare contradiction against the agreement, and also for the interest of his proper dignity: he remembered the secret negotiations entertained against him with other Princes, & with the Swissers: he was not ignorant that a litle before, pushed on by a desire directly to hinder the recouerie of Verona, he had suffered the regiments of Spanish footmen comming from Naples to the rescue of it, to passe in seuerall troupes through the dominions of the Church, excusing himselfe that he would not giue them occasion to passe in one ioynt strength, being in that case not able to stop them: lastly, he found in his conscience that he had not perfourmed his promises touching the donation of the tenths, but vnder conditions subtle and intangled, nor had obserued the rendering of the townes to the Duke of Ferrara, abusing the kings expectation, and his owne fidelitie. These were right iust causes to make him doubt of the kings will, wherof also his suspicions made him seeme to see certaine tokens, for that this conspiracie and leaue of men being bred in the partes of Verona, it could not be that Monsieur de Lawtrech could be without knowledge of it many dayes before, and seeing he was secret and silent in it, it was a manifest presumption of his priuie and consent. To this also was added a ielousie of Federike Bossolo, hauing till then followed the pay of the king, and it was doubtfull whether that was true that M. de Lawtrech alleaged for his excuse, that the time of his entertainment was finished. Moreover, the Pope stood doubtfull of the inclination of the Venetians, hauing an opinion that their Commissioners had made theselues parties to this vnion, for that the Senate stood verie much discontented with him, as well in regard of things past, as for ielousie of his present greatnesse, which was such, that being successor of so great a power & reputatiō of a Popedome, he disposed absolutely at his deuotion the whole estate of the Florentines. These considerations brought no small amaze to the Pope, to who also was no lesse reason of expectatiō or hope in the confidence or alliance with other Princes, for that. Besides that they were of new reconciled and confedered with the French king, not one of them held for acceptable his manner of proceeding with secret counsels and subtleties, wherein albeit he dissembled sometimes to incline on their side, yet what between the detections that burst out against him, and the slow execution of his intentions and promises, he gaue litle or no satisfaction to anie of them: yea disclosing oftentimes a manifest doubt against them all, he had dispatched a litle before to the king Catholike, Frier Nicholas an Almaine, and Secretarie to the Cardinall Medici, to draw him from the enteruiew and parley which was solicited with the French king, fearing a contract of greater alliance betweene them to his preiudice. Thus the Pope waned indifferently betweene doubt and dread, betweene feare and suspicion, expecting all things to happen to him which his timorous conscience did suggest or fashion, the same being a passion that oftentimes torments the minds of ill men, against whom Salomon pronounceth this vexation: That whatsoeuer their guiltie mindes do feare in ill, the same shall assuredly happen vnto them. Neuerthelesse amid these confusions and suspensions of mind, he and his Nephew Laurence ceased not to send bands of souldiers into Romagnia, such as for the most part were leauied of new, and the residue drawne out of the Squadrons of the Florentines pensioners: his reason was in sending out of this force, that ioynning with Ranse de Cere and Vitelli, who lay at Ranenna with the regiments of men at armes, they might giue impediment to the passage of the enemies: but this expedition was in vaine and the effect thereof, for that the armie of the enemy, hauing already passed the riuer of Paw at Ostia, and preuenting with their celeritie the preparations of their aduersaries, were by that time entred vpon the lands of the Duke of Ferrara, taking the way to Cento and Burio, and marching through the countrey of Bologna. In this journey they sacked Granarola, which is a borough vpon the territories of Faenza, & fro thence they drew neare to Faenza, to proue if they could conspire any mutation there, by the helpe of a yong Gentleman of the family of Manfroy, who was in that armie: but the inhabitants of Faenza disauowing all mutinies, the armie passed further, not trying to get any other of the townes of Romagnia, for that they were all strong in garrison, either of men at armes, or of footmen: & for the better surety of Rimini, Ranse and Vitelli were gone thither by sea. Laurence came to Cesena to assemble his companies there and at Rimini: but for that the enemies were already passed, he ceased not in the meane while to leaue souldiers in many places, whereof there flocked to him both more then he needed, and more then he required: for a regiment of two thousand five hundred Launceknights that were dismissed by Ad. de Lawtrech to returne into their houses, and likewise certaine Colonels of three thousand Guscons, were retained by John Poppy Secretary to Laurence: wherein he vsed his owne authority, being perswaded that that army of footmen wold follow Franciscmaria if they were not waged by others, or haply he beleued lightly that with these forces there might be opened an easie way to the victorie. In this action he employed also the authority of Monsieur Lawtrech (with whom he had remained manie moneths) to perswade the Captaines, whom with their seuerall bands and regiments he conuerted immediately towards Bologna: but his diligence brought forth an effect contrarie to his expectation and the merite of his trauell, since the Pope and Laurence were discontented with that manner of doing, suspecting the kings indignation, and yet they could not refuse them, for feare least they would ioine to the enemy, being marched so farre with minds and promises to be employed. In the meane while Franciscmaria aduanced more and more, accompanying his fortune with that diligence and celeritie, which leades men of action to the successe and felicity of the enterprises they follow: he was no sooner entred into the Duchy of Vrbino, then he was receiued in euerie place with great ioy and gladnesse: he found no souldiers in the townes, for that Laurence hauing no leasure to resurnish so many places, had onely care to defend the City of Vrbino, the sanctuarie and capitall place of that Duchie: and for that cause was sent thither by the counsell of Vitelli, a strength of two thousand footmen from Citta de Castello, and in place of Vitelli that refused to go to that seruice, that charge was committed to Iacques Rossetto of Citta de Castello, who notwithstanding he was aduised, by reason the people of Vrbino were holden suspected, to chase out of the towne all such bodies as were vnable to beare armes, yet he forbore to execute any such violence, thinking he should better assure himselfe by clemency then by cruelty. But Franciscmaria not conueruing his time to the seruice of any other place, drew directly to Vrbino, where albeit he could do litle at the first approach, yet at the second Iacques Rossetto agreed to deliuer the towne into his hands, his infidelity being greater then his feare, both for that there were no mutinies nor vprores amongst the people, and also he had no reason to be timorous of the forces of the enemies, hauing neither artilleries nor other prouisions seruing to the taking of towne. The soldiers according to the composition went out of the towne, their goods and liues saued, but the Bishop of Virelli remained prisoner, who had bene Regent of that estate for the new Duke, and vnder whose gouernment it seemed that nothing had happily succeeded. All the other towne and places of the Duchie followed the example of Vrbino, except S. Leon, which for the qualitie of his situation, and propertie of the munitions that were there, was easie to be defended, yea with a verie smal garrison: the citie of Agobbio that in the beginning was declared for Franciscomaria, and eftsoones returned to the obedience of Laurence, did now as the rest did, being caried not by respect to faith and alleageance, but by the euent and obseruation of things: onely Pefera, Simigalo, Gradaro and Mondano, towne separate from the Duchie, remained in the iurisdiction and deuotion of Laurence. Franciscomaria hauing thus recouered Vrbino, entred into deuise to make him selfe Lord of some place vpon the sea shoare: and making shewes as though he would go to Pefera, whither were gone already manie bands of souldiers, and to Simigalo, he dissembled his intention and drew towards Fano, a citie which in all times had caried more facility to be taken, and whereof the aduersarie doubted least, for that it had bene neuer as yet subiected to his iurisdiction: Ranfe de Cere that lay at Pefera, either doubting of the daunger, which in reason of warre he foresaw, or seeing into his intention, which he could not hide, dispatched thither Troylo Sauallo with an hundred men at armes, & fixe hundred footmen: neuerthelesse the enemy made his approches with fiue peeces of artillerie not great, which they had found in Vrbino, and hauing also want of powder, they could not make so great execution as they would, only they brought downe to the earth twentie fadomes of wall, which notwithstanding was not done without great difficulty, yet they followed it with an assault, at which they lost more then an hundred and fiftie men: but neither being amazed with that slaughter (for their mindes were resolute) nor standing to expect and temporize (though they were weake in munitions) they recontinued the charge the day following, when with their valour they so farre vanquished the perill, that they made the breach almost abandoned, yea they had no doubt, entred the wall, had it not bene for Fabian de Gallefo Lieutenant to Troylo, who being left vpon the wall with a verie small companie of men of warre, made a wonderfull defence, and sustained the charge. The day after they were prepared to giue the third assault, but vnderstanding by espial that a strength of fiue hundred men sent from Pefera, were entred by night by sea, they leauied the siege, and retired to the borough and Castle of the mount Baroco, which standing vpon a high hill, beareth a verie strong situation, his descending being easie towards Fossambrun, and most hard and sharpe towards Pefera: they remained in that place, where hauing no further conuenient occasion, they garded the Duchie of Vrbino, which lay vpon their backs. On the other side, those regiments of Launceknights and Gascons that were come to Rimini to Laurence de Medicis, prepared them to march, together with many bands of Italian footmen, and another regiment of fiftene hundred Launceknights, of those that had bene at the seruice of Verana: with which strength ioyned to the horsmen of the Popedome and Florence, Laurence marched with his men at armes to Pefera: and being wholly gouerned by the counsell of his Captaines, for the small experience he had to manage an enterprise, he sent his footmen to encampe vpon the mountaines opposite to the enemies. The citie of Pefera standeth at the entrie of a litle valley which comes from Vrbino, out of which issueth a riuier which the inhabitants call Porta, for that by the oportunitie of his deepnesse the vessels are brought vp euen to that place: this riuier runnes neare to the Citie on that side which is towards Rimini: the Castle hath his standing towards the sea, and betweene the riuier and the Citie be many storehouses, which Ranfe caused to be reuerfed for the surety of the towne: a great part of the Citie is enuironed with mountaines on all parts, which stretch not out so farre as the sea, but betweene them and the sea remaineth a certaine peece of the plaine containing two miles in largenesse on that side towards Fano, and vpon the banke rise two hilles the one right ouer against the other, that towards the sea is called Candelaro, and Nugalaro that which hath his prospect towards Vrbino: and in the top of euerie of them is a borough and a Castle bearing the same name. The Italian footmen were lodged at the Castle of Candelaro, and to the Launceknights and Gascons was appointed Nugalaro, which lay nearest to the enemy: which disposing of the army in this sort, was not of intencio to fight with the, otherwise than then by light skirmishes to cut them off from ouerrunning the countrey, or to amuse them for resolving to any enterprife: for the Popes counsell was not to hazard the battell with the enemies, velle he there were almost an assured hope of the victory, for that he saw what perill it was to fight against resolute men, who by how much greater was the inequality of the reward of the victory, by so much lesse would they feare the hazard of their liues: and the battell swaying on their side, he saw the estate of the Church & the Florentins would be abandoned into manifest danger. That it were far more assured to temporise, specially the apparance being great, that for want of mony & victuals, the enemy would draw to some disorder; the pouerty & sterility of the countrey cōpelling the thereunto: That his army with respite wold become better & better, as well through experience which much helpeth to the perfection of soldiers, as also that from moneth to moneth it was refurnished with braue & resolute bodies: Lastly he had expectatiō that his affaires would daily take better course, since that frō the beginning of this str & actiō, he had vehemently solicited the succors of al Princes, both cōplayning to their Embassadors that lay at Rome, & by special messengers & letters imploring the Princes themselues: wherein he wrought not with all in one maner, for, signifying to Cesar & the king of Spaine, that the conspiracy of Franciscomarina & the Spanish footmen, was contriued in the campe of the French king, & with the priuity of his Lieutenant: he objected so far in those particular clauses of his letters, that it might be easily comprehended how far he suspected the king in the action: and to the French king, himselfe he alleaged only a ielousie of Monsieur de Lawtrech, and forbare to execute his complaints any further. The matter was diuersly taken by those Princes, for to Cesar and his nephew it was no small gladnesse to heare that the Pope interpreted that iniuriē to the French king: besides, the auncient hatred of Cesar ioyned to his naturall inconstancy, had made him already estranged from the French king, and newly become confederate with the king of England: He also had communed with his nephew neare Anwerpe, & dissuaded him from hauing conference with the French king, which accordingly was at last accomplished by the consent of both the one and the other king: and in the king Catholike the confederation that he had with him, did not suffice to deface his emulation, ielousie, and suspition: so that they made a ready offer to the Pope to ayde him, giuing present commandement to all their subiects to depart from the war that was made against the Pope. The king Catholike sent the Count Potensō to the Realme of Naples, to the end that vpon the view and muster of his men at armes, he should leade to his succours foure hundred launces: and for a more full testimony of his will, he deposed Franciscomarina as disobedient, from the Duchy of Sorra, an estate lying vpon the confines of Terra Lanoro, and had bene purchased by his father: but for other respects, were agreable to the perplexities of the Pope to the French king, as a Prince that had a mind estranged from him: & therefore following his example from the beginning, he determined to entertaine him with vaine hopes, & answering that his discontentments brought no litle griefe to him, he promised so to worke, that Monsieur de Lawtrech should minister to his affaires: and yet he forbare not to say, that the Pope himselfe had bene the causer of his proper afflictions, for that the Spaniards would neuer haue taken that boldnesse, if their numbers had not bene increased by such as vnder his licence were passed from Naples to Verona. This was the kings intention at the beginning: but considering afterwards that the Pope being left abandoned of him & of his succours, would run with a ready will into the amities of the king Catholike, he determined to ayde and fauour him, & according to the estate of the time, to draw some fruit of his necessity. In so much as the Pope sending estoones to demaund succours of him, he tooke order to refurnish him from Millan with three hundred launces requiring withall to haue a new league to passe betweene them, since that that was contracted afore at Bologna, was of no more consideration, hauing suffered many violations by the Pope in sundrie manners: he added many complaints to the offers which he made him: sometimes he sayd he suffered wrong in matters wherein the Pope charged him to other Princes: and sometimes he held himselfe iniured; for that he had excommunicated George Sopressan soliciting for him with the Swissers; an actiō wherein the despite of his iniury was so much the greater, by how much in the doing of it he expressed a desire to gratify the Cardinal of Sion. Moreouer the Lady Regent mother to the king, & of no final authority with him, reprehended without respect, the impiety of the Pope, for that not satisfied to haue chased a Prince out of his proper estates and dominions, he had also subiected him to the censures of the Church, and with a mind full of inhumanity, had denied to the old Duchesse, the property of her dowrie due vpon those patrimonies, and also had withdrawne from the young Duchesse his wife, all sorts of reliefe and meanes to preserve and nourish her: these words finding passage euen to the eares and hearing of the Pope, brought matter to redouble the suspition. Neuertheless the Pope, who in those difficulties desired the kings succors, not so much for the effect and meaning, as for the name and reputation of them, being not able to dissemble his suspition, made stay for many dayes of the three hundred lances that went from Millan vpon the territories of Modena and Bologna: and afterwards Lawrence bestowed them within Rimini, as hauing lesse meane to annoy him by lying there, for that that city bare a farre distance from the enemies. The Pope could not be drawne from his ieaiousies and suspitions, notwithstanding at the same time was let downe in Rome, a conclusion of confederation betweene him and the French king: and albeit before it was ratified, the king obiected many new difficulties for the which the matter remained many daies in suspence, yet at last the Pope yeelding to many things, the king past the ratification. By the articles of ratification, the Pope and the king were reciprocally bound to the defence of their estates with an equall proportion of men and souldiers; and a charge of twelue thousand ducats for every moneth: The same bond was betweene the French king and the Florentines, with whom was conioyned the authority of Lawrence de Medicis, and in that article was comprehended the Duchie of Vrbino, but with a lesser number of men, and pay of fixe thousand ducats monthly: The king was bound to ayde the Pope when soeuer he had any action vpon the subjects and vassals of the Church: The Pope confirmed to the king the nomination of the benefices, and the tenth, according to his promises made at Bologna, vnder this condition, that the monies should be put into the hands of a third man to be employed against the Turkes. This was the colour of granting the tenth, but there was secretly hope giuen to the king, that after the collection of the whole quantity, the condition should be changed by another writ, and his maiesty to haue liberty to conuert them to what vse he would. The Pope passed a seuerall promise to the king vnder his signature, neuer to demand of him any ayde or succours against the Duke of Ferrara, and consented withall, that the king might take him into his protection. There was long dispute vpon the rendring of Reggia, Modena, and Rubiero, which albeit the king demanded with no small instance, according to the Popes promises at Bologna, and the Pope altogether not refused it, yet he reserued the restitution till an other time, alleaging that it would be an action far vnworthy of him, and almost a confession of his extreame necessity and compulsion, to redeliuer them at a time when he stood oppressed with the warre. The king stood still vpon it to haue them rendered presently, insomuch that the Pope making manifest shewes that he would vtterly estrange himselfe from the king if he sought to constrain him any further, the king hauing for declared enemies the English, and no lesse suspition of Cesar, the Spaniards and the Swissers, accepted the Popes promise vnder his hand, that within seuen moneths next following, he would put into the hands of the Duke of Ferrara, Modena, Reggia, and Rubiero. The Pope had this intention, that if the dangers wherein he was, ceased afore, he would make no more accompt of his act vnder his signature then of his promise simply made at Bologna. And touching the king, since he could winne no further of him without the hazard of his extreame indignation, held himselfe contented, esteeming it somewhat sufficient, that he had appearing in writing the assurance and testimony of his word and faith.

During the discourse and action of these matters, Lawrence had much increased his army, both by many regiments of Italians leauied of new, and also by a thousand footemen Spanish and a thousand Launceknights waged by the Pope at Rome: with which strength ioyned to the opportunity and ripenesse of the time, he saw he stood in good estate to assay to deliuer himselfe of such a warre, wherein his onely hope was by the strength and situation of the place where the enemies lay, to compell them to dis campe for want of victuals: for which cause was dispatched Camilla Vrsin with seuen hundred light horsemen, to ouerrun all that countrey which is called the Vicarage, from whence came the greatest traffike of their victuals. At this time was sent to Pesera from the campe of the enemy, a Trumpet who required of Lawrence safe conduct for Captaine Suero a Spaniard appointed by Franciscomaria to come to him: his demand was easily accepted by Lawrence, for that he thought it had bene a Captaine with whom he had entertained very secret intelligence: but there came to him another Captaine of the same name, and with him one Oracio de Ferina Secretary to Franciscomaria, who after they were brought into publike audience, declared

(according to the instructions of Franciscomaria) that since the quarrels that were between them might be decided by singular combat of their own persons, or with a determinate number of men indifferently agreed vpon by them both, it were better to chuse the one of those two meanes, then to perseuer in that course whereby might be brought to destruction so many numbers of people on both sides, no lesse contrary to all piety, then euen to the preiudice of whosoever should carie the victory. In which good respects, Franciscomaria offered him to make election of whether of these two wayes he would: and after he had deliuered this message by mouth, he would haue read a writing that he had in his hand, sauing that he was forbidden. Lawrence answered by the counsell of his Captaines, that he willingly accepted this offer, so farre forth as Franciscomaria would first leaue those peeces which he occupied by force. After which answer (by the incensing of Ranse de Cere) he caused them both to be apprehended prisoners, Ranse maintaining that they had deserved punishment for performing an action too insolent. But the other Captaines shewing him how far he transgressed the law of armes and the reputation of his faith and word, he let go Suaro, and retained only Oratio, excusing, with false colours, the infamy of his faith breaking, as though it had bene necessary in the safe conduct to haue expressed specially Oratio; who, for his birth and countrey, was a subiect of the Church, and for his place, a secretary to the enemy: but his restraint was chiefly to draw from him the secrets of Franciscomaria, but specially by whose counsell and authority he had begun the warre. Whereupon being examined with torments, it was published that in his confession was matter to augment the suspition conceiued against the French king. To the desire of Lawrence, to cut off from the Spaniards the traffike of victuals out of the countrey of the Vicarage, was neede to be applied greater forces, both for that by the incursions of his light horsemen, was done no matter of importance, and withall, his army was in that estate of strength & furniture, that he might boldly make head against the enemies: for, beside a thousand men at armes and a thousand light horsemen, he had leuiued fifteen thousand footmen of diuerse nations, amongst whom was a regiment of two thousand Spaniards mustered at Rome: an army of footemen of speciall choyce and sort, and of great exercise and training in armes, for that the warre being in no other place in Italy, the Captaines had good meane to exchange for better, all such bands of Italian footemen as were leuiued in haste: and so compounded their whole army vpon the glory and flower of the souldiers of all Italy. He determined at last to go incampe at Sorbolongo, a borough in the countrey of Fano, five miles from Fossambrono, from whence it was easie to him to restraîne from the enemy all reliefe comming out of the Vicarage. The City of Fossambrono stands vpon the riuer of Meitro, which is a riuer of name, by reason of a victory which the Romains had against Asdruball of Carthage, and running thither by a channell restrained betwene the mountaines, it passeth Fossambrono, and beginnes to run thorough a little vally more large, which makes it selfe so much the larger by how much it approacheth the sea that is fifteen miles beyond Fossambrono, and there it falleth into Meitro neare to Fano, but on that side towards Sinigalo. On the right hand following the course of the riuer, is the countrey which they call the Vicarage, full of fertill hils and boroughes, and lieth stretched out in great length towards the sea: and on the left hand of the riuer are also hils, but passing further, there are found mountaines very high and sharpe, the plaine or vally whereof extending towards Fano, containeth more then three miles in largenesse. At such times Lawrence determined to incampe at Sorbolongo, fearing least his enemies, knowing of his remouing, would preuent him: he sent on the morow afore day Iohn de Medicis, Iohn Baptista Stabbio, and Brunault de Furl, with foure hundred horsemen, to surprise Sorbolongo, and gaue order to the footemen that were at Candelaro and Nugularo, to crosse the mountaines and draw towards Meitro, to ioyne with the others: himselfe with the residue of the army, leauing for the gard of Pesera, Guido Rangon, with an hundred and fifty men at armes, tooke his way at Sunne rising, from Pesera towards Fano along the sea shoare, and afterwards turning towards Fossambrono where the vally beginneth, he arriued about noone at a place called our Ladies mill built vpon the riuer. All the horsemen and the regiments of Italian footemen, passed the riuer by foord, but the bands of Gasccons and Launceknights, were so long in passing the bridge prepared to that ende; that the army was not able that day to fetch Sorbolongo according to the direction: and therefore they thought it conuenient to incampe at Saint Georges, Orciano, and Mondano boroughes bearing distance one from another halfe a mile. The direction that was layd out for the light horse, men, succeeded not with much better fortune: for, as they marched, Iohn de Medicis (in whom in this first triall of seruice, appeared those signes of valour that appertained to one of his discending) seeming by error to take the longer way, left the residue that contemned his counsell, and entered within Sorbolongo long time before night: & the other two Captaines, after they had fetched a long compasse, returned at last to the army, being abused (as they said) by their guide: neither could Iohn de Medicis (who had with him only his regiment) abide that night within Sorbolongo, for that the same morning Franciscumaria had with great celerity taken the field with all his army, doubting belike of the discamping of his enemies, and no lesse imagining which way they would draw: he found no impediment to passe the river, but vsing the fauor of a stone bridge at Fossombrono, he won Sorbolongo afore night, and bringing with him matter of feare and astonishment to Iohn, being then of sufficient ability to resist him, he compelled Iohn to retire towards Orciano, whither he was followed in chafe by the horsemen of the enemy, who made pray of many of his people, & caried them backe in the state & fortune of prisoners. At Orciano he went to find Lawrence in his lodging, to whom he complained with a mind much discontented, that either the negligence, or the cowardise of Brunauli & Iohn Baptista Stabbia, standing then in his presence, had that day taken out of his hand, the victory of the warre: he esteemed the iniury so much the greater, by how much the vertue & celerity of his owne people were lesse forward to aduance his glory, then fortune her selfe, who for the most part vseth to hold backe the merit of mens valor in such actions. But albeit this was the first, yet it was not the only occasion of good lucke that the army of Lawrence did lose, seeing afterwards he did not only omit the honor of enterprises of great importance, but also he was folowed continually with far more dangerous disorders, his ill fortune being alwayes accompanied with ill counsels. The boroughs of Orciano & Sorbolongo haue their situation in a place eminent & high, & are distant one from the other, somewhat more the two miles: the mid way betwene them is full of litle mountaines & hils, & hath a borough in it called Barry, wherein were incamped part of the bands of Franciscumaria, & for that neighbourhood & nearnesse of the armies, al the day folowing was spent in skirmishing. Amongst the Captaines of Lawrence army, the counsels and opinions were diuerse: for some, and chiefly they who bare least swaigh in the resolution of things, perswaded to giue a charge on the enemies, thinking perhaps, by aduancing vainely valiant counsels, they should get the name of valiant men, not weighing in their glorious moodes, how farre the daunger exceeded the attempt. But this counsell was impugned by Ranfe and Vitelli, vpon whose aduises Lawrence with great confidence, founded all his directions, for, sayd they, the enemies being lodged in a place of strength and aduantage, and hauing on their backe the fauour of the borough, there was no possibility to execute that enterprise, but by a way troublesome and too full of annoyance: yea they thought it not good that the army should continue in those places, being a matter no lesse vnprofitable, then hindring the purpose for the which they were remoued from Pesera, for that Sorbolongo being at the deuotion of Franciscumaria, it would be hard to restrain the resort of victuals from the countrey of the Vicarage. The reasons made reiect all other counsels, obtayning what by the authoritie of the same, and by the necessitie of things, that the army should returne: and to the end their retiring should not seeme a manifest flying, their direction was, that the army should not only returne to their first lodging place, but also to go seafe vpon Monte Baroccio and other places left abandoned by the enemies, from whence they might draw towards Vrbino. With this resolution the army departed the morning folowing at the appearing of the day: but the manner of their going away held more of a flying then of a retraite, which growing to an opinion throughout the camp, it hapned that Franciscumaria was aduertised by two men at armes, that the enemies were filled full of feare, and were broken vp almost in disorder and flying: in so much as seeming to be almost possessed of the certaine victory, he aduanced his army, and marched with great speede, by the way that leades athwart the mountaines: he hoped to encounter them at their discending into the playne, beleeuing that they would take the way that was most short and passible, which if they had taken, neither the one nor the other army could haue audyed the battell. But as oftentimes in warres, effects and euents of greatest consequence are both hindred and changed by light causes and accidents: so fortune would, that by the occasion of a Cannon left behind the day before, for that one of his mounting wheeles was broken, the armie of Lawrence went to repasse the riuer of Neruo at our Ladies mill, which is foure miles miles lower then the place whereunto his short and easie way would haue brought him. All the horsemen and footmen of Lawrence army passed ouer at the foord, and as both for their numbers and other impediments they made a long passage, so as soone as they were ouer, they cast themselves with great celeritie into order, keeping along the plaine that draweth towards Fossambro. The armie of footmen being passed, and the men at armes and light horsemen marching in the later ward of the campe being vpon their passing, the light horsemen of the enemies, both many in number, and of the most resolute, began to skirmish with them; in which encounter was taken prisoner Constantin the son of Iohn Paul Bailou, whom we might as well call his nephew as his sonne, since he begat him of one of his owne sisters: not many dayes before the same Iohn Paul was come to the armie, and led the vanguard, but by the ill chaunce of his sonne, struing to do his best to recouer him, he stayd so long deuising, that from the auantgard he became in the areareward, and Lawrence that led the battell stepped into the foreward, as also Troilus Sauello that gouerned the arearegard was set to guide the battell, for that Ranse and Vitelli marched before with the footmen. But Franciscomaria and his Captaines, discerning well that the enemies, by the same measure and numbers wherewith they passed the riuer, turned towards Fossambro; saw that they remoued not like men that fled, but with intention to surprise Montebaroccio: for which consideration, they forgate their former furie and disposition to fight, which haply was grounded vpon an imagined feare of the enemies, and leauing abandoned their baggage, they ran in great hast, and with no lesse disorder, yea casting their ensignes wrapped vpon their shoulders, to get a very strong passage of the riuer called the passage of Tauernelle. At this passage it seemed that nature had made a confused trench full of cliffs which runneth all along through a plaine place euen vntill the mountaine, which gaue no libertie of passage, but by one way which was made for ease and sufferance. To this passage if their bands had come, who turned from that side alwayes as they passed ouer, the Spaniards had bene reduced into manifest daunger. And albeit Lawrence and his Captaines were aduertised of this by Lodowike the sonne of Oluer de Fermo, who the same day was come to the army with a thousand footmen, together with a Spanish Sergeant that could well discover the country. yet their espiall was of litle profite, fortune and destinie being stronger then counsell: for notwithstanding in the regiments of Launceknights and Gascons was expressed a wonderfull readinesse and disposition to fight; and the same desired with an vniuersall cry throughout the whole campe, and withall, the will of Lawrence being fully concurrant; yet that resolute deuotion of the campe was not executed by the aduise of Ranse de Cere and Vitelli, who counselled him not to go meete his enemies, but to draw his armie to a litle hill fast by, from whence in great safetie he might do many grieuances to his enemies with his light horsemen, if they attempted to passe the riuer: and so leauing that place of strength, Ranse turned towards the mountaine, which as soone as the Spaniards had brought to their deuotion, they began to salute with the bullet those bands of Launceknights that lay nearest them, and signified with cryings and other tokens full of reioycing, how out of a daunger manifest and desperate, their valout had made them a way into absolute safetie. Thus either by indiscretion or by cowardise (if we may not allow destinie to partake in it) did Lawrence loose that day (in the iudgement of all men) the occasion of the victorie. The difference of counsels amongst his Captaines were very preiudiciall to the glory and succeffe of this expedition, for they stood there to consult and debate, where the occasion called them on to execute the thing which their fortune had offered them, and then were they least settled in resolution, when they saw most necessitie of action. That night the armie was lodged in a borough neare that place called Saltaro: but such was the diligence of Franciscomaria, that marching with his campe till well of the night, he gate Montebaroccio; preuenting a regiment of two thousand footmen which Lawrence sent thither to surprise it. The day after he went and incamped aboute Saltaro towards the mountaine, taking a place for the bestowing of his armie, that had his prospect vpon Montebaroccio, but standing somewhat lower and had his situation vpon the sea shore. These were the places wherein the two armies incamped, bearing no more distance then a myle one from another, onely there fell to Lawrence greater discommodities by the often want of victuals, for that the traffike lying by sea from Peferato to Fano, they were driuen vpon the alteration of the winds, to vse the seruice of cariages ouer land, to the which the light horsemen of Franciscomaria gaue no small impediments by their continual roades and incurfions ouer the whole countrey, hauing espiall by the payfants of euery litle mouing of the enemies. About this time Franciscumaria sent a trumpet to communicate with the Gascons certaine packets of letters found amongst the writings of the Secretaries of Lawrence, and taken from him with other of his trash by the horsemen of the enemy, the same day that he departed from the borough of Salaro. By these letters was discerned, that the Pope being wearie of the great payes of the Gascons, and yet stood to make immoderate augmentation of them euery moneth, wished that trauell might be made to induce them to returne into Fraunce. By which occasion there had bene great perill of a tumult the selfe same day, if Carbone their Captaine and Lawrence de Medicis had not by good perswasions reclaimed them, making them beleue that the exhibition of those letters, was but a suborned and fallible stratageme of the enemy. Neuerthelesse, what by the suspicion of that danger, the necessitie of victuals, & the difficulties of the place, bearing more manifest signes to loose, then any hope at all to winne, they determined to breake vp from thence, and to enter into the countrey of the Vicarage on that side that is nearest the sea, and so to march on, till they approached Fossambrono. And albeit it was not without shame to retire so often from the enemies, yet the resolution to depart was allowed through the whole campe, but not without the infamie of Ranse and Vitelli, against whom exclaimed all the regiments of souldiers, charging him, that if in the beginning they had put execution to that deuise, they had brought vpon the enemies no small wants & difficulties of victuals. Lawrence himselfe reprehended them no lesse then the others, who accompanying his complaints with reprochfull suspitions, imposed vpon them, that either to make the warre long for their particular profite, or to hinder his reputation and glory by armes, fearing haply to their persons the like effectes by his greatnesse, which the estate and ambition of Valentino had wrought against their houses, they had brought so many difficulties and so many daungers vpon an armie so mightie and appointed, and so farre about the enemies, in force, in fortune, and in discipline. But the armie marched and incamped before S. Constance, a borough appertaining to the countrey of the Vicarage, the wals whereof they began with no lesse speede then violence to batter and execute with their artilleries. And albeit the inhabitants sued for parley, and offered to submit and render it, yet knowing the facilitie to force it, there was giuen to the Gascons onely a full libertie to assault it, retiring from the wals all the other sortes of souldiers: such was the desire to reappease the angry minds of the Gascons by the spoyle & sacke of that place, whereof the whole profite and riches was transferred to them. From thence the campe marched two myles further, and went the same day to Mandolfe the best and strongest borough of all the Vicarage, and hauing his situation vpon a hill, and in a high place thereof, is also inuironed with wals and trenches conuenient, to the which the situation of the place serueth as a rampier, hauing withall two hundred souldiers in garrison. That night they planted the artilleries on that side towards the South, but either by negligence or by indiscretion of Ranse de Cere, to whom was appointed the managing of that charge, they were planted in a place discouered and not defended by rampiers: by which fault, before the sunne had disperfed his brightnesse one houre vpon the earth, there were slaine by the artilleries from within, eight Cannoniers with many pyoners, and Antho. Santcroffe the Captaine of their artillerie wounded: by reason of which accident, Lawrence rising into some perturbation of minde, went in person to cause the artilleries to be rampiered and defended, notwithstanding all his Captaines aduised him to forbear in his owne person the execution of a danger which he might well recómend to the charge of another. After he had set in hand that labour & well refurnished the worke with all things necessary, about the middle of the day, he retired behind the place to repose himselfe vnder the shade of certaine trees, thinking the height of the hill to be a sufficiēt couer to him against all dangers. But as he labored in climbing, & the height of the hill diminishing by his labour, he discouered a sidelong, the rocke situate on that side towards the West, which he had no sooner disclosed, then he had in his eye (such is the swiftnesse of destinie) a fire giuen to a harquebuzer layd with full leauell against him: and as he threw himselfe flat on his face to deceiue the blow, the swiftnesse of the bullet was farre greater then his speede in falling, in so much as before he could fall to the earth, the bullet that otherwise had runne through his body, tooke the top of his head, and raising vpon the bone, passed along the braine-pan towards the necke. This wounding of the Generall brought no small griefe to the Captaines and vniuersall multitude of the armie, in whom was kindled a greater desire of reuenge, by how much lesse worthy were the people by whom they had receiued the despite, and that euen in the person of the greatest amongst them. And therefore redoubling their resoresolution by the remembrance of the iniurie, and finding that notwithstanding the battering they had made of the wall, the earth was yet too high behind; they began to cast a mine, where-with entering vnder a towre that leaned to the wall which they had battred, they put fire to it the first day. The powder and other matter vsed in the mine being embrased of the fire, threw out such a violence and strength, that it brought the tower downe to the earth, together with a quarter of the wall ioyning to it: which furious execution of the fire, was followed of the campe with a assault, but with litle order, and (as it were) at aduenture, the same yeelding no other fruit then such as is wont to grow vpon enterprises ill disposed and directed. Neuertheless (fortune in some actions doth more then either power or pollicie) the night drawing on, the souldiers that had no expectation of succours, for that Franciscumaria had not stirred from Montebaroccio, either not to loose the aduantage of the situation of the place, or for other occasion, yeelded vp the place vnder condition of goods and life saued, leauing in vile maner the people of the towne as a wretched pray to the enemies. But by reason of the hurt of Lawrence, which brought his life in daunger, the Pope sent as Legate to the armie, the Cardinall S. Maria in Portico, who, ill fortune being already ioyned to ill gouernement, began with very ill signes, to exercise his Legation: for, the day after he came to the armie, there hapned a quarrell by chance betweene an Italian and a Launce knight, when such as were nearest running to the fray, & euery one calling vpon the name of his nation, the tumult so increased through the whole campe, that expecting neither any informatiō of the cause, nor seeking the due redresse & remedie of the same, all the bands of footemen ranne in great mutinie to the lodgings of their fellowes and companions, to arme themselves: the violence of their disorder caried them so farre, that whosoever they encountred in the way of another language or nation, payed with their liues the price of their furie. And as such generall calamities draw with them many diuersities of disorders, so in this vniuersall confusion, whilst the bandes of Italian footemen were gone in good order towards the place where the tumult began, their lodgings and houses were sacked by the Gascons: no nation, no regiment, no companie was free from this outrage, and in whom was greatest care to cure the euill, in him was most possibilitie of perill and daunger: the innocent found least safetie in abtaining most from violence: there was no dispensation of harmes where was no respect to person, and lesse expectation of safetie where the sword bare most sway, and that guided by hatreds ferie and bloody. The principall Captaines after they had bin in counsell to remedie the disorder, ranne to the fray, to see if by their presenche they might do the thing which they were not able to do by counsell: but finding the danger of the tumult to be greater then their authoritie, euery one cast from him the thoughts and care of the common businesse, and began to looke to their particular safetie: they ranne to their lodgings and houses, and putting in order their men at armes, they retired for their safetie a myle from the campe, drawing with them their particular companies to defend them from the furie of the popular souldiers: onely the Legate Bibieno, vsing the constancie and readinesse that appertained to his office and honour, would neuer abandon the common cause, but putting himself oftentimes with the danger of his life, amid the prease of their bloody swords and weapons, he did so much with the diligence and labour of other Captaines of the footebands, that the tumult was at last reappeased, during the furie whereof were slaine in many parts of the campe, more then an hundred Launce knights, xx. Italians, & some Spaniards. This accident was the cause that they determined for the present to enter into no enterprise, but for a time to keepe the armie separate: for it was feared, that if the armie should keepe together, the souldiers not yet reconciled for the harmes receiued, would recontinue the mutinie for euery light occasion, knowing that by so much greater is the despite of an iniury, & the desire of reuenge more violent, by how much are remaining in presente and memorie the first authors and doers. Therefore the companies of men at armes of the Church, and of the Florentins were bestowed in the Citie of Pesera, together with the regiments of Italian footemen: for, touching the French Launces, they had not stirred from Rimini, by reason the difficulties that were betweene the Pope and their King were not yet resolved. The footebands of the Gascons were incamped vpon the plaine within halfe a myle of that Citie, and the other companies of footemen were dispersed vpon the mount Imperialo about Pesera & on that side towards Rimini: and such was the feuerall distribution of them, that Spaniards were placed vpon the top of the mountaine, the Launce knights somewhat lower according to the descending of the mountaine, & the Corfikans at the foote of the hill: vpon this mountaine called Imperiallo standeth a pallace, which the auncestours of the familie of Malatesta had builded. They continu'd in this order three and twentie dayes, executing no other thing in that respite and intermission of time, then certaine skirmishes of the light horsenien: for, Franciscomaria stirred not, what with desire to hold that he had gotten, and that he saw no hope to breake so great an army in the plaine field, or to take any place so neare the enemies. Neuerthelesse at last which was the foure and twentieth day, departing by night frō Montebarroccio, he came by the peepe of the morning to the top of the mountaine, where the Spaniards lay incamped, with whom either generally or seuerally it was beleueed he had some secret intelligence, according to the relation and testimony of the successe that followed: for, as soone as he was come thither, his Spaniards began to cry vpon the others of their nation, that if they would make care of their owne safetie, they should follow them; a voyce which most part of them did accept, euery one putting vpon his head a bough of greene leaues, according to the example of the others: onely their Captaines retired to Pesera, and drew with them about eight hundred footemen. When the Spaniards were thus ioyned into one strength, they went all together to the tents of the Launceknights, who kept no great gard on that side for the suretie of the neighbourhood of the Spaniards, and taking the aduantage of their securitie, they fell to execution and slaughter, in which medley they killed & hurt more then sixe hundred of them, the residue fled to the campe of Corsikaies, and with them retired in one strength, towards Pesera. The Gascons might well discerne the bickering, and putting themselues in order, they kept their ground not once mouing from the place where they stood. Franciscomaria, after this slaughter of the Launceknights, and the most part of the Spanish footebands allured to his side, went to incampe betweene Urbino and Pesera, not without great hope to haue to come ioyne with him those Gascons & Launceknights, who, leauied at that time in the campe of Monsieur de Lawtrech, had alwayes marched together, and were for the most part lodged together, and neuer did any action separate or apart. There was amongst the Gascons a Captaine called Ambro, who bare enuie to the vertue and glorie of Captaine Carbano. This Ambro was young & well disposed, of noble place and discending, kinsman to Monsieur de Lawtrech, and with the souldiers bare a greater credite and authoritie then did Carbano: he had secretly practised many dayes to passe with his regiment of footemen to the part of Franciscomaria, wherein he tooke this occasion, that not satisfied with the immoderate augmentation of their payes, they redemaunded insolently greater conditions: which when they were denied by the Popes ministers, there interposed betweene them Carbano & their Captaines of the French horsenien, who for the same cause were come from Rimini to Pesera, to reduce them to accord: but fīue or sixe dayes after the discomfiture of the Spaniards and Germanes in the Imperiall hill, Franciscomaria, with his whole armie disclosed himselfe neare vnto them: of whom one part together with Ambro being fallen into array of battell with sixe peeces of ordinaunce called Sagors, the Germanes followed and ioyned themselues also vnto him: Carbano in vaine endeouoring to stay them with prayers and most vehement perswasions: with Carbano abode seuen Captaines with 1300. footemen, all the rest together with the Germanes forsooke him. And as in warlike matters alwayes one mischiefe breeds another: so the Italian footemen, perceiving what neede there was of them the next morning stirred vp a tumult. And to reapease it, when neither greater shamefastnesse nor lesser greedinesse was in the Captaines then in the souldiers, it was necessary in their payes to promise them more immoderate conditions. And truly it was a matter to be maruelled at, that in the armie of Franciscomaria, in the which no pay was distributed to the souldiers, was so great agreement, discipline, and concord, which no doubt proceeded not (as is sayd of the Carthaginian Hanniball to his high commendation) so much of the vertue or authoritie of the Gouvernour, as of the exceeding affection and constancie of the souldiers. But of the contrary, in the armie of the Church, where in times due were not wanting excessive payes, was seene an vniuersall confusion, disorder, and desire of the souldiers to passe to the enemies campe. The same prouing that oftentimes, concord and discipline in armies are not so easily conserued by money as by other causes. The Legate and others who were present at the Councell being made astonished with so many accidents, after they had long time debated by what meanes & remedies they might relieue the afflicted estate of things: neither were they more discrete or abundant in counsels, to foresee that those disorders fell not, then apt to apply due remedies to the mischiefs hapned. And therefore being moued also with their owne couetous desires desires and interest particular, they concluded to perswade the Pope to restore Bologna to the Bentiuolians before they being imboldened by the late declination of things, or pushed on by the incitation of others, they should make some commotion; a matter which how vnable they were to resist, was well expressed in the difficulties they had to sustaine the warres in one onely place: and therefore to giue the greater authority to this counsell; and for the more iustification of all parties in all euents, they sent the same to the Pope by Robert Buschet, a Gentleman of Modena set downe in writing, subscribed with the hands of all the Captaines, and of the Legate, and the Archbishop of Ursin, of whom the que was linked to the Bentiuolians in auncient amitie, the other ioyned to them in parentage: which aduise the Pope did not onely despise, but also complayned in most bitter tearmes, that his owne ministers, and such as had bene enriched by him with many benefites, with dayly expectation to receiue more, had set before him with so litle faith and loue, a counsell or election no lesse pernicious then the very euils which the enemies did: but chiefly he cried out against the Archbishop of Ursin, whom haply he iudged to be the chiefe author and inducer of the others to this counsell: vnder the occasion of which displeasure, it was beleued that he depriued him of the purple hat or Cardinals dignitie; which was promised in the beginning with an vniuersall consent to be transferred to him in the first promotion that hapned. But Franciscomaria seeing his strength so increased and his enemies forces abated, and making his aduantage also vpon the necessity, rayfed his thoughts to greater attempts: for both the footemen which came with him, had bene three whole moneths without pay, and he had no likelyhood of meane or ability to wage those that lately revolted to him: and also the Duchie being sore pilked and harried, and almost vtterly spoyled, the souldiers had not onely no meane of praie and bootie, but also with great difficultie could they find out sufficient victuals to sustaine them. But in choosing this new expedition, he was to follow other mens willes, so that for the better establisshing of his estate before he would attempt any other matter, he sought to assault afresh Fano or some other peece on the sea coast. Neuerthelesse by the inclination of the souldiers, greedie of pray and bootie, he determined to turne into Tuscane, where because the region was plentifull of all things, without suspect, and vnready for defence, he hoped to rayse some great spoyle. Furthermore he was caried with a hope to make some mutation in Perusia and Sienna, by the meane of Charles Baylion and Borgnese of Petrucchi, by which deuise his owne things had bene sufficiently augmented, together with the molestations and perils of the Pope and his nephew: therefore the next day, after he had assembled the Gascons, he remoued his campe towards Perusia: but when he was come to the playne of Agobina, he determined to make manifest his suspicion, yea rather the certaine apprehension which he had of the treason of the Colonell Maldonato and others ioyned with him in the same cause. The matter was bred and brought forth in this sort: When the army marched by Romagnia, Suares one of the Captaines of the Spaniards, vnder dissimulation of sicknesse dragged behind, and of purpose suffered himselfe to be taken of his enemies, and being in the state of a prisoner he was conueied to Cesena to Lawrence, to whom he declared in the name of Maldonato, and the two other Captaines of the Spaniards, that not for any other cause they were conioyned with Franciscomaria, then to haue occasion to do some notable seruice to the Pope and to him, seeing it was not in their power to let the accident of this commotion, promising in all their names, that they would not omit the execution assoone as the oportunitie was offered: which deuise whereas it was vtterly kept vnkowne from Franciscomaria, yet he quickly tookē suspicion by certaine words vnaduisedly spoken of Ranse de Cere to a drumme of the Spaniards: of whom taking occasion to iest with him, he demanded when those Spaniards would giue vp their Duke prisoner: which voyce making deepe impressiō in the hart of Franciscomaria, gaue him cause diligently to obserue whether there were any infidelity or treason in the army, which at the length by letters intercepted with the cariages of Lawrence, he did not onely discernē, but perceiued that Maldonato was the author of some dangerous stratageme; a matter which (hauing dissimuled vntill then) he thought not good any longer to conceale it: and therefore calling together all the Spanish footemen, setting himselfe in the middest of them, he began to giue them great thankes, with words of most vehement insinuation, for those things which for his sake they had vndertaken with so great inclination of mind, confessing openly that neither in the memory of these latter times, nor in histories of auncient writers, had bene any Prince or Captaine owing so great obligations to men of warre, as he acknowledged to owe to them: for that neither hauing money, nor any meane to reward their great merites and seruices, and himselfe a Prince but of small estate though he should reccuer all his patrimonies, not being of their nation and language, nor hauing serued with them in the field, yet they had with so ready a disposition followed him against so mightie a Prince and of so great authority, and that not for hope or greediness of spoyle, since they knew they were led into a barreine and poore region: which valour and good seruices, as he had no meane to recompence to them but with good wil and gratification of mind, so yet this was his comfort, that not only amongst the regions of Italy, but also through all the prouinces of Europe they had purchased perpetuall fame and reputation vnder him: they being but very few in number, without money, without artillery, without any warlike furniture, had so often constrained to turne their backs, an armie most rich in treasure and all other prouisions, with whom were ioyned so manie warlike people, against the forces of the Pope and the power of the Florentines, with whom the name and authority of the kings of France and Spain was concu-rant: and that in regard to support and preserue the faith and honour of merof seruice, they had neglected the solemne commandement of their proper Princes. Of which things like as he did take exceeding pleasure, because of the name and glorie of them, so on the other side, all matters which might obscure so glorious a renowne, would bring vpon him a burden of intollerable griefes:

 that as he endured with manifest dolor the opening of matters which should draw to hurt them or anie of that company, to euery particular of whom he had vowed whilest he drew breath for euer to be dedicated in all affection, in all seruice, in all fidelitie, and all office whatsoeuer: so neuerthelesse, least this euill begunne should be increased with his silence, and least the malice of some should blemish so great glorie gotten by this armie: and being also conuenient that he should hold a more deare account of the same and honour of them all, then particularly respect the amity of a few: he could not conceale longer from them, that there were foure in that armie who went about to betray the glory and the safety of them all. Touching his owne priuate case, neither would he make mention, nor inferre complaints, since hauing bene trauelled in so many accidents, and passed the rage of fortune for innocencie, he was now reduced to this temperance and staie of minde, that it was all one with him the desire of death or life: But for their parts, neither the obligations and offices which he ought to them, nor the settled affection which with so great merite he bare to them, would suffer him to keepe longer from them the information and knowledge of their present daunger, which was that Colonell Maldonato, in whom for his place ought to haue bene a greater care of the safetie and glorie of them all, and Captaine Suares the first contriuer of this fraud, by yeelding vnder a counterfeit sicknesse to be taken of his enemies in Remagnia, together with two other Captaines, had conspired and promised vnder wicked counsels, to betray the liues of them all to Lawrence de Medicis: And as the effect of those counsels was disappointed by his vigilancie, for which cause he would no sooner reueale so great a treason: so now not thinking to behold any longer either the person of himselfe, or the liues of others vnder so great a daunger, he hath opened vnto them, the thing which long before was knowne to himselfe: And the better to induce their minds, he sayd that the discourse of this treason was set downe in credible forme in certaine letters autentike found amongst the writings of Lawrence and intercepted by him, besides many apparant signes and coniectures: all which he thought good to lay afore them, to the end they might be the iudges of such a hainous conspiracy, and so hearing aswell the crime detected, as the iustifications of the offenders, they might proceede to iustice according to that counsell which should stand best with equitie and order, and establish a due safety to the whole army. When he had made an end of speaking, he commanded to be read and interpreted the euidences of the crime objected against them; which being heard with very great attention, Maldonato, Suares, and the other two Captaines not being suffered to aunswere, were condemned by the common iudgement of the army, as of a matter most manifestly proued, and forthwith being committed to passe the pikes, they were executed after the maner of souldiers. Thus the army being purged (as they sayd) by this punishment of all treason, they followed on their iourney towards Persia:
 to the which was already entred Io. Paule Baillon, being departed from Pejera as scone as he had knowledge of their intention: & there arming his friends with many companies of peasants leuied in the countrey and confines there, he prepared himselfe to defend it: to whom the Legate had

sent for succour, Camillo Vrsin his sonne in law, leader of the Florentins together with the men at armes of his conduct, and two hundred and fiftie light horsemen : with the which forces it was thought he might sustaine the inuasion of his enemies, the rather for that many deuises were made to hinder their proceedings : for Vitelli with his regiment of men at armes, and Sise with the French launces, who stood now no more suspected, for that betweene the Pope and the French King was established a confederation, were marched to Citta de Castello, and Lawrence de Medicis, who being newly recured of his wound, & also lately come from Ancona to Pesera, was sent in post to Florence to prepare therethings necessary to the conseruation of that gouernement & the cities adioyning : there he tooke order that the Legate with the rest of the army, should march towards the Dukedome of Vrbis, to the end to counsell Franciscomaria to abandon the expedition of Tuscane, for the gard whereof was left no other regiments of souldiers, then a defence of the inhabitants. Franciscomaria not without the hope of some intelligence or conspiracy, did remoue his army to Perugia, where Iohn Paule riding about the city to take view, he was assailed in the middest of the streete by a peasant or soldier of the countrey, and sayling at that time to strike him to the death, he was suddenly set vpon & slaine by the concourse of those that accompanied Iohn Paule: who taking the oportunity of this tumult, caused certaine others whom he suspected to be mured, and so being deliuered from snares of conspiracy, he seemed also to be acquitted from all perill, for that the enemies who had now many dayes lien about Perugia, had no meane to take it by force: and yet Iohn Paule at a time least expected such a matter, alleaging in his iustification, that the people of Perugia (whose furie he had no power to resist) would no longer endure the spoyling of their countrey, couenanted with the army to pay ten thousand duckats, to graunt victuals for foure dayes, not to take armes against Franciscomaria in that warre, and they to issue presently out of the territories of Perugia: a matter very grieuous and of no little discontentment to the Pope, for that it confirmed the opinion conceiued of him from the beginning of this warre, in going so slowly to the army with the succors he promised, and holding for suspected the power of Lawrence, he wished that Franciscomaria should conserue the Dukedome of Vrbis. This also aggrauated the grieve and discontentment of Baillon, that whilest he was in the campe with Lawrence, Ranse and Vitelli bare greater authority then he : the memory of which things was haply the chiefeest cause of his owne calamities in times following. Franciscomaria hauing made conditionall agreement with the Perugians, marched towards Citta de Castello, where when he had made certaine incursions, with intention to enter the towne of Sansepulcro in the state of Florence, the danger of his owne state constrained him to take other counsell, for that the Legate Bibiana hauing estoones leuiē certaine bands of footmen Italians, folowing the deliberation made at Pesera, was remoued with the rest of his army to Fossombrono, which city being battered with the artillery, the third day was taken & sacked. This done, he led his army to Pergola, where the day folowing the Earle of Porenza with 400 Spanish launces sent frō the king of Spaine to the aid of the Pope, did ioyne with the army : within Pergola there was not one souldier, but only a Spanish Captaine & many inhabitants of the region, who being sore astonished begā to cōmune of yelding, but while they were in parley, the Captaine who stood vpon the wall being wounded in the face, the soldiers made assalt, without any order or cōmandement of their Captaines, & won the towne by force. From Pergola they consulted to bring their army to Cagli, but being aduertised that Franciscomaria hauing heard of the losse of Fossombrono, was returned into that region with most great celerity, they determined to retire themselues: wherefore the same night in the which the Legate receiued that intelligence, they departed from Pergola, & hauing trauelled to Montlion, whē knowing that there they might lodge, they began to lay out the ground according to encamping, being aduertised by other messengers that the celerity of the enemy was far aboue perswasion, and that he sent before him a thousand horsemen, euery one carying a footman in croope, to the end that they being constrained to trauell with more leasure, time might be giuen to the army to ouertake them: they marched vij. miles to a place called Bosco, from whence departing the morning folowing before day, they came in the euening to Fano, hauing almost vpon their backes the horsemen of the enemies, which came with so great celeritie, that if they had onely departed foure houres later, they had hardly escaped the necessitie of the fight.

At this time the affaires of the Pope in other actions, proceeded with no better felicitie, then in the accidents and events of the warre: for that Alphonso the Cardinall of Sienna disdain-ing much the life of the Pope, lay in waite to betray him, the rather for that the Pope hauing forgotten the trauels and dangers which Pandolfe Peirucci his father had endured to restore him and his bretheren to the gouernement of Florence, together with the operations which he with other yong Cardinals had wrought in the consistory to aduance him to the Popedom. In recompence of so many benefits he had caused to be thrust out of Sienna, Borguese his brother and him. By which occasion, being also spoyled of his fathers estates, he could not maintaine the dignity of the purple hat with that glory which he was accustomed: and therefore being caried with hatred, and reduced almost to dispaire, he began to deuise by a young counsell to murder him with violent hands, whom his hatefull hart could not brooke to loue: but restrained with the perill and difficulty of the fact, more then with the example and common infamie that throughout all Chri-stendome would run, if any Cardinall would with his owne hands take away the life of a Pope, he changed aduise, and turned all his thoughts to take him away with poyson, by the ministration of Baptista Vercelli a famous Surgion, and very familiar with him: of which counsell (if so wicked a furie be worthy such name) this should haue bene the order, that sith that he could not find any other meane, the Surgion should by setting foorth with singular prayes his vertues, make such insinuation into him, that the Pope hauing a Fistula vnder his fundament, for the which he vsed daily the trauell of men of his profession, would by such impression call him to his cure.

 But the impatience of Alphonso reduced the action of this deuise to a desperate hope, since as the execution drew with it some long tract of time, depending vpon many obseruations and circumstances, so Alfonso who could not containe himselfe from complayning against the ingratitude of the Pope, being every day more hatefull, and suspecting least he would conspire some thing against his estate, was at last as it were constrained for his owne safety to depart from Rome, leaving neuertheless behind him Ambo Nino his secretary. Betweene them there was a continuall passage of letters, whereof certaine being intercepted, the Pope discerned manifest treason to be practised against his life: therefore vnder colour to make some prouision for the affaires of Alfonso, he called him to Rome, sending him safe conduct, ioyned to his word and faith giuen besides to the Spanish Embassador, not to touch him prejudicially. Vnder which assurance, notwithstanding the priuity and testimony of his conscience to so apparant treason, he went vnwisely to the Pope, who immediately caused him to be apprehended together with Barinello Cardinall Sawha Genoway, a great furtherer of Leo to the Popedom, but so conioyned with Alfonso in strait friendship and familiarity, that he was thought partaker with him in all things. Their first apprehending was in the Popes chamber and in his presence, and from thence were conueyed as prisoners to the Castell Saint Angelo: there was also present direction giuen, that Baptista Vercelli, who then was following his art at Florence, should be made prisoner and sent to Rome. The Spanish Embassador labored with vehement complaints and protestations, to haue Alfonso set at liberty, alleaging that the Popes faith giuen to him as the kings Embassador, ought to be obserued with the same fidelity, as if it had bene giuen to the king himselfe. But the Pope answered that there was no safe conduct, how ample soeuer it was, with clauses strong and speciall, that caried anie suretie in crimes conspired against the life of the Pope, without peculiar and speciall nomination:
 and that the same exception and prerogatiue followed also the crime of poysoning; an offence so greatly abhorred by the diuine and humane lawes, and so hatefull to the senses of all men, that they haue reserued no safe conduct or assurance for the offenders that way, but vnder particular and speciall mention. The Pope preferred to examine them, Mario Perusio the procurer of the fiske, who following the matter vpon them with seuerity and rigour, they confessed the treason conspired with the priuity of Bandinello. The confession was verified by the Surgion, & confirmed by Po. Bagnacuallo, who vnder Pandolfe his father, and Borguese his brother, had long bene Captaine of the garrison of Sienna, and for this offence were now publicly quartered. After this confession, in the next sitting of the consistory, was apprehended and caried to the Castell, Raphael Riario, Cardinall Saint George chiefe Chamberlaine to the sea Apostolike, who for his wealth & riches, for the magnificency of his court, & for his long time & continuance in that dignity, was become both in truth & name, the principal Cardinall of all the Colledge: he confessed, that albeit neither the treason nor the counsell thereof had bin imparted to him, by the which he iustified his innocencie, yet he had heard oftentimes the Cardinall of Sienna both lament and use threats to the Pope vnder such words and speeches, as he could not but comprehend that he bare in him a mind to do some violence against this person when occasion offered. The Pope after this continued his complaints in another Consistorie, wherein the Cardinals, not accustomed to be violated, fell into no small astonishment and griefe of mind, that with such cruelty and iniquity the Popes life should be betrayed by those, who for their place and dignity which made them principall members of the Sea Apostolike, stood more then all others iustly bound to defend it: he complained with great compassion against the accident and the vnthankfulnesse thereof, to returne to him such a recompence for his infinite benefites and liberalities bestowed vpon all sorts, yea not without blame and imputation of some: but the thing that made him burst out into more vehemencie of passion, was that other Cardinals were intangled with conspiracie, who neuertheless, if afore the Consistorie were dissolued, they would frankly confesse their offence, they should find him prepared to clemencie and to giue pardon, but if they deferred till the Consistorie were broken vp, he would turne his clemency into seuerity of iustice, and cal into proscription as well the accessaries as chiefe offenders. Which words working both pietie and submission in the minds of Adriano Cardinall of Cornetto, & Fran. Soderin Cardinall of Volterra, they humbled themselves vpon their knees afore the feete of the Pope, confessing that the Cardinall of Siena had vsed the same speeches to them, which the Cardinall Saint George had expressed. As soone as these examinations and the evidences incident were published in the Consistorie, Alfonso and Bandinello by sentence of the generall Consistorie, were degraded of the dignitie of the purple hat and holy orders, and deliuered ouer to the secular Court and Iudges of criminall offences. The night following Alfonso was secretly strangled in prison, but the sentence of Bandinello by the Popes grace was changed into perpetuall imprisonment, from the which neuertheless he was not long afterwards deliuered vnder a ranfome of money, and eftsoones restored to the dignitie of Cardinall, notwithstanding he had iust cause of indignation against him for the many benefites and graces he had bestowed vpon him: and yet he was become estranged from him for no other cause then for the amity he had with Alfonso, adding withall a disdain that the Cardinall Medicis was preferred afore him in the suites of certaine benefices: and there were not wanting malicious interpreters, who iudged that afore he was deliuered out of prison, there was giuen to him by the Popes commandement, a potion confected with that kind of poison which killeth not sodainly, but worketh by suttile operations vntill by times it hath wasted the life of him that receiueth it. And touching the Cardinall Saint George, albeit the lawes ordained by Princes for the securitie of their states, commaund that in the crime of high treason aswell the accessarie as the principall be past vnder extreame punishment: yet, what by the state of his fall, being in a condition inferiour to the others, and what for the respect of his age and authority, which time had made reuerent in him, and lastly, what for the law of friendship, which had indifferently runne betweene them afore his ascending to the Popedome, he proceeded with him with more clemencie and fauour: in so much as like as for the authoritie and reputation of iustice, he was by sentence depriued of the Cardinals dignitie, so he was immediatly by grace bought with a great summe of money, restored to his former condition in all things, sauing in the authoritie and priuiledge of his voice actiue and passiue, which grace neuertheless within the reuolution of a yeare was fully restored to him againe. There was no other vexation imposed vpon Adrian and Volterra, sauing a secret exaction of great summes of money: but seeing there was no surety to either of them to abide in Rome with conuenient dignitie, Volterra with the Popes licence went to Fondy, where vnder the wings of Prosper Colonna he remained till the Popes death: & Adrian departed secretly out of Rome, but what destinie fell vpon him it is hard to report, seeing there are none that euer could giue any informatiō of him since his going away. The bitterness of this accident drew the Pope to consider for the creation of new Cardinals, knowing that the whole presence of the Colledge, astonished by this punishment, and ielous of other occasions, were of minds much estranged from him. In which action he proceeded so immoderately, that in one morning in the Consistory, the Colledge consenting more for feare then of will, he pronounced xxxj. Cardinals, and in that abundance and plentie of numbers, as he had good meane to satisfie many ends, and to make his election of euery qualitie of men, so he preferred two sonnes of his sister, with some others, who, sauing for the seruices they had done him, & had bene acceptable to the Cardinall Medicis by manie offices, were in other reasons neither capable nor worthie so high dignities: in the calling of some, he obserued the humours of great Princes, creating them at their instance: some he raised by symonie and corruption of money, to relieue his treasure being much consumed: some he called were verie famous by the opinion & credit of their learning, amongst whom were three Generals, (that appellation is of the highest degree) of the order of S. Augustine, S. Dominicke, and S. Francis: and in this creation he left this most rare tradition, that to one function, in one promotion, and at one time, he preferred two of the family of Trinulce, vsing his inducement for the one, to recompence his seruice, for that he had bene his Chamberlaire, & also vpon a desire to satisfie Iohn Iacques; & touching the other, he was caried with the fauour of his learning accompanied with some quantitie of mony: but that which bred matter of greatest admiration, was the election of Frauncis Vrsin and Pompey Colonne, with other five Romains of the principall houses, such as were followers of all factions, with counsels altogether contrarie to the resolution of his predecessor: neuerthelesse it was reputed an action not the least discreet, and yet it drew no great happinesse in the end to his friends and kindred: for, whereas the greatnesse of the Barons of Rome being alwayes the suppression & vexation of the Popes, and where in default of the ancient Cardinals of those families, whom Alexander the sixt had bitterly persecuted to make a pray of their goods, Iulio would neuer suffer that dignitie to be reinuested in any of the. Leo with great immoderation did the contrarie, not that it could be said he was drawne with the merite of the men, for that as Frauncis was taken from the profession of armes, & created Cardinall, so for Pompey, the memorie of his doings past ought to be objected against his preferment, for that though he was a Bishop, yet vsing the occasion of Pope Iulios sicknesse, he had laboured to seduce to tumult the people of Rome against the gouernment of Priests, for which cause Pope Iulio depriued him iustly of the dignitie of Bishop. But in this time Franciscumaria, albeit by the retiring, or rather manifest flying of the enemies, could haue no meane to fight, his armie being made mightie in men and valour by the continuall resort of new souldiers, running after the fame of the Captain, and partly caried with hope of pray, entred into Marca, where Fabriano & many other townes compounded with him, redeeming with readie mony the peril of sacking and robbing their houses: but others standing destitute of that humanity, he committed to the mercie of the souldiers, amongst the which the citie of Iessi ran a hard fortune, since during the parlie & negociation of accord, it was entred and spoyled in the vnbrideled insolencie of the souldiers: he drew from thence to Ancona, for the defending of the which the Legate had sent a crue of souldiers: he remained about it many dayes, to the great hinderance of his affaires by the losse of time which he suffered, not in fighting with the defendants of the place, but in temporizing to compound with them: at last, because they would not with the harmes of the war suffer also the losse of their haruest, they made him a ranome of eight thousand ducets, not swaruing in other sort from their accustomed fidelitie to the Church: afterwards he inuaded the citie of Osim with very ill successe: and at last he planted his camp afore the towne of Corinaldo, wherein were two hundred footmen forreyners, by whom together with the valour of the townes-men, it was so valiantly defended, that after he had consumed xxij. dayes about it, he leuied his siege, his despaire being greater then his hope to carie it. This did greatly diminish the terror and feare that was had of that armie, the rather for that he had not made conquest of any those townes that refused to compound with him: a matter which no way could proceed of the vnskillfulnesse of the Capitaine to dispose, nor of want of valour in the souldiers to execute: but the true reason was, for that they had but very few & those very smal field peeces, lacking withall many things to put them to seruice: besides, touching those townes which would not yeeld to him, it was necessary they should make demonstration of their constancie and valour, for that the Captaines of the Church armie, amongst whom Count Potenza was chiefe, had sent troupes of their men of warre to bridle and make pillage of the countrey euen to the walles of Urbis: and Sise being returned from Citta de Castello in Romagnia, and afterwards entred into Montefeltro, & had subdued by force Secchiano with certaine other small townes, was reduced to remaine incamped within five miles of Pejera, with intention not to minister succours to any place, nor once to stirre vnlesse necessitie moued them to retire: for, where in the times when they were superior in forces and strength, their affaires had falne out so vnhappily, now being made inferiour in numbers by the diminution of their footmen, they had not the courage to sustaine the fame of their enemies approaching, & much lesse to abide any other perill: in which resolution made according to the Popes mind, they were confirmed confirmed by a hope of the comming of fixe thousand Swissers, whom the Pope, by the counsell of the French king, had sent to leaue and wage for, the French king after the confederation made, desired the victorie of the Pope, & yet at the same time he retained the same suspicion of him that he did before: he was continued in this suspition by the relations of Galças Viscount and Clarke Amb. Colonne, of whom the one being reuoked to his countrie from banishment, and the other notwithstanding his seruices and merits well recompenced by Cesar, and both transferred with honorable conditions to the pay of the French king, they had reported that the Pope had conspired greatly with Cesar & the Swissers against him. But much more was the French king moued, for that the Pope had contracted secretly a new confederation with Cesar, with the king of Spaine, and the English, which albeit was lawfull for him to do, for that it bare onely for their defence, yet both the matter & maner of it troubled not a litle the thoughts of his mind: he was induced through feare to be deliuered of the wars, least the Pope not finding his aides & succours ready, would enter into a greater coniunction with other Princes against him. And besides that, he began to take grieft & suspition of the armie of Vrbino, whose strength was compounded of footmen Spanish & Launceknights: therefore, besides that he had aduiled the Pope to make himselfe strong with the footmen of Swissers, he offered to send him of new three hundred launces vnder Thomas de Foix brother to Odet, alleaging that besides the reputation and valour of the man, he would be a conuenient instrument to imbecill from the army of Franciscmaria the bands of Gascons, with whom those brothers & race of Foix being descended of the noblest bloud in Gascoigne, had great authority. The Pope accepted this offer, but with a mind verie suspicious, for that he stood doubtfull as he did before, of the kings will, wherein he suffered his suspition to take increasing by the withdrawing of the Gascons, fearing least that action had priuily proceeded of the operation of Lamirech: and he that in those times had made obseruation of the doings of Princes, might apparantly discern, that no benefite, no office, no coniunction, was sufficient to remoue out of their hearts the distrusts and ielousies which they had one of another: for, the suspition was not only reciprocally betweene the Pope and French king, but also the king of Spaine hearing of the leauies of the Swissers, & the preparation of Thomas de Foix, was not without his feare, that the Pope and the French king ioynd together, would deuise to spoile him of the kingdom of Naples. These suspicions were thought to profite the affaires of the Pope, since both of them least they should giue him cause or matter to estrange himselfe from them, labored to confirme him, and assure him with benefits and with aydes.

Now Franciscmaria departing from Corinaldo, returned vpon the state of Vrbino to giue defence and protection to his people for the getting in of their haruest: & retaining with an increase of ambition his ancient desire to get Pesera, which was garded by the Count Potenza and his souldiers, he brought his armie to the borders thereof, and obiecing all impediments to cut off the resort of victuals, he put to the sea certaine ships: but against that force they of Rimini rigged out sixteene vessels, some barkes, and some brigantines, & some of other nature agreeable to the seruice of those times, which being armed and manned, and sent to accompanie and assure other ships loaden with victuals for Pesera, they encountred the nauie of Franciscmaria, of whō they sunk to the bottome the Admirall, and tooke all the residue; by which accidēt, despairing of the enterprise of Pesera, he leauied his forces and departed. In this meane while M. de Foix aduanced with his three hundred launces, but the Swissers made slow preparation, for that the Cantons denied their consent vnlesse they were first satisfied of their old pensions: from which obstinacy the king being not able to remoue them, and in the Pope no ablitie to make them satisfied for the intollerable defrayments he had expended, his Agents hauing consumed in that solicitation many dayes, entertained and waged without common priuity two thousand particulars of that nation, and foure thousand other Germans and Grisons: which leauies being descended and bestowed in the confines and suburbs of Rimini, and they being deuided by the riuier from the residue of the Citie, are enuironed and fetched in with walles: Franciscmaria was entred by night by the vaults and arches of that notable bridge of Marble which tieth the suburbs with the Citie, but he could not passe ouer, the riuier being swelled by the inundation of the sea. There grew a strong fight betweene his souldiers and the footbandes bestowed in the suburbs, in which was slaine Iasper Captaine of the Popes gard, who had conducted them thither: but greater was the losse of the enemies, by the death of Balastishino & Vinea Spanish Captaines, & Federike:

Bossolo and Franciscumaria being wounded in the bodie with a bullet. After this encounter he turned his armie towards Tuscane, being caried more by necessitie then by hope, for that in a region so much consumed, so great an armie could not be nourished. He remained certaine dayes in Tuscane amongst the populars of S. Stephano, the borough of S. Sepulchro; and Anguiano, townes of the dominion of Florence, where he tooke Montedoglio, a place verie weak, and of little importance: he gaue a long assault to Anguiano, a towne more strong by the fidelity and valour of the inhabitants, then by fortification of walles, or other kinds of munitions: but being not able for his owne weakenesse and wants to carie it, he retired his armie vnder the Appennine, betwene S. Sepulchro and Città de Castello; and causing to be drawne thither from Mercatello foure peeces of artilleries, he incamped within lesse then halfe a mile of the towne, vpon that way that leadeth to Vrbino: there he seemed to stand irresolute and doubtfull what course to take, seeing that as his enemies were passed behind him into Tuscane, & manie Italian bands entered into S. Sepulchro, and Pitelli with a great strength was got into Città de Castello: so within Anguiano within the plaine of S. Stephano, and within the other townes conioyning, were entered the bands of footmen of the Germanes, the Grisons, and the Swissers. Laurence de Medicis came also into Florence but somewhat late to S. Sepulchro, where Franciscumaria had lye with his campe manie dayes idly: and for that he began to find in these places many discommodities of victuals, and lesse hope to be able to bring forth any good effect, & withall, for that the souldiers of his armie, who were driuen to defend their liues by pray & pillage, were now of equall terror to his friends and to his enemies, he began not to discern any good expedition or end for his affaires: and the bands of footmen who had so long followed him, seeing no pay ministered, and no more hope remaining to liue by discretion, because they had no munition of qualitie to force townes, and nothing withall, that to their calamitie of want of victuals, was ioyned an increase of the force and reputation of their enemies, by the grace of many Princes disclosed in their fauour, they began to be weary with the longnesse of the warre, the rather also for that they could hope for no good issue or successe, neither by the oportunitie of present battell, nor by the benefit of longer time. The Pope for his part felt likewise the same perplexities and afflictions, for he was both made naked of wealth and treasure, and no abilitie of himselfe to continue the prouisions of his campe, & also he stood more doubtfull then euer of the fidelitie of other Princes, but chieflie of the French king, who with great slownesse and negligence did prouide for the reliefe of mony, which he was bound vnto by the capitulation. And for that M. de Foix hauing by the Popes directiō remained in Romagnia, refused to send part of his launces into Tuscane, alleaging that he would not deuide his strength before the armies were passed the Appennin, there arose many arguments & perswasions of accord betwene the Legate and Franciscumaria & his Captaines. In which good inclination to peace, there interposed betwene them M. de Foix, and Don Hugo de Montado; and for that effect also the Viceroy of Sicilia was sent by the king Catholike: but vntill that day nothing succeeded, for the hard cōditions which Franciscumaria vrged. At length the bands of Spanish footmen, induced both by the difficulties that appeared, & also by the sollicitation & instance of Don Hugo, who ioyning threats to the authority of his place, & satisfying them, that such was precisely the will of the king of Spaine, they were brought to incline & embrace peace: which with a verie hard consent of Franciscumaria, & the negociation of the Bishop of Auellino sent thither for the Pope by the Legate, was contracted in this sort, concurring also the consent of the bands of Gascōn footmen by the interposing of M. de Foix: That the Pope should pay to the Spanish footmen fīue and fortie thousand duckets for the full satisfying of foure moneths pay, and to the Gascōns & Germanes ioyned with the, threescore thousand duckets: That they should all depart within eight dayes out of the state of the Church, the iurisdiction of Florence, & the territories of Vrbino: That Franciscumaria leauing abandoned all that he possessed in that state, might passe in security to Mantua: That he might carie with him his artilleries, his household stufte, & namely that famous Library which with so great charge and diligence had bin erected of Federike his grandfather by the mothers side; a Captaine for leading of an army, of most renowme of al the Captains of his time, but most famous amongst all other his vertues for his patronage of good learning: That the Pope should absolue him of all censures, and giue remission to all the subiects of the gouernement of Vrbino, & to all others that had risen against him in this warre. But whilest they were reducing the substance of these capitulations into articles and writing, Franciscumaria sought to haue haue inferred in speciall wordes, that the Spaniards were they who promised to deliuer vp to the Pope, the state of Vrbis; a matter which they refused for the regard of their honour, whereupon they came to contention, when Franciscomarìa suspecting least they would sell him to the Pope, went suddenly to Sestina, leading with him part of the light horsemen, with the footmen Italians, Gascōns, & Germanis, & foure peeces of artilleries. As soone as perfection was giuen to the peace, and the Spaniards receiued their payes, they went into the Realme of Naples, containing at their departure a strength of fixe hundred horsemen, and foure thousand footmen: by their example, the other bands of footmen departed after they had receiued the reward of their disloyaltie: onely to the Italians, nothing was neither giuen nor promised; and touching Franciscomarìa ouer whose safetie it seemed Monsieur de Foix had a care particular, seeing himselfe now abandoned, challenged the benefit of the first peace, and went through Romagnia and the countrey of Bologna to Atlantua, being accompanied with Federike de Bossolo, an hundred horse and sixe hundred footmen. In this sort did end the warre of Vrbis, continued eight monethes with great expences and ignominie to the Victors: on the Popes part were expended eight hundred thousand duckats, the greatest masse whereof was drawne out of the common weale of Florence; for the authoritie he bare there at that time. And touching the Captaines to whom was referred the administration of those warres, there was heaped against them, great imputation of cowardise, and of disordered gouernement, adioyning to it want of sinceritie or sound intention: for that in the beginning of the warre when the forces of Lawrence were mighty, and the power of the enemies in great weakenesse, they neuer could vse any occasion, neither by apparant valour, nor by their industrie, and much lesse by their prouidēce of forecast. To which beginnings drawing with them losse of their reputation, negligence in discipline, and disobedience of the armie, were adioyned in the proceedings and further course of the warre, want of many prouisions in the campe. And at last fortune seeming to take her sport and pleasure vpon their errors, did by her working so heape calamities vpon their disorders, that the affaires of the warres were reduced to these termes, that the Pope detecting the snares that were layd against his life, and being much shaken in the gouernement of the Church, and estsoones fearing the estate of Florence, was constrained with petitions and new obligations, to implore the aydes of all men. And yet he could not be deliuered from those calamities; but by defraying of his owne treasure vpon the armie of his enemies; and such as either were the originall mouers of the warre, or else being entertained in his pay, had vilely reuolted against him, after they had vexed him with many extortions.

In this yeare and almost in the end of the yeare, the king of Spaine went with prosperous navigation, to take possessions of his kingdomes: he had obtained before of the French king (betweene whom and him went many demonstrations of amitie, both of them couering the secret intention of their mindes) assurance that he would forbear for sixe monethes, the first payment of an hundred thousand duckats, which he was bound to pay in by the articles of the last accord contracted betweene them. The Venetians also made a reconfirmation for two yeares, of the league defensue which they had with the French King, with whom as they stood most firmly conioyned in the law of league and fidelitie, so in regard of him they made small account of the amitie of all other Princes. In so much as they omitted to send Embassadors to present their obedience to the Pope, who hauing sent Legate to Venice, Allobello Bishop of Pola, it was imputed against him as a matter vnworthy his maiestie.

There followeth now the yeare a thousand five hundred and eightene, in which the regions of Italie, contrary to the precedent of many yeares before, felt not the least impression or motion of warre, yea there appeared the selfe same disposition in all other Princes of Christendome, betweene whom by the operation of the Pope, though haply more with faire reasons, then with substantiall counsels, was solicited a vniuersall expedition of all Christendome against the pride of Selim Prince of the Turkes, who the yeare before had so enlarged and extended his greatness, that comparing with his power, his ambition to be greater, pushed on with many helpees of nature, it was worthily to be doubted, that if he were not prevented by the inuasions of the Christians, he would in his pride lift vp his victorious hand against them. For Selim discerning that Baiazer his father, reduced to extreame old age, sought to establish the succession of the Empire in the person of Acomath his elder brother, drew into rebellion against him, & by force of armes, concurring the corruption of the souldiers of his gard, constrained him to resigne vp to him the authoritie of the gouernement: and not suffering his ambition to stay there, it was beleueed of all men, that for his more absolute assurance, he tooke away his life by poyson: and afterwarde obtaining an ouerthrow to his brother in an encounter of a battell, he confirmed fully the seate of his Empire, by depriving him of his life in publike shew, exercising the like rage of crueltie vpon Corcu the youngest brother of all. And being not satisfied according to the tyrannie of the house of Ottomauni, with the bloud and slaughter of all his Nephewes, or any others that remained of that line and stocke, he was in thought oftentimes (by the rage and furie of his disposition) to take away the life of Solyman his onely sonne. Of these beginnings breeding one warre vpon another, after he had subdued the Aduliti a people of the Mountaines, he passed ouer into Persia against the Sopbi, to whom he gaue battell and ouerthrew him, and in that felicitie of warre he tooke the Citie of Tauris the soueraigne seate of that state, together with the greatest part of Persia, which he was constrained to abandon, not through the valour of his enemies, who for their disabilitie to support their armie, were retired into the mountaines and places desert, but for the vniuersall dearth & barennesse of that yeare, he fell into an extreame want of victuals. He returned soone after this expeditiō to Constantinople, where, after he had done execution vpon certaine soldiers seditious, & for certaine moneths had refreshed his armie, he gaue out that he would eftsouones returne to make warre vpon Persia, but indeede he turned his forces against the Soldan king of Soria and Egypt, a Prince not onely of most auncient reuerence and dignitie for that religion, but most mightie for the amplitude of dominion, most rich in tributes, and very glorious by the discipline of the Mammelukes, of whose armes and forces that state was possessed with great reputation three hundred yeares: for that Empire being ruled of the Soldans, they not by succession but by election, ascended to it, and to the supreme seate of gouernement were not preferred but men of manifest vertue, and confirmed by all the degrees of war, in the administration of provinces and armies: and also the sinewes and strength of their forces, stood not vpon souldiers mercenarie and forreine, but of men elected, who taken of children in the provinces adioyning, and trayned vp by succession of yeares in hardnesse of fare, in suffering of labour and toyle, and in the exercise of armes and all customes appertaining to the discipline and law of warre, they ascribed and enroled them in the order of the Mammelukes. There succeeded from hand to hand in this order, not the sonnes of the Mammelukes that were dead, but others, who being taken of children for slaues, had their rising by the same discipline, & by the same industrie and artes, by the which their predecessours had passed from hand to hand. These not being in number aboute seueenteene or eighteene thousand, held subiected vnder a most heauy yoke, all the people of Egypt and Soria, whom they spoiled of the vse of all armes, and practise to manage horses: yea such was their fiercenesse and valour, that oftentimes they made warre of themselves, for that of their numbers and by their election were chosen the Soldans, and in their power rested all authoritie to distribute the honours, offices, and profit of that most rich Empire. By the oportunitie of which, hauing subdued many nations adioyning, and reduced to obedience the Arabians, and maintained many warres with the Turkes, they were many times victorious, but very seldome or neuer vanquished of others. Against these people did Selim conuert his forces, whom he ouerthrew in many battells fought in plaine field, wherein was slaine the Soldan, and afterwarde in another battell was taken prisoner the other Soldan his successour, who he caused be publikely murdered with an vnworthy kinde of torment. Thus hauing satisfied his bloody humour with these great slaughters, and almost wasted the name of the Mammelukes, he proceeded to the inuasion of Cairo a most populous Citie, wherein were resident the Soldans, and in short time subdued vnder his iurisdiction all Soria and all Egypt: the same drawing vnto him so great an increase of Imperie, such amplification of tribute and reuenue, and remouing the impediments of so mightie enemies and of so great reputation, that with great reason he was to be feared of the Christians: a feare which tooke his degrees of increasing by this consideration, that to so great a power & valour, was ioyned a settled inpression of ambition to beare rule, and by many victories to make glorious his name to all posterities: wherein reading oftentimes the Legendes and actions of the great Alexander and Iulius Caesar, he seemed to suffer grieve and perplexitie of minde, that his actions and exploits of warre could in no wise hold comparison with so many great triumphes and victories. In which humour, refurnishing continually his armies, and building of new a great number of ships, and leauying all prouisions necessarie for the warre, it was feared when his preparations were accom-accomplished, that he would inuade Rhodes, the bulwarke of the Christians in the East parts, or else the kingdome of Hungaria, made fearefull by the valour of the inhabitants to the nation of Turkes, which at that time was in diuision amongst themselves, and made weake by the minority of their King, who was gouerned by Priests and the Barons of the Realme. Others were of opinion, that he had addrest all his thoughts to the inuasion of Italie, taking his encouragement vpon the discord of the Potentates and naturall Princes, whom he knew to be much taken with the long warres of those regions. To this was ioyned the memorie of Mahomet his grandfather, who with a power farre lesse then his, and with a small Nauie sent vpon the coastes of the Realme of Naples, had wonne by assault the Citie of Ostonto: and, sauing (he was preuented by death) had both opened the way, and established the meane to persecute the regions of Italie with continuall vexations. So that the Pope together with the whole Court of Rome being made astonied with so great successe, and no lesse prouident to eschue so great a daunger; making their first recourse to the ayde and succour of God, caused to be celebrated through Rome most deuout inuocations, which he did assist in presence bare foote: and afterwards calling vpon the helpe of men, he wrote letters to all Christian Princes, both admonishing them of the perill, and perswading them to lay aside all ciuill discordes and contentions, and attend speedily to the defence of religion and their common safetie, which he affirmed would more and more take increase of most grievous daunger, if with the vnitie of mindes, and concordances of forces, they sought not to transerre the warre into the Empire of the Turkes; and inuade the enemy in his owne countrey. Vpon this aduise and admonition, was taken the examination and opinion of men of warre, and persons skilfull in the discouerie of countreys, the disposing of prouinces, and of the nature and vsage of the forces and weapons of that kingdome, and thereupon a resolution being set downe to make great leauies of money by voluntarie contributions of Princes, and vniuersall impostes of all people of Christendome, it was thought necessarie that Cesar accompanied with the horsemen of Hungaria and Polonia, nations warlike, and practised in continuall warres against the Turke, and also with the footemen of Germanie, should saile along Danubi into Bossina, called aunciently Misa, and from thence to Thracia; and so to draw neare Constantinople; the seate of the Empire of the Ottomans: That the French King with all the forces of his kingdome, the Venetians, and the other Potentates of Italie, accompanied with the infanterie of Switzerland, should passe from the port of Brindisi in Albania, a passage very easie and short, to inuade Greece, a countrey full of Christian inhabitants, and for the intollerable yoke of the Turkes, most ready to rebell: That the Kings of Spaine, of England, and Portugall, assembling their forces together in Carragena and the ports thereabouts, should take their course with two hundred ships full of Spanish footemen and other souldiers, to the straite of Galipoli, to make roades vp to Constantinople, hauing first subdued the Castels and fortes standing vpon the mouth of the straite: and the Pope to take the same course, embarking at Ancona with an hundred ships armed. With these preparations, seeming sufficient to couer the land & ouerspread the sea, it was thought that of a warre so full of deuotion and pietie, there could not be but hoped a happie end, specially adding the inuocation of God, and so many seuerall inuasions made at one time against the Turkes, who make their principall foundation of defence, to fight in the plaine field. These matters were solicited with no small industrie, & to stop all matter of imputation against the office of the Pope, the minds of Princes were thoroughly sounded, & an vniuersall truce for five yeares betweene all the Princes of Christendome, published in the consistorie, vpon paine of most grievous censure to such as should impugne it. So that the negotiation continuing for all things appertaining to so great an enterprise, he assigned Embassadors to all Princes: to the Emperour he sent the Cardinall S. Sisto, to the French king he dispatched the Cardinall of S. Maria in Portico, the Cardinall Giles to the king of Spaine, and the Cardinall Campium to the king of England: all Cardinals of authoritie, either for their experience in affaires, or for opinion of their doctrine, or for their familiaritie with the Pope. All which things albeir they were begun with great hope and expectation, and the vniuersall truce accepted of all men, and all men with no litle ostentation and brauerie of wordes, made strew of their readinesse with their forces to aduance so good a cause: yet, what with the consideration of the perill esteemed vncertaine and farre off, and extending more to one Prince then to another, & what by the difficulties & long tract of time that appeared, to introduce a zeale & vnion so vniuersall, priuate interrestes and respectes particular seemed to preuaile more, then the pietie of the expedition. In so much as the negociation stood not onely naked of all hope and issue, but also it was followed very lightly and as it were by ceremonie, this being one propertie in the nature of men, that those things which in their beginnings appeare fearefull, do dayly take such degrees of diminution, and vanishing, that vnlesse the first feares be reuiued by new accidents, they leade men in processe of time to securitie: which propertie of negligence, both touching the affaires publicke and affection of priuate and particular men, was well confirmed by the death that succeeded not long after to Selim, who, hauing by a long maladie suspended the preparations of the warre, was in the end consumed by the passions of his disease, & so passed into other life, leauing so great an Empire to Solyman his sonne, young in yeares, and iudged to beare a wit and minde not so disposed to the warres, although afterwarde the effectes declared the contrarie. At this time, appeared betweene the Pope and the French King, a most great and straight coniunction: for, the King gaue to wife to Lawrence, his Nephew, the Lady Magdalene noblie descended of the bloud and house of Bologna, with a yearely reuenue of ten thousand crownes, whereof part was of the Kings gift, and the residue rising of her owne patrimoine. Besides, the King hauing borne to him a sonne, the Pope required that in his Baptisme, he would impose vpon him his name. By which occasion Lawrence making preparations to go to marrie his new wife, for his more speede, performed his iourney by post into Fraunce, where he was receiued with many amities and much honour of the King, to whom he became very gracious and of deare account, the rather for that besides other generall respectes, he made a dedication of himselfe wholly to the King, with promise to follow in all accidents, his fortune: he brought also to the King a writ or warrant from the Pope, by the which he graunted to him, that till the moneyes collected of the tenthes, and by other meanes of contribution, were expended vpon the holy warre against the Turkes, he might dispose it to his owne vses, so farre forth as he would make promise to restore it whēsoever occasiō & necessity would cal him to defray it to that end it was gathered for: his warrant bare also to deliuer to Lawrence of the same treasure, fiftie thousand crownes. And whereas the King till that day had dissembled not to execute the Popes promise made to him vnder writing for the restoring of Modena & Reggia to the Duke of Ferrara, notwithstanding the terme of seuen monethes were past, and knowing withall that he could not offer to the Pope a thing more grieuous, then to vrge him to that restitution, he redeliuered into the hands of Lawrence the sayd writ of promise, making a greater reckening (as it often hapneth amongst mortall men) of the stronger then of the weaker. About the same time, the Venetians by the operation of the French King, prolonged the truce they had with Cesar for five yeares, with cōdition to pay for euery one of the five yeares twentie thousand crownes, & to euery one of the exiles that had followed Cesar, the fourth part of their goods yearely, being rated at the value of five thousand crownes. It was supposed that Cesar would haue bin induced to haue made peace with them, if they would haue gratified him with a greater summe of money.

But this truce was not a litle agreeable to the French King, for that the Venetians not standing fully assured, had the greater reason to make deare account of his amitie, and that to Cesar was giuen no power, with the money he had of them, to dresse any innouation. In so much as matters on all sides, tending to peace and concord, the differences betweene the French and English were also reconciled. And for the more stabilitie of which agreement, it was confirmed with a contract of parentage and alliance, wherein the King of England promised to giue his onely daughter, to whom hauing no sonnes, there was hope of the descending and succession of the kingdome, to the Dolphin the eldest sonne of the crowne of Fraunce, adding for a portion foure hundred thousand duckats. Both the one and the other bare yet so tender age, that infinite accidents might happen, before perfectiō of yeares would make them able to establish matrimonie. There was made betweene them a league defensue, wherein were comprehended Cesar and the King of Spaine, in case they would ratifie it a certaine time. The king of England bound himself to restore Tournay, receiuing presently for defrayments expended vpon that town, two hundred and lx thousand duckats, & three hundred thousand to be defalked of the portion, & to pay three hundred thousand more in the space of twelue yeares. The French king also was bound, that if the peace and the parentage followed not, to render vp againe into the hands of the English, the towne of Tournay. Many Embassadors were sent from both the realmes to negociate this league, and

and to receiue the ratifications and oathes, by whom in the Courts of both the Kings the actes of the accord were dispatched with great solemnitie and ceremonie, with a resolution of an enterview of both the Kings betweene Callice and Bolleme, immediatly after the restitution of Tournay. About the same time, the daughter of the French King appointed to be married to the King of Spaine, being dead, the former peace and capitulation was estoones reconfirmed betweene them, wherein was promised the mariage of the second daughter of Fraunce. Both the Kings celebrated this coniunction with most great demonstrations of perfect amitie: for, the King of Spaine, hauing payed in at Lyons an hundred thousand duckats, ware publicly the order of Saint Michael vpon the day of the celebration of the same; and in recompence of that honour, the French King, vpon the day dedicated to Saint Andrew, was honorably attired in the robes and colour of the golden fleece.

Thus the affaires of Italie standing in good estate of tranquillitie, there remained onely discontented and in ill disposition, Iohn Iacques Trinuice, whom neither his old age reduced almost to the last time, nor his vertue so oftentimes expressed in the seruice of the house of France, could any way aide or comfort: for, as in himselfe were bred some occasions, partly by his ambition, which was suspected, and partly through his impatiencie, which the condition of old age might reasonably excuse. So he was crossed by the subtle humours of such as did enuie him, but chiefly and vehemently quarrelled withall in many things by Monsieur de Lawtrech, by whose instigatiō, the king was drawne into suspition of him, that not onely his owne person but also the whole familie and house, were too much agreeable to the Venetians. Wherein they tooke the consideration of their suspition, not onely for the interest of the faction of the Guelfes, and many other actions and traditions of times past to keep him entertained in the grace of the Venetians, but also for that Theodor Trinuice was become their gouernour, & Rene a member of their family, was newly receiued into the pay of that state. By reason of which, after Galeas Viscount by the death of Fr. Bernardin Viscount, was become chiefe of the Gebelin faction, the king indued him with the order of S. Michael & allowāce of pension, to the end to oppose him against Trinuice with a greater authoritie, hauing withall the ready hād of Lawtrech to push on his reputatiō & credit as oftē as occasiōs occurred to do anything to the disaduantage of Trinuice. The passage of which things brought no litle diminutiō to the authority of the old Trinuice, who, hauing no patiēce to dissemble the wrōgs he knew he had not deserued, made his dayly complaints, and was so much the more hated and suspected. Lawtrech with his other aduersaries made this no litle occasion to approch him and accuse him to the King, that he had made himselfe a burgesse inrolled with the Swissers, as though he would vse their meane to be supported against the king, and haply aspire to greater things: so apt is enuie to suborne suggestions, & so ready to enforce them dangerously, to the ruine of those against whō she contendeth: and as Trinuice, notwithstanding his old age which was now in the estate decrepit, & the infirmities of a body broken which draweth after it dispensation from trauell, was gone into Fraunce to iustifie himselfe: so, Monsieur de Lawtrech after his departure, restrained vnder reasonable gard by the kings directiō at Vigenena, his wife & grandchild borne of the Count of Musque his onely sonne deceased, which degree of rigour or hard dealing, was well expressed vpon himself at his coming into France, for that much lesse that he was receiued of the king with the same aspect, countenance, & honour that he was wont, seeing of the cōtrariety reproched to his face, his amity & correspondency with the Swissers, assuring him that no other thing held him frō punishing him as he had deserued, the consideration of the vniuersall renowne that ran (though not true in many parts) of the merite & seruices he had done to the crowne of Frāce: vpon the kings displeasure which commonly worketh many dangerous impressiōs in the minds of men, he renounced and disclaimed all societie & introduction with the Swissers: and not many dayes after, following the Court, he fell sicke at Chartres, where he gaue vp to the King, his innocencie and complaints, and made to God the last reckening of his aged dayes: he was a man in the iudgement of many, and confirmed by sundry experiences, of singular valour in the discipline of warre, and ranne a race alwayes opposed to the inconstancie of fortune, who according to her mutabilitie, made him feeble the operation of both her humours, sometimes reioycing in her fauour, and earst againe finding her sower and of bitter tast. By his commaundement were written vpon his tombe, these wordes not disagreeable to the condition and course of his life: I finde the rest within my graue, which in my life I could not haue.

Jealousie against Iohn Iacques Trinuice.

The death of Iohn Iacques Trinuice.

About this time, Cæsar desiring after his death to establish the succession of the Romaine Empire in the person of one of his grādchildrē, treated with the Electors to chuse one of them king of Romains, a dignitie which draweth with it an immediat succession to the Empire after the Emperours death, without other election or confirmation. And because none can aspire to such election, vntill the Emperour elect haue obtained the crown Imperial, he made instance to the Pope, that by a new exāple, he would accōplish his coronation in Germanie by the hands & deputatiō of certaine Cardinals Legates Apostolike for that action. And albeit Cæsar had afore wished that that dignitie might be trāsferred to Ferdinand his grādchild as a degree to support him, the elder hauing diuolued to him so great a puissance of estates, & albeit he iudged that for the better continuance of his house in fame & honour, & to meete with all ill accidents that run vpon the eldest, it were better that two personages were great then one alone, yet what by the operatiō of many his Courtiers, & by the perpetuall labour of the Cardinal of Syon, & lastly by the suborned importunities of such as feared & hated the puissance of Fraunce, he reiected the first counsell, & disposed all his meanes to haue the King of Spaine elected to that dignitie: wherein he was perswaded, that it would be farre more profitable for the house of Austrich, to assemble & draw into one alone, all power & greatnesse, then in canuasing & deuiding it into many parts, to make that familie lesse mightie to obtaine the issue of their purposes: That the foundations of the greatnesse of Charles were such & so mightie, that adding the dignitie Imperiall, there was great hope, that he might reduce into one Monarchy all Italie & a great part of Christedom; an action not only appertaining to the greatnes of his progenie & descendāts, but also agreeable to the tranquillitie of his subiectes, & for the regard of the infidels, most cōformable to the benefite of the cōmō weale of Christendome: That it belōged to him in office & equitie, to lay for the augmētation & exaltation of the dignitie Imperiall, which had bin so many yeares inuested in his person & his house of Austrich, & which till that day, both by his weakenesse & infirmitie of his predecessors, had bene greater in title & name thē in substāce & effects: that there was no hope of the rising of that dignity, or to reinuest it in his anciēt renowme, but by trāsporting it into the person of Charles & annexing it to his power: That seeing the humour of the time presented to him the occasion, wherein also did concur the order of nature & of fortune, it ought to be far from him to stop or hinder the course of so many helpes, to aduance & lift vp the greatnes of his house: That it was seene by examples & traditions of auncient Emperours, that Cæsar Augustus & many of his successors, for want of sonnes or other issue of their line, haue searched by meane of adoption for successors very farre remoued from their alliance, yea such as touched them nothing in blood and kindred, wherein they were caried by a naturall ielousie lineally descēding from one to another, that the dignitie which had bin so long resident in their persons, should not be separate or decline to diminution: That the exāple was familiar of the king Catholike, who albeit he loued as his sonne, Ferdinand, who had bin alwayes trained vp about him, & neuer seeing Charles, but found him in his last age, very disobedient to his cōmaundements: yet without hauing cōpassion of the pouertie of him whom he loued as his sonne, he neuer imparted with him any one of those estates which he held, nor of such as he might dispose by the right and prerogatiue of conquest, but left all to him whom he scarcely knew but as a straunger: That he would remember how the same King would alwayes vrge him to purchase new estates for Ferdinand, but to leaue the dignitie Imperiall to Charles: & that it was seene that for the augmentatiō of the greatnes of his successor, he had, perhaps with a counsell reproued of many and haply vniust, euested from the kingdome of Aragon, his proper house, & consented against the cōmō desire of most men, that the name of his house so noble and renowned, should fall into obscuritie & perdition. Against this instance of Cæsar, the French King opposed himselfe with all industrie and meanes possible, taking not a litle displeasure & enuie, that to so many kingdomes & great estates holden by the Spanish, there should be added the dignitie Imperiall, which resumng a certaine vigour & strength for so great a puissance, might subdue all others vnder his feare and iurisdiction; he made secret solicitation to all the Electors, to stop the effect of such an ambition: he stood vpon instance to the Pope not to send with an example new and daungerous, the Crowne to Maximilian: and he sent Embassadors to the Venetians, to induce them to hinder it with the Pope, whom he admonished of the perils that might fall vpon them both by the course of such a greatnesse. But the Electours for the most part were already drawne to the opinion of Cæsar, and no lesse assured of the summes of money promised them them for that election by the King of Spaine, who for that purpose had sent into Germanie two hundred thousand duckats. Neither could they in reason, nor haply without daunger of slander in regard of the examples past, denie him such a demaund. Besides, it was not to be beleefed that the Pope (notwithstanding it was discontenting to him) would refuse to agree that Cesar should receiue in Germanie by the ministrations of Legates Apostolike, the Crowne Imperiall in his name, seeing that to make a voyage to Rome to be crowned, albeit it brought greater authoritie to the sea Apostolike, yet in all other regardes, it was a matter rather ceremonious then substantiall. With these impressions and with these accidents, ended the yeare thousand five hundred and eightene: and as the Electours had not resolued and established the deliberation, so it was made both more doubtfull and full of difficulties, by the death of Cesar which hapned in the first beginning of the yeare following: he dyed at Linz a towne vpon the marches of Austriche, where he remained for the delight and pleasure in hunting the wild Boare and other chases of the field. He liued alwayes vnder one condition of fortune, who many times fauoured him in offering him many faire occasions, and as often wrought against him in not suffering him to take the fruite and effect of them. He was by nature inconstant and remouable, and had conceites and impressions very ill disposed and different from the iudgement of other men, ioyned to an excessiue prodigallitie & dissipation of money; matters which cut off from him the effectes and successe of all occasions, being otherwise a Prince most perfect, and instructed in the ordering of warre, secret to lay and dispose a plot, diligent to follow it, of body able and suffering, of minde affable and easie, and replenished with many other excellent gifts and ornaments. As soone as he was dead, the French King and the King of Spaine, began manifestly to aspire to the Empire, the purchase whereof albeit was a matter of right great importance, and no lesse the emulation running betweene two so mightie Princes, yet they ordered their ambition with great modestie, neither vsing wordes of iniurie nor threatnes of armes, but either one labouring by his authoritie and by his meanes, to draw on his side the Electours. The French King sundry times reasoned touching the election with great comelinesse with the Spanish Embassadors, to whom he sayd it was a matter both agreeable and conuenient, that either of them seuerally should seeke by honest meanes to increafe the honour of his house by so great a dignitie: which for that in times before had bene transferred into the families of their predecessours, there was now the lesse occasion to breed betweene them two, matter of iniurie, or diminution of their amitie and good will: but rather he wished that in the action of the Empire they might follow the example and order of two young louers, who albeit they follow the quest of one Lady, and either one laboureth by his industry to carie her, yet they forbear to come to contention. The king of Spaine alluded with good right that the Empire appertained to him, as hauing continued by a long succession of time in the house of Austriche, and that it had not bene the custome of the Electours to depriue the issue of the Emperours without manifest cause of their disability; neither was there any in Germanie of that puissance and authoritie to make him equall to stand competitor with him in that election. And least of all did he hold it iust or likely, that the Electors would transport to a forreine or straunge Prince, so great a dignitie, continued by so many ages in the nation of Germanie. And albeit some particular amongst them, either through the insinuation of money, or other propertie of corruptiō, might be allured to another intentiō, yet he hoped to stop him with force prepared in time conuenient, not doubting also but the other Electours would oppose against him, and the Princes and free townes of Germanie would not endure so vniuersall an infamie, specially to suffer it to be layd vpon the person of the French king, which would be no other thing then to make great the puissance of a king enemie to their nation, & from whom there was no suetie that the Imperiall dignitie would euer returne into Germany: he thought it would be an action easie to obtaine & reduce to perfection, that which had bin solicited by his grandfather, who had already compounded for recompences & donations, & other diuidents for euery of the Electors. On the other side, the desire of the French king was as great, and no lesse were his hopes, which tooke their principall foundation vpon an opinion he had to corrupt the voices of the Electors with his huge summes of money, especially for that there were amongst the both Pensionaries to him, & otherwise assured by many good offices, who encouraging him with the facilitie of the enterprise, pushed him on to embrace it. And for his part, as mortall men are apt to beleue the thing they desire, so he nourished that hope with reasons rather apparant then the true: he knew that commonly it was a matter grievous to the Princes of Germanie to haue the Emperours mightie, being iealous, that in so great a puissance, they would not either in part or in all, quarrell the iurisdiccions & authorities Imperiall occupied by many of the. In which reason he perswaded himselfe, that they would in no sort consent to the election of the Spaniard, and so of themselves to subiect themselves to an Emperour more mightie then had bene since along descent and race of Emperours: a matter which in his person seemed to be qualified, for that hauing neither states nor auncient alliances in Germanie, they had no occasion of suspition of his greatnesse. The same reason also made him beleue well of the conformitie of the free townes, in whom much lesse than the regard of the glorie of the nation would carie it from him, seeing it would helpe to poise the ballance on his side, for that with most men the motions of proper and priuate interest may do more then the respect of publike and generall profite. He knew it was not a little grievous to many noble houses of Germanie, pretending to be capable of such a dignitie, to see the Empire continue so long time in one house, but much more did it discontent them to suffer that so great an estate which of right ought sometimes to be giuen to one of them, and sometimes to passe to another, should become a perpetuall descent and succession in one line: in so much as they might call inheritance and succession that election, which durst not leaue the line of the Emperours: that in that sort the Empire was translated from Albert d' Austrich to Federike his brother, & from Federike to Maximilian his sonne, and now there was deuice to passe it from Maximilian to the person of Charles his grandchild. By these humours and indignations of the Princes of Germany, he tooke hope that the discordes and iealousies amongst themselves might helpe on his cause, the rather for that it often hapneth in the contentions of men, that he that is excluded, or the partie whom he fauoureth, runneth with a naturall rashnesse rather to call in and aduaunce a third, then to giue place to him that hath opposed against his intention. Moreouer the French King was not without his hopes in the fauour of the Pope, both in regard of the amitie and alliance newly past betweene the, & also for that he was not ignorant how incouenient it would be to the sea Apostolike, to haue the Imperiall Crowne inuested in Charles, not so much for his owne greatnesse, as for that by the oportunitie & neighbourhood of the realme of Naples to the estate of the Church, and the adherencie of the Barons of the Gabelins, he had a plaine and open passage to runne vp to the gates of Rome. But in that discourse he considered not that the same reason which he iudged true against Charles, was also against himselfe, for that the Empire being ioyned to his person, he was no lesse to be feared of the Pope and all others, then Charles, for that though the one of them possessed haply more realmes and states, yet the other was not to be lesse esteemed, hauing his power not dispersed nor separate in many places, but was Prince of a realme entirely assembled and vnited, where the obedience and fidelitie of his subiectes was no lesse wonderful, then his treasure and riches infinite. Neuerthelesse not knowing in himselfe that which he considered in another, he had recourse to the Pope, and implored his fauour vnder the offer and protestation of his person and kingdomes, with all other deuotions of a louing sonne. The matter of this election pressed much the Pope, to whom it was not a litle grievous, both for the suretie of the sea Apostolike, and tranquillitie of Italie, that either of those two Kings should be elected Emperour: and as his authoritie with the Electours was not such as he might hope to draw them much to his purpose, so he iudged it necessarie to take a wise course, and to vse industrie in a matter that drew so great consequence. He perswaded himselfe that the French King being abused by some of the Electours, would haue litle part in the election, and that the corruptions in men salable, would not be sufficient to transport the Empire from the Germanie nation to the house of Fraunce. But he supposed the action would be easie to the King of Spaine, both for the conformitie of language and nation, & for the practises and sollicitations begun with Maximilian, and for many other regards, yea he thought he might easily leade on his intention, if he objected no impedimēt: a matter which he saw he could not worke in other sort, then to labour the French king to turne vpon the person of one of the selfe Electours the same fauours & distributions of money, which he aduaunced to procure his owne election: but he esteemed it a matter impossible to induce the kings mind to take that course, so long as he stood caried with the vehement humour of vaine hopes. And as he hoped that by how much more earnestly he should embarke himselfe into that practise, by so much more easily should he draw the French King to fauour the election of a third, with no lesse affection then he had sought to aduaunce his own: so he doubted not that vnder that dealing he might not winne so much with the king as to bring him to receiue and heare his authoritie and counsell, especially hauing insinuated in him a credence certaine to be his friend, and to haue with him the same desire to aduance his election: besides, he thought that in fauoring at the beginning the affaires of the French king, the king of Spaine finding difficulty to obtaine his desire, and fearing least the French would winne some aduantage, would in like sort dispose himselfe to elect a third: for which reasons he did not onely signifie to the French king, with what affection he wished he were lifted to the Empire, but he counselled him with many reasons to proceed resolutely in the enterprise, promising him vnder large words, to fauour him with the whole authoritie of the Sea Apostolike: and as he thought he could not in better sort imprint in the kings mind the sinceritie of his intention, then to vse for that purpose an instrument whom the French king would thinke depended more vpon him then of anie other, he gaue present direction to his Nuncio in Germany called Robert Vrsin, Archbishop of Reggio, and of great confidence with the king, that both seuerally and ioynedly with the French Agents there, he should make the best labour he could to sollicite the Electors: but he diminished the libertie of this commission by secret aduertisement, that the Nuncio should proceed either more or lesse moderately, according as he found in Germany the Electors disposed, and the affaires aduanced. These actions discreetly discoursed by the Pope, and no lesse couered with a wonderfull simulation, stood in need, as well for the person of the king as in his Agents in Germany, of a greater wisdom and secrecie, and in the Popes ministers a more fidelitie and grauitie.

But whilest these matters tooke their proceedings by practises and by armes, the French king gaue direction to Peter of Nauarre to go to the sea with a Nauic oftwentie gallies and other vessels fraughted with a thousand souldiers: his commission was to lie to impeach the piracies and inrodes of the Moores, who hauing with their foists runne into our seas without impediment, became more harmefull this yeare then at any time before: his commission bare also to inuade the Moores of Affrica, if the Pope thought it so good: but the principall respect and intention of this expedition was, to take away from the Pope (who was whole for him in the chalenge of the Empire) all occasion not to feare the forces of the King Catholike, who more for feare to be troubled in his owne estates, then for desire to vexe any other, leauied with great preparations an armie by sea, to send it out for the garding of the realme of Naples. And yet notwithstanding amid these distrusts and suspicions, both the kings continuing in demonstrations and faire semblances of amitie, there was sent from them seuerally and in particular to Montpellier, the great Maister of Fraunce, and the Lord of Cheures, in the seuerall persons of whom consisted almost all the counsels and intentions of their kings: their negotiation tended partly to confirme the mariage of the second daughter of Fraunce with the king of Spaine, and partly to resolue the affaires of the kingdom of Naples, the restitution of which albeit being promised to the ancient King in the accord made at Noyon, though much solicited by the French King, was till that day deferred by the King of Spaine with diuerse cunning excuses: but this intercounsell and meeting was dashed, by the accident of death hapning to the great Maister, who was taken away afore they assembled.

In this time died Laurence de Medicis, who had languished in a continual sicknesse euer since his returne from Fraunce, where he had consummated his mariage with a wretched prediction by the death of his wife, who not manie dayes before, and after her deliuerie of child, was reuoked out of this world, leauing him behind to take warning of his mortall end by her going before to prepare his way. By the death of Laurence, the Pope standing desirous to keepe conioyned so long as he liued the power of the Florentines with the estate of the Church, would take no counsell of certaine his familiar friends, who aduised him, that since of the line Masculine there remained no more (except himselfe) of the lawfull descendants of Cosmo de Medicis the first founder of that greatnesse, he would reinlarge and restore the libertie of his country: but with a counsell singular and particular, he preferred the Cardinall Medicis to the administration of that estate, either in an ambitious humour to perpetuate the name of his house, or for a reuenging hatred nourished by his exile against the name of that common weale: and iudging that the Duchy of Vrbis for the vniuersall loue which the people bare to their ancient Duke, would hardly be holden vnder the name of the only daughter remaining of Laurence, who was comprehended in the inuestiture of her father, he rendered it, together with Peferia and Sinigato, to the Sea Apostolike, which seeming not sufficient to repress the vehement affection of the peoples, he threw downe to the earth the wals of the Citie of Vrbm and the other principall places of that Duchie, except Agobbio: a Citie which for the ieaiousie it had ouer the Citie of Vrbm, bare no great inclination to Franciscanaria, he fauored, and restored it to reputation, enduing it with a chiefe iurisdiction and principallie ouer all that Duchie: and to weaken it so much the more, he gaue to the Florentines in recompence of the mony expended by him in the war of Vrbm, for the which he before had reduced the character Apostolike, as better to the state of Florēce, the fortresse of S. Leo with all Mōsfelro & the parishes of Sestine which were alwayes of the demaine of Sesena. The Florentins were not wel content with this maner of satisfaction, & yet they had no meane to oppose against his authority and will.

Let vs eftsoones returne to the challenge or sute for the Empire, which holding all Christendome in suspence, was pursued by both the kings with more ambition then euer. The French king was beguiled more and more vnder the inducements and great promises of the Marquis of Brandeburg, one of the Electours, who was allured with no small offers of money, and haply some round summe in prest, for the which he did not onely bind himself with secret capitulations, to giue him his voyce, but also to make for him & on his side his brother the Archbishop of Magence one of the three Prelate Electors. The king in like sort promised himselfe much of another part of the Electors, and in case it came to an equalitie of voyces, he hoped not a litle in the voice of the king of Bohemia, by the voice of whom the controuersie was to be decided, if the fixe Electors, whereof three be Ecclesiastike and three secular, were discordant. Therefore the French king sent to the Admirall, who was gone before into Germanie to solicit the action, a great quantitie of money to be distributed amongst the Electors. And as he vnderstood that many of the free townes, together with the Duke of Wittemberg gaue out threats against those that sought to transport the dignitie of the Empire into the person of strangers, for the which they made leaues of men of warre: so he forgot not to collect great prouisions of money and treasure, to the end that both with corruption and armes, he might oppose against such as put the Electors in feare to make choise of him. But great was the inclination of the people of Germany to keepe retained the Imperiall maiesty within the compasse of that nation, yea it concurred and ran euen among the communities of the Swissers, who for the loue they bare to their common cuntry of Germany, besought the Pope, that in the election, he would not beare fauor to any that were not of the naturall language of Germany. Neuerthelesse the Pope perseuered to push on the French king, hoping that for those degrees & demonstrations of his affection towards him, he would at least be brought to heare & take counsell of him with greater credit and faith: vnder which counsel followed with other reasons, he labored in the end to perswade the king, that shaking off all hope from him selfe to be elected, he would worke with the same instance and importunitie, to transferre the election to the person of some other of the Princes of Germany; a counsell that serued to small purpose, for that the Admirall and Robert Vrsin, being cunningly caried ouer with the promises of such, as, to make them selues rich with the money of France, sed them with intentions very certaine and pleasing, the one being of a French nature and the kings seruant, and the other bearing a light and vnstayed condition, & desirous to win grace with the king, consumed him daily more and more, with vaine aduertisements increasing his hope to cary the election. With these practises and operations of money and sinister meanes, the Princes, to whom not more by antiquitie of custome or well grounded reason, then through permission and priuilege, or rather dispensation of Pope Gregory the fift a Germanie of nation, belongeth the power to elect the Emperour of Rome, went according to that ancient vsage, to Francfort a towne of low Germany, where, as they contended vpon many points & differences touching the proceeding to the election in time due, obseruing their ordinances, they were aduertised of an armie put already to the field by the king of Spaine, who was more carefull to wage souldiers with money, then to expend his treasure in symonie and corruption vpon the Electors. This armie approaching neare the towne of Francfort, vnder title to bridle all such as should offer force to the action of election, brought no small encouragement to those Electors who fauored his cause, reduced to his part those that stood doubtfull, and so astonished the Marquis of Brandeburg, who was for the French king, that both despairing of the concurrence of other Electors, and also glad to auoid the hatred and vniuersall infamie of the whole nation, he had no hart to discouer his intencion. So that comming at last to the act of election, Charles of Austrich king of Spaine was elected Emperour the xxviij. of Iune, by the full voyces of these foure Electors, the Archbishop of Magence, the Archbishop of Colleine, the Count Palatine, and the Duke of Saxony.

the Archbishop of Trenes chose the Marquis of Brandeburg, who was also concurrant in the election of himselfe: but touching Charles it is not to be doubted, that if by equalitie of voyces the election had bene passed over to the gratification of the seuenth Elector, that he had not bene also caused, for that Lewis the king of Bobemia, who was also king of Hungary, had promised his voycel to Charles. This election pulled downe maruellously the heart of the French king, and not only abated the reputation of all those that in Italy had their expectation and dependancy of him: and on the other side, it raised into courage and stomacke all such as were occupied with hopes and thoughts contrarie, seeing transferred and conioyned so great a power, in the person of one only Prince, whose youth and other apparances made shew of great effectes of ambition in him: besides that there was promised and prophesied vpon him by many predictions, a right great and large Empire, together with many worldly fortunes and felicities: and albeit he was not so rich in treasure and money as was the French king, yet it was noted in him a matter of right great importance, to be able to furnish his armies with footmen of Swissers, Germans, and Spaniards, people for their valour of great glorie and reputation through the world: a matter wherein he had a singular aduantage of the French king, who for that he had not in his kingdome a strength of footmen to oppose against the vertue of these, had no meane to make strong warre, but by drawing with great expences and intollerable difficulties, bands of footmen out of foraine countries; a necessitie which constrained him to entertaine with great charge and diligence the nation of Swissers, and to endure of them manie iniuries, and yet he neuer stood fully assured neither of their constancie nor of their fidelitie. Moreouer, it was not to be doubted, but that betweene these two Princes of equall youth and ambition, and hauing indifferent reasons and occasions of ielousie and contention, would in the end arise a great and dangerous warre: for the French king was not without a burning desire to recouer the kingdome of Naples, to the which he aspired and pretended iust title: and he tooke greatly to heart the restoring of king John to the realme of Nauarre, touching the which he now discerned that he had bene fed with vaine hopes. It troubled the Emperour to pay the hundred thousand duckets promised in the accord of Noyon, & he interpreted against the king, that in reiecting the accord made before at Paris, and vsing immoderately the occasion when he was to passe into Spaine, he had almost forced him to make a new accord: besides, the cause of the Duke of Guelders was greene & fresh betweene the, a matter of it selfe without any other concurrancy, sufficient to stirre them vp to warre & armes, for that as the French king on the one side had taken him into his protection, so on the other side he was holden by the people of Flawnders a seuerer and bitter enemy: but aboue all other quarels the Duchie of Burgundy wrought in the mind of the Emperour no small emulation: which Duchy being possessed by Lewis the eleuenth, by reason of the death of Charles Duke of Burgundy grandfather by the mothers side to the Emperours father, hath euer since tormented the minds of his successors: lastly, there wanted no matter nor occasions of strife & war for the Duchy of Millan, of which the king rainging had not since the death of Lewis the twelfth, neither demanded nor obtained the inuestiture: besides, there was pretended to the rights which had bin gotten to him by the inuestiture which had bin made to his predecessor, many challenges & exceptions, aswel touching the inualidity, as the losse of those rights, which was matter sufficient to stirre the vp to quarrell: neuertheless, neither the time running, nor the oportunitie present (which are the guiders of actions) consented as then that they should enter into any innouation: for, besides that the Emperour of necessity was to repasse first into Germany, to receiue at Aix the crowne of the Empire, according to the custome of those that are elected: yet they were either of them so puissant and mighty, that the difficulty to offend one another kept them restrained from all inuasion vntill they had perfect information of the intention & disposition of other Princes, but specially of the Pope, in case the warre were to begin in Italy: his intentions and inclination were so obscured and couered with artificiall and faire semblances, that much lesse that they were knowne to others, seeing haply at some times they held no resolution in himselfe: notwithstanding he had dispensed with Charles for the acceptation of the election made in his person, contrary to the tenor of the inuestiture of the realme of Naples, wherein (being made according to the ancient forme of inuestitures) he was expressly forbidden such a matter: but whatsoeuer he did in that action, proceeded not so much of good wil, as for that he had no occasiō to refuse it to him, without offending him greatly.

So that the regions of Italy, for these reasons, stood in good estate of peace and tranquillitie, Occasions of contention between the French king and the Emperour.

The Popes enterprise vpon Ferrara.

notwithstanding in the end of the same yeare, the Pope sought to possesse the Citie of Ferrara, not with manifest armes, but by secret ambush and device: for albeit it might haue bin beleueed, that for the death of his Nephew Lawrence de Medicis, especially for that there wanted in his house rather men then estates, he would haue shaken off all thoughts and ambition to occupie Ferrara, to the which he had alwayes aspired before: yet whether he was pushed on by a hatred conceiued against that Duke, or by a desire to make himselfe equall, or at least to come as neare as he could to the glory of Iulio, he had not, neither for the death of his brother, nor for the loosing of his nephew, diminished any part of that burning ambition: by which experience it may be easily discerned, that the ambition of Priests taketh of nothing so great nouriture, as of it selfe. But the qualitie of the time and the situation and fortresse of that Citie, which Alfonso with great diligence had reduced to good rampiers & fortifications, would not agree, that he should make his enterprize with forces open and discovered, seeing withall he had provided an infinite quantitie of faire artilleries and munitions, and improving to the vttermost his reuenues, and limiting all his expences, imposing new taxations and tributes, and lastly expressing in all things the minde of a marchant more then of a Prince, it was beleueed he had gathered together a huge masse of money and treasure: in so much, that if the conditions of the time chaunged not, there remained to the Pope no other hope to carie it, then by the way of secret conspiracie and practise: whereof as he had in vaine made experience in times past with Nicholas d'Este and many others: and Alfonso for that he knew not that he followed any more those practises, held himselfe almost assured, not of his will, but of his conspiracies and ambushes. So it seemed to the Pope, for the meanes that were offered to him, and for that Alfonso by the oppression of a long maladie was reduced to those desperate termes, that there was almost no hope of his recouerie, and withall for that his brother the Cardinall, because he would not remaine in the Court of Rome with disgrace, was gone into Hungarie, that the time consented to execute some plot layd and preferred by some exiles of Ferrara, and by their working, by Alexander Fregoso Bishop of Vintemille, who was then at Bologna, for that aspiring to be Duke as his father the Cardinall had bene, he was suspected of Ottavian Fregoso. The same Bishop hauing had ill speede in the traffikes and practises which he managed to bring him againe into his owne countrey, promised to himselfe a better course, and more happy successe in the drifts which he should driue for another in a strange countrey: so that after he had secretly receiued of the Pope ten thousand duckats, he leauied vnder colour to reenter Genes by force, a power of two thousand footemen partly in the countreys of Rome, and partly within the iurisdiction of Lunigiane. By the brute and rumour of which mustering, Ottavian Fregoso fearing to be surprised by him, made himselfe strong both by sea and land. But the Bishop making as though by the disclosing of his driftes, he were fallen from all hope to be able at that time to alter the estate of Genes, gaue aduertisement to Federike de Bossolo, with whose ayde the towne of Concorda was chiefly maintained against Count Iohn Francis of Mirandola, that he might vse the seruice of his forces vntill the expiration of their pay, which yet continued almost a moneth: and after he had passed the Appennin, he descended into the countrey of Corregio, taking the way by slow marchings to Concorda. The foundation of this treatise or solicitation was to passe the riuer of Paw, for which effect certaine seruants of Albert Carpi consenting to the expedition, had vnder colour to be marchaunts of corne, hyred many barkes ryding at the mouth of the riuer of Secchio, and passing in them the riuer of Paw, the Bishop layd his pretence to approach vpon the sudden neare to Ferrara, where for that he had bene not many monethes before, he had carefully surueyed one part of the towne vpon the riuer side, where fortie fadomes of the wall were downe to the earth, which was a breach sufficient enough to enter. This breach or ruine of wall, for that it was but lately fallen, was not reenforced & made vp againe so speedily as appertained, both for that the neighbourhood of the riuer & the priuation of feare, had nourished securitie & negligence in such as ought to haue provided & repaired such disorders. But whē the rumor ran through the countrey, that the Bishop of Vintemille was passed the Appennin with his souldiers, the Marquis of Mantua, though for no particular suspition; yet following his auncient custome to take away all meanes from forreine bandes to passe the riuers, retired to Mantua all the barkes that lay in the mouth of Secchio. By which accident the Bishop lost the oportunitie and seruice of those barkes which were hyred, and lesse meane to recouer other so soone as the necessitie of the expedition required, for that the

the officers for the Church that were nearest that place, were not made priue to the practise, or at least if they had any inkling, they were without Commission to deale in it. In so much that whilst he searcheth with the Agents of Albert some remedie, and reposes his people about the confines of Corregia, where, by indiscretion he discloseth to some the particularities of his purpose, the Marquis of Mantua sendeth one of his men to impart the intention and discourse of the enterprize to the Duke of Ferrara, who doubted so litle of any such matter, that he was hardly induced to beleue it. Neuerthelesse looking with better eyes into the estate of his daunger, that part of the wall that was ruinate mouing him more then any other thing, he began to wage men of warre: and making as though he had no suspicion of the Pope, he aduertised him of the ambushes dressed against him by the Bishop of Vintemille, beseeching him to giue direction to the gouernours thereabouts to minister succours to him if neede required; a request which was readily graunted and executed by the Pope by writs and letters in his fauour, notwithstanding he dispatcheth secretly at the same time commissions to the contrary. The rumour that ranne of the preparations which were made at Ferrara, ioyned to the difficulties to passe the riuer of Paw, tooke from the Bishop all hope to accomplish his enterprize; by reason whereof he drew with his armie towards Concorda: and whilst he treated with those that were within (who were already entred into suspicion against him) to inuade Mirandola, he presented himselfe suddenly in the night before the wals of Concorda, and gaue the assault, to the end to induce a perswasion that he was come into those places not to go to Ferrara, but to impatronise himselfe vpon Concorda. But this assault as it was in vayne, so the residue of the expedition drew with it a light effect, for that afterwarde he dismissed the most part of his souldiers: he left many men in opinion, and euen Alfonso himselfe, that if he meane to passe the riuer of Paw had not bene taken from him, the breach or ruine of the wall that was reuerfed, had ministered to him a great commoditie to take Ferrara, wherein was not one band nor regiment of men of warre, the Duke extreemely diseased, and the vniuersall people in such discontentment of him, that in an accident so sudden and vnprouided, there were few that would haue fought their remedie by armes, or offered their bodies to be opposed against such a daunger.

Now followeth the yeare a thousand five hundred and wentie, wherein the peace of Italie, 1520. for the same reasons and occasions by the which it had bene preserued the yeare before; tooke continuation and held good. But new doctrines began to spread and increafe, first against the authoritie of the Church of Rome, and afterwarde against the course of Christian religion. This doctrine tooke beginning in Germanie in the countrey of Saxonie, by the preachings of Martin Luther, sometimes of the order of Saint Augustine, who renewed at the first for the most part, the auncient errors of the Bohemians, which being reprobued by the vniuersall Councell of the Church holden at Constance, by whose authoritie were burned Iohn Hus and Ierome of Prage, two heads of those heresies, had lyen of long time contained within the limittes of Bohemia. The cause that newly stirred vp these opinions in Germanie, was a contempt of the authoritie of the sea Apostolike, which Pope Leo abused too licentiouly: he following too much the counsell of Lawrence Puccio Cardinall of the title of foure Saints, touching the administration of graces which the Court of Rome distributeth vpon things spirituall & beneficiall, had dispersed throughout the world without distinction of times or places, most ample indulgences, whereunto he had ioyned a power to helpe not onely those that were yet in this life, but also to deliuer the soules of the dead out of the paines of Purgatorie. And because it was manifestly knowen that those indulgences were graunted onely to draw money from men, and the same impudently demaunded by the Commissaries deputed for that exaction, who had bought of the Popes officers power to exercise and distribute by sale the sayd indulgences, they had bred in many places a great indignation and many slaunders, and especially in Germanie, where were detected many of his ministers selling for a small price, or set vpon a game at tables in a Tauerne, the power to redeeme the soules of dead men out of Purgatorie. This indignation tooke also increasing by another degree of abuse in the Pope, who for the facilitie of his nature managing in many things the office of Pope with very litle maiestie, made donation to his sister Magdalene, of the profite and exaction of the indulgences in many quarters of Germanie, and she assigned her Commissarie Bishop Arembould, a minister worthy such a commission, which he executed with no litle auarice and extortion. And for as much as it was knowne notoriously through all Germanie, that the money that was drawn by these indulgences, were not payed ouer to the Pope nor the Apostolike Chamber, who haply might haue expended some part of it in good vses, but was transferred indirectly to satisfie the infinite couetousnesse of a frayle woman, not onely the action became detestable and the officers of the same, but also the name and authoritie of him who with so litle discretion graunted it. Vnder this occasion Luther entred into his conuerſion, & began not onely to contemne those indulgences, but also in them to taxe and reprehend the authoritie of the Pope; and drawing to him euery day great numbers of auditors, who ranne to heare a matter so well receiued of the eares of the people, he began to denie and quarrell more openly the authoritie of the Pope.

Of these beginnings haply honest of themselves, or at least excusable in the greatest part, he nourished his occasion and auowed it to be iust: and being further caried with ambition and popular inclination ioyned to the speciall fauour of the Duke of Saxon, he went on not onely to taxe the power of the Popes and the authoritie of the Church of Rome, but also standing still vpon the errours of the Bohemians, he began with time to batter the Images of Churches, to depriue places Ecclesiastlike of their goods, and to permit mariages to Monkes and Nunnes professed, confirming his opinion not onely with authoritie and with arguments, but also with the example of himselfe. He denied that the power of the Pope was extended out of the Bishopricke of Rome; & maintained that euery other Bishop had as much authoritie and power in his particular Diocesse, as the Pope had within the Bishopricke of Rome. He reiected all matters determined in Councils, all traditions written by those that are called Doctours of the Church, and all Cannons and decrees of Popes, and reduced himselfe onely to the old Testament, to the booke of the Gospels, to the Actes of the Apostles, to all that is comprehended vnder the name of the new Testament, and to the Epistles of S. Paul: onely he gaue to all these a new sence and interpretation doubtful, such as neuer had bene heard of before. But the follie of Luther and his adherents stayed not onely there, but being in effect followed of all Germanie, & running dayly into errors more detestable and dangerous, he came at last to deale with the Sacraments of the Church, & to despise fastings, penances, & confessions, yea some of his followers (such as some way differed from his opinion) spake matter of blasphemie against the Eucharist. All which things being originally reprobued by the authoritie of Councils and holy Doctours; haue giuen an entry to all new and peruerſe inuentions and interpretations, and going on encreasing and amplifying in many places out of the bounds of Germanie, for that they containe such propertie of doctrine, that deliuering men from many commaundements established for their safetie by the generall Councils of the Church, by the decrees of Popes, by the authoritie of Cannons, and by the sound interpretations of holy Doctours, they bring men backe to a maner of life more full of libertie, yea euen according to their own fancies & lust. The Pope laboured in the beginning to quench this pestiferous doctrine, & yet he forbore to vse remedies & medicines proper & couenient to cure so great a maladie: for he cited to Rome Martin Luther, he forbad him to preach, and afterwarde for his disobedience, he imposed vpon him the censures of the Church: but he abstained not from the action of many things of ill example, and such as being reasonably reprobued and blamed by Luther, became very intollerable to all men: for proceeding against him in his intemperancie, with armes spirituall and Ecclesiastlike, much lesse that he did diminish, but did augment in the mindes of the people, the reputation of Martin, as though those persecutions had taken their beginning of the innocencie of his life and of his sound doctrine, rather then vpon any other occasion. The Pope sent into Germany many religious men to preach against him, and countenanced them with many letters and writs of censure to Princes and Prelates: but neither that course nor any other meanes which he vsed to repress him, serued to nothing, by reason of the vniuersall inclination of the people, and the speciall protection and fauour of the Duke of Saxon being within his iurisdiction. In so much as the cause of Luther began to seeme euery day in the Court of Rome to carry greater importance, & to augment a feare amongst them, that there grew not but some great damage touching the greatnesse of Popes, the profits of the Court of Rome, & the vnion of Christian religion: for which occasion in that yeare were summoned many consistories at Rome, and many consultations assembled in the chamber of the Pope; and many disputations amongst the Cardinals and diuines specially deputed, to deuise a remedie for such an euill, which tooke increasing dayly. And albeit there were some amongst them in this solemnne Councell, that sayled not to reduce reduce to the Popes memorie, that the persecutions which had bin executed against Luther, since they were not accompanied with a correctiō of things dānable in theselues, had increased his reputation & good will with the people, and that it had bene a lesse euill to dissemble the knowledge of such a matter, which perhaps would haue dissolued of it selfe, then by blowing at the brand, to make the fire burne more, and cast a greater flame: yet (such is the nature of mortall men to proceede with remedies fierce and violent) the persecutions were not onely redoubled against him and his followers, commonly called Lutherans, but also a wonderfull writ of threatening monition, thundered out against the Duke of Saxon, by the which being so much the more incensed and kindled, he became with a greater affection the protectour of his cause: which, for the space of many yeares went multiplying so farre, that there was great danger least the residue of Christedome were not infected with the contagion. But there is nothing that so much hath restrained his course as the knowledge that men tooke that the followers of his doctrine, did no lesse impugne the imperie & power of Princes temporall, then were most enemies to the authority of the Popes of Rome; a reason which hath moued manie Princes for their proper interests, to labour with studie and seuerity to keepe out of their realmes and principalities that contagion: And of the contrary, albeit those errors haue bene many times at the point to confound and fall, both for the immoderate intemperancie of their heads and chieftaines, and for the diuersity and contrariety of opinions amongst their disciples, yet there is no one thing that so much hath entertained and continued the obstination of them, as the licentious libertie which the people haue gotten in their maner of liuing, together with the couetousnesse of great men, who would not suffer the deprivation of those portions of goods which they occupied of the Churches.

There hapned nothing this yeare worthy of memory, sauing that John Paule Baillon, and Gentill one of the same familie, being at Perousa, fell at quarrell betweene themselves, for that John Paule being not content that he had the greatest part & authority in the gouernment, sought to subiect the whole, in which ambition he chased Gentill out of Perousa: for which violence the Pope being not a litle grieved, cited him to appeare personally at Rome, but fearing some daunger to his person, he forbore to go thither, but sent Malatesta his sonne with his iustifications, & to protest his ready obedience to the Pope and all his commandements. Neuertheless the Pope insisting still vpon his personall appearance, after the passion of many doubts and perplexities, he was resolved at last to go to Rome, being caried partly with confidence in his ancient merits and seruices done in all times to his house, and partly ouer-ruled by the perswasions of Camilla Vrsin his sonne in law with other his friends, who both extended their authority and applyed all other meanes they could to the Pope for his safetie: of whom they obtained promise vnder his fidelity and expresse assurance (though not set downe in writing, but pronounced with the Popes mouth with great arte) vnder confidence whereof he willed them to encourage him to appeare, which they accomplished vnder warrant of assurance from them that he might do it in safety. But when he was come to Rome, he found the Pope vnder colour of his recreation according to his custome, gone a few dayes before to the Castle S. Angelo, whither John Paule going the morning following to present himselfe to him, he was before he came there, made prisoner by the Captaine of the Castle: afterwards he was rigorously examined by Iudges assigned, to whom in his misery he confessed, that he had committed many grieuous faults, as well for the conseruation of yrannie, as to continue his disordered pleasures, and to obserue his other interest particular: for he which, after he had bene prisoner more then two moneths, he was beheaded according to the ordinance and sentence of the law: it was beleeued that the Pope was induced to this punishment, for that he discerned in the warre of Vrbis by many signes, that John Paule bare a mind estranged from him, that he had entertained conspiracies with Franciscomaria, and that he could not in all accidents assure himselfe of him, and consequently so long as he was at Perousa, he could make no foundation of that estate. The children of John Paule as soone as they heard of the estraining of their father, fled from the malice of the Pope, who to readdress the gouernment of Perousa according to his fancy, gaue that legation to Syluis Cardinall of Cortono, his seruant, and of his ancient bringing vp: he restored Gentill into Perousa, to whom he gaue the goods which John Paule had possessed, and so resting vpon a foundation and subiect verie weake, he conuerted into him all greatnesse and reputation. In like sort this yeare, the Pope, who attributed more to fortune or want of discretion then to any other operation, the losse and miscarrying of the Bishop of Vintimille, beganne to enforce new ambushes against the Duke of Ferrara, by the meane and working of Hubert Gambaro the Apostolike pronotarie: to him one Rodolph Capitaine of certaine bands of Launceknights which Alphonso held for his garde, had promised to put into his hands at his pleasure, the entrie of the gate of the castle Tualto, whither the souldiers that were to be sent from Bologna and Modena, hauing no meane to come without passing the riuer of Paw, but by the wooden bridge which is before that gate, direction was giuen to Guido Rangon and the Gouvernour of Modena to assemble a certaine crue of souldiers vnder some other colour, and to go make a surprise of that gate, and to defend it vntill were assuied the others that were to come from Bologna and Modena: but the day to execute the enterprise was no sooner determined vpon, then it was discouered that Rodolph, to whom by the Popes ordinance were giuen about two thousand duckets by Hubert Gambaro, had frō the beginning communicated all the conspiracie to Alfonso, who, after he was well informed and assured of the Popes intention and his purposes, stopped the further course and passage of things, and reuealed to all men the deceit of Rodolph.

The Emperour
in England.

In this yeare the Emperour passed by sea out of Spaine into Flaunders, and making his courte by the shoares of England, he descended and took land there, not by necessity, as his father did, but voluntarily to haue conference with the king of England, with whom he found good agreement: from Flaunders he went into Germany, where he receiued in the moneth of October at Aix, being a citie of fame and renouine for the ancient residencie and sepulcher of Charlemaine, the first Crowne, which is as men say, the selfe same Crowne with the which Charlemaine was celebrated: it was deliuered to him according to old obseruation, by the authority of the Princes of Germany: but that felicity was troubled with new accidents hapning in Spaine, which grew vpon this occasion: The populars and vniuersall multitudes of that kingdome, were not a litle agrieved with his promotion to the Empire, as knowing that to the great incommodity and harme of them all, he should for sundry occasions be constrained to spend the most part of his time out of Spaine: but the principall cause of that discontentment and stirre, was the generall hatred they had conceiued against the couetousnesse of such as gouerned him, especially against Al. de Cheneu, who expressing desires insatiable, had raked together by many means a great masse of treasure: by whose example the other Flemmings were caried by humours couetous, to selling for ready money to strangers those offices and magistracies, which were wont to be bestowed vpon Spaniards, and made vendible all other graces, priuiledges, fauors & expeditions of Court: insomuch as al mens minds being inflamed against the name of the Flemmings; the people of the vale of Osje began to draw into rebellion, at such time as the Emperour departed: and immediatly after he was gone out of Spaine, all the peoples of any prouince whatsoever gathered into commotion, not against their king as they protested, but to suppress the couetousnesse of his wicked gouernours: and after they had communicated together their counsels, they would no more obey the kings officers, but of themselves set downe a forme of gouernement, dressed by the vniuersal counsell of the multitude, which they called La santa Giunta: such is the name they giue to the vniuersal counsell of the popular sort. The Captaines and kings officers tooke armes against them, and so things being reduced to a manifest warre, the disorders increased by so many degrees, that the Emperour held amongst them a verie small authority: the same being the cause that aswell in Italy as out of Italy, the hope of those increased, who desired the diminution of such a greatnesse. Neuerthelesse as his armie by sea had won vpon the Moors the Ile of Gerbes; so in Germany the reputation of the French king had bene somewhat embased: for, the king, to nourish the troubles of Germany, fauored in that Prouince the Duke of Wuttemberg, who was disagreeing frō the league of Suanbe, which thing, his peoples finding and feeling to their damage and harme, they chased him by force out of his estate, and after they had wonne his liuing vpon him, they sold it to the Emperour whom they knew to be desirous to pull downe the factioners of the French king: the Emperour bound himselfe to defend them in all oppressions whatsoever, insomuch as the Duke seeing himselfe reduced to hope in the succors of the French, was constrained to haue his recourse to the clemency of the Emperour, and to receiue of him such lawes as was his pleasure to assigne, not being for all that restored to the possession of his Dukedome.

Commotions in Spaine.

Towards the end of this yeare, a regiment of three thousand Spanish footmen hauing no minds to returne into Spaine, according to a commaundement which they receiued of the Emperour, and

and little esteeming the authority of their Captaines, passed to Reggia in Calabria: & fro thence, committing many insolencies as they past, they drew towards the territories of the Church: a matter which put the Pope (in whose mind was fixed the memorie of the accidents of Vrbini) in great feare: first being either stirred vp by other Princes, or ioyning themselues with Franscomaria, or with the sonnes of Iohn Paule Baillon, or some other enemies of the Church, they were the cause of some great emotion. This feare was made greater in the Pope, for that the souldiers refused the offers made to them by him and the Viceroy of Naples to entertaine part of them in pay, & to distribute money to the residue: but these offers raised the so much the more into courage, & made the to march towards the riuer of Tronto, not keeping the straight way of Capinai, but spreading ouer the large way of Powilla: the resort of other souldiers ioyning with them dayly, together with certaine companies of horsemen increased more & more the humor of this feare. In men timorous feare is a ready impressiō, and for the time carieth the mind in contemplations of peril & daunger: neuertheless, this emotion tooke end both with more expedition & more facility then was expected, since as soone as they had passed Tronto to enter into the marke of Ancona, whither the Pope had sent strength of souldiers; & incamping before Ripatransono, they were compelled to retire for the great losse of men they had sustained in a fierce assault they gaue to the souldiers within Ripatransono: an accident so preiudiciall to their valour and reputation, that they accepted willingly of the Emperours officers conditions of farre lesser qualitie then such as they had reiect before.

THE ARGVMENT.

Pope Leo is the cause that the peace continueth not in Italy. He ioyneth in league with the Emperor against the French king. The French king looseth the Duchie of Millan. Pope Leo dieth. Adrian the sixt is created Pope. Francis Sforce reentresth vpon the Duchy of Millan. Warre is made in Tuscanie by Ransse de Cere.

Bout the beginning of the years 1521 was reappeared that former little stirre, touching the which mens minds suffered more feare by a fresh recordination and memorie of those bands of Spanishe footmen that inuaded the state of Vrbini, the for any other cause bearing either reason, likelihood or probabilitie of terrour: but as one warre draweth on another, like to diseases, that redouble in bodies ill disposed, so, not many moneths after, Italy began estsoones to be vexed with warres of greater peril, of longer continuance, & of more importance then were all the other quarrels that had passed afore: wherein the ambition of two most mighty kings, puffed vp with mutuall jealousies, hatreds, and deepe suspitions, drew them on to make exercise of all their power and forces in the parts and bowels of Italy, which hauing scarcely breathed three yeares in peace (and yet alwayes full of doubt and suspition) it seemed that in the powers of heauen, destinie and fortune, was laid vp either a manifest enuie of their tranquillitie, or else a superstitious feare that vnder the benefit of rest & concord, those regions would estsoones returne to their ancient felicitie & greatness. Such personages were the beginners of these new emotions, as albeit they had farre more interest then all others to procure the preferuatiō of the peace, yet generally & seuerally they troubled it more then any others, and by their industrie and authority, sought to kindle the fire, which they ought to haue quenched with their proper blood, if other remedies had not sufficed. For, notwithstanding the hard moods and inclinations betweene Cesar and the French king grew increasing continually, yet there was no cause at all to push them on so fast to make present waire, neither did the one so farre exceed the other in Italy, either with force or friends, or any other property of aide; that they were able to offend one another without the fauours, oportunities, and means of the Italian Princes: for that as the French king had no reason to feare any vexation of Cesar, neither touching the kingdome of Naples, nor for any quarell of Germany, both hauing the Venetians conioyned with him for the defence of Millan, and in the Swissers remaining no more readinesse to make warres in their owne names, but stood onely disposed to serue as souldiers to whosoever would minister pay to them: so also he had no meane to offend Cesar in the realme of Naples, vnlesse the Pope were concurrant with him in the action, who stood solicited by them both by many offers and meanes to be their friend: insomuch as it was beleued, that if the Pope continuing indifferent betweene them, were carefull to temper and raunge with his high authority, and fidelity of a newter, their disdaines and quarrels, and to cut off and stop the passage of their troublesome counsels, the peace would easily be preferued without violation: and there was not discerned any apparant cause why he should seeke to incense the warre; both for that he had with ill speed broken out into armes before, and withall, considering the greatnesse of those two Princes; it stood him vpon to keepe an indifferent feare of the victory of either of them, since it was euidently seene into, that whether of them soeuer preuailed in that warre, could not be stayed fro subiecting to his obedience all the regions of Italy. The Pope possessed in peace and great obedience the large estate of the Church, and Rome; and his whole Court flourished wonderfully vnder him in plentifull happinesse and felicitie: he had full authority ouer the state of Florence, which in those times was a state mightie in people, pollicie, and riches: he was naturally inclined to ease and pleasures, and therefore made it an offence to his liberty & greatnesse, to heare speake of suits and affaires: his custome was to consume the day in hearing of Musicke, in seeing stage-playes, and trifling with scoffers and iesters; so that being more effeminate then was either conuenient or comely, it seemed he should be altogether estranged from the warre. Besides as he was full of gracious liberalities and magnificencie, such as might be feared wonderfull, though he had disceded by long succession from great kings, so he had not only by his incredible prodigalities and distributions without discretion or distinction consumed the treasures gathered by Iulio, but also hauing exacted an infinit quantity of mony of the expeditions of the Court, & many new sorts of offices inuented to raise gaine, he had wasted all so excessiuely, that he was still constrained to studie meanes and deuises to entertaine those immoderate expences which grew, increasing with the vanity of his disposition: he had no deuotion to make great any of his house or kindred: & though he was possessed with a vehement desire to recouer Parma & Plaisance, & no lesse ambition to reduce to him the estate of Ferrara, yet he thought them not causes sufficient to remoue him from his pleasures, nor to reuerse the peaceable condition of things, but in his delights & security he held it better to temporize & expect oportunities and occasions: But “ right trulie is it spoken, that there is no greater enemy to great men, then too great prosperity, for “ that it takes from them all rule of themselves, it makes them full of liberty, it giues them boldnesse “ to do euill, & it breedes in them a desire & aptnesse to trouble their proper weale and benefite by “ innouations and new things.

Pope Leo is the cause of the war in Italy.

Leo being thus lifted to so high estate, suffered to be bred in him many considerations: sometimes he saw what infamy it brought to him to loose Parma & Plaisance gotten by Iulio with so great glory, and to that mood was ioyned his burning desire to aduance the action of Ferrara: sometimes he seemed to see that if he dyed without doing something of importance, the memory of his Pontificacy would remaine dishonoured: sometimes he feared least those two kings (they both being excluded out of hope to haue him on their side, and therefore lesse able to offend one another) would grow at last to contract betweene themselves some league preiudiciall tending to the ruine of the Church & the residue of Italy: sometimes he hoped (as I haue heard the Cardinall de Medicis say, who knew all his secrets) that the Frenchmen being chased out of Genet & Millan, he might the more easily expulse Cesar out of the kingdome of Naples, & so appropriate to himself the glory of the liberty of Italy, to the which his predecessor had so manifestly aspired: an enterprize which by how much lesse he thought he was able to accomplish by his proper forces, forces, by so much more did he hope, by appeasing somewhat the mind of the French king, either by the election of some Cardinall whom he would preferre, or by his readinesse to gratifie him in some other matters, to draw him to giue him succors against Cesar, as though it were a satisfacti- on to the king to see that as much was done to Cesar as to him. These were his conceptions, such were the discourses of his mind, and in these variations did he fashion the image of things: but which sooner of these causes moued him, whether one, or more, or all together, he took vnto him new impressions, & turned all his thoughts to the war, & to ioyne himselfe with one of these two Princes, to the end that being allied with the one, he might moue war in Italy against the other: & for a declaration of his readinesse to the matter, as also not to be oppressed in the meane while by either of them; whilst he negociated with them both, but more straitly and particularly with the French king: he sent into Swisserland Anth. Puccio Bishop of Pistoie, and afterwards Cardinall, to leaue and leade to the seruice of the Church sixe thousand Swissers: an armie which being deliuered to him without difficulty by the Cantons, vnder the fauour of the confederation, which since the warre of Urbino he had renewed with them, and hauing likewise got liberty of passage through the estate of Millan, was conducted vpon the lands and dominions of the Church, where he entertained them manie moneths, as well in Romagnia, as in la Marqua. Many were vncertaine to what ends he made so great & chargeable a leaue of men, & not to imploy the, seeing there was no stirre or alteration in Italy: & albeit he assured the regions & Potentacies of the same that he had armed them for his proper surety, for that he knew well that the rebels of the Church conspired some violent action against him: yet, the murmure of the people being not satisfied, for that his reasons bare smal resemblace with truth, men discoursed seuerally vpon it according to their feuerall fancies: some supposed that he called in those forces for feare of the French king, others beleued that he would imploy them against Ferrara, & some thought that he would turne the against Cesar to chase him out of the kingdome of Naples. But the practise that was secret betweene him and the French king, was, that they should with their ioynt forces invade the kingdome of Naples, vnder this condition, that Caietta and all that stood betweene the riuer of Garillan, and the confines of the Ecclesiastike state, should be for the Church, and the residue of the realme to reuert to the second sonne of France, who, vntill he came to the age of maiorty should be gouerned together with the kingdome by a Legate Apostolicall, that should lie resident at Naples. Moreouer, it was an article in the capitulation, that the king should aid him against the subiects and freeholders of the Sea Apostolicke, which was a condition affixed for the better assuring of that which the Church held already, and no lesse tending to the desire which the Pope had to get Ferrara.

In these times, and in verie good season for those practises, the French king no lesse taking the occasiō of the tumults of Spaine, the obseruing the perswasions of the Pope (which he afterwards assured by complaints) sent out an army into the kingdome of Nauarre vnder M. d'Asperot brother to Lamirech, to range that kingdome and reduce it to his ancient king, requiring at the same instant Robert de la Marche and the Duke of Guelders, to breake out & vex the confines of Flaunders. The seditions of Spaine were the cause that M. d'Asperot made an easie conquest of the kingdome of Nauarre, both being destitute of succours, and also not without a great memorie and deuotion to their originall and ancient king: for, after he had forced with his artilleries the castle of Pampeluna, he entred the frontiers of the kingdome of Catelogna, and tooke Fontarabie, turning vp euen to Logroña: of this enterprise it hapned, as oftentimes cometh to passe by the French, in humaine things, that that which men thought would haue brought preiudice & harme to Cesar, turned greatly to his seruice and benefit: for the matters of Spaine being trauelled till that time with diuerse aduentures & fortunes, were now reduced into verie great perplexities & troubles, for that on the one side, the multitude and popular fort were banded together, and on the other side many Nobles & Barons had taken armes for the seruice of Cesar: they, for the interest of their estates, feared the popular libertie, being now come to a manifest rebellion, and the rather to haue it gouerned by a head of authority, they had drawne out of the castle of Sciatina the Duke of Calabria, whose fidelity made him refuse to come out of prison, because he would not beare armes against Cesar: but such is the affection & conscience of men towards their naturall country, & such the perpetuall custome of country-men when they see inuasions made by forraigne forces, that ciuill quarrels cannot take from them the feeling of common and forraigne dangers: for when the Spaniards saw the armies of Fraunce make slaughter and hostility vpon their countrey, notwithstanding they had suffered the losse of the realme of Nauarre, being a member of their dominions, by the vniing which the king Catholike made, they felt themselves so touched in conscience and affection, that partly for those regards, and partly for a happie encounter which the armie of Cesar had made, they became men conuerted and returned to the obedience of their king, leauing suppressed and forgotten, their domesticall hatreds and contentions.

After this easie conquest of the realme of Nauarre, there hapned to the king a farre greater successe if he could haue vsed the occasion: for, as both he and Cesar had their Embassadors with the Swissers, soliciting seuerally that nation to stand with them, so the Cantons did not onely refuse (contrarie to the opinion of many, and against the hope that was giuen) the friendship & offers of Cesar, but also embraced the alliance of the French king, binding themselves to furnish for his seruice so many footmen as he would, and for what enterprize it pleased him, and not to suffer anie leaues of souldiers for anie other against him. There rested the execution of the capitulation made at Rome betweene the Pope and the king, who, when he was required to ratifie it, began to temporize and dwell in suspence, being aduertised by many, that there was no expectation of suretie in the Pope, in whom was no opinion of fidelity and confidence, & who, since he was possessed of the dignity and place of Pope, had alwayes made declaration of small friendship towards the French: that it was to be feared that his doings were intangled with suttletie and deceit, since there was no congruency of reason that the Pope should desire the diuoluing of the realme of Naples into his power, or to the inheritance of his son, for that by how much more iurisdiction the French should haue in the kingdome of Naples and the Duchy of Millan, by so much lesse would be the surety of the Pope amid a power so mighty and redoubted: that so great a shew of amitie breaking out vpon such a sodaine, could not be without mysterie: that the tokens of deceit that appeared, warned him to take heed, that vnder the practise to conquer the kingdome of Naples, he fell not into the snares laid for him to loose the Duchy of Millan: for that to send his army into Naples, was none other thing then to giue power and oportunitie to the Pope with his fixe thousand Swissers to breake it, and put all to extreame hazard, which being ouerthrowne, there remained no defence for the Duchie of Millan: an estate which (as he knew) the Pope had failed to take from him by armes and warre, so it was to be feared that he would assay to depriue him of it by treacherie and deceit. These reasons so wrought with the king, that they made him doubtfull to ratifie the capitulation, and therefore expecting haply an answer of some other practises, he sent no dispatch of the ratification to Rome, but left the Popes Embassadors in suspence. But for that the Pope either in deed (notwithstanding his shewes & semblances) had his mind estranged from the king, or (for that all the tearmes and dates to answer being past) he began to suspect a truth: or haply for that he feared least the king would discequer to Cesar his practises, and so some alliance to passe betweene them to his preiudice: or it might be, he was pushed on by a yehement ambition to recouer Parma and Plaisance, and to do some thing worthie of memorie: or lastly, perhaps he might take to displeasure the insolencie of Monsieur de Lamirech and the Bishop of Tarba his minister, who contemning his commandements in the estate of Millan, and reiecting some Ecclesiasticall edicts, disdained him with verie proud and insolent words: for some of these causes he determined to enter league against the French king with Cesar, who also for his part, being kindled for the warre of Nauarre, and pushed on by many of the exiles of Millan, & lastly, induced by some of his counsell desiring to embase the greatnesse of M. de Cheures, who had alwayes perswaded him not to separate himselfe from the French king, resolved to ioyne confederation with the Pope against the king: which he was thought to hasten the more, vnder a hope that with the Popes authority & his owne, he should either diminish or dissolue the alliance made with the Swissers, afore it were confirmed by bonds and other offices of gratifications. Moreouer, the Pope tooke greater occasion of confidence in this, that Cesar, who had heard Martin Luther in the Parliament of Wormes, whither he was come vnder his safeconduct, and hauing passed him to be examined by many Diuines, who made report that his doctrine was erroneous & dangerous for Christendome, had banished him to gratifie the Pope: onely at last there was contracted between Cesar & the Pope a confederatiō for their cōmon defence, including also the family of Medicis & the estate of Florence: this league was resolved without the priuity of M. de Cheures, who til that time had borne with him right great place & authority, & died almost euē at the same time.

time. There were all these additions to the contract, that they should raise war against the state of Millan at such time and in such maner, as should be resolved vpon betweene them; and if it were subdued and conquered, then Parma and Plaisance to reuert to the Church vnder the same rights and titles with the which it had holden them before: That Francis Sforce, who had bene chased out of Millan and remained then at Trent, should be eftsoones restored to the possession of that state, as hauing right thereunto by the inuestiture of his father, and by the renuntiation of his brother: That the confederates should be bound to defend him in his title: That the Duchie of Millan should vse no other Saltes nor Saltpits then those of Cernaia: That it should not onely be lawfull to the Pope to proceede against his subiects and freeholders, but also Cesar to be bound (after the conquest of Millan) to ioyne with him against them, and namely for the recouerie of Ferrara. The tribute of the Realme of Naples was increased, and there was promised to the Cardinall of Medicis a pension of ten thousand duckats out of the Archbishoprike of Toledo, which was newly voyde: and to Alexander de Medicis bastard son to Lawrence and lately Duke of Vrbis, was promised an estate in the dominion of Naples of ten thousand duckats of reuenue.

For the more plaine information and opening of these things, it is not out of purpose to set downe in brieft what were the rights that Cesar pretended the Empire to haue vpon the Duchy of Millan in those times. The Lawiers of the Empire alleaged, that the ancient rights of the Dukes of Orleance were of no consideration, for that whatsoeuer had bene accorded touching the succession of Madame Valentina, was not confirmed with the authority Imperiall: and that for the present, that Duchy appertained immediatly to the Empire, because the inuestiture made to Lodowike Sforce for him and his sonnes, was reuoked by Maximilian graundfather to Charles, and that with so many and ample claufes that the reuocation had iudicially his effect to the preiudice chiefly of his sons, who neuer possessing it, their right and title was in hope, & not in effect. Therefore the inuestiture was available that was made to king Lewis, for him and for his daughter Clawda, in case she were married to Charles, and with condition that the mariage not going forward without that there were fault in Charles, it should be nothing, and that the Duchy of Millan should passe directly to Charles, who in that case was inuested of it in the presence of his father Philip: That it followed thereupon that the second inuestiture made to the same king Lewis, for him and for the same Lady Clawda, and for Francis Lord of Angoulesme, was nothing worth, as being made to the preiudice of Charles then an infant and vnder the tutorship of Maximilian: so that as the king then raigning could make no foundation of that, so he could lesse alleage interest in that Duchy by new rights or titles, for that much lesse that he had obtained inuestiture from the Emperour, seeing he had not so much as demanded it, as also it was manifest, that the session made to him by Maximilian at such time as he rendred to him the Castell of Millan, could not helpe him: for that a chiefe aliened of proper authority, reuerteth immediatly to the supreme Lord: And lastly, for that Maximilian Sforce, notwithstanding he had bene admitted by the consent of the Emperour, and dying in that estate without hauing euer receiued the inuestiture, he could not transport to another the rights that appertained not to himselfe. Thus as soone as the confederation was passed betweene the Pope and Cesar against the French king, and that as secretly as might be, they consulted together (asore they entred publicly into armes) to proceede by ambulches and practises, and by the meane of the exiles, to assaile at one time by sudden inuasion, the Duchy of Millan and Genes. In which counsell it was set downe, that Cesars gallies which were at Naples, and the Popes gallies armed with two thousand Spanish footemen, should fall at vnwares into the port of Genes, and hauing with them Jerome Adorno, by whose authority and traine of followers, those of the riuers which were of their faction drawing into commotion, they hoped that that Citie would easily fall into tumult. On the other side Francis Sforce and Jerome Moron, who was with him at Trent with many of the best sort of the exiles, had consulted that the French bands that were within Parma, Plaisance, and Cremona, should be charged at vnwares: that the like inuasion should be made at Millan by Manfrey Paluorin and Matto de Brinzi a chiefe commaunder in those mountaines, who should leade thither by the lake of Coma certaine Launceknights, and so to execute that city, where they were assured to haue secret intelligence. Moreouer if those enterprises tooke good successe, or any of the being of most importance, then the exiles of Millan who were many Gentlemen, and they to be conueyed secretly to Reggia where should meete them Ieronimo Moron at the day appointed, should draw into a strength, and rise to enter into that state, leuying with all possible diligence a campe of three thousand footemen: for the better effect and expedition of those actions, the Pope sent to Francis Guiccardin an ancient gouernour of Modena and Reggia, ten thousand duckats, to be deuiered ouer to Moron for the entertaining of footmen to be ready vpon the euent of things, to whom Guiccardin was commanded to shew fauour, but secretly and in such maner, that the French king should take no occasion either to complaine of the actions of his Officers; or euill interpret the Pope: But so vnperfect are the counsels and deuises of man, and so naturally subiect to a prouidence infallible and immutable, that there is left no certainty of their resolutions, and lesse surety in their mortall doings, themselves being no other thing then bodies compounded of imperfection, error and frailty: not one of these deuises succeded either to purpose or to profit: for, the army by sea that went to Genes, which was compounded of seuen gallies, foure Brigantins, and certaine ships of other nature, made a vaine shew afore the port, for that Duke Fregosa, doubting belike of their comming, had well manned and refurnished the towne: insonmuch as they crossed sayle and retired into the riuer of Leuant, after they found no mutinies nor any other thing well disposed on their behalfe. And touching Lombardy, many of the exiles hauing speciall priuity with the negociation there, together with the voyce that Ierom Moron was to come to Reggia, Federik de Bossolo hauing intelligence of it, went to Millan to giue signification to M. d'Escud, supplying the place of his brother who a litle before was gone into Fraunce. By reason of these aduertisements, he mustered and drew together the bands of men at armes that lay dispersed in diuerse places, and after he had giuen order that Federik should leade thither a thousand footemen of his subiects, he went suddenly to Parma with foure hundred launces. In the way he was from time to time made more certaine of those things which Federik had reported to him, the rather for that the banished men, not obseruing the order that was giuen them to make their assemblies secret, were in an open force withdrawne to Reggia: They required in all places bands of soldiers, & gaue out in publike & manifest rumors, that they would immediatly attempt some new enterprise: in whose example & maner of proceeding, continued Ierom Moron that came after them, pushed on perhaps with this reason, that by how much they did disclose themselves and their enterprise, by so much would it breede hatred & enmity betweene the Pope and the French king. But the vanity of these deuises and enterprises declared it selfe manifestly to all men: and yet M. d'Escud being arriued at Parma, determined the morning following (a day solemne for the natiuity of S. Iohn Baptisf) to present himselfe afore the gates of Reggia: he hoped in this maner of action to find occasiō to take either all or part of the exiles, and that either as they fled out of the towne through the feare and astonishment of his comming, or else there being no strength of forraine souldiers, the feare of the gouernour (a personage estranged from the profession of war) would put them prisoners into his hands: or lastly he hoped that vnder the terror which the townsmen would haue of his forces and sudden comming, the occasion & fauor of the time would giue him leaue to enter without difficulty. The gouernour made some doubt of the matter, and albeit (the assailing of Genes being not yet come to his knowledge (he thought it not likely, that M. d'Escud would giue beginning to the war without the commandement of his king, & enter in warlike maner vpon the lands of the Pope: yet looking into the ordinary furies and importunities of the french nation, as also to be somewhat armed against a mischiefe so apparantly threatned, he sent out his present directions to Guido Rangon lying vpon the confines of Modena, to come the same night to Reggia, giuing the like order that those bands of footmen leuiued by Moron, & lodged nearest that place, should likewise march thither. And lastly his precepts went out to the people of the towne, in whom he knew was no property of affection to the French name, that at the sounding of the great bell, they should be at the gard of the gates, where euery one should receiue his charge. The morning following M. d'Escud arriued with foure hundred launces, Federike de Bossolo marching a mile behind him with a thousand footmen. As soone as M. d'Escud approached the towne, he sent to the gouernour a Capitaine of his, called M. Bonnenall, to tell him that he would speake with him: by whom it was agreed & assigned, that Escud should come to the posterne that entreth vpon the raueline of the gate that looketh towards Parma, where the gouernour would meete him, either one assuring other of their faith. M. d'Escud according to the appointment came neare the gate accompanied with many Gentlemē of his traine, & the gouernour issuing out of the wicket, they began to comune together:

The one complained, that contrary to the articles of confederation, there was receiued & releued in the towne of the Church, the exiles & banished peoples which were drawne into companies & bands, to trouble the states of the king: The other expressed a grieffe & vnkindnesse, that there was made sudden inuasion in manifest array of warre and force vpon the lands of the Church. But as they stood debating those complaints, certaine of the inhabitants (contrary to the order set downe) opened suddenly one of the gates, to let in a cart loden with meale: when M. Bonnenall (standing right against the gate (for the traine of Escud disperfed about the wals enuironed a great part of it) advanced with certaine men at armes to enter the gate: but he was repulſed, and the gate ſhut vpon him with a cry, which piercing euen to the place where Monsieur Escud and the gouernour conſulted together, it was the cauſe that they of the towne and certaine of the exiles (ſtanding by troupes vpon the wals of the Arch, gaue the bullet to ſuch as ſtood neare to Monsieur d'Escud, and in that violence ſo hurt Alexander Trinnice, that he died of the wounds within ten dayes, although he had not deſerued the ſtroke of ſuch a calamitie, for that he had diſſwaded the enterpriſe of Reggia. The terror of this ſudden violence made the others ſeeke ſafety by flying, and no other thing preſerued Monsieur d'Escud, but a feare that he had who aymed and leuelled at him, leaſt he ſhould ſtrike the Gouernour. This aſtoniſhed not a little Monsieur d'Escud, who tooke occaſion of the violence, to complaine of infidelitie and faith breaking, and according to the face of his perill, not knowing what reſolution to take, whether to tary or to flie, the Gouernour tooke him by the hand, and perſwading him to follow him vpon his faith, he led him vpon the Arch, being accompanied with none other of his traine then Monsieur la Motte, a Gentleman of Fraunce. It was a thing wonderfull that all the bands of men at armes vnderſtanding that Monsieur d'Escud was entred within the gate, were poſſeſſed forthwith with an opinion that he was made priſoner; a concept which made them fall to flying with ſuch generall feare & confuſion, that many of them caſt away their launces, reſuſing (to make the more light & eaſie to flye) the weapons which they brought to defend their liues: ſuch a matter is feare, that oftentimes it makes men forſake the things that they ought moſt to employ for their ſafety. In this confuſed feare, there were few that either looked backe, or once taried for Monsieur d'Escud, who finding after long reaſoning, that the diſorder grew vpon his owne people, was immediately diſmiſſed of the Gouernour, in whom was no intention to keepe him retained, both for not deſiling his faith giuen, and alſo to obſerue the commiſſions he had of the Pope to make no violent demonſtration againſt the king: as alſo in regard that the effect of the rebelling of the eſtate of Millan did not follow, as many beleued at that time: for, notwithstanding the troupes of men at armes fell all to flying, yet ſeeing no men purſued the chaſe for that there were then within Reggia very few horſemen, and withall meeting vpon the limits and confines of the countrey of Reggia with Federike Boſſolo who halted on with his regiments of a thouſand footmen, they ſtayed and drew theſelues eſſeſſoon into order. Neither had the feare continued that was begun at Parma and at Millan by the firſt rumors that came, that Escud was holden priſoner, and the men at armes broken, notwithstanding it had bene knowne that the bands of men at armes had bin whole, for that neither was there neare at hand any army or force to make any ſtirre, and withall many other Captaines of men at armes were there remaining. But aſſoone as M. d'Escud had reaſſembled his companies of horſemen and footmen, he retired to Coriague a village in the countrey of Reggia not fixe miles from the City: from thence within certaine dayes after, he withdrew to the confines of Parma on the other ſide the riuer of Lenzo, and ſent la Motte to the Pope to tell him what moued him to go to Reggia, and withall to ſolicite him in vertue of the capitulations which were betweene the French king and him, to expulſe out of the dominions of the Church, ſuch as were holden rebels againſt the king.

About this time there happened at Millan a matter of no leſſe wonder then feare, which brought to the Frenchmen no ſmall aſtoniſhment, as if the heauens by manifold ſignes had giuen them a forewarning of their calamities to come. For, vpon the day that is ſolemnely conſecrated to the memory of the death of the Prince of Apoſtles, the Sunne being ſet, and the aire and firmament cleare, there fell downe from the vppermoſt regiments as it were a fire, & light afore the gate of the Caſtle, whither were brought many barrells of gunpowder drawne out of the Caſtle to be ſent to certaine places offeruice. This flaſh or fiery lightning embraced by and by the powder, with a horrible noyſe, and by the violence of it the faire tower of marble builded ouer the gate and bearing vpon his top a goodly clocke, was cast downe and rased from the top to the foundation: in which furie did communicate also the wals and chambers of the Castell with other buildings adioyning the tower: yea in one instant all the whole bodie of the Castell, together with the vniuersall City of Millan trembled and shaked with the furie of a tempest, which blew into the ayre from sundry places many huge and great stones, falling to the hurt of many persons. And as in a generall calamity euery one hath his fortune, so there were many that being happie to escape the fall of the huge stones, were made wretched by the ruines of the wals, vnder the which they were smothered and rammed to death; with which ruines, the Castell Greene was so spred and couered, that it was a terror to behold such an alteration, but specially it brought astonishment euen to the most assured, to see the stones of incredible greatnesse which the fury of the tempest had cast more then 500 pases from the place. It happened in the very howr wherein the people of all sorts were gone for their recreation to take the ayre vpon the Greene, by which occasion were slaine more then fife hundred footemen of the Castle, and the Captaine of the Rocke and the Castell, together with others of principall place so amazed and desperate both in courage and counsell, that if the people would haue taken the benefite of that accident and false to armes, they might without difficulty that night haue occupied the Castell, specially so great a quantity of the wall being reuerfed.

After the Pope was aduertised how Monsieur d'Escud was come euen to the gates of Reggia, he serued his turne of that enterprife, and enforced it to the iustification of his owne actions, he complained greatly of that doing in the consistory of Cardinals, where, concealing the confederation made secretly afore with Cesar, and also the direction that both their gallies should be armed to the assailing of Genes, he declared that since Monsieur d'Escud had attempted to take Reggia, it was to be supposed that the French king bare no good mind to the sea Apostolike: he concluded that for the defence of the Church and the rights of the same, he was constrained to ioyne with Cesar, in whom had neuer bin discerned any action that was not worthy a Christian Prince, & the same expressed as well in his other operations, as in his late zeale which he published at Wormes touching the protection of religion. Therefore he made semblance, and shew to contract then, with Don Iohn Emanuel Casars Embassador, the confederation which had bin concluded afore, & for that matter he caused to be sent for to Rome, Prosper Colonne, vpon whom was determined the charge of the enterprife, and with whom they consulted in what maner and with what forces, they should enter into open war, seeing they had found no successe in ambushes and assaults sudden, like as indeede the treatie of Coma did no more happily succeed then the enterprife of Genes: for, as Manfroy Paluoyfin and M. de Brinzi were by night drawne neare the wals of Cuma with 800 footmen, as well Italians as Launceknights, hoping that Anthony de Rusquo a Citizen there would breake downe so much of the wall next ioyning to his house, as they should haue meane to enter, where, for the slender strength of Frenchmen that were there, they supposed would be offered no resistance. And after they had expected some good space of time, the gouernour of the place, assembling together all the Frenchmen, with certaine of the townsmen, whose fidelity he held most assured (& yet their numbers were lesse then they that were without) gaue the charge vpon them with a violence and suddenesse so terrible, that they brake and fell easily into flight, not without suspicion that he had corrupted the Almaine Captaines both with mony and greater promises. In the chase three barkes were sunke vpon the lake, & seuen taken: many of the generall souldiers fell into the fortune of prisoners, and amongst the chieftaines were taken Matto & Manfroy as they fled by the way of the mountaines. The Launceknights were suffered to go away freely, & the residue were led to Millan, where Manfroy & Matto were publicly quartered: They confessed in their execution, that Bar. Ferrery of Millan a man of place and authority, was consenting to the practises of Moron: vpon which accusation he was imprisoned together with his son, & so committed to the same punishment, for that he had not reuealed that Moron had induced him by secret messages, to practise innouations, and to raise enterprises against the king. About this time, the Pope knowing of what oportunitie was the estate of Mantua for the wars of Lombardy, tooke to his pay Federik Marquis of Mantua with 200 men at armes, & 200 light horsemen, and indued him with the title of Captaine Generall of the Church: but before he possessed himselfe of the entertainment of the Pope, he renounced the order of S. Michael, and returned the coller and Ensigne that the king accustomed to giue to those that were received into that order.

of Mantua for the Pope.

This was the resolution set downe at Rome betweene the Pope and Casars Embassador, touching the order and maner of proceeding in this warre, and that according to the counsell & resolutions of Prosper Colomo First, that along the frontiers of the Church, inuasio should be made with all speed possible ypon the estate of Millan, employing in that enterprise the companies of men at armes of the Pope & the Florentins; a regiment which (comprehending the bands of the Marquis of Manhua) mounted to the full number of six hundred men at armes, & to them were to be adioyned all the bands of men at armes which Cesar had in the realme of Naples, being almost as many as the residue: That there should be leuied six thousand footmen Italians: That the regiment of two thousand footmen Spanish which were with Adorno in the riuer of Genes should come to the army, making their assembly betweene the countrey of Modena and Reggia: That the Marquis of Pesquero should bring two thousand other footbands from Naples: That there should be leuied of the common purse of the Pope & Cesar, foure thousand Launceknights & two thousand Grisons: That there should be also ioyned to the army the two thousand Swissers which remained voluntarily in the Popes pay: for the residue of their countrey men both weary with wandring so long time without any thing doing, & also the season of their haruest drawing on, were now returned to their countrey afore M. d'Escud came to Reggia, neither could the Pope retaine them any longer, notwithstanding he had vnprofitably consumed amongst them an hundred & fiftie thousand duckats. Besides these prouisions, it was determined that with the authority of the Pope and Cesar, there should be instance made to the Swisser Cantons, both to aduance six thousand footmen according to the tenor of the contract which the Pope had made with them, & also to refuse to minister any succors of mē to the French king: and the better to draw them to his demaund, the Pope alleaged that the confederation which he had made with thē, was afore that which they had contracted with the French king. If these demands were obtained, it was resolved in the generall order & resolution of the war, that the Duchy of Millan should be inuaded on that side towards Coma, in which quarter was hope that there would be made some insurrection, both for the great multitude of the banished men being the most part of honourable houses, & also for that the ancient reuerence & affection which the people were wont to beare to the name of king Louis, was converted into hatred, & that not little thereto was, that the mē at armes ordinary for the gard of that estate, liued in a great & vnbridled liberty, the rather for that they were ill payd through the ill order the king vsed in his affaires, whereat partly by necessity & partly by will, he had couenanted to allow huge expences. The Gouernors rising more insolent and haughty by the negligence of the king, did not minister that true & liuely iustice which they were wont to execute with integrity & roundnesse in the time of the late king, who bearing a deare affection to the Duchy of Millan, had alwayes a particular care & regard to the interests of the people and subiects there. This was also one thing that went hard with them, that they were constrained according to the custome of Fraunce, to lodge continually in their houses: the officers & souldiers of the French, which albeit was nothing of their expences & charges, yet the trouble being perpetuall & generall, it was so much the more intollerable and grievous. And albeit it was a yoke which they bare during the time of the late king, who enforcing the example of Paris, would neuer exempt the subiectes of Millan, yet the discommodity drawing with it the other evils that we haue spoken of, it seemed to them for the present very heauy and irkesome. To this also was added the common nature of the people, alwayes desirous of new things, together with a vehement thirst and inclination which mortall men haue to deliuer themselves from perplexities present, not considering what will be the cuent and afterchance of things.

The rumor of this warre set downe by the Pope and Cesar with so mighty preparations, gaue warning to the French king to looke to the defending of Millan with prouisions no lesse resolute and well appointed: wherein, not to delay the danger that was so imminent and manifest, Monsieur Lautrech who was ypon his way to go to the Court for certaine his particular affaires, was estsoones readiourned and remaunded to returne to Millan. And albeit, doubting of the kings variety and negligence, and inconstancy of such as gouerned, he refused the iourney, vnlesse they first deliuered him in prest three hundred thousand duckats, which he assured to be no more then necessary for the defence of that state: yet being no lesse ouerruled with the importunities of the king and his mother, then beguiled with the promises and oathes of such as had the charge of his treasure, assuring him that his person and the money he demanded, should arrive there with one speede: he embraced the journey and returned thither with great diligence, putting carefully in order all things necessary for the defence. This was the order which he set downe vnto the king. That to the kings men at armes which were then in Lombardy, should be ioyned the six hundred men at armes, and six thousand footmen, which the Venetians were bound to sende to the kings seruice, whom they offered to aduance speedily, making their men at armes to march euery by the countrey of Verona and Bressia: That there should be leuied ten thousand Swissers, which they held for certaine would not be denied by vertue & tenor of the new confederation: That they should cause to passe into Italy six thousand aduenturers, and to adioyne to the whole army certaine bands of Italian footemen. With these forces he hoped without great danger to be able to aduenture the fortune of a battell, or being too weake for such an action, he should at least sufficiently strengthen his places with garrisons of men; and so temporise vpon the depending of them, that both the enemies in time would draw to be wearie: the one by his naturall prodigality and huge expenses disbursed in the warre of Vrbis, was drayned of all money and treasure, and for the other he stood so abridged and restrained at that time, that the tribute and reuenues which he leuied of his kingdomes and dominions, could not suffice to furnish for any long season the expenses of such a war. This was also considered, that Alfonso d'Este dispayring of his proper estates, if the victory fell to the Pope, would either rise to recouer that which he had lost, or at least standing vpon his readinesse, would so hold the Pope in suspition, that of necessity he should employ many bands of souldiers for the gard of townes and places adioyning his confines and limits. These were the counsels and preparations of both parts, the king neuerthelesse labouring by all his meanes (but in vaine) to appease the Pope.

At that time Prosper Colonne was at Bologna, and from thence not tarying for the regiments that were to come from the kingdome of Naples, nor the bands of Launceknights, after he had mustred his other companies, and left sufficient garrisons within Modena, Reggia, Bologna, Ravenna, and Imola, for feare of the Duke of Ferrara, he marched and encamped vpon the riuer of Lenza within five miles of Parma: he nourished himselfe with a full hope that the Frenchmen could draw no strength of footmen from the Swissers, and that as well for that disappointment as for the ill disposition of the people, he supposed they would rather abandon then defend the Duchy of Millan: but it hapned otherwise: for the Cantons, notwithstanding the vehement labour to the contrary made by the Cardinall of Sion and the Embassadors of the Pope and Cesar, determined to deliuer to the king, bands of men such as they were bound to leuie by the last conventions. And whilest those leuies were in preparing, George Sopressan was descended to Millan with foure thousand footmen Valesiens: by reason of which succour, Monsieur Lamirech desirous to defend Parma, sent thither Monsieur d'Escud his brother with foure hundred launces and five thousand Italian footemen, ouer whom Federike Bossolo was Captaine. Moreouer it was vnderstood that the Venetians made their musters at Poniquo to send speedily to the ayde of the French king, and also that the Duke of Ferrara leuied certaine regiments of footemen. By reason of these preparations, Prosper seeing in what neede he stood of greater forces, kept himselfe incamped seuen dayes in that place, during which time, there ioyned to the army foure hundred Spanish launces led by Anthony de Lema, and drawne out of the kingdome of Naples: there came also to the army the Marquis of Mantua with part of his regiments, and yet for his coming being Captaine Generall of all the souldiers of the Church, was nothing altered the authority of Prosper Colonne; in whose person according to the Popes will and Casars, rested the Government of the whole army, but without any supreme title, for that to Francis Guicciardin was giuen soueraighe and absolute power to command ouer the whole regiments of the Church, and namely ouer the Marquis of Mantua, & did beare this title, Generall commander ouer the army; a place which he exercised with a right great authority, far contrary to the custome of the generall commanders before. After this, Prosper led the army to S. Lazaro within a mile of Parma, taking the way that goeth to Reggia: there he determined to passe no further till the Marquis of Pesquero were come, who was then vehemently expected to march from Naples with three hundred Launces and two thousand Spanish footemen: he looked also to receiue there the regiments of Launceknights that were to come: and so long as the army remained there, there were no other violences done vpon the countrey men of Parma, then by common industrie, to turne the streames and course of waters, and by breaking downe their milles, to take from them all meane and vse of finding. There was great expectation when & what way the Launceknights would come; and to hinder their passing, the Venetians at the instance of the French, sent part of their regiments vpon the territories of Verona: for it was knowne by relation, that being come to Isprach, they sought to receiue at Trent their first moneths pay, and required that there might be sent to meete them, certaine numbers of horsemen, to the end that being once descended to Montbaldo, they might with more suretie passe on with their bands: whereupon Prosper Colono had dispatched to Mantua two hundred light horsemen, to the end that ioyning with two thousand footemen commaunded by the countrey of Mantua, they might aduaunce and march together with the artilleries of the Marquis, who (to be the more acceptable to the Pope and Cesar) proceeded in all things as in his owne action, and not in the condition of one mercenarie or taking their pay. But it was a matter of farre greater difficultie to make payment of the intertainments of the Launceknights at Trent, for that the Pope did not onely make prouision of his part, but also disbursed Cesars portion; neither could the money haue passage ouer the lands of the Venetians but with great difficultie and perill: in so much as the Launceknights hearing what impediments the Venetians would obiect against their comming, required for their suretie greater forces, and varied at the same time touching the passage of the mountaine and the way, notwithstanding that the Marquis of Pesquero turned his companies vpon the partes of Mantua, and was at that time arriued vpon the lands of Modena, and had sent to him from the campe two hundred men at armes and three hundred Spanish footemen. At last the Launceknights hauing no deuotion nor patience to attend the time they had set downe and signified, sent a new aduertisement that they would estoones cut off and lessen fise dayes, with this resolution, that they would not expect the horsemen more then one day at the foot of Montbaldo, and if they came not, they would returne backe againe. At which time the Marquis of Pesquero being not able to be there to hold appointment, they were constrained to send fro the campe in great diligence, Guido Rangon & Lewis Gonsaquo, which neuerthelesse serued to no purpose, for that (as Prosper did alwayes warrant and assure) the Venetians were not able to stop the passage to fixe thousand footemen (that being their number aswell Launceknights as Grisons) a force able to haue encountered the bands of horsemen, and for the Italian footemen, they had no courage to oppose against them. For which reason, and also for that the Senat (to whom was alwayes hatefull that the war should be managed vpon their proper estate) sought to satisfie the Frenchmen more with demonstrations then with effectes, they caused to retire towards Verona all their bands and regiments the day before the Launceknights should passe. By which occasion they found libertie of passage and went to Valegge without any impediment, and so the day after they drew vpon the confines of Mantua: and assoone as the Marquis of Pesquero was come to the campe, the armie that had remained three dayes at S. Lazaro, marched the day following to S. Martin, where did ioyn with them the same day the footemen of the Launceknights and Grisons.

Thus the forces ordained for this warre, reduced and drawne into one armie, the Captaines The Captaines of the League take counsell together. began to consult what was to be done: some gaue counsell to besiege Parma, both for that it was the first and chiefe towne of the frontier, and also that it was no suretie to leaue it behind for the armie that was to come on, in regard of the incommodities of victuals and conduct of money and other prouisions that might be necessarie, and much lesse was it profitable for the townes that should remaine betweene Parma and Bologna. They alledged, that the footmen that were within Parma were bodies of no valour, both because they were leauied in hast and at randon, and also they made continuall disorders, stealing to the campe by stealth, no lesse for the difficultie and straitnesse of their payes, then for want of meale and prouision for foode: that the circuite of the towne was great, and the people ill disposed, who though they were embased of courage, would yet take heart when they saw the armie neare the wals: so that exerceuting batterie vpon the Citie in many places, it would be heard for the Frenchmen at one time both to resist the enemy without, and also keepe gard vpon the people that were within. Others reasoned of the contrarie, that the Citie was well fortified, that it was strong in bands of men, that touching the footemen that wandred fro them, they were people vnprofitable, vnapt, & cowardly, but the bodies bearing abilitie, experience, & disposition to the war remained there, together with many bands of the French souldiers, all resolutely prepared to defend their life. Lastly, that without this good suretie and prouision, it stood not with the experience and conduct of M. d'Escaud, Federike de Bossolo, and other right braue and worthy Captaines, to suffer themselves to be environed: That it was well knowen (for that of late time the maner of warrefaring and to keepe and defend a place was chaunged) what difficulties were in the taking of townes: And that it belongeth to them to consider thoroughly, in what degree of reputation the armie should stand, if they could accomplish the first enterprize: That as they held it necessarie to plant before Parma their artilleries in two seuerall places, so they had to looke whether the campe were furnished with artilleries and other prouisions fit for the action: That such a quantitie of artilleries could not be drawn thither without the losse of certaine dayes, which (besides the consuming of too much time before) would be an intermission preiudiciall, for that in such respite the Venetian companies and the most part of the Swissers would be ioyned with Monsieur de Lawtrech, who was dayly expected at Cremona: That one part of the regiment of Swissers was already arriued, & the forerunners of the French army were neare at hand: That whilest the armie was intangled with the siege of Parma, it would bring no small preiudice if Monsieur de Lawtrech came and planted his campe afore some place adioyning: And as it would be a hard matter to force him to fight, so he might and would easily vex the scouts of the forragers, & giue impediments to the victuals which dayly were brought from Reggia, and they already in diuerse sortes distressed by such as were within Parma: That it were a better counsell to make prouision of victuals for certaine dayes, and leauing Parma behind, to proceede to surprise Plaisance, a Citie of farre greater circuite, and of lesse strength and garrison of souldiers, the place voyde of fortifications and artilleries, and the people of the same disposition with them of Parma: That these reasons remoued all doubt, that making their approaches, they should forthwith carie it, wherein Prosper Colommo being of the same aduise and counsell, assured the residue that he knew a place which in no sort could be possible to hinder their entring, being the same by the which Frauncis Sforce at that time Captaine ouer the peoples of Millan, made his victorious entrie against the Venetians, who had occupied it after the death of Philp Maria Viscount: That Plaisance was a Citie wonderfully abounding with great quantities of victuals, and stood so apt to assaile Millan, that the French men would be constrained to retire thither most of their forces, by which meane the Cities adioyning to Parma should stand in no estate of daunger. Lastly Prosper held himselfe assured, that passing the riuer of Paw onely with light horsemen, and so marching with diligence to Millan, that Citie would draw into tumult hearing of the rumour of his name: Such was his opinion afore he parted from Eclognia, and in that regard, not thinking it needefull to stay about the taking of any particular place, he would not haue a plentifull prouision of artillerie nor munitions.

In this varietie of counsels and opinions, it was determined by such as had authoritie to deliberate and resolute, that assoone as sufficient prouision might be made of meale and bread to nourish the armie for foure dayes, a regiment of five hundred men at armes, one part of the light horsemen, the regiments of Spanish footemen, and fiftene hundred footemen Italians, should march with great speede towards Plaisance, and the residue of the armie to come after, which could not march but with slow paze, by reason of the artilleries, victuals, and many other impediments following ordinarily a campe. And it was assuredly beleueed, that vpon the arriuall of the first companies, either the Citie would rise for the Church, or at least they should be a reasonable let for the entring of succours, and so vpon the comming of the residue & full force of the armie, they made no doubt to carie it. But it hapned the day before that the army should remoue, that certaine troupes of French horsemen hauing passed the riuer of Paw, ranne vp euen as farre as Bossetto: a matter which made a brute that the whole French army was come ouer Paw, and therefore that accident breaking the deliberatiō that had bin made, the departing of the bands was deferred vntill the certainty & truth were knowen, for the discouery whereof they dispatched Ioh. Medicis Captaine of the Popes light horsemen with a troupe of foure hundred horses. But that which most troubled this deuise & the executiō of it, was the ambitiō & controuersie that fell betweene Prosper & the Marquis of Pesquero, betweene who was no great agreemēt before. Prosper contended to leade the vauward & principall part of the army, against who the Marquis alledged that it was not reasonable that the regiments of Spanish footemen ouer who he was Captaine general, should go to any expedition without him. In regard of which ambition and ieaousie of the chiefe Captaines, daungerous most comonly for the affaires of Princes, notwithstanding it was knowen within few houres after, that the bands of Frenchmen were estsoones returned beyond Paw, and that

Monsieur

Monsieur de Lamirech stirred not, yet the first resolution was not followed. But what by the diversitie of opinions and for the naturall slownesse of Prosper, things had proceeded in greater delays and longnesse, if the Popes Agent had not stept in with them, and declared with discourte full of reasons and efficacie, how much and how iustly the Pope might take offence that they had temporised so long: wherein they could not in any reasonable sort excuse themselves towards the holinesse of the delays and respites they had vsed till then, first in expecting the Spaniards, and then in tarying for the Launceknights: vpon whose admonition they drew all to a present resolution (but more in maner of tumult, then by maturitie of counsell) to plant the campe before Parma, wherein euen such as the day before had assured the contrarie, began to haue a wonderfull hope of the victorie, the rather for that the numbers and bodies of footemen ceased not to issue out of Parma for want of money and food: onely it was reasonable to make some succour for certaine dayes, both to tary for two other Cannons that were expected from Bologna, and to make prouision of many other things necessarie for the executing of townes with artillerie; matters which Prosper had refused before. This, whether it may be called negligence, or mutation of counsell, brought no litle preiudice to the state of the enterprise, for that by how much more time was wasted in temporising, or in that propertie of controuersie, by so much more leasure and respite was giuen to Monsieur de Lamirech to assemble his companies which he expected out of Fraunce, from the Venetians and from the Swissers: so greatly doth it import wise Captaines, remembring how necessarie it is in warres to chaunge counsels according to the variety of accidents that happen, to accommodate in the beginning all prouisions for all accidents, and for all counsels. In this meane while, the armie remaining idle, there was executed nothing touching the seruice of Parma, but certaine very light skirmishes: neuerthelesse the third day after the campe was reduced to S. Martin, the armie passing beyond the riuer of Parma, was lodged vpon the way of Rome in the suburbs of the gate that leadeth to Plaisance called S. Crosse; which suburbs Monsieur d'Escud had burned the day before, hauing doubt of their comming.

The towne of Parma is deuided by a riuer that beareth the name of it, whose streame and channell is neither so deepe nor violent, but it may be alwayes passed by foord, sauing in seasons waterie and raynie: the lesser part of the towne, peopled by men of base condition, and yet containing the third part of the whole, called by the inhabitants Codipont, is situated on that side towards Plaisance. The Captaines made choise of this place, to be the more apt and ready to stop the entrie of succours into Parma, but much more for that on that part the wall was weake, and bare such situation that it could not beate the campe in flanke. The Marquis, who the day before went with certaine other Captaines to take knowledge and view of the place, made his report the same day that the batterie might easily be begun: but because it was necessarie (the better to remouetheir defences) to batter first a tower vpon the top of the gate, giuing no small strength to the wall, all the day was wasted in that action and a great Culuerine broken in the execution. The night following, the artillerie was planted against the wall vpon the left hand of the gate to such as entred, their purpose being to do the like on the right hand, and to leaue the gate in the midst. The reason was, for that hauing no conueniencie to bestow the artilleries in two places separate, for that there were as yet brought to the campe no more then sixe Cannons, and two great Culuerines, it seemed that by constraining the defendants to be amuled at that defence for a long space, it would worke all one effect: but that deuise was not put in execution, for that there was on that side vpon the compasse of the trench that environeth the wals, a rising or mount, so high, that vnlesse it were either made plaine or layd open (a matter vnpossible in so short time) it would giue great impediment to the artillerie to batter the wall. The wall, for that it was old and weake, made no great resistance to the artilleries, which hauing easily made two sufficient breaches, the Captaines spake of giuing the assault the same day, notwithstanding without any firme or assured resolution: onely the Marquis, who with his bandes of Spaniards had the whole charge of the batterie, sent certaine companies of footemen to discover the breach, and to disclose if they could, what fortifications they had within: who being mounted vpon the wall, began to make showts and signes to the armie to approach and enter; in so much that the footebandes of Spaniards and Italians ranne to the wall more by heapes and troupes then by order. But by that time they were approached and began to climbe the breach, vpon the which was slaine Ierome Guicciardin leader of the footmen, the Captaines ranne thither with the Alarme, and caused them immediately to retire, doubting there could no good fruite come of that charge, being rather a feeble and weak rumult then assault well ordered. This retraite either made cold all their thoughts to the charge, or at least so serued for excuse, that that day they forbore to follow the assault in order. The day after they continued to batter the wall which stood whole in the midst of the two breaches, and also a flanke, which had bene made within vpon the tower of the gate. But for that there ranne through the armie a brute, that for the huge rampiers which the French had made, it would be hard to carie it with a simple assault, the Captaines sent out to discover the batterie two footemen of both the languages, who, either by feare, or by their little diligence, or perhaps by subornation (as was supposed) brought word that there remained of the wall which had bene battered to the ground, more then fise sadomes on height. They reported also that the defendants had cast a very deepe ditch, and had made so many other sortes of fortifications, that it was determined to make mines neare to the wall that was battered, and to open the wall fast by, and so with the ruines of the same, to fill the ditch that was made within, thereby to make the entrie more easie. It was also agreed, that as soone as those workes were brought to perfection, and that the artilleries of the armie were increased with two Cannons that came from Mamua, there should be made another batterie in that place, where the wall by turning makes an angle after it hath gone forthright a long space, on the right side of the gate, on which side, after the wall was cast downe, they might beare the defendants in flanke. But as they began to cast a trench on that side which had bene battered, and within few dayes after, another, the better to cast downe the wall with the working of the mines: so neuerthelesse those workes proceeded slowly, as well for that the necessarie prouisions and instruments for such actions, were not yet in the campe, because Prosper nourished endes and thoughts diuerse, as also for that the earth where they digged was hard to open, bearing a propertie of soile resisting their labour and diligence.

Whilest these things were in doing, and a generall intention not to assault the towne vntill they were fully accomplished, Monsieur de Lavirech who had bene slow to march for the long tarying of such as came to the armie, hauing now assembled the most part of his men of warre, aduanced and marched fise myles, holding alwayes along the riuier. He had in his armie fise hundred Launces, seuen thousand Swissers, foure thousand footemen brought the same day by Monsieur S. Valer out of Fraunce, and foure hundred men at armes with foure thousand footemen vnder Theodor Trinulce commaunder of the Venetian bands, and Andrew Gritti their Legate or commissarie. There followed this armie the Duke of Vrbis, and Alarke Anthoine Colonne, the one as souldier to the French King, but without title and charge, and the other following the common hope of such as were banished: he expected also a regiment of fise thousand Swissers which the Câtons had made him graunt of, they were already vpon their way, but according to their custome, they marched slowly and with many difficulties. All which forces being ioyned to his armie, he would not haue refused for the rescue of Parma, to aduenture the fortune of battell. In which regard, what in expecting such as were to come, and what in soliciting and labouring the bandes already arriued, he stayed on the way and went not far from the shores of the riuier of Paw. Onely he feared least whilest he temporised vpon those good causes, his brother might compound with the enemies, and therefore he sent to him to let him vnderstand, that the cause why he prolonged and lingered so much, was that he taried for a greater force of Swissers who were neare at hand, and without whom the regiments that were already with him made difficultie to passe Paw. Neuerthelesse he would draw neare to Parma, and would giue him a token of his comming by shooting off certaine peeces of artilleries, and so the day following he would affront the enemy and prouoke them to fight, sending out certaine troupes of his horsemen to entertaine the skirmish, to the end he might with better oportunitie issue out and ioyne with the armie; a matter which Monsieur d'Escud did chiefly sollicite, who assured him that he was not able to hold out aboue two or three dayes in that part of the towne, and not aboue two dayes more beyond the riuier, both for that the towne was large and weak, and his forces remaining not aboue two thousand footemen, for that many of them were straggled away, and also the men at armes being but three hundred, vpon whom lay the burden of the seruice, were not able to make resistance, if the towne were assaulted in many places. Thus afterwarde the same day he had promised, he accosted the enemies in the borough of Zibelle which is about twentie myles from Parma, and from thence dispatched foure hundred horsemen to runne vp euen to the tents of the enemies, who hauing brought their mines euen to the wal, and afterwards turning them and dressing them in the place where the fire should be put, Count Guido Rangon with the Italian footebandes ouer whom he was Capitaine general, began to plant the artilleries on the other side of the wall. But the Frenchmen hearing the bruit that was made in executing the mines, hauing for two houres afore abandoned the Codispont, retired in order and without noyse on the other side the water, drawing with them their artilleries: which retrace being knowen to those that were without, they entred into the Codispont the morning following at the breake of the day, some making their way by the breach, and some vled the seruice of scaling ladders. They were receiued with an vniuersall gladnesse of the Parmesans, to whom nothing could be more acceptable then to retorne vnder the dominion of the Church: but it was a ioy that drew with it a present sorrow and heauinesse, and a gladnesse that was easily conuerted into dolour and lamentations, for that they saw afore their eyes their houses sacked and spoyled, in no lesse rigour and furie then if they had bene mortall enemies. And it was not to be doubted that if certaine dayes before, the artilleries had bene planted in the same place, but the Frenchmen had in the same maner abandoned the Codispont. After their entrie, they fell to breaking open the gates which afore had bene rammed vp with no small industrie, and so the artillerie hauing passage euen to the shore of the riuer, they began to batter the wall that defendeth the other banke of the riuer: but the neare approach of the night hindered the benefite and effect of their working that way, and by the litle time they had left, it was well knowen they could do no great execution for that day. The same day Monsieur de Lawtrech came and incamped vpon the riuer of Taro within seuen myles of Parma: some supposed his comming so neare was to bid battell to the enemy, but others were of opinion, that he aduanced the shew of his armie, to the end that either he might be ready to receiue his brother and his companies if they issued out of Parma by night, being no longer able to hold out: or else to entertaine some treatie or parley with the enemy, for the better deliuerie of his brother, and his souldiers with safetie and without obligation, according to the example of Federike de Bossolo, who had begun a conference by the solicitation of the Marquis, notwithstanding he had receiued a hurt in his shoulder with a shot not many dayes before as he walked about the rampiers. But the parley was not so farre forward, as that there could be made any certaine coniecture of the will of Monsieur d'Esud. The truth was (by the experience of things that hapned afterwarde) that Monsieur de Lawtrech was not determined to fight, vnlesse the regiments of Swissers came to him: for notwithstanding he had somewhat the aduantage, both for the numbers and valour of men at armes, and also was more mightie in artillerie, yet the enemy was stronger then he in footemen, containing (according to a iust computation and account) nine thousand Launceknights and Spaniards, two thousand Swissers, and more then foure thousand Italians. Let it here be considered how often and how much vpon small accidents & moments in warres, depend things of very great consequence: for the night after the armie entred the Codispont, it hapned iust at the instant that by aduertisements comming from Modena & Bologna, they vnderstood that Alfonso d'Este issuing out of Ferrara with a hundred men at armes, two hundred light horsemen, and two thousand footemen, amongst whom were a thousand aswell Corse-kais as Italians, which Lawtrech had sent him, and with twelue peeces of artillerie, had surprised the boroughs of Finalo and S. Felix, with great feare that he would passe further. This bred no small trouble and terrour in the mindes of the Captaines, notwithstanding they had feare of such a leauie long time before, being not ignorant with what vehement instance the Frenchmen solicited him to it: and yet had they not made at Modena such a prouision as might suffice for the surerie of the Citie, for that Prosper maintaining to the vttermost the contrary opinion, would neuer consent that souldiers should be drawne out of the armie to be sent to Modena: his reason was, that either he reposed assured faith in the promises of the duke who was his right deare friend, and with whom euen vnder the Popes directions, he was interposed to sollicite some accord: or else for that he had no wil to diminish the number of his men of warre, in a time when they feared the enemy would approach: One principall reason might be also taken of his naturall disposition alwayes inclined to do things surely, which made him for the most part to desire to haue in his armie more men then the seruice needed. It may be he had other ends & considerations more secre-

and priuate to him selfe, then to be knowen of others by any coniecture or apparance : onely as soone as the aduertisements were thoroughly disclosed and vnderstood, the Captaynes assembled in counsell vpon those affaires, determined that Guido Rangon should depart for Modena with two hundred light horsemen and eight hundred footemen, which being ioyned to the sixe hundred footemen that were left there before, they thought would be a sufficient strength and garrison against the forces of Alfonso. After they had set downe this order & resolution, there remained yet certaine houres afore it was day. A litle before also there came aduertisement that Monsieur de Lawtrech was incamped the night before vpon Taro, which aduertisement was partly true and partly doubtfull, for that it contained that the Swissers were ioyned with him, and it was not knowne that those which he had then in the army, notwithstanding his infinite requestes, had made him no further promise then to come to Taro. The Captaynes, though they were not assembled for that matter, yet seeing there yet remained certaine houres of the night, and by that occasion they had no necessitie to employ themselves seuerally in other affaires, they began to reason amongst themselves rather to beguile the time then by way of counsell, into what estate things would be reduced now that Lawtrech did approach. In which discourfing it seemed the wordes and reasons of Prosper, the Marquis, and Vitelli, tended to this end : That it would be hard to take Parma, if they planted not a batterie on the other side the Citie: for that though the wall beyond the water should be executed, which they had begun to batter the day before, yet there would be a wonderfull difficultie to climbe vp from the bottome or lower part of the riuier to the banke: neither could they put that matter in practise without great daunger, for that the artilleries and shots bestowed vpon the three bridges standing vpon the same riuier, and in the houses there adioyning, would be as flankers to the perill of such as offered to climbe the banke: They reasoned that the neighbourhood of Monsieur de Lawtrech, who was to march on and incampe in some place towards Paw, though he would not attempt the fortune of the field, would be the cause that the assault could not be giuen without great daunger. Moreouer it was to be considered, that by reason of the pillage and sacke which had bene lately made of part of Parma, there were many footemen gone away laden with spoile, and the other that remained were more carefull to saue the things they had gotten, then disposed or apt to fight: That the armie could not remaine there without many difficulties, discommodities, and daungers, for that as it should be necessarie for the seruice to send out every day great troupes and bands, not onely to defend the forragers, but also for the suretie of victuals and money which came dayly, making a long circuit about the wals of Parma: so, whilst such troupes should occupy the fieldes, it might come to passe that the residue of the campe should haue to do at one time with the French men that were without, and such also as were within. They brought into discourse also, that if the Duke of Ferrara reenforced his armie with mo bandes of souldiers, they should be driuen of necessitie to leaue from the campe farre greater forces for the suretie of Modena and Reggio: yea, if he ouerranne the countrey with such bandes as he had, he might so hinder the resort of victuals that they should be driuen to breake vp and dissolue the campe; extremities which brought with them manifest apparances of most great daungers. These reasons albeit they expressed an inclination to leaue the siege, yet they were so cloaked and dissembled, that it could not be discerned that such was their counsell and intention. At last after they had occupied many reasons and long discourfes, the Marquis of Pesquero seeming to haue already comprehended the intention of the residue, sayd that he discerned well enough that there was amongst them all one opinion and counsell, but euery one seuerally respecting his particular, was content to vse silence, expecting that the mouth of another should be the authour of the thing which they conceiued in their hearts. But for my part, sayd he, depriuing my selfe of such interest and respect, I can not but pronounce in the presence of you all, that as whilst we remaine about the confines of Parma, our daungers are greater then our hopes, and our labours more then the fruites we shall reape, so to auoyd greater euils, I thinke it very necessarie we leaue and depart. Prosper iustifying the wordes of the Marquis, alleaged that he had expressed no lesse, had not the celeritie of the Marquis preuented his slownesse to speake. Vitelli confirmed the opinion of them both: but Antioch Lena well allowing of the breaking vp of the campe fro thence, made this proposition, to consider whether it were not better to seeke M. de Lawtrech and to giue the charge vpon him. Whereunto it was answered, that as it would be very hard to constrain the enemy to fight, so also to

remaine there would be a matter so much the more impossible, by how much the difficulties that were to be brought into consideration about their abiding there, would rise farre greater, seeing it was not vnlikely to come to passe, but the regiment of two thousand Swissers would follow them, both for that many dayes before they had receiued commandement from the Cantons to depart out of the Popes pay; and also it was not likely that they would be drawne or disposed to fight against an armie, wherein were so many bodies of the same language and nation. Moreouer, it could not be denied but that by reason of the sacke and pillage made the day before, it would be very hard to moue the footmen that were so disordered: so that this counsell and the reasons of it being reiected, it seemed that the opinions and willes of all the Captaines drew to this, that it were best to breake vp the Campe from before Parma. Vpon which resolution, no lesse settled then vniuersall, Prosper and the Marquis, withdrawing themselues apart from the residue, after a long conference in priuate, demaunded of the Popes Legate, what the Pope would say if they leauied the Campe. The Legate answered the Marquis with this question: Shall we not take Parma this day, according as you assured vs yesternight? To whom the Marquis replied in his Spanish language, neither this day, nor to morow, nor after to morow. The Legate said, it could not be doubted, that the Pope would be right greatly discontented with the matter, for that it would altogether depriue him of the hope of the victorie: onely he said that the point of that deliberation consisted in the truth or error of the suppositions and reasons by them set downe, for that if to surcease and abstaine, were a matter dangerous and without hope, it could not be doubted that to remaine there were great indiscretion, but if it were otherwise, to breake vp could not but bring slaunder of too great disorder. Therefore he willed them to consider with deep counsell and discretion, both the estate of the armie and importance of things, and to ballance indifferently whether was the greater, either the daunger or the hope. But Prosper and the Marquis stood continually vpon this, that all reasons and rules of warre aduised them to retire: against whom being Captaines of such name and authoritie, the Legate forbore to object any further: in so much as it was set downe the same day that the Campe should breake vp, and the artilleries should be retired from the wals, which being published through the campe, it was blamed as a resolution timorous and fearefull by all those that were not present at the counsell. And albeit it was a counsell euen then disposed to execution, yet by the murmure of the vniuersall bodie of the Campe, the Legate and Moron ioyning together, laboured to alter Prosper and retire him from his opinion: they found him not much estranged to consult againe and call a new counsell, alleaging with words and reasons so much the more worthy and commendable, by how much was great or graue the personage that spake them, that he held it no shame to chaunge counsell when he was encountred with better reasons, and therefore caused estoones to be summoned all such, as were at the first resolution. But the Marquis of Pesquero, being busie about retiring the artillery, would not heare speake of changing the first conclusion, & refused to come to counsell: inso much as the matter remaining rather confused them resolved, they proceeded to execute the first determinatiō. Thus the same day, which was the xij. since their encāping, they returned to S. Lazaro; and at the departing there wanted not much of a verie great disorder, for that the footmen Launceknights demanding so vnreasonable conditions touching their payes, that they could not be accorded, refused to followe the armie: and the old Captaines that impugned the counsell, concurring with them in that tumult, had created amongst themselues a Captaine & Author of that sedition. In which disorder it was feared least they would compound and accord with the Frenchmen: neuerthelesse the armie being already gone, and no hope that the sentence or resolution would be altered, they prepared also to depart, and followed the army. In this maner of perturbation, the army being full of feare and faction, both for so sodaine a breaking vp, and for the tumult of the Launceknights, there is no doubt, if Lamirech had aduanced and taken the occasion but he had easily put them all to flight: Such a thing is disorder, that in an army deuided, it breeds more daunger then the multitude or sword of the enemy. This sodaine discamping wonderfully afflicted the mind of the Pope, who expected from one day to another, that newes would be brought to him that his souldiers were within Parma: he seemed to be depriued of his hope contrary to all reason & order, & that he was now entred into a most deepe subiection to a heauie & intollerable charge, for that (except the men at armes & the Spanish footmē) he supported generally all the burthen & expences of the warre: but that which worse was, he was not without doubt of the Captaines Imperials, whom many others held also suspected, perswading themselves that the retiring of the Campe from before Parma proceeded not of feare, but of art and cunning, as though they had suspected that after the Pope had recovered Parma and Plaisance (nothing else appertaining to him in the estate of Millan) he would waxe wearie of the warre & the thoughts thereof, forbearing any longer to sustaine so great a charge and trauell for the interests of another: he was induced to these suspitions, both by the long tract & delay that was used to plant the campe afore Parma, and also that they had bestowed it in a place so vnapt and inconuenient, seeing the lesser part of the towne being taken, they were to deuise to take the other part with the same difficulties: lastly they proceeded in the siege slowly, and drawing things in delay, as though they meant expressly to giue time and respite to the succours of the French: and being at last in possession of one part of the towne, they cowardly left it abandoned as soone as they heard Lawtrech approached, and yet he was not stronger then they. Some there were that supposed all this action might proceed (without the priuity of Prosper) of the arte and suttletie of the Marquis of Pesquero, who as much as he could, was enuious and iealous of the glorie of Prosper: neuertheless it might be, that those sortes of men supposed the truth, who beleued that all was done with sincerity and good meaning, and that they were not pushed on with other motions then of a feare that Lawtrech was at hand, wherein they were greatly beguiled by the first aduertisements, by the which they were made to vnderstand that his armie contained farre greater forces. But it is most certaine that the French Captaines maruelled more then all the residue, being reduced into a verie small hope to be able to defend Parma, for that the Swissers, being gouerned more by their owne humours and nature, then obseruing the necessities of those that payd them their wages, were verie long in coming: which made many amongst them (not attributing to feare so sodaine a discamping) interpret rather that Prosper, a wise and experienced Captaine, knowing what disorder the sacking of cities brings vpon armies, and considering how hard it would be to restrain the souldiers from spoyling of Parma, iudged it a matter of perill to take it; the enemies being so neare. Whatsoever was the cause, M. Lawtrech after he had refurnished Parma with new bands, incamped at Fontanella, and within three dayes after he sent one part of the armie to take Roccabianqua, a borough of the territories of Parma neare to Paw, which after it had bene battered with artilleries, the borough and the Castle were rendered by Rowland Paluoin Lord of the place, himselfe hauing liberty to depart. After this the armie was dispersed betweene S. Secondo and the riuer of Taro, the better to be ready for imployment according to the proceedings of the enemies, and it was now become strong and well resolved, as well for the defence of Parma, as for that the new regiments of Swissers which were expected, were now arriued at Cremona: the same being the cause that the armie of the enemies not seeming to be insufficient surety at S. Lazaro (notwithstanding M. Lawtrech had commanded them not to stir frō thence) that they retired to the riuer of Lenza on that side towards Reggia, with intention to draw yet further off, if the Frenchmen aduanced: yea the Captaines without further tarying, had made a greater retrait, if they had not bene contained by the complaints of the Pope and the Agents of Cesar, and touched with the murmure and blame of the whole armie. This was the behauiour and disposition of both the armies for many dayes, Lawtrech notwithstanding making diuerse incursions with his horsemen and the souldiers of Parma, euen vp to Reggia by the way of the mountaine: wherein he gaue great impediments to the victuals which were brought to the enemies from Reggia, and that to the great discommendation of Prosper, who would hardly suffer his light horsemen to do seruice, and verie slowly provided for the safetie of such things, as he might haue remedied with good facilitie. On the other side the mounts, the affaires of Cesar ran the same fortune, for that being entred into the dominions of the French king on Flanders side, with a mighty armie, and holding Mesieres besieged with great hope to carie it, he was deceiued in his expectation: insomuch as being not able to take it, for that a strong succour of the French came to rescue it, he retired with perill lest his armie were broken and ouerthrowne. But in Italy notwithstanding the successe of the war was not happy nor acceptable, yet the thoughts & counsels of men were nothing restrained or forslowd: for, the enemies to the French, not deuising any more to take Parma or any other towne, determined to enter deeper into the Duchie of Millan, joyning to the army so many bands of Italians, that in all they contained six thousand, which were leuied frō hand to hand: they were the more boldned to take this resolutiō, by a hope they had that there

there would of newe descend to the pay of the Pope, twelue thousand Swissers: who albeit had bene refused by the Cardinall of Sion soliciting openly in their parliaments against the French, and by Ennius Bishop of Verola the Popes Legat, and alio by Casars Embassadors, for that the Cantons would not deliuer such a regiment of their nation, but for the defence of the dominions of the Church, and with expresse direction not to march to offend the estates of the French king: yet for that they could not haue them with other reason, they were glad at last to accept them vnder the same condition, hoping that being once descended into the regions of Italy, they might be induc- ed to follow the armie against the Duchie of Millan; and that either through their naturall in- constancie, or by their vniuersall couetousnesse, or at least by the sleights and corruptions that might be ministred to their Captaines. In this deliberation to passe further; there was no doubt made into what quarter they would draw: for that, to continue the warre on this side the riuer of Paw, could not be without manifest and right great difficulties, seeing it was a matter desperat to take Parma: & if they would leaue that Citie behind, they must of necessitie go seeke out the ene- mies to fight with them; an action euidently daungerous, for that they were lodged in a place of aduantage and well fortified with artilleries: to remaine betweene Parma and them; or to passe further without fighting, there was no reason nor abilitie to do so, for that standing betweene the townes that were possessed by them and the armie, they should within few dayes be afflicted with penurie of victuals, the countrey of the enemy denying all resort, and no possibilitie of traffike fur- ther off. All which difficulties would be auoyded in transferring the warre beyond Paw, for that in that country, naturally abounding in all things and had not as yet tasted of the harmes of the war, they made good warrantie to find victuals sufficient, and to meete with no impediment vntill the riuer of Adda: both for that, leauing Cremona on the left hand, and drawing neare to the riuer of Oglio, there were no places to make resistance, and also they were perswaded that the Senate of Venice would not (for the interests of others) deliuer vp their bands of souldiers to the fortune of a battell. They beleueed also that the French durst not oppose against them, but at the passage of the riuer of Adda: yea the vniuersall hope was, that the armie approaching the Venetian frontiers, the Senate (for the suretie of their owne estates) would call home the most part of those souldiers which they had sent to the seruice of the French king. Lastly, ouer and besides all these considera- tions, to passe beyond Paw, sel out very aptly for the armie to ioin with the Swissers; a matter not of least importance. But whilest necessarie prouisions were in preparing for this deliberation, as artilleries, munitions, pioners, bridges, and victuals: and whilest bands of Italian footmen were le- uied in Tuscane and Romagnia, Count Guido Rangon, vnder the Popes commaundement, mar- ched towards the mountaine of Modena, with part of the footmen that were already leuied, and with those bands that were vnder his gouernement. This mountaine did neuer acknowledge other Lord then the Duke of Ferrara, neither so long as Modena stood vnder the iurisdiction of Cesar, nor afterwards when it diuolued to the dominion of the Church. But the peoples of the countrey hearing how armed men came to inuade them, made publike protestation for the Church; not tarying till they were assailed. At the same time fled from Millan, Boniface Bishop of Alexan- dria, and sonne to the late Frauncis Barnardin Viscount: the cause of his euasion, was, for that certaine conspiracies which he had practised against the French, came to light: as also was disclo- sed a practise managed within Cremona by Nicholas Varola, one of the best sort of the banished men of that Citie, by reason of which conspiracie, certaine inhabitants in Cremona, partakers of the matter, were executed and made an example: a great number of the exiles of Millan followed the armie, in whom I know not which was greater in those seasons, either their ill fortune, or their vndiscreet behauiour: for, besides that all the enterprises that they tooke in hand drew verie vnto- ward effects & successe, yet being wholly giuen to pill and spoile the country, they were the cause that there came not to the armie so great store of victuals as was necessarie, yea (except the indus- trie of Moron) they recouered not these euils by any diligence or intelligence of espials. Lastly, and which is of more importance then all the residue, Prosper hauing sent them long time before towards Plaisance, they executed great domages & hostilities indifferently both vpon their friends and enemies, and fell at last into such ciuill contention amongst them selues by reason of the bod- ties, that Peter Scot of Plaisance a chieftaine amongst them, was slaine by Hector Viscount and diuerse others: Such destinie followeth vnlawfull pillage and spoile, that being purchased by vn- just armes and violence; it either brings with it the feedes of sedition, hostilitie, and blood, or at least leaues to the getters a miserable vse and fruition. In this meane while Prosper attempted to burne the barks of the bridge, which the Frenchmen had retired neare to Cremona with a very slender gard, he set vpon the enterprise to this end, to win so much the more time to enter the countrey, whilst Lawirech should reassemble the barks necessary to reedifie the bridge. But the expedition being imposed vpon Iohn de Medicis, sent out to that end with two hundred horsemen and three hundred Spanish footemen, the longnesse of the way was the cause that he could not arriue there till after the night was passed: in somuch as the mariners iudging for the violence by the noyse or brutes that were made, retired the barks into the middelt of the riuer of Paw, where the enemy that lay planted vpon the shore, had no way to offend them. At last when all things necessary to passe Paw were prepared, the army marched to Bresselle where was erected a bridge of barks: but afore they passed ouer, for that to their purpose to offend another, was ioyned a necessity to see to the defending of themselves, there was sent to the garde of the townes of the Church which should remaine behind, Vitello Vitelli with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, the like number of light horsemen, and two thousand footmen of the pension and pay of the Florentins. In like sort went thither the Bishop of Pistoia with the regiment of two thousand Swissers, who were turned to that enterprise, for that it seemed to stand neither with surety nor pollicy to lead them against the French, in whose armie was so strong a power of the same nation deliuered to them by vniuersall decree, and bearing their publike Ensignes: neither were they assured what the new companies of Swissers would resolue, who being mustered and assembled at Coire, there was dayly expectation of assured aduertisements that they had taken the fields to march. The Bishop and Vitelli had charge, not onely to defend Modena and other townes of the Church: if any inuasion were made, but also to assaile the Duke of Ferrara, who attributing to himselfe the glory to haue deliuered Parma, and occupied Finalo, and Saint Felix, passed not further, for that the Pope (in whom was redoubled a hatred for that surprise) proceeded against him with censures and excommunications of the Church, to deprive him of the Duchie of Ferrara.

the league passed the riuer
of Paw.

Thus the army passed the riuer of Paw the first of October, and went to incampe at Casalmaior: they consumed in passing not onely all the day, but a great part of the night, the multitudes of such as followed the campe giuing no lesse impediments then the baggage that was drawne and caried. In this the Captaines were much deceived, for that they made their reckening to see the whole army passed before noone, in somuch as what by the slownesse and negligence of the stragglers which are no small impediments to a campe marching, and what by the darkenesse of the night, in which the vse of the eyes and hands is taken away, one part of the artilleries and munitions, with many bands of souldiers remained disperfed the whole night betweene Paw and Casalmaior, in danger to be made a pray to euery small troupe of enemies that would haue set vpon them in their disorder: yea it was not to be doubted, that if Monsieur Lawirech (who after he had assembled all his Swissers, came to incampe at Colorgne the same day that the enemies incamped at Bresselle) had passed ouer his bridge at Casalmaior, which is but three miles from Colorgne at the instant that they made their passage, or at least at midday, had charged that part of the army which was not yet passed (for betweene Bresselle and Colorgne is but six miles) he had had good meane and oportunitie to bring his businesse well to passe: But in warres many occasions are lost, for that the Captaines and leaders haue not alwayes knowledge of the disorders and difficulties that happen amongst the enemies. The same night arriued at Casalmaior, Cardinall de Medicis, whom the Pope sent as Legate into the army. This was the Popes reason to send him thither: That albeir he had very secretly begun to giue care to the Embassador of the French king, yet for the feare he had least these aduersities and contrary successes, together with the burden of the war which was almost wholly reduced vpon him, should giue occasion to Cesar and his ministers to doubt, that to shake off so many difficulties and doubts, he would chaunge his mind and turne his thoughts to new deuises: he iudged there could be nothing more apt to assure them, and so by consequence to induce them to proceede more resolutely in the war, then to send amongst them Cardinall de Medicis; both for that by reason of his affinity and nearenesse of kinred, he bare no litle authority with him, & also for that without his priuity and counsell, they knew was done nothing of importance, notwithstanding he remained for the most part at Florence. And besides that in him were concluded the very counsels & authority of the Pope, yet in sending him to the armie, was thought to rest no small matter to hold vpon the reputation of the enterprife which was somewhat declined: & lastly, it was likely that for the presence of so great a personage the Captaines would deliberate vpon the affaires with a greater agreement and vnitie; a matter of no lesse necessity to be looked into and remedied, for that betwene Prosper and the Marquis of Pesquero the quarrell rose more and more increasing, the rather for that the Marquis since the Campe was leuied from before Parma, seeking to lay vpon others the infamie of that deliberation, gaue aduertisements to Rome, that the resolution had bene set downe without his counsell or priuity. The armie rested one day at Casalmajor, and from thence they marched along the territories of Cremona to draw neare the riuer Oglia, where they arriued in foure remoues of marching: and in this while was nothing done of consequence, sauing that as the armie was lodged in a farme called la Corte de Frati, there arose a great fray and mutiny betwene the footbands of Spaniards & Italians, in the which were slaine many of the Italian nation, and yet more by the pollicie of the Spaniards then by their valour, for that they knew how to vse the oportunitie of the occasion: neuerthelesse, by the authoritie and labour of the Captaines, the matter was speedily reappeased. The day before, Iohn de Medicis alwayes pursuing the enemies, who the same day that the armie stayed at Casalmajor, were passed the riuer of Paw somewhat higher towards Cremona, brake a band of Venetian eltradiots led by Mercurie, with whom were certaine French horsemen, who tooke prisoner Don Louis Caietan sonne to the Duke of Tracetta, whose estate neuerthelesse was holden by Prosper Colonne: but assoone as they came to incampe vpon the riuer of Oglia, fortune beholding with better eye the affaires of the Pope and Cesar, broke the sinister counsels of the Captaines, who had determined that from the farme of the Friers or Monks the armie should go to lodge in the towne of Bordelano, a place about eight miles from thence, and vpon the same riuer of Oglia: for, being not possible to draw thither the artilleries by reason of the ill wayes, it was necessarie to stay in the towne of Rebecca, being in the midway, and a place which is only separate by the riuer of Oglia from Pontuike a towne of the Venetians: and whilst they incamped there, they had aduertisement that Monsieur de Lawtrech, being followed with the Venetian regiments, and had also left at Cremona all his baggage and impediments of campe, was come the same day to S. Martin, within five miles of that place, with full resolution to meete the enemies the day after in the field, if they offered to passe any further. This troubled not a litle the minds of the Cardinall and the Captaines, for that the Senate of Venice, at such time as they sent their people into Lawtreches armie, had signified that deliberation to the Pope with such words as seemed to haue some power to stirre and moue him, not for any desire of the French victorie, but for that he had not iust cause not to obserue the confederation. They were also perswaded afore, and the comming of the Cardinall did well confirme that opinion, that Andrew Grutti had secret commaundement not to suffer his bands to come to the fight: which perswasion or opinion falling out to be false, it was necessarie to leaue there all their former counsels, since it was confessed of all men, that the armie of the enemy was farre about them in forces, containing, besides the horsemen which were mightie and strong, and seuen thousand footmen French and Italians, a puissant strength of ten thousand Swissers. But in the armie of the Pope and Cesar the numbers of Launceknights were so diminished, and the bands of the Spaniards abated, that scarcely were they able to bring to the musters seuen thousand bodies, and of sixe thousand Italians (for that the most of them were new supplies, & leuied in haste) their number was more in consideration then their vertue.

Thus Prosper with the others determined to tarie in that place for the comming of the Swissers, who being vpon their way, and the Cardinall of Sion that led them, hauing sent word not to linger for them in any place, it was thought they could not tarie about three or foure dayes: and therefore the morning following, after the Captaines had diligently considered the situation of the place, they reduced into a better forme the lodging, which the night before had bene made almost in tumult and mutinie: in which action they did not consider in what perill they stood to be offended with the artilleries of the towne of Pontuike which stood vpon the opposite; for this was the perswasion of the Cardinall de Medicis, retaining still his first impressions, that the Venetians who stood not bound to the French king in other conditions then to ayde him with men for the defence of the Duchie of Millan, would neuer consent nor suffer that out of their places should be drawne anie meane to vexe the armie of the Church and

Cesar. The difficultie of victuals was one thing that seemed contrarie to the resolution to tarry for the Swissers at Rebecca; for besides that the quantities that were caried with the armie were not sufficient to feed them but for verie few dayes, yet by reason of the labours done by the exiles of Millan, and the vniuersall flying and abandoning that was made through the whole countrey, there was supplied and brought verie litle, and yet that more and more diminished dayly. In respect of these difficulties and wants, Gnecardin their Agent gave this counsell, that seeing there was no abiding there for want of victuals, and lesse expectation of the coming of the Swissers, who might be stayed by manie occasions, it could not be prejudicial to retire backe againe five or sixe miles vpon the same riuer to the confines of Mantua, where hauing vpon their backs the countries of their friends, they should not feare the affliction of famine or want of prouisions. He enforced this counsell with this reasonable allegation, that the thing which presently might be done with suretie, might perhaps stand intangled with greater perill whensoever the enemies should approach. This counsell haply was not displeasing to the Captaines, but the late infamie of the retiring from before Parma kept manie of them restrained from the libertie of free speaking. They were also not a litle caried with the hope that the Swissers could make no long tarrying, for that within sixe dayes they might easily descend from Coure to the territorie of Bergamo, and from thence they had no great way to make to ioine with the armie: so that being thus determined to awaite their coming at Rebecca, the prouisions of meale caried with the armie were distributed by measure to all the bands. And because there were in the campe no ouens portatiue, and the houses wherein any were built were taken vp by the souldiers, euerie one for his particular feeding baked vpon stones and hote coles the part that was deliuered to him for his prouision: which incommoditie ioyned to the small distributions that were made of meale, was the cause that the bands of Italian footmen, notwithstanding they had plentie of wine and flesh, fled secretly from the campe. But the third day M. Lawtrech remaining at Bordellane, caused about noone-tide to passe ouer Ogha, one part of the artilleries, and sent them to Pontuike vnder the sufferance and priuity of the Venetian Agent, notwithstanding he made semblance of the contrary: and albeit it was almost night, yet they began the same day to draw towards the lodgings of the enemies, whose Captains seeing into the manifest danger, notwithstanding they might haue conueyed themselves into a place where they might haue found defence in the court and shadowes of certaine litle hilles, yet what with the calamitie of want of victuals, and a redoubled feare that the Swissers would make long tarrying, they caused the armie to depart the morning following by breake of the day: and as their going away was without brute or sound of trumpet or drumme, and their baggage and traine of Campe drawne afore their companies, so there was no band which did not march in good order and well appointed to fight: they incamped at Gabbionetta, about five miles from thence vpon the confines of Mantua, confessing with one voyce that they were deliuered from a great daunger, partly by the benefite of fortune, and partly by the negligence and indiscretion of the enemies: for if they had not stayed at Rebecca the verie same day that they were appointed to go to Bordellano, there had remayned to them a verie small hope of safetie, for that the selfesame or else greater necessities had constrained them to retire, by which aduersitie the retraite being longer, and the enemies more neare, the perill was most manifest. In like sort it is most certaine, that the victorie had vndoubtedly fallen vpon Monsieur de Lawtrech, if he had marched to incampe neare the enemies, the same day.

A fault of M. de Lawtrech. he sent the artilleries to Pontuike, whereunto hee was aduised by manie of the Captaines, but chiefly by the Swissers: for by reason of his nearenesse, they had stood deprived of all meanes to retire in safetie, both for that they could not raunge themselves into battell-array for the impediments of the artilleries of Pontuike, and also the rage of the famine would not giue them sufferance in that place aboue three or foure dayes. But such are the ordinarie fruites of singularity and selfe-weening, that whilst by his nature and custome he despised the counsels of all others, he layd open to the enemies the knowledge of the perill that was towards them, and through his fault made them able to preuent his threatnings by their sodaine departure; in so much as it was not without reason that the Swisser Captaines told him, that they had well deserued the payes accustomed to be giuen to souldiers that had wonne the battell, seeing it was not long of them that they had not got the victorie. At Gabbionetta the armie of the League fortified their campe with great industry, and in their owne safety remained there many dayes. Neuerthelesse both for that the coming of the Swissers seemed dayly to linger and suspend, and also for feare of the neighborhood of the French, both mighty in strength and braue in demonstrations to set vpon them, they passed the riuier of Oglia, and went to incampe in the borough of Ostiano appertaining to Lodowik de Bossolo, with intention not to depart from thence till the Swissers were come: which resolution made with wisdom and counsell, was also accompanied with good fortune, for that at Gabbionetta by reason of the low and shallow situation, the army had receiued great damages by the abundance of raines and waters falling assoone as the campe was gone.

But whilest in this sort the time ranne forth idly betweene both the armies, the one lying at Ostiano and the other at Rebecca, the Bishop of Pistoia Vitelli hauing drawne into one strength the Swissers and the bands of Italian footemen, gaue charge vpon the garrisons of the Duke of Ferrara that lay at Finalo, who albeit had for their aduantage the opportunity of the place, both strong by nature and well fortified by art, yet the Swissers whose feare is alwayes least when the perill seemes most, presented themselues with a braue resolution to the daunger, and giuing an ouerthrowe to the whole, they slue manie of them, amongst whom the knight Coruano passed by the sword as he was fighting. This brought so great feare and amazement to the Duke of Ferrara lying then at Bodena, that yeelding to the aduersitie which he could not overcome, he abandoned forthwith that towne, and fled to Ferrara, his feares being greater then his assurance. And to take from the enemies all oportunities to follow him, he retired with a present diligence all those barks, vpon the which he had builded a bridge in the same place.

In this meane while the regiments of Swissers that were expected, were discented vpon the territories of Bergama: and yet their minds being no lesse variable then their difficulties certaine, they stayed to passe further, hauing expressely refused to turne themselues to inuade the Duchy of Millan according to the instance of the Cardinall of Sion and the Agents of the Pope and Cesar. They also made difficultie to ioyne with the armie that expected them at Ostiano, for that it was prepared to march against the French king, offering to go to the seruice of any place that the Pope should thinke good in the estate or dominion of the Church, for the defending of which, they sayd they were entred into pay: and yet according to their barbarous interpretation of things, they consented to march to assaile Parma and Plaisance as Cities manifestly appertaining to the Church, or at least to they which the French king had no certaine right or interest. They required also that afore they should march, there should be sent to them from the army, three hundred light horsemen, the better with their ayde to leaue victuals in those countries and places through the which they should passe. These were the difficulties they stood vpon, bearing more vpon froward wilfulnesse, then vpon reason or necessitie of the present seruice: neuerthelesse in the ende the light horsemen were sent, who passed at vnwares in great diligence along the territories of the Venetians: they disposed their marching so, as they might come into some place most neare the army, to haue the more conueniency and oportunitie to consult and resolue what were to be done: and in their way they gaue the chase to certaine bands of the French and the Venetians which were bestowed at Pondowille or rather vpon the lake of Eupile to stoppe their passage. Assoone as they were drawne neare to the armie, there was present labour made to dispose them to ioyne, against the French, in which solicitation were employed manie messengers and Embassadors, and chiefly the Archbishop of Capua going to and fro in the name of the Cardinall de Medicis. At last, the bands that were leuiued of the Canton of Surich, who as they haue a greater authority, so they make profession to do things with a greater grauity, refused it constantly: the others after many doubts and obiections, neither expressely denied, nor manifestly accepted the offers that were made to them, for that as they refused not to follow the armie, so yet it was without declaration that they would enter with them into the Duchie of Millan. So that, what by the counsell of the Cardinall of Sion, and labour of the Captaines, into whose wils were made many corrupt insinuations by offers and promises, the army determined to march on vnder this hope, that since they refused not to follow, they would not be hard to be drawne to any place where the army went.

leuiued by the Pope would not march a-
French king.*

The bands of Surich containing foure thousand in number, braken off and returned toward Reggia: and the army after it had remained about a moneth betwene Gabbionetta and Osirano, ioyned with the other Swissers at Gambaro: they caried marching in the middle of them the Legats of Sion and Medicis with their crosses of siluer, enuironed with infinite weapons, artificeries, blasphemers, mankillers, & robbers: so much at that time did they abuse the reuerence of religion. They went in three remouings of campe through the lands of the Venetians to Orchiueche, a towne of their obedience, making this excuse to the Senate, that it was a passage necessary, and that they had no intention or desire to offend them. In the same sort was it excused to them when Andrewe Gritti their Agent was constrained to consent to Monsieur Lawirech, to send artilleries to Pontuice. At Orchiueche arriued certaine Curriers sent by the Lords of the Cantons to commaund the Swissers to depart from the army, sending also the like commaundement by other Postes to the bands that were in the French campe, to whom was alleaged, that it was a thing vnworthy the reputation of their name and countrey, to suffer the footemen of their nation to serue vnder publike Ensignes in the armies of two enemies: but these commandements brought forth diuerse effects, for, the Postes that were dispatched to the campe of the League, were by coming stayed in the way, so that they came not so farre as to those bands that were with the Cardinall of Sion. And touching the companies that followed the French campe, they dismissed themselves immediatly without bidding farewell, not that they moued by the commandements that were sent, and much lesse for the longnesse of the warre, wherein they are wont to be most impatient aboue all other nations. But they saw into the disability of Monsieur de Lawirech to answer their payes, who as he had of long time receiued no mony out of France, so the extreame exactions which he leuied vpon the Duchie of Millan were farre insufficient to satisfie his charge.

Here may be gathered a fit experience, how much the enuie and indiscretion of officers brings preiudice and damage to Princes, who either through negligence haue no employment in affaires, or else by incapacity, are not able of themselves to discern good counsels from euill: for, where direction was giuen for the leuying of three hundred thousand crownes to be sent to Lawirech according to the kings promise: the Lady Regent being the kings mother, bare so great emulation of his greatnesse, that vsing her enuie against the profite of her sonne, she procured the Treasurers and Receiuers without the kings priuie, to turne that summe to another vse. The same being the cause that Monsieur Lawirech suffered himselfe to runne into confusion and priuate grieft, since by the departing of the Swissers, the successe of the warres which afore he promised to be good and happie, was become full of doubts and dispaire: and therefore forbearing to contend against enuie, fortune and the time, he bestowed garrisons in Cremona and Pisqueton, and reduced himselfe with the residue of the armie to Cassan, hoping to giue impediment to the enemies to passe Adda, both in respect of the ordinarie difficulties which follow armiesthat are to passe riuers when there stands resistance vpon the shore opposite, and also for the oportunity of the place, bearing his banke towards Millan verie high and raised, and therefore the offence is greater that is done to the enemies with the artilleries, then that which they can receiue.

On the other side, the Legats Apostolike and the Captaines were broken vp from Orchiueche, and passing eftsoones the riuer of Oglio, were come in three remouings to Rinolco, not feeling any more the incommodity of victuals, for that they were plentifully relieved by the townes of Gumaradadda, which the Frenchmen had left abandoned. At this place, as both the armies were vpon tearmes, the one to winne, and the other to stoppe the passage of the riuer, Prosper and the other Captaines made preparation to build a bridge betwene Rinolco and Cassan; a matter very doubtfull and hard for the stopping of the enemies. Wherein hauing consumed two or three dayes in controuersies and counsels, at last Prosper who would not communicate his thoughts with the Marquis of Pesquero, to the ende he should haue no interest in the glory of that action, and much lesse would vse the seruice of the Spaniards least they would disclose his deuise, caused secretly to be taken from the riuer of Bembe, two small barks, and sent by night with great silence certaine bands of Italian footmen to passe the riuer right against the towne of Vaury: Vaury is a towne open, discouered, and without wals, and hath his situation vpon the barks of Adda fife miles from Cassan: There is conuenient passage ouer the riuer, & in the midst of the towne is there a small circuit of wal raised in forme ^{The souldiers of the league passe the riuer of Adda.} of a litle Castell: these were for the gard of this place, certaine bands of horsmen vnder the charge of Hugh de Pape Lieutenant to the men at armes which the French king had giuen to Othman Fregosa: vpon the hearing of the noyse that was made, he presented himselfe vpon the banke or shore, from the which he was presently repulsed with force of shot, and yet it was thought that he might easily haue maintained resistance, if a certaine troupe of hargubuziers had ioyned with those horsmen which he had with him; a matter which afterwards he said he did require of Monsieur Lawtrech.

As the footmen passed in troupes and numbers, so they assembled and drew into strength in a place within the towne raised and somewhat fortified, expecting there the succours which Prosper had appointed: who as soone as he was aduertised of that happie beginning, caused to be turned that way almost all the footebands of the army bestowed in diuerse boroughs of Guiradadda, to who he gaue this order, that as they arriued they should passe successiuelly vpon the same small barks, and vpon two others that were appointed to follow the armie to serue for bridges ouer riuers, which by night were caried ouer land to the same banke or shore: then he and the other Captaines with the Cardinall Medicis, tooke forthwith the same way, leauing this commandement to such as taried at Rimolto, that if the Frenchmen retired from thence, they should immediatly set vp the bridge. But at Vadry the successe of the enterprise was vncertaine for certaine howers, for, if Monsieur Lawtrech vpon his first aduertisement of the passing of his enemies, had conuerted thither one part of the armie, he had no doubt giuen them the ouerthrowe: but after he had spent certaine howers in doubt what he had to do, he dispatched thither Monsieur d'Escud with foure hundred Launces and the bands of the French footemen, causing to be drawne afterwards certaine peeces of artilleries. Monsieur d'Escud and his regiments marched thither in great diligence, and beganne very resolutely to charge the place where the enemies were retired, euē at the same time that the succours which were expected appeared vpon the other shore: for whose coming, together with the hope that they brought, the enemies made a valiant defence, notwithstanding that Monsieur d'Escud descended on foote with all his men at armes, and made so resolute a fight in the straightes of the streetes, that if the artilleries had come in time, his valour no doubt had giuen them the ouerthrowe: but on the other side the shore, did make speede to passe as much as the fraught of the barks could carie, Tegame Captaine of the Grisons, and two Ensignes of Spanish footemen, pushed on with the comforts and speeches of Cardinall de Medicis and the other Captaines. And as in matters of execution examples do much, so in this heate of valour and valiant doings, Iohn de Medicis, more moued of his naturall magnanimity and great desire of glorie, then by any other mans incitation, swam ouer the deepnesse of the water vpon a Turkish horse to the other side, giuing in that action both a present feare to the enemy, and a iust courage to his owne companies. At last notwithstanding the present arriual of the artilleries, Monsieur d'Escud finding the defence that was made to be so farre aboue his forces, and his fortune no lesse inferiour, that he could not but dispaire of the victory, retired to Cassan with the losse of an Ensigne, and by his example Lawtrech departed from Cassan, and withdrew to Mullan with the whole army. There, whether it was that he would not lose the occasion to satisfie his hate conceiued afore, or whether he thought that by that spectacle he should make himselfe more feared and redoubted, he caused to be executed publicly, Christopher Paluoin: an action of great pitie and compassion to behold, no lesse for the noblenesse of his house, greatnesse and authority of his person, and flourishing estate of his age, then for that he was committed to prison many monerhs afore the warre; in which point his iustice was not without extreame feueritie. By this passing ouer Adda, Prosper wonne a name and glory aboue the Sunne: he was afore not only infamous at Rome, but contemned throughout the whole army, not so much for his breaking vp from before Parma, as for his custome in protracting the warre: but now, as it often happeneth that things done first, loose their memorie by the consideration of such as follow and are done afterwards, so the infamie of his former vices was now defaced, and the minds of all men conuerted to prayse and extoll him, the rather for that without bloud and daunger, yea altogether with counsell and industrie worthy of so well experienced a Captaine, he had stolne from the enemies the passage of that riuer: a matter which Monsieur Lawtrech did not onely promise to himselfe and his whole armie to let and stoppe, but also assured it absolutely to the king vnder his writing and publike protestations: and yet (such emulation followeth valour and the glory thereof) there were some, who with reasons either true, or apparent, laboured to diminish the glory of this action, wherein they alleaged that there was no vertue nor rare industry neither in the inuention nor in the execution: for that nature and naturall providence doth teach all men finding impediments in riuers and strait passages, to search and sound some other way to passe either higher or lower, where nothing is obiected to stop them. They could say also that the passage of Vaur was at hand, and by his ordinary frequentation a passage very conuenient, and that Lawtrech had bene so carelesse to gard it, that his negligence had left no place to industrie: so that in no other thing could be recommended the providence of Prosper, then that with secrecie he had made prouision of the barkes, and managed the whole enterprise with necessary silence. There were other also, who perhaps either too diligent to iudge of things, or more ready to reprehend faults that be doubtfull, then apt to commend actions and doings certaine, were not contented to diminish the renoume of his industrie, but with a spirite more enuious, they iustified that there was in him neither providence nor order conuenient: for, say they, in not sending commaundement to those bands to stirre that were appointed for succours and lodged within Treny, Carauage and many other places, but when the footemen whom he had sent before were possessed of Vaur: it fell out that the first companies could not arriue vpon the shore of theriuier vntill noone, which was foureteene houres after the first bands of footmen were past: so that if Monsieur Lawtrech had done presently vpon the aduertisement that was sent to him, the thing which he did many houres after, there is no doubt but he had recouered Vaur, and giuen the ouerthrowe to those footebandes that were passed, for that the succours or rescue were too slowe and lingering: But such interpretations and fancies of men did nothing at all depraue the glorie of Prosper, for that commonly in humane wittes this collection is made, that they iudge the counsels of men by the euent of things, and so sometimes with praise and sometimes with dishonour according as the successe is happie or contrarie, they giue that to counsell and providence, which for the most part takes his proceeding of fortune.

Monsieur Lawtrech being departed from the shores of Adda, it was to be doubted that the enemies who the day following builded a bridge betweene Rimolia & Cassan, wold draw neare to Millan as fast as they could: yet Prosper, whose counsell albeit was blamed by the popular sort, was yet approued by such as saw into the science of war, was of mind that in taking a longer circuite, they should march the first day to incampe at Marignan, a towne equally distant from Millan & Pauia: for, being not possible for the hardnesse of the time both cold and rainy, to keepe the field, he iudged it best to draw neare to Millan on that side, by the which if he found it hard to enter, he might immediatly turne to Pauia, where Lawtrech had left no garrison, for that he sought to reduce all his forces to Millan: in which city both for the plenty of victuals, & many other oportunities, he thought to settle the seate of the war. On the other side, M. Lawtrech whose army of footmen was reduced to a very small number, had from the beginning deuised to gard only the City of Millan: but considering afterwards that if he abandoned the suburbs, he gaue meane to the enemy to lodge and incampe, and therewithall many ready oportunities to take the towne, he changed opinion, and determined as yet to defend the suburbs: This no doubt was a resolute and wise counsell, if it had bene accompanied with that vigilancy that appertained, for that by it, considering the vnlooked for accidents that fell within few dayes after, things had brought forth another issue then they did. But the army of the league being lodged for the greatest part at Marignan, & the Swissers more forward in the Abbay of Cleruault, after they had remained there three dayes to expect the artilleries which could not follow for the extremity of the wayes: presented themselves the xix. day of Nouember before Millan, hauing this intention, that if they could not enter the same day, they wold depart the day after and draw to Pauia, whither was already dispatched part of the light horfmen to take possession of the towne. There hapned that morning this matter worthy of memory, as the Legates and Chieftaines of the army stood in a medow neare to Cleruault to giue place to the Swissers to passe, there came to them an old mā of aspect & habit popular, who telling them that he was sent by the parish of S. Cir in Millan solicited & called vpon them with great exclamations to passe further: for that saith he, order was giue that not onely the parish of Saint Cir, but all the parts of Millan vpon the approching of the army would rise and take armes against the Frenchmen at the vniuersall ringing of the bells of euery parish. This relation was made more wonderfull by the consideration of the man and his departure, for that notwithstanding al their diligence to find him againe, they could neuer learne what he was, nor by whom he was sent. The army then marched in order towards the gate of Rome, and the great artilleries stayed at the entry of a way which turneth to Pania. The Marquis of Pesquero who was in the former front of the battell with his bands of Spanish footmen, obseruing the coming on of the euening, drew neare the trench that is betweene the gate of Rome, and the port Thesin, & presenting his harquebuziers against a bastillion made in a place called Vicentin, neare the gate named Lodowikes gate, and that more to make a triall, then in hope to cary it, the Venetian footebands that garded the place, after they had with much ado endured the presence of the enemies, gaue their backs with an incredible basenesse of mind, by whose example the Swissers that lay neare them, put themselves to flight, their feare being greater then their fidelity. By which yeelding, the Spanish footebands that passed the trench and the rampier without any impediment, entred with the same facility the suburbes, and in that hurliburley of entring they rooke and hurt lightly Theodor Trinnlce being all disarmed vpon a little nagge, who payed afterward to the Marquis of Pesquero for his liberty twentie thousand duckats. In this confusion of feare and perill, Andrew Gritti with many others made way with great hardnesse for their safety, who after by the benefite of chase and flying, they were esstoones vnited with the French; they retired altogether into the towne by fetching a very long compasse: but both for that they had made no prouision for their defence, and also that they had no strength of footemen, and therewithall the people disposed to rebell, they stayed about the Castell. On the other side, the Marquis of Pesquero in whom wanted no diligence to follow his fortune, made his approach to the gate of Rome (the gates of the City and the suburbes beare all one name) & was receiued into the towne by the principall partners of the Gebelin faction, hauing the gate in gard. And not long after the Cardinall Medici, the Marquis of Mantua, Prosper, and one part of the army made their entrie in the same sort by the port Thesin, the victors themselves being almost ignorant in what manner or by what disorder they had won so great a victory: onely the principall cause proceeded of the negligence of the Frenchmen, for that (as was discerned afterwards) Monsieur Lawtrech had no aduertisement that the enemies were remoued that day; yea it was beleueed that he assured himselfe, that for the disaduantage of the wayes being much disordered and broken with the raynes that were fallen, they would not that day make their artilleries march, without the which he neuer thought that they would assault the rampiers: yea such was his security, that at the same time that the enemy entred the rampiers, he was walking vnarmed in the City of Millan, accompanied with other Captaines, without any cogitation of enterprise, as also Monsieur d'Escud being made wearie with watching the night before, was layd downe to sleepe in his owne lodging: both of them being beguiled in the care which they ought to haue had of their proper safety, honor and reputation. And yet it seemed fortune reserued for them a fauour which their destiny would not let them enioy: for if Monsieur de Lawtrech after his feare and flying had reassembled his people vpon the Castell greene, it was beleueed that there was offered to him no little occasion to offend the enemies, for that one part were dispersed disorderly within Millan, another part stood houering in the suburbes in confusion; and the residue remained without in a troubled expectation. But what through his feare, which could not be reappeased, and what by the error of the darke night to discerne in so little time the estate of the enemies, he departed the same night to Coma, where leauing fiftie men at armes and fixe hundred footemen, he tooke the way by the parish of Inzina, and so after he was passed Adda to Lecco, he drew to the countrey of Bergama, the Castell of Millan remaining well garded and furnished. Lodi and Pania followed the example of Millan: and at the same time the Bishop of Pisoya and Vitelli, who leauing Parma behind them, had taken the way of Plaisance, were willingly receiued into that City. The like successe they had in Cremona, where vpon the newes not onely that Millan was taken, but also that the French were ouerthrowne, the people ran to armes and cried vpon the name of the Empire and Duke of Millan: As soone as the commotion was vnderstood by Monsieur Lawtrech, who was then arriued vpon the territories of Bergama, he dispatched thither Monsieur d'Escud with one part of the armie to recouer it: he was repulsed by the people, by which occasion Lamirech notwithstanding he had very small hope of good successe, for that the Swissers that were within Parma might easily succor it, went thither with the whole arme, hauing first giuen order that Federike de Bessolo should abandon Parma, holding it a matter of too great difficulty to furnish so many places. This enterprize drew with it a good successe and issue: for, notwithstanding that Cardinall Medici assoone as he understood of the rebellion of Cremona, had sent to the Bishop of Pistoia, that the better to assure such a conquest, he should dispatch thither one part of the Swissers: yet because he would neither deuide them, nor intangle himselfe with other affaires, standing alwayes vpon a desire to go with them to an enterprize determined vpon Genes, he lingred so long, that he left sufficient time to Monsieur Lamirech to recouer it, hauing both the Castell to hold for him, and also knowing there was to be objected against him no other defence then a confused resistance of the people, in whom he discerned already an inclination to yeeld, for that they sent Embassadors to sollicite their pardon. This good euent ministred eftsoones some good courage and life to Monsieur Lamirech, who sent forthwith to Federike Bessolo not to abandon Parma: but he was departed afore the sommons came, and had passed Pau with his bands and companies: at what time Vitelli who went to Plaisance with his companies, and was not farre from Parma when Federike departed, was called in by an vniuersall consent of the people, and made his entrie. The Capitaines and Assistantes of the League deuised how to recouer the residue of the estate, vnder this foundation, to make no more so great expences: and accordingly they dispatched from Millean at the same time the Marquis of Pesquero with his bands of Spaniards and the Launceknights and Grisons, to lay siege to Coma. In which enterprize it may be doubted whether was more forward his desire or his fortune, for he had no sooner begunne to enforce the terrour of his artilleries, then the defendants dispayring of rescue, agreed to render vp the place vnder condition of safety of life and goods, aswell to the French bands as to the inhabitants of the towne: and yet when the Frenchmen were vpon their departure, the Spaniards made their entrie and sacked it, to the great infamy of the Marquis, who being afterwards accused of faith breaking by Iohn Chabannes chiefe of the French bands within Coma, was by him defied and chalenged to the combate.

At the same instant they of the League sent the Bishop of Verula to the Swissers, to assure them of their wils, neuertheless assoone as he was come to Belinsone they committed him to ward, for that standing ill contented that their regiments of footmen had marched against the French king, they did not only complaine of the Cardinall of Sion and the Pope, but also of all their ministers and officers: but chiefly they inueyed against the Bishop of Verula, for that being the Popes Nuncio with them at such time as they leuied their men, he laboured to induce them to go against the exception vnder the which they had bene accorded.

The estate and affaires of the warre was reduced into these rearmes, with a wonderfull hope in the Pope and Cesar to confirme the victory, both for that the French king had no meane to dispatch with expedition new companies into Italy, and also for themselues they thought the power of those who had won Millean vpon him with the most part of the Duchy, was sufficient not onely to preserve it, but also to runne through all the residue that remained in the hands of the enemy. Yea such a thing is terrour, that the Senate of Venice fearing least the warre begunne against others would fall vpon them, gaue hope to the Pope to cause the French bands to depart out of their lands. But of thoughts sudden beganne to spring an accident vnlooked for: for, newes came that the Pope was dead suddenly the first day of December: as he lay at the village of of Magliana whither he went oftentimes for his recreation, he heard the first report of the taking of Millean, which stirred in him such an extreame passion of ioy, that the same night he entred into a small feauer: and for his better remedie he caused himselfe the next day to be removed to Rome, where he died within very few dayes after, notwithstanding the Physicians in the beginning made no great reckening of his disease. There was great suspition that he was poysoned by Barnaby Malestina his Chamberleine, whose office was alwayes to giue him drinke: and yet though he was made prisoner through the suspition of the fact & the vehement reasons of the same: yet the matter was dashed and the examination thereof, for that the Cardinall Medici assoone as he came to Rome, set him at liberty, fearing to fall further into the disgrace of the French king, by whose practise it was supposed that Barnaby gaue him the fatall drinke. This was

but whispered secretly, the author being no lesse doubtfull then the coniectures vncertaine: he died, if we consider the common opinion of men, in verie great glorie and felicitie, not so much for that by the surprising of Millan he saw himselfe deliuered of daungers and expences intollerable, which hauing drayned him of all store of money and treasure, he was constrained to aduaunce all means and maners for his supply and relieuing: but also that a verie few dayes afore his death he receiued aduertisement of the taking of Plaisance, and the very day he died, newes came to him of the winning of Parma; a matter so greatly desired by him, that at such time as he debated to moue warre against the Frenchmen, it is verie well remebred that he said to the Cardinall de Medici labouring to dissuade him, that as he was in nothing more caried to the desire of that warre, then to recouer to the Church those two cities, so whensoever God should blesse him with the effect of that desire, it would not grieue him to die. He was a Prince in whom were many things worthy to be commended and blamed, and in the estate and discourse of his life he deceiued greatly the expectation that was had of him when he was created Pope, for that his gouernement was with a greater discretion, but with farre lesse bounty then was looked for.

The death of the Pope did greatly diminish the affaires of Cesar in Italy, as also it was not vnlikely that such an enemy being taken away, with whose money the whole warre was both begun and continued, both the French king would enter into a new spirit, and dispatch a new armie into Italy, and also the Venetians for the same causes would recontinue the confederation they had with him: so that it seemed that by this accident, the deuises to assaile Cremona and Genes vanished and were dissolued: and the officers of Cesar, who till then had payd the Spanish bands, with great difficultie were constrained to dismisse a great part of them; a matter not without daunger, since there were holden yet for the king Cremona, Genes, Alexandria, and Castle of Millan, the Castles of Nouaro and Tressa, Pisqueton, Domussolo, Arona, and all the Lake maiors besides, the rocke of Pontremio was eftsoones returned to his deuotion, which being lost before, was reconquered by Sinibaldo de Fiesquo and the Count Nocero. Neither had the affaires of the French king anie good successe beyond the mounts, for that Cesar bringing warre vpon Flanders, had taken from him the Citie of Tournay, and not long after the Castle, wherein were no small quantities of artilleries and munitions: in so much that by reason of the Popes death, new gouernements, new counsels, and new estates of affaires and doings were introduced into the Duchie of Millan. The Cardinals of Syon and Medici made forthwith to Rome, to communicate in the election of the new Pope. The Imperials kept retained with them fifteene hundred footmen Swissers, and dismissed all the others, together with the Launceknights, who went their way: the bands of the Florentines tooke their way to returne into Tuscane: touching the regiments of the Church, Guido Rangon led one part of them to Modena, and the other remained in the estate of Millan with the Marquis of Mantua, and that more of his proper resolution then by the consent of the Colledge of Cardinals, who standing deuided amongst themselves, could bring forth nothing in determinatiō: insomuch as when Monsieur Lawtrech made his complaints to them, that the souldiers of the Church remayned vpon the Duchie of Millan, to the preiudice of the French king, to whom for the charitable actions of his predecessors done to the Church, was transferred the title of Protector and eldest sonne of the same; they could not agree to returne other answer or resolution, then that they referred his remedy to the determination of the Pope to come. Of those Swissers that were in Plaisance, one part went with the Bishop of Pisoy to Modena, for the defence of that Citie and Reggia against the Duke of Ferrara, who immediately vpon the death of the Pope had taken the field with an hundred men at armes, two thousand footmen, and three hundred light horsemen, and so went to incampe before Cente, after he had recouered by the will of the inhabitants Bondene, Finalo, the mountaine of Modena, and Tarfagnano, and with the same facility had taken Lugo, Bagnacaval, with other townes of Romagnia. Those Swissers that were of the Canton of Zurich continued at Plaisance, and for that they would not suffer themselves to be separated, they would not giue leaue to a thousand of them to go to the guard of Parma, which Citie remaining almost disfurnished, Monsieur Lawtrech being then within Cremona with sixe hundred Launces, and two thousand five hundred footmen, tooke occasion of the nakednesse of the place, to attempt to reconquer it, being specially induced to the action by Federike Bossolo, who caried great credite in that matter for he peculiar knowledge he had in enterprises of like nature.

The Frenchmen

It was then determined that M. de Bonneau with three hundred Launces, and Federike and Marke Anth. Colonne, the one with the French footmen, the other with the Venetian bands containing in one strength and general number five thousand bodies, should be employed to surprise the citie of Parma, wherein were sixe hundred footmen Italians, and fiftie men at armes of the Marquis of Mantua, besides that the people & inhabitants were at the deuotion of the Church, but slenderly armed, and no lesse ill contented for the memorie of the French, and violences wed by Federike. With these was also concurrant this aduantage, that of that part of the towne which had bene battered by the Campe of the Church, the walles lay yet on the ground without any restoring or repairing: lastly, the Sea Apostolike was in vacation, a matter which is alwayes wont to keepe the minds of men in variation, and make gouernours rather carefull of their proper safety, then to looke to the defence of townes, as not knowing for whom they should put themselves into daunger. So that with these foundations, the French footmen were sent below, along the riuer of Pau euen vnto Torricelle, where the bands of men at armes that were come from Cremona by land, ioyned with them: and many Barks being sent thither from Cremona, they passed ouer Pau by night to Torricelle, which is within twelue miles of Parma, hauing to follow them by direction Marke Anth. Colonne with the Venetian footbands that were lodged vpon Oglio. Frauncis Guicciardin was sent thither for the guard of the towne by commission of Cardinall de Medici, and doubting of the daunger that was so apparant, he caused to call together by night the whole people and inhabitants, whom he encouraged to stand valiantly to the defence of their liues and libertie: and because they should fight against their perill more with weapons then with words, he caused to be bestowed among them two thousand pikes, which two dayes before he had sent for from Reggia: it imported him much to be carefull to make prouisions necessarie for defence, wherein by so much greater was his diligence and studie, by how much more both the time and the place ministred many difficulties, both for that the small numbers of souldiers within the towne were not sufficient to defend it, without the ayde of the people, vpon whom in those sodaine and daungerous cases can be laid no firme foundation, for the variableness of their condition: and also for that he saw it impossible to let the enemies for entring the Codipont, for which cause he retired the souldiers and all the townes-men into the other part of the citie, but not without a wonderfull difficultie: for, hauing a vaine perswasion amongst them, that it might be defended, as also the inhabitants of that quarter, interpreting to rigour and hardnesse to leaue abandoned their owne houses, they could not be disposed to it neither with reasons, nor with authoritie, vntill they saw the enemies approach: because the inhabitants were so long afore they would be perswaded to retire, the enemy lacked not much to enter with them pell-mell into the other part of the towne, where concurred at one time many difficulties, both necessity of mony, and inconueniency of the time, being the selfe same day wherein they were to pay the footbands, who protested to go out of the towne if they were not satisfied of their payes within xxiiij. houres. The first day Federike Bossolo with threethousand footmen and certaine light horsemen, entred the Codipont which was left abandoned: the day after arriued there M. de Bonneau with the French Launces, and Marke Anth. with 2000 footmen Venetians: they had not with them other artilleries then two Sakers, for that by the impediment of the ill wayes all along Pau, the places being lowe and apt to retaine water, made it verie hard for the vse of carts to draw greater artilleries: which had not bene without losse of time, and that contrary to their hopes, grounded altogether vpon celeritie and diligence, for that they feared in lingring much, least Parma should receiue some rescue either from Modena or from Plaisance. Neuerthelesse the inhabitants being abused with the fancies and feares of certaine paynants of the countrey that were fled, stood possessed with an opinion that the great artilleries were comming: by which occasion they were entred into a wonderfull terrour, and the same redoubled by a deuise of Federike, who hauing taken in the countrey certaine Citizens, he made them assuredly beleue by certaine rebels of Parma which he had with him, that Marke Anth. and the Frenchmen came after with a great armie and artilleries: and after he had let them go to Parma, they brought newes touching the forces of the enemies and other things, much against the truth, and so replenished the people with terrour and amaze, that not only the Commons through all the quarters of the towne, but euen their Magistrates and counsell, hauing charge of the affaires publike, began with importunities to entreate the Gouernour, that what for the safetie of himselfe and his souldiers, and to deliuer the Citie fro

seruitude and sacking, he would suffer them to compound with the enemies. Against which demand whilest the Gouernour made resistance, sometimes with reasons, and sometimes with requests, & consumed the time in debating, there hapned this new difficultie, that the pay day being come, the souldiers that were drawne into insurrection, published in maner of tumult, that if they were not paid, they would depart the towne: So litle assurance is there in souldiers mercenarie, in whom in times of triall and danger, is commonly found lesse fidelity then forwardnesse, and more corruption then constancie, and seruing but for pay, they haue no regards about the desire of money and gaine. Neuerthelesse the Agent or treasurer obtained with manie perswasions of the inhabitants, to furnish one part of the money, which though they had promised before, yet they became slowe to performe; notwithstanding he declared to them that in alleuents & changes that action would stand them in no small stead of iustification with the Popes to come: with this mony he reappeased the tumult as well as he could, the same being the cause that the feare of the people augmented. And as the souldiers, who for their small numbers saw themselves at the discretion of the people, and had no suretie of any one of the Citie, so they entred into present suspicion that the forces that were both within and without would set vpon them at one time: inso-much as they rather wished that the Citie would render by accord vnder capitulations of their safetie, then to continue and dwell in that daunger: So vnquiet a passion is feare, that whom it possesseth, it maketh them nothing lesse apt then to be resolute or constant, and keepeth them deprived of that reason and counsell which in other cases is the guide of mortall men and their doings. But in this estate of affaires reduced thus to extremities, it was necessarie for the gouer-nour to shew himselfe constant and absolute, & therefore he sometimes assured the souldiers that the perill was aswell comon to him as to the, & somtimes he stirred vp the principals of the towne assembled in counsell, with whom he reasoned that there was no occasion of feare, for that he was assured the enemies caused not to march their great artilleries, without the which it was both childish & scornfull to doubt that by the benefit of scaling ladders they would offer to enter or force the towne, wherein was a sufficient strength of youth and souldiers to make resistance against a far greater violence: he told them he had sent to require succours at Modena, where were the Swissers, Vstelli, & Guido Rangon, with their bands, not doubting but that the day following he should be supplied with such a strength as wold be able to enforce the enemy to depart: that aswell in regard of their own honor, as for feare least with the loosing of Parma, there hapned not a greater disorder, those succors wold make haste & their rescue be almost as ready as their danger: that he had sent to Plaisance for the same matter, & for the same reasons he had manifest hope to be relieved fro thence: that they had to consider that the Pope being dead, who had honored him with the credit of that place wherein he was, there remained to him no interest or bond (if things stood vpon such such termes as they imagined) to subiect himselfe to a perill so apparant; for that according to experience & comon examples past, much lesse that the officers of the Pope deceased can expect of the Pope to come any degree of recopence, since it was most likely that the Pope of the new election wold become enemy to Florence his naturall country: for which reasons he had no cause to desire the greatnesse of the Church, respects publike being no lesse against it the occasions priuate: only such might be the concurrence of accidents, that the diminution of the same wold be most acceptable to him: that touching his owne particular, he had not within Parma either wife, children, or any goods, for the which he was to feare that by the translation of the gouernment they might be made a pray to the lusts, to the insolencies, & rapines of the French: that lastly, since he had no reason to hope for any profite by the defence of Parma, and lesse feare (by rendring it) of the aduersities they had proued vnder the hard yoke of the French, & taking it by force, his person communicating in the same daungers that they did: they might be assured that no other thing moued him to remaine constant, then the manifest knowledge he had that the enemies had no ability to force the towne without their great artilleries; of which as he was assured, they had none at all, so if he stood in doubt, it stood him vpon not to stand against the accord, hauing no lesse care of his owne safety, then all they had desire to auoyd their common daunger: seeing withall, that by the vacation of the Sea Apostolike, and he not able in such a towne as that was, to oppose himselfe against so great an inclination and will of the people, he could not be within daunger of imputation, and much lesse stand charged with their reuolt. With these reasons sometimes dealing apart and seuerall with many particulars, and sometimes disputing with them altogether and sometimes leading them along the walles, and eversoones reasoning with them of other provisions, he robbed the time from them, and entertained them all the night: yea he was not ignorant that notwithstanding they had vehement imaginations to compound with the enemies, and that not for other cause then for feare to be passed into captiuitie and spoile; yet they retained this consideration, that in according without his consent, they could not auoid the note of rebels and faith-breakers. But assoone as the day appeared, which was a day dedicated to Saint Thomas the Apostle, they began to know by the bullets that were shot from the two sakers planted there the same night, that the enemies had no peeces for batterie: which made the gouernour to hope that returning to counsell, he should find them chaunged and assured, but he found them of disposition contrarie, their feares being by so much augmented & redoubled, by how much by the light of the day making them able to discern, they esteemed themselves to be neare the perill: inso much as laying aside all regards to fidelitie, & aptnesse to heare reason, they began with manifest instance, with protestations and threatnings to compell him to aduance the composition:

“ Such is the rage of a multitude vnbridled, and so violently do they run to execute the thing which “ in their feares they haue imagined, that their minds being once made timorous, there is nothing “ lesse respected with them then the thing which should most assure them. The Gouernour made answer with a liuely resolution and libertie of mind, that since he had no power to stop in them the course of those speeches & thoughts, which he wold do, if he had in Parma a greater strength, there remained to him no other satisfaction of the iniurie which they were determined to do to the Sea Apostolike, & to him being a minister of the same, then that they could not auoid the infamie of rebellion, and imputation of disloyalty to their Lords, if reason could not hold them from executing the resolution which their timorous condition had stirred in them: he reproched to the with vehement words the oath of homage & fidelity, which a few dayes before they had solemnly made to him on the behalfe of the Sea Apostolike: he told them, that though he saw afore his eyes their destruction & death manifest, yet they were not to draw fro him any other conclusion then that he would continue to make good his faith in that seruice, vntill either by supplies of new bands, or by the comming of great artilleries to the campe of the enemies, or some other accident hapning, he were satisfied that the daunger was more manifest to loose the towne, then the hope greater to defend it. He flung out of the Counsell immediatly vpon the deliuey of these speeches, partly to leaue them sounding in their eares, and imprinted in their minds with greater au-thoritie, and partly to giue order to many things necessarie, if the enemies should offer to giue to the assault that day, as was beleueed: but they remained in suspence, and stood so much the more confused, by how much their reason was lesse then their feares: whereupon yeelding at last the thing that could least assure them, and subduing in their fearfulness all other good regards, they resolved to send out at aduenture to sollicite an accord, dispatching withall certaine of them to the gouernour, to protest to him, that if he continued obstinate to consent to their safety, they were determined by their owne meane, both to put away the perill that was towards them, and to preserue the City fro the spoyle that they saw pretended: but at the verie instant that they were determined to addresse their Embassage, there began to be heard on all sides the cries of such as garded the gates and the wals, together with the Alarme sounded by the bells of the high tower of the Citie, which gaue the signe that the enemies being issued out of the Codipont in order of battell, made their approches to the walles to giue the assault: by which occasion the Gouernour returning to those that he had not spokē to as yet, cried vnto the, that though all men were willing, yet “ the time now was incōuenient to come to accord: This is the election (saith he) you stand in, either “ to defend your liues honourably, or to see your Citie put to shamefull sacke, and your selues de-“ liuered into captiuitie: your aduersity calleth you to be warned by the example of Rauenna and “ Capua, whose inhabitants and the eyes of the naturall children borne in them, saw them misera“ bly sacked, euen as they were soliciting an accord with the enemies that stood vpon the walles: I “ haue done hitherunto as much as might be concluded in the abilitie of one alone: my will hath “ bene so much aboute my power, by how much my fortune hath bene lesse then my meanes: I “ haue gouerned you thus long, not more to mine owne praise then to your profite, not lesse to “ your vniuersall safetie, then to the due satisfaction of the place I hold, and now haue I led you to

with what affection I desire to defend or to die: Be not the more discouraged for the nearnesse of your perill, let not your confidence be so much abated, by how much your danger is imminent: strive not lesse to vanquish feare then to overcome shame: and be not lesse resolute to defend your liues, your goods, the honour of your Wiues and daughters, then you haue bene importunate to desire without any necessitie to runne into willing seruitude of the French, in whom you are not ignorant remaineth a naturall malice towards you. After these speeches, he turned his horse away, and left them all possessed with contemplations of feare: but as necessity is mightie to make men resolute, so for that their fortune had left them now no time to procure other remedies, they let fall all parleys for accord, for the present necessity they had to defend themselves: for that one part of the enemies, who the day before had gathered in the country a great quantity of scaling ladders, made approach to the Bastillion which Federike had builded on that side towards Paw, and inuaded it valiantly: and at the same time was a furious assault giuen to the gate that leades to Reggia, as also the fight was begunne in two other places, with so much the more difficultie of defence to them within, by how much the enemies were more braue and encouraged by the examples of the Captaines; and the men of the towne filled full of terrour and cowardise, went not to the walles, but closed themselves within their houses, as though euerie moment they had expected the latest ruine of the Citie. These assaults being releued manie times, continued the space of foure houres, the daunger of the townes-men diminishing continually, not so much for the wearinesse of the enemies, who by the wounds and harmes they receiued in many places, began to loose hart, as also by the example of the Gouvernour, and valour of the townes-men, who seeing the defence to succeed well, tooke courage in their good fortune, and laboured more and more at the wall: insomuch that afore the assault retired, not onely the vniuersall multitude of people was run thither together with the Church-men to defend the breaches, but also in the action was concurrant the valour of many women, who despising the daunger, were seene to carie wine and other refreshings to their husbands. By these, the enemies without despairing of the victorie, retired with the losse of some, and manie wounded, to the Codipont, from whence they dislodged the morning following, and so returned beyond Paw, after they had remained a day or two about the borders of Parma. Federike confessed that in this expedition, whereof he was the authour, nothing did more beguile him, then that he would neuer haue beleued, that in a Gouvernour neither for his profession a man of warre, nor for his time of any continuance in the citie, would be found such valour; that the Pope being dead, he would rather throw himselfe into daunger without anie hope of profite, then seeke for his safety which he might do without his dishonour or infamie.

This defending of Parma hurt greatly the affaires of the French, for that it put the people of Millan & other subiects of that state into greater hart to defend themselves then they had before: but specially they tooke courage when they knew what weakenesse of souldiers was within, and had receiued no succours abroad, for that besides that there came no rescue from Plasance, neither the Swissers that were within Modena, nor Guido Rangon, nor Vitelli, would once make out any men for the succours of Parma: wherein Guido alleaged for his excuse, that notwithstanding the duke of Ferrara because he could not take Cente defended by the Bolognois, was retired to Finale at such time as the Swissers arriued: yet he stood afraid least he would attempt some violent action vpon Modena being made naked of the garrison. And the Bishop of Pistoia so wauered, and was troubled for the instant requests which Guicciardin made to him, & for the perswasions of Vitelli, who for his owne interest stirred him vp to passe into Romagnia with the Swissers, to the end to stop the passage of the Duke of Vrbino: that what for that he was irresolute, & what through his naturall slownesse, he did neither the one nor the other of those matters, both for that Parma defended her self, & in Romagnia no impediment was giuen to the Duke of Vrbino, because the Swissers would not march for want of their payes: which Duke of Vrbino and with him Malatesta & Horace of the family of the Baillous passed, the one to recouer his estates lost, and the other to returne to Perousa, hauing assembled at Ferrara 200 men at armes, 300 light horsemen, and 3000 footmen; an army which willingly followed them, partly for friendship, & partly for hope of spoile: for neither of the Frenchmen nor Venetians they could obtaine no other fauour then a permission: to whosoever had take their pay, to follow the, & that the Venetians were contented that Malatesta & Horace should depart out of their pay. Thus they went from Ferrara to Lugo all along Paw, and finding no impediments in the estate of the Church, they drew neare to the Duchy of Vrbino, where the Duke being called in by the peoples, recovered presently his whole estate, except certaine peeces holden by the Florentines, and so turning towards Peſera, he tooke the towne with the same facility, and within few dayes after the Castle: he ioyned diligence to his good fortune, & hauing chased out of Camerino, John Maria de Varana the ancient Lord, who for his greater dignity & illustration had obtained of Pope Leo the title of Duke; he bestowed within it Symond a Gentleman of the same family, by whom was pretended a better right in the same estate, and yet the Duke, who was withdrawne within Aquila, kept still the castle: and so after the expedition of these matters, he returned with Malatesta and Horace Baillon to Perouſa, of which place the Florentines had taken the defence, not so much of their owne counsell, as following the will of the Cardinall de Medici: wherein he was pushed on, either by a kind of hatred, that he nourished against the Duke of Vrbino and the Bailions, or by the impediment of their neighbourhood, which he thought might put in daunger the authority he had in Florence, or lastly, for that aspiring to the Popedom, he sought to carie the reputation that he alone was the defender of the Church during the Sea vacant, the Colledge of Cardinals hauing no care to defend anie part of the Ecclesiastike dominion, neither in Lombardy, in Tuscane, nor else where: the same proceeding partly by the diuision of the Cardinals, being no lesse full of ciuill factions, then wholly drowned in deepe ambition to climbe to the Popedom, and partly for that it could not be found neither in the treasure Pontificall, nor in the castle S. Angelo, that the late Pope had left any prouision of money: for such were his prodigalities that he had not onely consumed the moneyes which his predecessor had left him, with an incredible quantity of treasure which he had leuied of the creation of new officers, with a yearely diminution of forty thousand duckets of reuenue, but also he had left the Sea charged with huge debts, & layd to pawn al the precious iewels of the holy treasure: vpon which occasion was published this suttile speech, that other Prelacies ended with the death of Popes, but the Pontificacie of Leo was to continue many yeares after. Onely the Archbishop Vrbino was sent by the Colledge to Perouſa, to accord an vnite and reconciliation with the Bailions, but that deuise was no lesse vaine then the labour fruitlesse, for that the man was suspected to Gentill for the alliance he had with the sonnes of John Paule, and also for the conditions that were offered, bearing no surety for him: insomuch, as towards the last day of the yeare the Duke of Vrbino, Malatesta and Horace Baillon with Camilla Vrbino, who being followed of certaine voluntaries was newly vnited with them, went to Pont. S. John, and from thence running vp to the other places thereabouts, they did great domages as well by night as by day to the Citie of Perouſa, where ouer and besides fise hundred footmen which Gentill had leuied, the Florentines had sent thither two thousand footmen and an hundred light horsmen vnder Guido Vaino, and an hundred and twenty men at armes, and an hundred light horsmen vnder Vitelli.

This time was quiet in the Duchie of Millan, no other thing being done by either of the parties then certaine roades and pillages: and the better to execute those domages vpon places holden by the Church, those bands of Frenchmen which were remaining in Cremona being two thousand footmen, had set vpon a bridge vpon Paw, by the oportunitie wherof passing oftentimes vpon the territories of Plaisance and Parma, they did harmes to the whole countrie: and notwithstanding Prosper by the incitation of other Captaines did publish that he would take Trezzo, & had already sent thither artilleries, yet he forbore to put the deuise to execution, alleaging that it was not conuenient that the armie should be restrained to any one place, to the end to be the more able to succour the estates of the Church, if the French should begin to execute any action vpon them: but it seemed his thoughts were farre different from his words, for that when he was told that the French campe was planted before Parma, much lesse that he made anie signe to succour it, seeing he said it was more conuenient to expect the euent and issue; yea, that which more is, at such time as Plaisance remained disfurnished of garrison, for that the Swissers of the Cantons of Zurich, according to the summons of their Lords, were gone away in halle, Prosper did what he could to let the Marquis of Mantua for going from Millan with his bands: and he being put within Plaisance, sustained that citie to his great praise with the footbands of his estates, not sparing oftentimes to relieue their necessities with money.

Amid so manie daungers and variations, there was no prouision for the election of the new Pope, a matter which was deferred to the great preiudice of the estate Ecclesiastike, both to giue

time to the absent Cardinals to resort to Rome, & also for that the Cardinall of Turea going frō Tburin to Rome, was retained in Millan by commaundement from Prosper Colonna, to the end he should not assitt the assembly in the Cōclauē, for that he was a fauorer of the Frēch: vpo whose restraining the Colledge set down a decree, that so many dayes would they tary to enter the Cōclauē, how many the Cardinall Turea either had bin or should be stopped frō passing further: but as soone as he was deliuered, the Cōclauē assembled the xxvij. of Decēber, wherein were drawne together in solēne assembly nine & thirtie Cardinals: so much was increased the nūber by the immoderate promotiōs of Leo, at whose creatiō were not present aboue foure & twentie Cardinals.

The first Act of the yeare a thousand siue hundred two and twentie, was the mutation of the estate of Perousa, which according to the iudgement of men; hapned no lesse through the cowardise of the defendants, then by the valour of the assailants: who with their voluntaries and followers, were risen to a number of two hundred men at armes, three hundred light horsemen, and siue thousand footemen. This armie after it had lodged in the suburbs of Saint Peter, which they within had abandoned, gaue the fourth day of the yeare an assault with many numbers of ladders both at Saint Peters gate, Solions gate, and the gate Brōgnio, with many other places, hauing first remoued the defences of all these places with seuen field peeces which the Duke of Ferrara had lent them. The assault began about the breach of the day, and being many times relieued, it continued almost the whole day: and albeit entrie was made in two or three places of the towne, which onely was defended by the souldiers without the ayde of the people who stirred not, yet the assailants were alwayes repulsed with slaughter, which gaue no lesse courage to Gentill, then hope to the Florentine Agent, to be able to defend it still with no lesse felicitie and successe: but the timorousnesse of Vitelli was the cause that the matter drew an other euent: for fearing least the people bearing more inclination the sonnes of Iohn Paule then to Gentill, would rise in their fauours, and finding it withall a matter of no litle importance that they were bestowed in the suburbs betweene the two gates of Saint Peter: but principallie standing fearefull to loose his life vpon the ill euent of things, for the hatred which he knew the Duke of Vrbis and the sonnes of Iohn Paule bare to him; he signified in the night to the other Capitaines, that he would depart, alleaging that his presence would be to litle purpose for the seruice, for that the day before he had receiued at the assault a wound in his foote with a bullet, the anguish whercof constrained him to keepe his bed. Gentill and the other Capitaines laboured him with many requestes to chaunge that intention, wherein albeit they layd before him how hurtfull would be his departure to the whole seruice, & of no lesse ill example to the souldiers and people of the towne, yet they found him lesse apt to be remoued then belonged to a man of his place and valour, and in that inclination they ioyned with him to follow him: and so the same night they departed to Citta de Castello, leauing Perousa to receiue the Baillons, not without an incredible wonder to all those, who being aduertised by letters writtē the same night what good successe they within had the day before, heard within few houres after, how Vitelli and the residue had cowardly left it abandoned.

The election of the new Pope was not yet accomplished, which had bene deferred by reason of the discord that was amongst the Cardinals, deriuing principally from the Cardinall de Medicis who aspired to the place, and who could do much for the reputation of his greatnesse, & for his reuenues: he had also by the glory of the late conquest of Millan corrupted the voices of fiftene Cardinals, pushed on either by their proper interrests, or for the affection they bare to him, or by the memory of the benefites they had receiued of Pope Leo: yea some of them were carried with this hope, that though he should not be able to carie the soueraigne seate of the Popedom, yet he would at least beare fauour to those that had stood with him and for him: but many wayes his ambition was suspected, and many things were contrarie to his desire: for to many of them it seemed a matter most preiudiciall, that one of the familie should succede the dead Pope, and that in it would be concluded a President & example to dispose the Popedom by succession. All the elder sort of Cardinals obiected theselues against him, holding the dignitie of their time and grauitie much deprauid, to suffer the election to settle vpon one that had lesse then fiftie yeares of age. All those that were of the French part were against him, with whom did ioyn also some of the Imperiall factiō: for notwithstanding in the beginning the Cardinall Colonna gaue it out that he would fauour him, yet afterwards he opposed himselfe openly against him: as also all those companies of Cardinals that were ill contented with Pope Leo, declared themselves his enemies: neuertheless amid these difficulties, the thing that nourished him was, that he knew that such as were of his side, making more then a third part of the Colledge, so long as they stood vnited and constant, the election could not be accomplished without their consent: a matter which kept him delited in this hope; that with time his aduersaries would either be wearie or deuided, the rather for that there were of them who for their age and other infirmities, were not able to beare out a long paine: and withall, though they stood firme not to receiue him at all, yet he saw their diuersitie would keepe them from concluding the creation of another euerie one struing to transerre the election to his friend, & most of the retaining a seuered obstinacie not to giue place one to another. But the chaunge of the estate of Perousa did somewhat say the ambition of Cardinall de Medicis, by the instance of Cardinall Petrucci, one of the Cardinals of his faction: who being chiefe of the estate of Sienna, and fearing least by his absence there might happen some mutation in the Citie, whereunto he vnderstood the Duke of Vrbino would addresse his armie, did vehemently labour to aduance the election of the new Pope: his importunities together with the interest and consideration of the daunger which would fall vpon the state of Florence, if Sienna should happen to chaunge, drew the Cardinall de Medicis somewhat to incline and yeeld, and yet was not determined to whom to giue his voyce. At last they fell to the custome of lotting of voyces in the Conclau, wherein Cardinall Adrian Bishop of Derchuso was preferred without any affection or partialitie of voyce: he was of nation a Flemming, and in his youth hauing bene Schoolemaister to Cesar, and by his meane made Cardinall vnder Pope Leo, did at that time gouerne Spaine in the absence Cesar: and as there began some voyces to publish for him, so Cardinall Xisto one of that election, began vnder an Oration speciall, to recount and amplifie his vertues and knowledge, by whose example certaine other Cardinals yeelded, and the residue from hand to hand followed, though more by compulsion then by counsell. Thus was he chosen with the voyces of all the Cardinals, and had his creation perfected the same morning: wherein this was to be wondred at, that euen those that had elected him could giue no reason, why amid so many troubles and daungers in the estate Ecclesiastike, they had raised to the soueraigne sea, a straunger, a forreiner, and of long absence out of the countrey, and wherein were helping no respectes of fauour, no consideration of former merites, nor any couersation had with any of the other Cardinals: yea they scarcely knew his name; he had neuer bene in Italie, & had no hope nor cogitation to see it: of which strauagant maner of dealing, being not able to excuse themselves by any reason, they attributed all to the working of the holy Ghost, who is wont (so they alleaged) to inspire the hearts of the Cardinals in the electing of Popes: he receiued newes of his election in the towne of Victoria in Biskay, and would not haue imposed vpon him any other name then his owne, which he caused to be published vnder Adrian the sixth.

Vrbino and the Baillons before Sienna.

Vpon the mutation of Perousa, after the bandes of souldiers had lingred certaine dayes to march, not without some litle preiudice to their other businesse, they went (to the end to leaue monie of their friends) from Perousa & Todie, where Camilla Vrsin had restored the exiles. The Duke of Vrbino with the residue leauing Malatesta in Perousa, marched in great diligence towards Sienna, hauing with them Laclanco Petrucci, whom Pope Leo had depriued of the Bishoprike of Sienna, for that the Emperours officers had stayed Bourgesio & Fabio the sonnes of Pandolfo Petrucci from going fro Naples. Those that gouerned in Sienna had no other hopes then in the succours of the Florentins, and that by intelligence which they had with Cardinall de Medicis: at whose instance his faction ruling for him in his absence the estate of Florence, vnderstanding that the Duke of Vrbino was gone fro Perousa, dispatched presently to Sienna, Guido Vaino with an hundred light horsemen & prouision of money, to ioyne with them certaine bands of footmen which they of Sienna had leauied. But the principall foundation was vpon the forces appointed many dayes before: for, when they were aduertised of the first mouing of the Duke of Vrbino and the Baillons, & withall, hauing feare of Tuskane, they had solicited to wage the Swissers of the Canton of Berne, who being in number almost a thousand, were remaining within Bologna with the Bishop of Pistoia, making no reckening of the commaundements sent to them by their Lords to returne into Switzerland. This practise albeit it drew a longer time then was needefull by many difficulties objected by the Bishop of Pistoia, yet at last it was put in execution, not without great expences, besides the leauying of foure hundred Almaine footmen, who were ioyned in Bologna with the Swissers:

Swissers : they had also called out of Lombardie Iohn de Medicis, and with those forces arriuing in time, they made no doubt to assure the affaires of Sienna, which were now reduced to very ill termes, both for that the greatest part of the people enuid the present gouernement, and also for an ancient hatred against the Florentines, they could hardly endure that their bands of souldiers should enter into Sienna. But the matter that redoubled the danger present, was the absence of Cardinal Petrucchi, in whose place notwithstanding his nephew Frauncis did what he could to sustaine things, though his authoritie was not equall to the Cardinall: for this cause, being carefull either to auoid or to prolong the danger present, (wherein the principals & chieftaines were concurring) they had dispatched Enbassadours to the Duke of Urbino as soone as he was entered vpon the territories of Sienna: who notwithstanding required in the beginning a change of the state, and thirty thousand ducats; yet afterwards his demaunds were reduced to a moderatiō, in so much as it was to be feared greatly that there would grow betweene the Duke & the Siennesis some composition, either by the consent & priuie of the gouernors, or by the motion of the people against their wils. Neuerthelesse as the bands of the Florentines entred continually within Sienna, together with a brute running, that Iohn de Medicis approached with the Swissers, so such as impugned the accord & the solicitation of the same, tooke so much the more courage to hinder it from conclusion: so that the Duke being drawne neare to the wals with his armie, which contained but foure thousand footmen the most part leauied at random, he euenly left the enterprise of Sienna to retire into his estate, he hopes of the accord diminishing, and the Swissers being come within a dayes iourney.

The same companies that succoured Sienna turned towards Perousa, and the Florentines tooke occasion to execute speedily the thing which they desired, being thereunto also solicited by the Colledge of Cardinals: vnder whose name and authoritie the state of the Church was gouerned in the absence of the Pope, and by that reason the Cardinall Cortona, who from the time of Pope Leo was Legate of the Citie of Perousa, was personally in the armie. But since the creation of the Pope, there was in the Colledge no greater vnitie or resolution then had bene before in the Conclauē, but the variations were more apparant and their controuersies not lesse violent: for, they had set down an order, that euery moneth the affaires should be gouerned by three Cardinals bearing the title of Priors, whose office was to conuocate and assemble the residue and dispatch causes: of which the first three that were newly entred, began to oppose against the Cardinall Medicis, who was immediatly returned to Florence after the election of the Pope, and cried out that the bandes of the Florentines should do no harmes nor damage to the lands of the Church. These bands hauing already sacked the towne of Passignian refusing to lodge them, and afterwarde being bestowed within Olma three myles from Perousa, vnder an assured hope almost to cary that Citie, they had held small reckening of those commaundements, had not bene the knowledge when had of the vanitie of their hopes: for the familie of the Baillons had made to enter Perousa many bandes of souldiers, and bare besides a greater authoritie with the people then Gentili who followed the armie: in which regard no lesse despairing of the victorie, then hauing proceeded in vaine to cary it by composition, they retired somewhat about the borders of Perousa, as though they would not oppose against the wil of the Colledge. They entred into the countrey of Monfietro, which except Saint Leo and the rocke of Mainola, was wholly returned vnder the obedience of the Duke of Urbino: and after they had recouered it with more facilitie then losse, armes were depozed on that side as it were by a peaceable conuention, both for that the Duke was not sufficiently mighty to continue the warres with the Florentines, nor they had not cause to hold him in warre, neither for their owne profit, nor to content others: for, the Colledge wherein the aduersaries of Cardinall Medicis could do most, had at the same instant couenanted with him to retaine the estate which he had recouered vntill the Popes coming into Italie, & longer if it so pleased the Pope, & that he should not molest the Florentines nor the Siennesis, nor enter into confederacie with any Prince, nor any way communicate with him or administer to him.

Hitherunto the matters of Lombardie had bene in peaceable estate, the one part hauing want Alexandria of money, and the other no lesse necessitie of men: and therefore the souldiers of the Imperials taken by the who were not payed, refusing to stirre out of their lodgings, there was dispatched into Alexandria Imperials, onely Iohn Sasserella with his regiment, & other souldiers & subiectes of the Duchie of Mil-lan. This Captaine in the beginning of the warre changing a benefit certaine for hopes incertaine, left the pay of the Venetians to take the wages of the Duke of Mil-lan, notwithstanding he was banished from his estate . In which disposition of minde, and with a fortune more ready then a counsell stayed , he approached to Alexandria , where the rashnesse of the Guelfes defending the Citie more then the force of the French souldiers , made easie to him the action which all men esteemed hard: for that being issued out to skirmish with the enemies, and not able to sustaine the encounter, their disabilitie gaue them occasion to enter pellmell into the Citie, which by that accident more then through their valour , became a pray to the victors , and a reproch to the vanquished: and not many dayes after with the same facilitie, were chased out of Ast, certaine bands of the French being there entred, by the meane of certaine particulars of the Guelfes faction.

Ten thousand Swissers desired into the Duchie of Millan for the Fréichlung.

But of this short and suspected quietnesse , there were already discerned to grow on beginnings of verie great troubles: for, notwithstanding in the Parliaments of the Swissers , there were great contentions risen vpon the demands of the French King, wherein as the Cantons of Zurich and Zurich stood obstinate against him , and the Canton of Lucerna wholly with him, and the residue deuided amongst themselves , so also the publike affaires were troubled by the couetousnesse of priuate persons, some demanding of the King pension and entertainment present, & some requiring their old payes and debts due in times past : yet they accorded to him at last those proportions of footemen, which he required for the recouerie of the Duchie of Millan: which leauie making a number of more then ten thousand bodies , descended into Lombardie by the mountaines of S. Bernard and S. Goddard, and were conducted by the bastard of Sauoy great Maister of Fraunce, and by Galeas S. Senerin maister of the horse. About this time the king of England being estraunged from the amitie of the French, had lent to Cesar a great quantitie of money , the better to furnish him against so great an emotion : and with that money the Emperour had sent Ierome Adorno to Trent, to leaue sixe thousand Launceknights, & to leade them to Millan, together with the person of Frauncis Sforce: his comming was the esteemed of great importance, both to keepe contained & constant, Millan and the other places of that estate which greatly desired his presence, & also by his authoritie & fauours to make easie the exactions of money whereof there was extreame want. At the same time they of Millan not knowing the prouisiōs that Cesar made, had sent money to Trent to wage foure thousand footemen, & they being prepared by that time that Adorno came thither, he left the other sixe thousand to be made ready , and with these foure thousand drew towards Millan to descend to Coma by the vale of Volturna. And albeit the Grisons denied to giue him passage, yet his celeritie & valour made his way, passing with so great diligence vpon the territories of Bergama, & fro thence to Guia-radadda, that the Venetian gouernours who were within Bergama, had no time to stop them. And after he had led these first companies of Launceknights to Millan, he returned with the same diligence to Trent, to guide thither Frauncis Sforce with the residue of that leaue. In Millan there was no care omitted to make all sorts of prouisiōs, wherein this was chiefly obserued, to forget no meanes that might augment the hatred, of the people against the French, to prepare them the better to defend themselves, and to relieue the common necessities with money . To this action was much helping many counterfet letters and false messages, together with other cunning stratagemes proceeding from the diligence & art of Moron. But the thing that most of all aduanced so great an inclination, was the preachings and Sermons of Andrew Barbato a religious man of the order of S. Augustin, who drawing to him a wonderfull cōcourse and affluence of people, induced them with reasons and perswasions to take vpon them the defence of their liues , and the redeeming of their free countrey from the yoke of straungers, auncient enemies to that Citie: he willed them not to be lesse forward to execute, then God was ready to raise them a meane to set themselves at libertie: he told them , the soueraigne care of mortall folkes was to care for their proper safety: he reduced to their memories the example of Parma, a weake & small citie in compariōn of Millan, and left not vnrecorded the actions of their Elders whose names had caried reputation & glory throughout all Italie: he layed out by reasons and examples, how far mortall men were bound to defend their countrey , for the which if the Gentiles who expected no other recompence then glorie , offered their liues willingly to death: the far greater was the office and bond of Christians, to whom, dying in so iust and holy an enterprise, was prepared for recompence, not the glory of this world fraile and transitorie, but the fruition of the immortal kingdome, infinite and euerlasting. They had to consider, what vniuersall ruine would be brought vpon that Citie by the victorie of the Frenchmen, whose yoke if it had seemed heavy & grieuous afore, their burdē now could not be lesse the extreame & intollerable; and

and by how much their rigour ragged vpon them without any cause afore, by so much had they to assure themselves of extreame oppression now vpon the occasion of these offences: That one execution of the people of Millan would not suffice to quench the thirst of their crueltie and hatred: That the goods of the Citie could not satisfie their immoderate couetousnesse: yea nothing could content them but the vtter defacing of the name and memorie of the inhabitants of Millan, and by a horrible example to surpass the vnnaturall crueltie of Federike Barberousse. These speeches so redoubled the hatred of the inhabitants, and no lesse suppressed all feare of the victorie of the Frenchmen, that it seemed now more necessarie to appease and retaine them, then to moue or prouoke them; such is the power of speeches aptly deliuered and duly respecting time, place, and all other circumstances concurring with the inclination of the people to whom they are pronounced. But in this meane while Prosper was not idle to repaire and relieue the bastillions and rampiers of the trenches, with intention to stay at Millan, which he hoped to be able to defend for certaine moneths, though the fixe thousand Swissers came not at all. And looking also to the defence of the other townes, he dispatched to Nouaro, Philip Torniello, and to Alexandria Monsieur Viscount, the one with two thousand, and the other with fifteene hundred Italian footemen, who liued vpon the people for that they were not payd: he sent also to Paula Ant. de Lena with two thousand Launceknights and a thousand Italians. And ouer and aboue all these proportions, he kept within Millan seuen hundred men at armes, seuen hundred light horsemen, and twelue thousand footemen: onely the present daunger that remained was, that the Frenchmen should not enter Millan by the Castell; therefore aswell to remedie that, as by the same meane to stop them for putting victuals or other prouisions into the Castell, Prosper with an intention highly esteemed, and in the iudgement of men supposed wonderfull, caused to cast without the Castell betweene the gates that leade to Vercell & to Coma, two trenches with a banke or rising to either of the same of that earth that was throwne vp. These two trenches were distant one from another twenty pases, and in longitude they contained almost a myle, euen as long as is the traueserfe of the gardens behind the Castell betweene the two wayes aforesayd: at either head of these two trenches, he erected a fort both high and well manned, the better to annoy the enemies with shot if they made their approches on that side. This was the vse of these two trenches, being well defended with footemen that were placed in the midst of the same: they both kept that no succours should enter into the Castell, and withall would not suffer any of the besieged to issue out: Fortune also expressed with a glad some token, that such an inuention should be no lesse happie, then it was full of wit and deuise: for she ministred to it this fauour, that it might be put in execution without any damage at all, for that Prosper seruing his turne of the benefite of a great snow that fell, caused to be cast before day two bankes or risings of snow (and to their resemblance or example he cast also trenches) which shadowed and couered from the shot of the Castell the labourers that wrought: & that which also helped to aduance the worke to perfection, was the impedimēt which the Swissers in passing the mountaines receiued by the snow, which was wonderfull deepe and thicke.

In this meane while Monsieur de Lawtrech readdressed and reassembled his companies, of whom he sent certaine bandes beyond Pau, and they entring Florenzola, strippd the guidon of horsemen of Lewis Gonzaguo whom they found sleeping in securitie and negligēce. The companies also of the Venetians were mustred about the confines of Cremona, vnder Andrew Gritti & Theodor Triunlce, and they ioyning at last with the Swissers, passed the riuer of Adda the first day of March. M. de Lawtrech was generall of the armie, whose authoritie was nothing diminished by the coming of the great Maister nor the Maister of the horse. And at the same time came to the armie Iohn de Medicis, who albeit he had solicited and almost resoluēd to enter into the pay of Frauncis Sforce, and was already vpon the way to go to Millan, where he was greatly desired for the good opinion that was of his valour and conduct: yet he was caried by the benefite of greater offers & more suretie of payment of the French king, taking this excuse, that there was not sent to him from Millan the summes of money that were promised him. In which respect, & in which disposition he went to the territories of Parma, where he had sacked the towne of Busselte, for that they had denied him lodging, and passed to the campe of the Frenchmen which lay within two myles of the Castell betweene the said wayes of Vercell & Coma. The third day after the Frenchmen were incamped, they marched in order making as though they would set vpon the trench and rampier, which notwithstanding they did not execute, either for that such was the intention of Monsieur de Lawtrech from the beginning, or else waighing together with the number of souldiers that were within, the disposition of the people, and the readinesse that appeared in the defendants, the manifest difficultie of the enterprise drew him from it. The same day the stones that violently were driuen frō a house within by the furie of the artilleries, slue Marcel Anthonie Colonna a Captaine of very great expectation: Camilla Trimalce bastard sonne to John Jacques participated also in this lamentable destinie as they walked together along the breache that was striken, deuising to raise a mount to strike with the artilleries betweene the two benches of the enemies. But Lawtrech hauing no confidence to take Millan by assault, thought he should be able to carie it with the longnesse of time, for that with the multitude of his horsemen, & great bands of banisht men that followed his armie, with whom he ouerranne the whole countrey, he gaue great impediments to the entrie of victuals: he caused to be broken downe all the milles, and turned away the course of such waters as any way gaue reliefe or commoditie to them of Millan: he was not also out of hope, that the payes would faile to the souldiers within, being hitherto entertained but with the money of the Millanois, for that Cesar sent a very small quantitie from the kingdome of Naples or other places. But such was the hatred of the people of Millan against the French, and so vniuersall their desire to haue their new Duke, that their affections therein did not onely make their patience greater then all discommodities, but also much lesse that those aduersities made them chaunge will, seeing it was the thing that did more and more confirme them, yea the youth of their Citie ranne voluntarily to armes, of whom they created Captaines in euery Parish, in so much that the gardes that with a ready diligence ranne day and night to the places furthest off removed from the armie, ministred no litle succour and comfort to the souldiers: and wanting the vse of milles at that time, for that they were ruined by the enemie, they relieued forthwith that aduersitie with the seruice of handmilles.

Thus the hope of the speedy victory of the warre, being reduced into the labours and cares of a long siege, the Duke of Millan whose departure had bene many dayes foreflowed for want of money, and had yet lingred if the Cardinal Medicis had not succoured him with nine thousand duckats, departed at last from Trenta with fixe thousand Launceknights, and taking the rocke of Croara belonging to the Venetians, the better to open his passage, he marched without any impediment through the lands of Verona and Mantua. And passing the riuer of Paw to Casalmajor, he arriued at Plasance, where the Marquis of Mantua came to him with three hundred me at armes, and accompanied him from hence to Pania: There the Duke stayed to expect occasiō to passe to Millan, where he was wished with an vniuersall expectation, for that by the dayly diminution of meanes to leaue money to entertaine the souldiers, it was thought necessarie to ioyne assoone as might be with the Launceknights, and so to take the field and seeke to put end to the warre. But the difficultie to passe was great, for that assoone as Lawtrech vnderstood they were in Plasance, he went to lodge at Casina siue myles from Millan, vpon the way that leades to Pania: he had also bestowed the Venetians within Binasquo which is vpon the same way, both the one and the other being in lodgings well rampiered and fortified: where after they had remained certaine dayes, and in that space had taken S. Ange and S. Colombano, Monsieur de Lawtrech, vnderstanding that Monsieur d'Escud his brother whom he had sent into Fraunce to relate to the king the estate of the affaires, was returned, and both with money and bands of footmen which he had waged at Genes, was arriued in the estate of Millan: he sent to ioyne with him Federike Bossolo with foure hundred Launces & seuen thousand Swissers & Italians. Against whō albeit the Marquis of Mantua issued out of Pania & went to Gambala to make head against them, yet he retired estfoories to Pania, hauing an opinion that his abode within Gambala would be to litle purpose, either for that (this was his saying) they made as though they would retire towards Tbesin, or els (which was more credible) he stood in some feare of them, for that their numbers were greater then had bin reported to him. But they being come to Gambala, and being ioyned with Monsieur d'Escud, they went to Nouaro, which after they had battred with the artilleries of the Castell that held for thē, they entred it by force at the third assault, with the slaughter of the greatest part of the footmen that were within, and Phillip Torniello remaining prisoner. For this accident together with the redoubled letters of Torniello appealing to him for succours, the Marquis of Mantua issued once againe out of Pania, returning estfoones thither assoone as he had knowledge how things went, went, retiring his companies from Vigenena, and leaving onely garrison within the Castell. The Francis Sforce joining of forces with Monsieur d'Escud and the taking of Novaro, was preiudiciall to the French at Millan. men in a matter of greatest importance, for that it was so much the more easie for Francis Sforce to go with his armie of Launceknights to Millan. It was agreed betweene Prosper and him to depart one night in secret from Paia, leaving for the gard of the same two thousand footemen and three hundred horsemen, vnder the charge of the Marquis of Mantua, who refused to passe any further, for that he would not be so far remoued from the estate of the Church. Francis Sforce taking a haunge and vncouth way, was receiued at Sesto by Prosper, who was gone to meete him with part of his companies, and so to guide him to Millan. Great was the ioy that the people of Millan made to receiue him, and euery one reducing to his memorie the felicitie wherein they had liued in that estate vnder his father and other Dukes of that name, made their desires so much the more infinite, by how much they doubted not that in a naturall and proper Prince could want no affection to his people to respect and esteeme them, and not to reiect or disfaue them for his immoderate greatnesse.

After the Duke was gone from Paia, Lamirech entred into hope to be able to take that Citie, and vpon foundation of that confidence, he went to encampe there as soone as he had reassembled his armie. And of the other side Prosper, not ignorant in what daunger it was, dispatched thither in great diligence a thousand footmen Corsekays, with certaine bands of Spaniards, who charging vpon a sudden the lodging of the French armie, passed through, partly marching and partly fighting. In which encounter making slaughter of many of the Frenchmen, they made way by their owne valour, and arriued in safetie in Paia, where were many incommodities, but specially great want of gunpowder. Monsieur Lamirech began to batter the walles in two parts, in the suburbes of Saint Marie imperico towards Tessin, and in the Burget. And after he had brought to the earth thirtie fadomes of the wall, he gaue the assault, but without any issue or good successe: in so much as seeing into the valour of the defendants, and their vniuersall resolution to sell their liues with the place, he began to dispaire of the enterprise. Besides, he was afflicted dayly with many other difficulties, both for the diminution of the treasure which his brother had brought out of France, and also by the generall necessitie of victuals through the armie, the same happening by the occasion of great raines: by the impediments whereof it was hard for the armie to be reuictualled by land, and lesse possibilitie of reliefe by the benefite of Tessin, for that the boates being driuen backe by the streame of the riuer which was great and violent, could not hold course against the furie of the streame.

About this time Prosper was issued out of Millan with his whole armie, to draw neare to Paia, but by reason of the raines and stormes that fell, he was constrained to stay at Binasqua, a place in the halfe way betweene Millan and Paia: and from thence aduancing as farre as the Charterhouse, which is within the Parke about fime miles from Paia, and haply the fairest monasterie in Italy, Lamirech dispaired to take Paia, and therefore retired his campe to Landriano, without receiuing any other impediment of the enemies, then certaine light skirmishes in the breaking vp. From Landriano he went to Monce, to receiue with more facilitie and readinesse the monies that were sent to him out of France, which were stayed at Arona, for that Anchisa Visconti sent for that purpose from Millan to Busto which is neare to Arona, stopped the that they could not passe further. This was the impediment that reduced the affaires of the French into the extreme or last disorder, for that the Swissers impatient by custome of all delayes, finding their payes deferred many dayes, sent their Captaines to M. Lamirech to make their complaints, that their nation hauing bin in all times liberal of their blood and seruice for the aduancement of the crowne of France, they were now restrained of their duties & payments, contrary to all equitie, order, and reason: That vnder this ingratitude and iniurie, it was manifest to all the world what slender estimation was made of their vertue and their faith: That after a vaine expectation of so many dayes, they were now determined to repose no more in promises, speeches, and termes, which so many times had bene falsified, though much to their hinderance and preiudice, yet not without dishonor and reproch to such as did assure them: and therefore they were now absolutely determined to The Swissers would leaue the French armie for that they are not payed. returne to their houses, after they had first made knowne to all the world, that the thing that induced them thereunto, was not any feare they had of their enemies who had now taken the field, and much lesse anie desire to eschue such daungers as men of warre are subiect vnto; a matter which alwayes had bin contemned by the Swissers, as many experiences & examples can witnesse. They told him withall that they were ready to go to the battell the day following, with intention to depart the day after: That therefore he would leade them to the field, and vsing the occasion of their readinesse, to bestow them in the first front of the whole armie: That they hoped that as with farre lesser forces they had vanquished the French armie in their owne tentes about the borders of Nonaro, so their valour was no lesse able to make them carie the victorie ouer Spaniards, who albeit were farre aboue the Frenchmen in deceits, suttleties, and ambushes, yet they esteemed themselves nothing inferiour to them so long as they were to fight with valiancie & force of armes. But Monsieur de Lawtrech considering in what perill he should abide the enemies in their tents, laboured to moderate that fury of the Swissers, & by sufferance to seeke to stay those mindes whom he saw obstinate to be contained by reason: he told them that though the moneyes were long in comming, yet the danger of the wayes was more to be considered then the default of the King: he assured them that ere many dayes they should be possessed of the thing which their impacience made to doubt of, and that their hopes should be no more prolonged, but their desires satisfied. But he could not winne nor reclaime them, neither with authoritie, with petitions, with promises, nor with reasons, and therefore since they should be the first that should feele the daunger, he determined rather to aduenture the battell with a great disaduauntage, then to loose vtterly the warre, which manifestly was scene to be lost, for that if he consented not to fight, the Swissers were resolued to depart.

The armie of the enemy lay at Bucocque, a towne within three myles of Millan, where is a camping place verie romthie and large; enuironed with great gardens, and they inclosed with verie deepe ditches, hauing their fieldes about full of fountaines and brookes deriued and conueyed according to the vsage of Lombardie, to water the medowes. Monsieur de Lawtrech issuing out of Monce drew towards that place with his armie, and supposing that the enemies lying in a place of aduauntage would not come out of it, he raunged and ordered his bandes in this sort: That the Swissers with the artilleries should charge the front of the place and the artilleries of the enemy, which quarter was garded by the Launceknights commaunded by George Frondisberg: That on the left had Monsieur d'Escud with three hundred Launces & a squadron of footmen French and Italians should be vpon the way that goeth to Millan, and should draw towards the bridge by the which might be made an entrie into the lodgings of the enemies: and for his part he would labour to enter vpon their place with an esquadron of horsemen: which enterprise he hoped to guide to good successe rather by art then by open force, for that to abuse them the more, he caused his people to put vpon their cassakins, the red. crosse, which is the marke of the armie Imperiall, and pulled off the white crosse, which is the signe of the French armie. On the other side Prosper Colonne, who for the situation and strength of the place held the victorie certaine, and therefore determined to abide the enemies vpon the ditch; caused all his companies to arme as soone as he heard of their comming, and hauing appointed to euerie one his place, he sent forthwith to Frauncis Sforce to come to the campe with that multitude of people that was armed: and hauing assembled at the ringing of the bell, foure hundred horsemen and sixe thousand footemen, he was appointed by Prosper to the gard of the bridge. But as soone as the Swissers were approached neare the tentes of the enemies, notwithstanding that for the height of the ditches more rising then they supposed, they could not assaile the artilleries according to their first hopes, yet those difficulties nothing diminishing their valour, they gaue a charge vpon the ditch, struiuing with a wonderfull courage to enter and carie it. And at the same time Monsieur d'Escud who was drawn towards the bridge, finding so great a gard contrarie to his opinion, was constrained to retire. Prosper also discouered immediatly the deuise of Lawtrech, and to meete with it commaunded his people to put vpon their heads bundels or handfuls of young corne and grasse, and so made vnprofitable the former suttelties: so that the whole swaigh or burden of the warre lay vpon the Swissers: who, as well for the great disaduauntage they had, as for the valour of the defendants, were much trauelled without any profit or effect: they receiued many harmes not onely by such as fought in the front, but also were galled by certaine harguebuziers Spanish: who lying hid and couered with the height of the corne almost full ripe, flanked them, and so played vpon them with assured aime, that in the end after they were well payed for their rashnesse by the slaughter of many of their companies, the violence of the shot compelled them to retire : and ioyning in their retraite with the French, they returned all together in good order to Monce, both leading with them their artilleries, & receiuing no distresse in their retiring : the Marquis of Pesquero with other Captaines importuned Prosper to giue a signe to pursue the enemy, seeing they had alreadie giuen their backs : but he beleeuing that which was, that they retired in good order and not in flying, wherein he was confirmed by the relation of certaine discouersers mounted by his direction vpon certain high trees, made this answer, that it was not reasonable to referre to the arbitrement of fortune the victory which was assuredly gotten, and lesse counsell to deface by his proper rashnesse the memory and imputation of other mens temeritie : to morow saith he, will make manifest to you what hath bin donethis day, for that the enemies comming to a better feeling of their wounds, and by their harme receiued, being warned to auoyd worse hurts to come, will seeke to returne ouer the mounts, by which honourable euasion we shall obtaine with securitie that which this day wee should aduenture to get with perill. There were found dead about the ditch three thousand bodies of the Swissers, of such as being more valiant and forward were most resolute to vanquish the daunger : of them were two and twentie Captaines : on the other side the slaughter was litle, and not one person of marke or qualitie except Iohn de Cardona Count Culifano stricken with a small shot through his helmet. The day following Monsieur de Lawtrech being wholly deprived of the hope of the victorie, went to Monce to passe the riuer of Adda neare to Tresse : and from thence the Swissers taking their way through the territories of Bergama, returned into their mountaines, their numbers being no lesse diminished then their valour, for that it is certaine that the harmes they receiued at Bicocqua so much afflicted them, that in many yeares after they expressed not their accustomed valour. The great Master and Master of the horse departed at the same time together with many French Captaines : Monsieur Lawtrech with his companies of men at armes went to Cremona to giue order for the defence of that citie, wherein he left his brother : and not manie dayes after he passed the mounts, carying to the French king not reports of victories or triumphs, but a iustification of himselfe, with complaints against others for the losse of such an estate, hapning partly by his owne errors, partly by the negligence and indiscretion of some about the king, and partly by the malice of fortune, if such attribution may be lawfull. Monsieur Lawtrech tooke order also afore his departure from Cremona, that Bonneuall and Federike Bossolo with fixe companies of men at armes, and sufficient garrison of footmen, should enter the towne of Loda, which had bene holden for the king during the whole course of the warre : he did this for that the Imperiall Captaines were let to conuert thither forthwith their forces, by reason of a tumult hapned amongst those companies of Launceknights which Frauncis Sforce had brought from Trent : they required for a reward of the victorie to haue a moneths pay, a demaund which the Captaines sayd was no lesse vnreasonable then vnjust, for that both there was a great difference betweene the defending of themselves from such as did assault them, and to vanquish those that did charge them, and also for that it could not be sayd that the enemies were vanquished, who were retired not in flying, but in good order, carying with them their artilleries and traines. Neuerthelesse, the insolency of the Launceknights preuailing more then either necessarie reason or due authoritie of the Captaines, a consent was made more by compulsion and necessity of things then by iust cause arising, and so they were satisfied with a promise to be paid within a certaine time. After many dayes past in these affaires, it hapned that the same day that the French Launces entred the Citie of Loda, and the footbands following, on the other side came the armie Imperiall, and afore them all the Marquis of Pesquero with the Spanish footmen, who entred afore the French could deuide or distribute the quarters of the towne, or bestow their gards, but were occupied in confusion and tumult, as often hapneth when men of warre enter a towne to lodge in it. This occasion was obserued by the Marquis, and ioyning ready diligence to the present oportunitie, he assaulted one of the suburbs of the towne, which was enuironed with a wall, where he found no great resistance : he was no sooner entred, then all the Frenchmen within the towne, no lesse terrified with the sodainnesse of the accident, then desperate for that their footmen were not yet come, yeelded to their feares and drew into tumult, flying towards the bridge which they had built vpon Adda : the Spaniards entring at the same instant the citie, some by the walles and some by the rampiers, followed them euen to the riuer, and in the chase tooke many souldiers, and almost all the Captaines except Federike and Bonneuall: and vpon their returne, they forbore not in that furie to sacke that vnfortunate citie, sparing no more the goods, then they had done the liues of men. From Loda the Marquis went to Pisqueton which he tooke by composition: and not many dayes after Prosper with the whole armie passed the riuer of Adda, to go and incampe afore Cremona, which he had no sooner approached, then Monsieur d'Escud began to hearken to accord: he had no other hope to sustaine the warre then vpon the coming of the Lord Admirall, whom the king (desiring to preserue that which yet held good for him in that estate) sent into Italy with foure hundred Lances and ten thousand footemen: and therefore he thought he did good seruice to the present affaires, if without danger he could temporize and entertaine things in tranquillitie, till he saw what would be the issue of his expectation of the Admirall. And on the other side Prosper desired to rid himselfe speedily of the affaires of Cremona; to haue the better opportunity to reestablish within Genes the brethren of the family of Adorna, and that afore Italy were posselt of the new succours of the enemies: insomuch as the capitulations bare that Monsieur d'Escud should depart out of Cremona within fortie dayes with all his souldiers, artilleries, and ensignes displayed, if within that time (which determined the xxvj. of Iune) there came not to him such a rescue as either might make him able by force to passe the riuer of Paw, or else to take one of those cities in the state of Millan which was possessed with garrison: that likewise he should procure that all those places and holds within the Duchy that were kept for the king, should be abandoned, except the Castles of Millan, Cremona, and Nouaro: that for the obseruation of these covenants, he should deliuer foure ostages: that there should be restitution of prisoners on both parts, and sufferance to the Frenchmen to passe in surety into Fraunce with their artilleries and traines.

Vpon the conclusion of this accord, and receiuing of the ostages, the armie of Cesar marched forthwith to Genes, which they approached in two places: the Marquis of Pesquiere with his regiments of Spanish footmen and Italians, were incamped on that side of Codisa, and Prosper with the men at armes and Launceknights vpon the opposite of Bisagnia: at that time the Citie of Genes was gouerned by Duke Ottavian Fregosa, a Prince of excellent vertue, and no lesse for his iustice then for his other good parts, as greatly beloued in that Citie, as any Prince may be in townes full of factions, retaining yet a memorie of their ancient liberty: he had waged two thousand Italian footmen, in whose confidence he laid vp all his hope of defence, for that the peoples of the towne being deuided by factions, and hauing about him so mightie an armie compounded vpon so great diuersity of languages and nations, forbore to take armes, but stood to behold things in the same maner, and with the same eyes wherewith in other times he was wont to behold his other trauels: wherein without the daunger or damage of such as tooke no armes, the publike authoritie being transported from one familie to another, there was scene no other mutation, then that in the pallace of the Duke were bestowed other inhabitants, other Captaines, and other bands of souldiers for the guard of the place. Assoone as the armie was approached the towne, the Duke began to sollicite composition by the meane of Bennet Vivaldi a Genoway, whom he sent to the Captaines: but this solicitation began to grow cold by the coming of Peter of Nauarre, who being sent by the French king with two light Gallies for the surety of Genes, entred the haven at the same instant: neuerthelesse the Marquis beginning to execute his artilleries and batter the walles, they began more then before to recontinue the parley for accord: wherein all difficulties being debated and resolved, and the matter vpon termes of conclusion, sodainly the Spaniards, who all that day had battred a tower neare to the gate, won the same, finding no guard nor order by the defendants, who were abused through their hope of composition: insomuch as following more their fortune then regarding their fidelity, they ioyned diligence to the occasion, and began to enter the city aswell by that tower, as by the wall that was reuerfed & ruined: by their exāple all that part of the armie ran to the action, and after the Marquis had set his bands in order, & signified to Prosper the state of the accidēt, they caused the trūpets to be sounded and entred the Citie by whole numbers: the calamitie of the defendants tooke away all resistance, the souldiers giuing themselves to flie, and the Citizens to seeke surety in shutting themselves in their houses: the Archbishop of Salerne, the Captaine of the guard, and many other Captaines and souldiers found safetie in certaine vessels, with the which they hoysed saile into the sea: the Duke for his disease not able to stirre, caused to shut the pallace, and sent to the Marquis of Pesquiere

Pesquero that he would yeeld to him, in whose house he died within few moneths after: Peter Nauarre was taken; all the goods of the Citie became a pray to the victors, manie rich families binding themselves some to one band of souldiers and some to another, to buy the safetie of their liues with great summes of money, which they assured either with pawnes and gages, or with bills of Merchants; and so with their money defended their bodies from bloud, and redeemed their houses from sacking: in the same maner was preserved the plot so famous which they call Carnia, and is kept with great reuerence in the Cathedrall Church. It is hard to recount what quantities of siluer vessell, jewels, mony, and most rich wares were made pillage, that Citie by the great assike of marchandize being replenished with infinite wealth: and yet so great a calamitie was so much the more easie and tollerable, by how much was aptly expressed a compassion by the brethren of the family of Adorna, who both of a naturall affection to the Citie, and for that the inhabitants had shewed no token of grudge or hatred, and for that also they were almost vpon the point of accord, procured such order to be set downe by the Captaines, that not one Genoway was made prisoner, nor the bodie of one woman put to violation. Immediately vpon the appeasing of the souldiers Antho. Adorna was elected Duke, who after the armie was gone encamped before the Castellet with such artilleries as the Florentines lent him: the third day he tooke the Cittadell and Saint Frauncis Church, and the day after the Castellet was rendered to him by the Captaine vnder articles of composition.

The mutation of Genes tooke from the French king all hope to be able to succour the affaires of Lombardy: for, both the armie that he sent, and by this time arriued vpon the territories of Ast, returned backe againe, and also M. d'Escud passed into Fraunce with his cōpanies, hauing stayed certaine dayes in Cremona about the tearme appointed for the resolving of certaine difficulties hapning about the castles of Tressa, Lecqua and Domussolo: in his departure he had not onely faith and promise kept with him, but also was honourably receiued wheresoever he passed.

But amid these broyles and alterations in Lombardy, Bologna stood not altogether in quiet, as well for the warre that was in Lombardy, as for the absence of the Pope: and much lesse did Tuscane reioyce in any great tranquillity; for touching Bologna, Hanniball Bentiuole ioyning with him Hanniball Rangon, leauied secretly an armie of foure thousand footemen, with whom and with three peeces of artilleries, one morning vpon the first appearing of the day, they made their approches on that side to the mountaines: and for that they in the towne made no brute, some of them passed the ditch, and fastened their ladders to the wall: but the inhabitants within, who had knowledge of their comming the day before, began to make a noyse and to stirre when they saw time, and to giue to fire the artilleries, & sending out also many troupes to begin the skirmish, the armie forthwith fell to flight, leauing their artilleries behind, and in the chase Hanniball Rangon was hurt in the backe. It was assuredly iudged, that this enterprize was attempted by the procurement and priuity of Cardinall Medicis, who fearing least the Pope at his comming into Italy, either of his owne counsell or by the incitation of others, would diminish his greatnesse, sought first to trouble him for so great a losse of the estate Ecclesiastike, and so by that meane not onely to conuert his thoughts to other matters then to persecute him, but also he should be constrained to haue recourse to his aide and counsell.

But farre more tedious and great were the trauels of Tuscane, for that scarcely was the estate of Sienna assured of the Duke of Vrbis, and the affaires of Perousa and Montfelire ceased, then the French king by the suggestion of Cardinall Volterro, gaue order of new that Ranse de Cere lying at Rome and not employed, should practise to change the estate of Florence, and to reestablish in that Citie, the brothers and nephewes of Cardinall Volterro, who was manifestly declared against the house of Medicis, with all his friends, and cōfederates of the king: but because the king at that time was in great necessittie, the Cardinall was to aduaunce for this enterprize all necessarie summes of mony, receiuing the kings promise to repay them within a certaine time. Whilest Ranse was making his preparations, these matters came to the knowledge of the Cardinall Medicis, the consideration whereof, fearing also least the Duke of Vrbis should stirre, compelled him to make this accord, that without prejudice to the rights which the Florentines and the Duke pretended to the townes in Montfelire, the Duke should be Captaine generall of the common weale for one yeare cōplete, & for another yeare at pleasure, and the time of his pay to begin the first day of the next moneth of September. For the same cause he retained in the pay of the Florentines Horace

Baillon, but with this condition, that the time of his pay should not begin vntill Iune, for that he was entertained and bound to the Venetians for so long. And albeit this contract was likewise made in the name of his brother Maletesta, yet he would not ratifie it, hauing afore receiued money to be ioyned with Ranſe de Cere with a charge of two thousand footemen and an hundred light horſemen. On the one ſide he would not openly blemiſh his proper honour, and on the other ſide he was loath to prouoke the Cardinall and the Florentines by new occaſions: therefore to wade in a meane betweene both, he fained himſelf to be ſicke, and ſent to Ranſe being ſent to the borough of Pienza two thousand footemen, an hundred light horſemen, and foure falconets, making excuſe by the rage of his ſickeſſe that he was not able to go in perſon: and to the Cardinall he gaue hope that he would take no more new payes of the enemy, and that as ſoone as the terme were finiſhed for the which he was payed, he would ratifie the contract made in his name & in the meane time would proceede with as great moderation as he could in ſuch actions as he could not reſuſe for the payes he had receiued. After this Ranſe entred into the territory of Sienna with ſiue hundred horſe and ſeuē thouſand footemen, with intention to praſtiſe the mutation of that gouernement with the trayne of the ſelfe ſame exiles which had followed the Duke of Vrbino: wherein if the enterpriſe had drawne to good iſſue, it was not to be doubted that hauing power by that meane to enter on that ſide into the bowels of the Florentine dominion, that the like ſucceſſe had not followed him touching the particular of Florence. But the Florentines no leſſe foreſeeing that danger, then deſiring that the enemies ſhould not approach to Sienna, had ſent to that ſtate all their regiments of men of war, vnder the conduct of Guido Rangon elected for that emotion generall of the armie: he had this ſpeciall intention, both to temporize with the enemies, to makethem loſe time, for that he was not ignorant that without expedition they would fall into want of money: & alſo vnder one time to vſe all the impediments he could to cut off & ſtop their victuals: ſo that gouerning himſelfe according to the proceedings of the enemies, he laboured to put ſeueral gariſons into thoſe townes that were neareſt the eſtate of the Siennois and the Florentines. In which remouing of ſouldiers from one place to another, it hapned that the guidon of horſemen of Vitelli going from Torrito to Aſinalongo, encountred on the way with three hundred horſemen of the enemies and were ouerthrowne, Ieronimo de Peppoli Lieutenant to Vitelli being taken priſoner with fifty men at armes & two enſignes: Ranſe addreſſed himſelf firſt to the Citie of Chinſa, a Citie more noble for the memorie of her antiquitie and the renowned actes of Porſene her king, then for her fortunes and conditions preſent: his hope was deceived to carie it, bringing with him no other ſortes of artilleries then foure falconets, a force farre too weake to take townes that are defended with ſouldiers. He marched further betweene Torrito and Aſinalongo, to draw neare to Sienna, but hauing no commoditie of victuals amid ſo many townes of the enemies, and ſeeing to get ſome by force, he aſſailed the borough of Torrito, where was in gariſon an hundred men at armes of Guido Rangon and ſiue hundred footemen: but he leaued his campe from thence without doing any thing to aduaunce his purpoſe, & keeping his way, he went to Moteliſſe, & from thence to Bagno de Rapolano within twelue myles of Sienna, in which citie the Florentines in the beginning had beſtowed the Count Petillano: but the Count Guido, by whole diligence and celeritie all theſe deuifes were preuented, entred the ſame day into Sienna with two hundred light horſemen, leauing his armie behind to follow after: ſo that what for the ſuccours that approached, and the reputation of Ranſe which was greatly diminished in this expedition aſwell with his owne companies as amongeſt the enemies, together with the knowledge they that he was reduced to a great neceſſitie of victuals, brought no litle diſcourage to them of Sienna, to whom could haue bene acceptable a chaunge or alteration: neuertheſſe he preſented himſelfe with halfe a myle of the wals, and ſeeing no inſurrection made in his fauour, he retired hauing remained there xxiiij houres. The ſame day he retired (but after he was gone) the bandes of the Florentines entred with in Sienna, who albeit were put in readineſſe to purſue him, yet they made no great labour when they ſaw he was too farre gone: they ſuffred certaine light horſemen to purſue the chaſe, and certaine bandes of footemen which were before at Sienna, of whom he receiued no great damage: onely his retraite being haſtie, and haply no leſſe for famine then for feare, he left his artilleries by the way, which to his great diſhonour fell into the power of the enemies: he ſtayed at Aguepenie to redreſſe his companies which were much diminished; a place ſo much the more aſſured to him, by how much he knew that the Florentine bandes would be curious to enter vpon the lands of the Church: but falling into wants of money and other prouisions, and the Cardinals of Volterra, of Monte, and of Coma, with whom by the French kings direction he communicated touching his affaires, beginning now to reiect him, he conuerted those few bands of souldiers that his fortune had left him, to pill and rob the shores or watersides of Sienna, and in vaine gaue assault to Orbatella: for which cause the Florentines hauing made their armes to march towards the bridge of Centino, which is the confine and limite betweene the estate of Sienna and the dominion of the Church, threatned to make inuasion of the lands of the Church, for that they saw Ranse did not wholly dissolue his companies. In which respect the Colledge of Cardinals, who stood iealous to suffer such an action vpon the estate of the Church, interposed to accord them; a matter indifferently agreeable to them both: It was acceptable to the Florentines, for that by it they were drawne out of a burthen of expences which they made without any fruite: and to Ranse it was no lesse welcome, for that both he was ill furnished for the present, and also had no hope to increase his forces, specially the French affaires suffering ill tearmes in Lombardy. The accord contained no other matter then a bare promise not to offend one another: which promise ran betweene the Florentines and Siennois on the one part, and Ranse de Cere on the other part, putting in pledge in Rome of fiftie thousand duckets for the suretie of obseruation: and touching the things that had bene made pillage and spoyle, they referred them to the arbitration of the Pope when he should come into Italie.

This winter there hapned in the towne of Lucqua this dangerous accident: one Vincent Pogio of a noble descending and family, and Lawrence Totti, vnder colour of particular discords, but more likely pushed on by ambition and pouertie, tooke armes, and in the publike pallace slue the chiefe Magistrate of that citie: and as one furie draweth on another, and in an vprore is seldome scene any moderation, so they ran with their armed weapons throughout the towne, and made slaughter of diuerse other citizens their aduersaries, with such an vniuersall terrour & feare, that not one durst oppose against them: neuerthelesse as soone as the first violence was somewhat ceased, the same feare that had amazed others began to terrifietheselues by the remorse and greatnesse of the offences they had done: in which oportunitie certaine wise citizens thrusting in to solcite and appease, the murtherers issued out of the citie vnder certaine conditions, and afterwards were sharply persecuted by the inhabitants of Lucqua.

Thus were the matters of Lombardy and Tuscane brought to some appeasment, but the Colledge of Cardinals taking no care of the estates of the Church, partly for the Popes absence, but more for the ambition and disagreements that were betweene them: Sigismond the sonne of Pandolfe Malatesta an ancient Lord of Rimini, tooke almost wholly into his hands the gouernment of that Citie, hauing therein but a verie small intelligence: and albeit Cardinall Medici at the instance of the Colledge, went to Bologna as Legate of that Citie, both to recouer Rimini, and to reorder the other affaires of Romagnia, which were much troubled and altered, to whom the Colledge had promised to send to his succours the Marquis of Mantua. Captaine generall of the Church: yet nothing sorted to effect, no lesse by the wants and impediments of money, then through the iealousie and emulation of the Cardinals his aduersaries, who objected themselves against all counsels and actions that anie way might aduance his reputation or greatnesse.

THE ARGUMENT.

Pope Adrian comes to Rome. The Venetians make league with the Emperour. The Frenching besiege Milan, and are constrained afterwards to returne from it. Cardinall Medicis is created Pope. King Frauncis descendeth into Italy, he taketh Milan, and besiegeth Pavia. The Emperour Charles sendeth out an armie to the succours of Pavia, where a battell is fought, and the French king taken prisoner.

Albeit the late victorie against the Frenchmen had somewhat reduced the matters of Lombardy into an estate peaceable and settled, yet it had nothing diminished the vniuersall suspition that the king would esstoones recontinue the warre, and in short time bring new inuasions vpon the Duchy of Milan: for both his owne kingdom stood quiet and acquitted from ciuill troubles, his Captaines and bands of men of warre whom he had sent into Italy, were returned in safety, the Swissers well disposed and prepared to take his pay, as before; and lastly, the Senate of Venice stood firme with him in the ancient league and confederation: which arguments ioyned to the remembrance and passion of his harmes receiued, and no lesse concurring the violent inclination of his youth naturally caried with moods of reuenge, were sufficient to arme his mind with bloody desires, and to make him by his valour to seeke to recompence the displeasures which the malice & enuie of his fortune had lately heaped vpon him. By the consideration of which danger, the Captaines of the Imperials were driuen to entertaine and pay the armie; a compulsion verie hard and grievous, for that they receiued no supplies of money neither from Cesar, nor from the kingdom of Naples: and touching the estate of Milan, it was so narrowly raked and gleaned, that of their proper treasure and ability, they were not able to sustaine so great a proportion of expences, as were distributed to the feeding of so many souldiers: and therefore for the relieuing of so great burthens, they sent the greatest part of their companies to be bestowed vpon the estates of the Church, notwithstanding the popular voyces and Colledge of Cardinals objected many impediments and vaine exclamations: also other prouinces of Italy were taxed for the conseruation of the Duchy of Milan, and that by the labour & solicitation chiefly of Don Charles de Lamo, lately made Viceroy of Naples by the death of Don Raimond de Cardona, and Don Iohn Manuell: the rate of the imposition was, that monethly for three moneths next following, the estate of Milan should contribute a thousand duckets, the Florentines fiftene thousand, the Genowayes eight thousand, Sienna siue thousand, and Lucca foure thousand. And albeit many murmured against this taxation, yet the feare of so great an armie made it to be both executed & suffered: So mightie is necessitie, that in cases of extremity it makes tollerable those things, which in all other conditions are full of inconueniencie and difficulty. Only they of Milan iustified the taxation to be necessarie, for that the defence of all Italie depended vpon the continuation of that armie: neither did it cease after the end of three moneths, for that the same necessitie continuing, the imposition was esstoones renewed, though in a farre lesse rate and taxation.

In this estate of affaires, Italy stood oppressed with continuall aduersities, and no lesse terrified with the feare of greater euils that threatned the vniuersall regions thereof: for the remedy whereof much was attributed to the comming of the Pope, as an apt and conuenient instrument by reason of his supreme authority, to appeale and reorder all disorders. And albeit Cesar passing at the same time by sea into Spaine, and in his way did communicate with the king of England, had besought

besought him to tarie for him at Barcelona, whither he would come in person to honour him as Pope: yet he forbore to abide the Emperours comming, either fearing least for the great distance of the Emperour, who as yet was in the extreame confines of Spaine, he should let slip the commoditie of his good time, which after his nauigation began to be rough and dangerous, or else he suspected least the Emperour would solícite him to deferre his voyage; or lastly (which was more credible) he feared to aggrauate the opinion conceiued of him from the beginning, that the Emperour did so much gouerne him, as to be able to let him to treat of the vniuersall peace betweene Christians: an action wherein he was determined to employ all his studies and labours: so that ouer-ruling by his wisdom all these suspitions, he passed at last by sea to Rome, where he made his entrie the xxix. of August, with a great concourse of the commons and the whole Court: of who albeit his comming was desired with an vniuersall gladnesse, for that without the presence of the Popes, Rome beareth more a resemblance of a sauage desert then of a citie, yet that spectacle wrought sundrie impressions and diuersitie of thoughts in the minds of all men, when they considered that they had a Pope for nation and language a straunger, and for the affaires of Italy & the Court altogether vnexperienced, and also for that he was not of those regions and countries, who by long conuersation were already made familiar with the customes of Italy: the enuy that stirred vp in men this consideration was redoubled by the accident of the plague, which beginning in Rome at his arriual, afflicted the citie during the whole season of Autumne, to the great calamitie and losse of the people; a matter which in the fancies of men was construed to an euill prognostication of his Pontificacie.

Pope Adrian the vi. cometh to Rome.

The first counsell that this Pope tooke, was to aduance the recovering of Rimini, and to put end to the controuersies which the Duke of Ferrara had continued with two of his latest predecessours: and for the better succeeding of that expedition, he sent into Romagnia that regiment of fiftene hundred Spanish footmen which he had brought with him for the more surety of his passage by sea.

Whilest the Pope was in these actions and preparations in Italy, the Emperour cast in his mind how much it would import to the successe and suretie of his affaires in Italy, to separate the Venetians from the French king: to which deuise was much helping an opinion that he had, that the hopes of the French matters being diminished, the Senate would not be without manifest inclination to peace, and that they would not for the interests of others, lay themselves downe to the daungers which such a warre might bring vpon their estates. In this practise he communicated with the king of England, who afore had lent him money secretly against the French king, and began openly to take part against him: they sent thither their Embassadors to require the Senate to confederate with the Emperour for the defence of Italy, Ierome Adorna being for the Emperour, and Richard Pafe for the king of England. There was also expectation of an Embassadour from Ferdinand Archduke of Austria, Casars brother, who entertaining many quarrels with the Venetians, it was iudged necessarie that he should interpose and communicate in all accords. Besides, the king of England sent a Herald to pronounce warre against the French king, in case he would not come to a generall truce with the Emperour for three yeares in all parts of the world: & therein should be comprehended the Church, the Duke of Millan, & the Florentines: he complained also in this defiance, that the French king had forborn to pay him the annuity of fifty thousand crownes which he was bound to answer yearely. But the French king whose youth made him more apt to trust in fortune, then to looke into things by counsell, refused to make truce, and touching the demand of the fifty thousand crownes, he protested openly that it was not conuenient for him to pay mony to him that ayded his enemies with money: an answer which so aggrauated the disdain and hart-burnings betweene them, that the Embassadors on both sides were reuoked.

The king of England for the Emperours & sendeth Embassadors to the Venetians to draw them from the alliance of the French.

This yeare departed out of Italy Don Iohn Mannell, who had bene Casars Embassadour at Rome with verie great authoritie: and at his departure he deliuered to the Florentines a scedule subsigned by his hand, declaring that Cesar by a scedule published in September 1520 promised to Pope Leo to reconfirm & estloones to reaccord to the Florentines the priuiledges of estate, of authority, & of the townes which they held within fixe moneths after the first dyot vpon his coronation at Aix: this was a reiteration of a former promise made by him to accomplish the same within foure moneths after his election, within which time he said he could not dispatch it for many iust causes: so that vnder protestation of that reasonable excuse, Don Iohn promised it estfoones in the name of Cesar, who ratified the scedule in March 1523, and deliuered the expedition of it in writing in a most ample forme.

What the Em-perour did in Spaine.

As hath bene set downe before, Cesar passed this yeare into Spaine, where he proceeded seuerely against many that were noted the authors of the sedition, and to others he remitted all punishments, and pardoned their goods: in which action, to ioyne with iustice and clemency, examples of recompence and remuneration, he called to the Court in great honour, Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, who refusing to be Captaine of the Commons that rebelled, he rewarded his fidelitie with the mariage of Madame Germania sometimes wife to the king of Spaine: she was rich, but barren, to the end that house should determine in him who was the last of the descendants of old Alfonso king of Aragon, two of his younger brothers being dead before, the one in Fraunce and the other in Italy.

Rhodes taken.

But the end of this yeare was made no lesse wretched and vnhappy, then slaúnderous to all Christian Princes for the losse of the Ile of Rhodes, which Solyman Ottoman tooke by violence, notwithstanding it was defended by the knights of Rhodes, called in other times more ancient, the knights of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem: and abiding in that place since they were chased out of Ierusalem, notwithstanding they lay betweene two so mighty Princes as the Turke and the Soldan, yet their valour had preserued it of long time, and to the right worthy glorie of their order, they had remayned as an assured rampier of Christian religion in those seas: and yet they were not without their imputations and notes of infamie, for that hauing a continuall custome for the better defending of those shores, to spoyle the vessels of the infidels, they were thought sometimes to make pillage of Christian ships. The Turke sent into the Iland a wonderfull great army, which remaining there many moneths, with no lesse horroure to good men for their cruelties, then terrour to all men for their huge numbers, at last he came thither in person, and drawing to his desire of conquest and glorie, the respect of profite and riches which the victorie would yeeld, he lost not one minute of time to vex them, wherein his industrie was nothing inferiour to his valour, for sometimes he cast monstrous mines and trenches, sometimes he raised platformes of earth and wood, whose height ouertopped the walles of the towne, and sometimes he afflicted them with most furious and bloody assaults: insomuch that as these workes and engines were not performed without a wonderfull butcherie and slaughter of his souldiers, so also the defence of them was so daungerous to the liues of them within, that manie numbers were diminished, manie bodies maimed and made vnseruiceable, and the residue made terrified by the calamities of their companions and friends, to whom they could giue no other propertie of compassion then to inourne with them their common miserie: their aduersitie was so much the more intollerable, by how much their trauels were without fruite, their words without comfort, and their valour disfaoured of fortune, and lastly, their store of gun-powder was consumed, which is not the least necessitie for the defence of a place: they saw afore their eyes huge breaches made into their walles with the artilleries of the enemies, they discerned seuerall mines wrought into many parts of the towne, and they found by lamentable experience, that the more painfully they laboured, the lesse good they did, for that their fortune had reduced them to these termes of extremitie, that in abandoning one place to relieue another, they put both in daunger, not hauing numbers sufficient to furnish the seruice, and lesse expectation of rescue amid perils so raging and desperate: so that, what for that their necessities were greater then their hopes, and their defence lesse able by the continuall diminution of their numbers, and lastly, holding it no breach of honour to preserue by wisdom and composition, that they could no longer defend by their valour and prowesse, they gaue place to their destiny, and capitulated with the Turke: That the great Master of their order should leaue the towne to him: That aswell he as all his knights should depart in safetie, with libertie to carie with them as much of their goods as they could: And for assurance of this capitulation, the Turke should withdraw out of those seas his flete or naue, and retire his armie by land five miles from Rhodes. By vertue of which capitulation Rhodes remained to the Turkes, and the Christians passed into Sicily, and so into Italy, keeping their faith and profession vniuolated: they found in Sicily an army by sea compounded of a certaine number of vessels, with great reliefe of victuals and munitions, and ready to hoise saile at the next wind to reuietually Rhodes. The slownesse of this rescue was layd to the Popes fault: After they were departed, Solyman for a more contempt of Christian religion, made his entrie into the Citie vpon the day of the birth of the sonne of God: which day being celebrated in the Churches of Christians with noyse of musicke and holie inuocations, he conuerted all the Churches of Rhodes, dedicated to the seruice of Iesus Christ, into Mosques (so they call their temples) which after all the Christian rites and ceremonies were abolished, they dedicated to Mahomet. This was the end of the yeare 1522, infamous for the name and title of Christendom, and this was the fruite drawne of the discords of our Princes, which yet might be somewhat tolerable, if at least the examples of harmes past might make them better tempered in time to come.

As the discords of Princes continued, so increased also the trauels and perplexities of the yeare 1523. In the beginning of which the familie of the Malatestis knowing how vnable they were to resist the Popes forces, were in the end contented by the mediation of the Duke of Vrbino to leaue Rimini and the Castle, albeit vnder this vncertaine hope, that there should be reserved for Pandolfo some reasonable estate and meane to liue, wherein nothing was done. Afterwards the Duke of Vrbino went to the Pope, with whome and with the most part of the Court, the glorious memorie of Pope Iulio working much for him, he obtained absolution from all paines and impositions, and was estsoones reinuested in the Duchie of Vrbino, but with this exception, not to preiudice the rights and application that had bene made of the country of Montefeltre to the Florentines, who sayd they had lent to Pope Leo three hundred and fifty thousand duckets for the defence of that Duchie, and had expended since his death in diuerse places for the preservation of the estate of the Church, more then threescore and ten thousand. The Pope receiued also into grace the Duke of Ferrara, whom he did not onely inuest of new in the impery of Ferrara, and of all that he possessed appertaining to the Church afore the warre of Pope Leo against the Frenchmen, but also he left to him (not without a note of infamie both to himselfe and ministers that abused his ignorance) the iurisdiction of the boroughes of Saint Felix and Firinale: which townes as he got at such time as he began the warre against Pope Leo, and afterwards lost them before his death, so he had estsoones taken them of new by the occasion of the vacancie of the Sea. For recompence of this grace and inuestiture, the Duke was bound to ayd and succor the Church in times of need with certaine numbers of men, for so much as belonged to the defence of his imperie and estate: and in case hereafter he should fall againe, and transgresse or offend the Sea Apostolike, besides his submission to great fines and amerçiements, he consented to haue this inuestiture made nothing, and to the priuation of all his rights. Moreouer the Pope gaue him great hopes to restore to him Modena and Reggia, notwithstanding afterwards he estranged his mind from his promise, as well for the importance of such an indument which was afterwards told him, as also for the infamie of the examples of his predecessors, which could not but redound vpon him.

About this time the Castle of Millan suffering no lesse wants of all prouisions except bread, then being vniuersally afflicted with sicknesse and diseases, agreed to deliuer vp their charge vnder condition of life and goods saued, if they were not succoured by the fourteenth day of Aprill: at which day the composition being accomplished, the most part of the souldiers were found dead: Cesar was contented to deliuer it ouer into the possession of Duke Frauncis Sforce, wherein he wonne no litle reputation and praise amongst the Italians: and albeit there was no other peece in Italy that held for the Frenchmen, except the Castle of Cremona, which had as yet a plentifull prouision of all things, yet these successes did nothing qualifie the infelicities and aduersities of the peoples of that Duchie, who were wonderfully oppressed with the armie of Cesar, for that it was not payd: in which discontentment being gone to lodge within Ast and the confines about it, and falling into tumult for the same cause, their disorder led them to make pillage of the whole countrey, euen as farre as Vigenena: for regard of which vniuersall wailing, as also to auoyd the harmes and daungers of the countrey, the inhabitants of Millan were driuen to make promise of their payes amounting to an hundred thousand duckets: and yet the feeling of so many aduersities and rigours, could nothing abate the hatreds of that people against the French, wherein the things that sustained them were partly a feare through the memorie of old iniuries done against them by that nation, and partly a hope, least vpon ceasing of the daunger the French king would estsoones assaile that state, and also that they should be deliuered from those great burthens, for that it should be no more.

necessarie for the Emperour to entertaine in that Duchie any regiments of souldiers.

The negociation of the peace betweene Cesar and the Venetians continued still, & as for many difficulties that hapned, and diuerse sorts of delayes interposed by the Venetians, the minds of men were holden in great suspence what successe or effect it would draw: so one chiefe matter that made that action dilatorie, & augmented the difficulties, was the death of Ierome Adorna, whose yeares albeit were not many, yet his experience was rare, and his wit raised to the comprehension of high things, which he well exprest in this treatie, wherein his authoritie was great and his capacitie singular. In his place was sent from Millean for Cesar, Martin Caracciolo Pronotarie to the Sea Apostolike, who manie yeares after was created Cardinall by Pope Paule the third. Many moneths were spent in this negociation at Venice, where the French king became no small impediment to the resolution by the importunate labour and diligence of his Embassadors, by whom he promised sometimes by letters, and sometimes by messengers especiall, that he would descend speedily into Italy with a right puissant armie. These offers and promises bred great diuersitie of opinions amongst the Senators, and continuall arguments and disputations: for many gaue counsell not to abandon the alliance of the French king, and reposed altogether vpon his promise to send presently an armie into Italy: which hope the French king labouring to feed with a wonderfull diligence, he had newly sent to Venice, Ranſe de Cere, not onely to entertaine and confirme his promise, but also to publish the manifest preparation of things: others remembring how in the hope of many things past the king had behaued himselfe negligently, could not now expect any confidence in his promise to passe into Italy: wherein that opinion was confirmed in them by certaine aduertisements from Iohn Baduere their Embassadour in France, who assured them, that for that yeare the French king would neither passe in person nor send any armie into Italy: an intelligence which he had from the Duke of Burbon, who was already very secretly conioyned with Cesar, and wished the Venetians to entertaine vnitie with him: another sort of the Senatours wauering in mind, stood terrified no lesse by the ill successe of the king, then by the good fortunes of Cesar, whereunto they ioyned this consideration, that in Italy the Duke of Millean, the Genowayes, the Florentines, together with all Tuscane followed the faction of Cesar, and doubted also least the Pope would likewise concur in that inclination: and out of Italy were for him his brother the Archduke; confining vpon the Venetian estates, and the king of England making continuall warre in Picardie: in which diuersitie of opinions running no lesse amongst the principals of the Senate, then the vniuersall multitude, the deliberation could not long suspend, as well for the forwardnesse of things, as for the importunities of Cesars Embassadors, by whose continuall solicitation the Councell of the Pregati was assembled to pronounce the resolution. In this Councell spake Andrew Gritti in this sort, a personage of verie high authoritie in that common weale, for the great offices he had administred, and of especiall reputation throughout all Italy, and with foraine Princes, for the merite of his wit and dealing.

The oration of
touching the alliance with Cesar.

There is nothing more hurtfull in Counsellers then the passion of ieaousie and suspicion, which drawing with it diuersitie and separation of willes, is so much the more preiudiciall, by how much it stoppeth oftentimes the libertie and freedome of well counselling: and for my part, albeit I am not ignorant that in giuing counsell at this present not to depart from the confederation

“ of the French king, some will interpret me to partialitie, as though in me bare more respect “ and authoritie the long custome and conuersation I haue had with the French, then the care and “ affection which in nature and equitie I ought to expresse to the benefite of the common weale: “ yet I will rather lay my selfe downe to the imputations of men, then keepe suppressed that fidelitie of counselling, which in good office appertaineth to euerie good Citizen, in whom cannot “ be expected any good propertie, either of a Citizen or a Senator that for anie occasion forbeareth “ to perswade to others, that which in himselfe he discerneth to be good for the common weale:
 “ and yet I doubt not that amongst men of discretion and wisdom this interpretation will “ find no place, both for the consideration of my customes and actions in all times past; and “ also for that I neuer negotiated with the French king nor his counsell, but as your Agent, “ your Creature, your commissioner, and your Deputie limited and regulated: but touching the “ present matter, I doubt not to accompanie my opinion and counsell with such force of reasons “ and examples as shall be able to make me iustified euen with such as hold me suspected. We are

assembled heere to dispute whether we ought to make a new confederation with the Emperour, both contrarie to the faith we haue giuen, and against the couenants of the League which we haue with the house of France: which in my iudgement is no other thing then to go about so to assure and confirme the power of the Emperour already vniuersally redoubted, that being without further remedy to moderate and cinbase it, it risē not continually encreasing to our right great and apparant preiudice. We haue no cause wherein may be taken any reason to iustifie that deliberation, if we looke into the fidelity and equity of the French king: for that as he hath for the most part fulfilled the alliance that he hath made with vs, and carefully restrained himselfe to the reasonable obseruation of amitie and League, so though the effects haue not followed so readily to renew the warre in Italy, yet in regard of his proper interests therein concurring, that hath not proceeded of other matter then of the impediments growing vpon him in the kingdome of France: which albeit may for a time prolong or deferre his counsels, yet let vs not looke that they will vtterly dissolue his enterprize, for that he liues possessed with so great a desire to recouer the Duchy of Millan, and hath his forces so mighty and ready, that hauing once sustained the first brunts of his enenies, there will nothing let him to renew his armie & recontinue the war in Italy. Wherein I may aptly vse for example the experience and memory of king Louu, who hauing his countrey inuaded with armies farre more mighty then those that now vex him, for that almost all the nations and regions round about him rose into conspiracy against him, yet did he so easily defend his estates by the greatnesse of his forces, by the munition and defence of his frontiers and places confining, and with the fidelity and readinesse of his peoples, that when in all reasonable consideration it was thought that necessity would driue him to retire himselfe for a time, and restrain his mind to rest and tranquility, he rayfed his thoughts to the warres of Italy, and in that vniuersall coniecture of his weaknesse, sent thither suddenly right huge and mighty armies. The king rainging did the like in the first yeare of his raigne, & euen then entred into the renouation of the warre, when, both by his new ascending to the Crowne, and also finding his treasures consumed by the infinite expences of his predecessor, euery man looked that he would put off the war till another yeare. Let vs not interpret sinisterly of his delays and deferring, and much lesse let vs lay them for an excuse our variations, seeing that confederate that is slow not of will but by impediments, giues to his companion no iust cause to complaine, nor any honest colour to depart from his confederation. We ought in this cause to iudge of the French king, as in matters of amity good men vse to measure friendship, that he that maketh a promise, albeit he performe late, yet he breakes not the law of promise, for that although he disappointeth, yet he sayleth not. It is a great vnthankfulnesse when we forget what we haue receiued of our friends: and when they are slow to performe but small things, we are ready to rayse great complaints against them. But touching this deliberation, if we looke well into the estate of our affaires, we shall find that if common honesty ioyned with the dignity of our Senat, call vs to it, no lesse are we iustly prouoked by the regard of our profite and proper safety: it is easie to be discerned from how many daungers, from how many suspitions, and from how many afflictions we shall be deliuered, if the French king recouer the estate of Millan: and wisemen with the same facility may find out, into what tranquility, into what assurance, and into what freedome of estate, our affaires will fall for many yeares, if he preuaile in that action, wherein he hath concurring with his forces reason, conscience, and equity. Of this we are warned by the examples of the yeares before, for at such time as the king that now is, went about to recouer it, it came to passe that we, who afore with many dangers and very great expences, were scarce able to defend Padoa and Trenisa, were made able by his occasion to reconquer Bressia and Verona: yea so long as he enioyed that Duchie in quietnesse; we possessed in peace and surety all our dominions and iurisdiccions, and what else was of our imperry or our obedience: which are examples that much more ought to moue vs then the ancient memory of the League of Cambray, for that the kings of France haue learned by experience that which they could neuer comprehend by reason, how preiudiciall it hath bene to them to depart our of our alliance; a matter which without all comparison they may best discern in the time present, wherein this king hath for his aduersary and competitor, an Emperour, a Prince whose amplitude of kingdomes, and whose redoubted power will keepe him in necessity to esteeme dearely our alliance. But on the contrary, who seeth not into what dangerous termes our affaires will be reduced, when the French king shall find himselfe mecrely excluded out of the enterprises of Italy: for who can let the Emperour to appropriate to himselfe or to his brother the Duchie of Millan, the which he would neuer to this day transerre the inuestiture to Frauncis Sforce? And if he haue power to do so, what is he that can assure his will? who can stay the streame driuen by so violent a wind? Yea, since the Duchie of Millan is so apt a ladder to lift him to the Empire of all Italy, who will take vpon him to promise, that in the Emperour iustice and conscience will beare more sway, then ambition and couetousnesse, inclination's naturall to all great Princes? If any man take any surety by the moderation and temperance of his officers which he hath in Italy, let him be answered, that the most of them are Syniards, a nation vnfaithfull, rauishing, and aboue all others most insatiable: so that if the Emperour or his brother Ferdinand, make Millan their owne and possesse it, in what degree shall remaine our estate being enuironed by them both, on the confines of Italy and Germanie? what surety, what succours, what expectation of remedie amid so many daungers? The kingdome of Naples is in his possession, the Pope with all the other Potentates of Italy are at his deuotion, and all our friends being made naked of money and forces, there remaines to vs no hope of ayde or comfort, and lesse possibility to find fauour where fortune and so great diuision of minds contend against vs. But if the French king were Lord of the Duchie of Millan, then should things stand so euently ballanced betweene two so great Princes, that who so euer stood in feare of the power of the one of them, should find peace and surety by the might of the other, for that both pollicy and their proper ambition would make them ialous one of anothers greatnesse: yea the onely feare of his comming assureth all his neighbours, for that by it the Imperials are restrained from entring into armes, or to intangle themselues with any enterprife. By which reason is made more ridiculous then terrible the vanity of their threatnings to turne the army against vs, if we confederate with the Emperour, as though it were an easie enterprife to moue warre against the state of Venice, and as though there were present surety of the victory, and lastly as though that were the onely meane and remedy to keepe the French king from passing, and not rather the cause of the contrarie: for who doubteth that being prouoked by them, we would propound to the king by necessitie such conditions, that though he bare no inclination to them, yet they would induce him to passe? The same hapned in the time of king Louis, when the iniuries and treasons that were done vnto vs by that nation, enforced vs so to incense and stirre vp that king (when of his prisoner I became your Embassadour) that euen when he stood in the greatest feare to be mightily inuaded in his kingdome of Fraunce, euen then did he dispatch a strong armie into Italy, though with very ill successe. Let vs not beleue that if the Imperials thought the way to draw vs to their amitie, or to assure themselues of the French king, were to set vpon vs, that they had till this day deferred the execution: perhappes their Captaines haue no desire to enrich themselues with the profites and spoyle of warre, perhappes they haue had no necessitie, in disburdening those countries that were friends to them to draw money from them, to nourish the army in the countrey of another: no rather they haue well found out, that by reason of our power, it is too hard a matter to force vs: and much lesse stands it with them hauing a continuall feare of the descending of the French, to entangle themselues with another warre, nor to giue occasion to a state so mightie in men, money, and opinion, to allure with the greatnesse of offers the French king to march. So long as they are holden in these suspitions and in these doubts, they will not intrude for themselues vpon the Duchie of Millan, neither will they seeke to offend vs but with vaine threatnings: where if we assure them of that feare, they will haue in their power to do both the one and other: and if they do it as it is likely they will, where is our remedie, where are become our hopes, our counsels, and our expectations, yea of whom may we complaine more then of our selues? our owne feares will breede our common daungers, our fraile suspitions will draw on our proper calamities, and as a destinie we shall be driuen into warre by our immoderate desires to peace: which then is most holy and most to be embraced, when it puts men out of suspition, when it increaseth no danger, and when it brings a meane to sit downe in tranquility, and to cut off great expences. But when it appeareth in another habite and forme, & begetteth effects contrary, it abusethe then the name, the property, & the nature of peace, & vnder a corrupt resemblance of peace it taketh iustly the title of a dangerous war, & vnder the shew of a wholesome medicine, it expresseth the operation of a mortal poyson: so that, as in confederating with the Emperour, we turne the French king from his enterprise of Italy, & leade the Emperour as it were by a line, to occupy at his will the Duchy of Milan, and so to embase vs and our iurisdiction: so it followeth that by that action (with a right great infamie of our name, and hazard of the faith of this common-weale) we buy the greatnesse of a Prince who hath giuen no lesse tokens of his ambition then prooffe of his power, and who (iuyning) with him his brother) hath set downe this pretence, that all that we possesse in the firme land, appertaineth vnto them. And on the other side, we reiect & exclude out of Italy, a king who vnder his equity and greatnesse assureth the liberty of vs all, and is induced by a great necessity & constraint to remaine traitly allied and conioyned with vs. These reasons so euident and sensible auoid all matter of imputation, that I am not pushed on more by affection then by truth, nor more caried by any interest particular, then with the loue I beare to the common-weale, the safety and preservation of which we neede not doubt, if God giue so great grace and felicity to your counsels, as he hath plentifully imparted amongst you the spirit of wisdom and forecast.

But against this speech, did oppose one George Cornaro a Gentleman of equall authority, and of no lesse reputation for grauitie and stayed condition.

Right ieaious were the office of Magistrates, if in matters of counsel it were lesse lawfull to con-fute, then to obiekt, and no lesse doth it offend the estate and credit of their place, where it is not thought as great a fidelity to answer as to propone: since such hath bin alwayes the law & liberty of counsell giuing, to assure the truth against all sinister insinuations: and albeit I am not ignorant that in nothing is more suspicion then to giue counsell in matters of state, yet for mine owne part, considering the equity of this Senate afore whom I speake, I doubt not but the reasons I shall giue will suffice to assure mine innocency against all imputations. Assuredly the matter we haue in hand, is great and full of difficulties, both for the consideration of the time and nature of many accidents concurring: and yet when I looke into the infidelity and ambition of the Princes of this time, and how much they differ from the nature of common-weales, whose gouernement being not subiect to the appetite of one alone, but disposed by the consents of many, vse to proceede with more moderation and regard, and obserue with great ceremony (contrary to the examples of Princes) not to departe from any thing that beareth apparence of iustice, honesty or reason: I can not but conclude, that it is most hurtfull for vs and our affaires, to haue the Duchy of Milan possessed by a Prince more mighty then our selues, seeing that necessarily such a neighbourhood will so hold vs suspected and afflicted, that though we enioy peace, yet we shall alwayes liue in continuall thoughts of warre, notwithstanding all Leagues of alliance or confederation what so euer. Of this ancient stories giue vs many examples, which for good respects I passe ouer for the present, leauing you onely to the lamentable experience of king Louis the twelfth, of whose doing I doubt not remaineth imprinted in the hearts of vs all a bitter remembrance. This Senate brought him into the Duchy of Milan, and to that unhappie resolution many of vs heere gaue assistance: we kept with him iustly our faith in all Capitulations, notwithstanding (vnder great offers and goodly occasions) we were aduised by the Spaniards and Launceknights to leaue his alliance, as also his infidelity gaue no small cause to draw vs thereunto, for that he solicited many practises against vs: but neither the memorie of so many benefites receiued, nor the merite of our fidelitie so iustly obserued, nor the consideration of many perpetuall offices exhibited, could moderate in him his great desire to vex vs: in so much as in that ambition, and for that cause, he made a willing reconciliation with his auncient and greatest enemies, and lastly contracted against vs that most perillous confederacy of Cambray. If it be daungerous for the rich and poore to dwell neare together, for that in the wealth of the rich are sowne the seedes of enuie to the poore, and by the wants of the poore are bred humors of couetousnesse in the rich man to consume him; farre greater harmes mult grow by the neighbourhood of great kings and Princes, whose ambition caried on the wings of authority, runneth without limite, and is no more repulled by the resistance of men, then a swift running streame blowne by a violent wind to overflow his channell: and therefore to escape those daungers that would alwayes hang ouer vs by so ill assured neighbourhood of great Princes, the necessitie of our affaires driues vs to adresse all our counsels to this ende, that neither the French king nor the Emperour haue any footing in the Duchie of Milan, but that it remaine to Franuisc Sforce, or such another of his equalitie, who were not borne vp with kingdomes or large dominions. Vpon such a

"choise dependes our surety for the present, and hereafter (if the condition of times do change) may "depend a great encreasing and exaltation of our state. We consult now, whether we should con"tinue amity with the French king, or confederate our selues with the Emperour: By the one of "these two deliberations Frauncis Sforce is excluded absolutely from the Duchy of Millan, and "an entrie left open to the French king, who is a Prince farre mightie aboue vs: the other tendeth
 "to assure and confirme in the same Duchie, Frauncis Sforce, whom the Emperour offereth to "comprehend as principall in our confederation, and hath made promise to the king of England to "protect him. So that though he would seeke to depriue him of that estate, he should not offend vs
 "only and the other potentates of Italy (to whom he should giue cause to turne eftsoones to the "French) but also in that action he is both to displease the king of England, whom it behoueth him
 "greatly to respect, and also to prouoke against him all the inhabitants of the Duchy of Millan, who "beare an vniuersall inclination to Frauncis Sforce: and so laying himselfe downe to many diffi"culties and dangers, and to no lesse infamie, he should also go against his faith, which till this day
 "we haue not found by any token that he hath defiled; a matter which we can not protest on the
 "behalf of the French: yea he can not be touched with any demonstration or signe contrarie to "his fidelity, hauing since the death of Pope Leo repossessed Frauncis Sforce of that estate, and "redelivered vp the strong holds in sort as they were conquered, and lastly reestablished him in "the Castell of Millan contrarie to the beleeuing of many: why therefore should we not rather "embrace that counsell, wherein is discerned an apparant hope to come to the end of our inten"tions, then to follow that which manifestly tendeth to an ende contrarie to our affaires? Per"haps there are that will obiekt against this, that this common-weale would suffer greater danger,
 "if the Duchy of Millan were in the power of the Emperour, then if it should diuolue into the "hands of the French, for that necessitie would draw that king, both for the greatnesse of Cesar,
 "and for the emulation and ielousie he hath of him, to perseuere in our alliance: but in the Em-
 "perour all the contrary, as well for his power and might, as for the claimes and rights which he
 "& his brother pretend against our estate. Sure I beleue that who hath that opinion of the Empe-
 "rour, is not beguiled, considering the nature and custome of Princes which are mighty and great:
 "but God grant that he be not deceiued that holdeth not the same opinion of the French king. Ma"ny of the same reasons made for his predecessor, yet ambition and couetousnesse bare more do"minion in him, then either common honesty, or his proper profit. And besides, the causes that "might keepe him contained in League with vs, are not perpetuall, but subiect to change from one
 "time to another, according to the nature of humane things: for, both the Emperour hath his mor"tality as other men haue, and withall, stands subiect to infinite accidents of fortune, according to "the example of many Princes as mighty in greatnesse as he: it is not long since, that all Spaine con"spiring against him, he seemed more needefull of pity then of spite. And at the leastwise there is "not so great difference betweene the one daughter and the other, as there is oddes betweene a
 "counsell that wholly excludes vs from our purpose, and a resolution which in similitude of truth "and reason leades vs to the full accomplishment of the same. Besides those reasons consider only
 "the time to come and farre off: but if we looke into the present estate of things, we shall discern
 "that to reiect the alliance of the Emperour, doth put vs for the present into greater perplexities and "dangers: for, if we separate our selues from the French king, it is credible that he will deferre the "warre vntill better times and fitter occasions, but if we continue conioyned with him, it may be "that the Emperour will presently make warre against vs; a matter which necessarily will heape vp-
 "on vs many troubles and expences. And in whether of these elections shall the issue of the war
 "be more dangerous to vs? If we ioyne with the Emperour, it is not almost to be doubted but the "victory will fall on that side, which we can not so assuredly promise to our selues, if we stand
 "conioyned with the French king: And in confederating vs with the Emperour, the victory of the "French can not be so dangerous to vs, as it wold be in the contrary, for that in that case, all the for"ces of the victor wold be turned against vs, and the Emperour wold not only haue a lesse bridle
 "and weaker impediments, but also he wold stand almost in an absolute necessity to occupie the "Duchy of Millan. Touching the obiection made against the bond of confederation, it is easily an"swered by the same reason that is vsed to satisfie questions of equity, since our promise to the "French king stretcheth only to ayd him to defend his estates that he possessed in Italy, but not to "recoouer them if he should lose them. The articles of the capitulations beare not that, and the same reasons

reasons make for vs that are brought in against vs: we accomplished the bond of all duetie and office, when, after the losse of Millan hapning through the default of their prouisions, our souldiers and men of seruice receiued more harmes then the Frenchmen. We were acquitted of our promise, when Adonheur Landrech returning to the warre with the Swissers, we sent him our bands of souldiers for his succours: yes we haue done more then reasonably might be required of vs, when, in expecting so many moneths the coming of his army, we receiued nothing from him but vaine hopes and dissembled promises: if he were stayed by his owne will, why seeke wee to support the imputation of his faults? if he were holden by necessity, is not the same a sufficient reason to iustifie vs, though we stood bound? I know not why we should be kept bound any longer to the French king, seeing he hath first abandoned vs: it can be no iniustice to retire from the League, since we take our liberty by his example: how can we stand guiltie in bond and office towards him, when he hath first broken the law of fidelity and contract with vs? In matters of League and confederation betweene parties, the breach of the one giues liberty to the other, and the bond that is once broken by the one, forbearth afterwards to compell the other. I will not assure that the Emperours Captaines intend to moue warre at this time against vs, no more will I warrant the contrary, considering with what necessity they are pressed to entertaine their army in the estates of others, and the hope they may conceiue to draw vs by that meane to their alliance, specially if the French do not march: of which who doubteth, doubteth not without reason, both for their naturall inclinations, for their necessity and want of mony, and for the impediments of the wars which they haue on the other side the Mounts with two so mighty Princes; & of these impediments our Embassador hath already made credible relation. Lastly, my reply containeth one selfe matter, that we ought to foresee with all study, that the Duchy of Millan be transferred to Frauncis Sforce, and consequently I maintaine, that the counsell that guides vs to that effect is more profitable, then that which makes reasons and arguments to exclude vs from it.

The authority of two such personages, together with the force of their reasons, did rather make doubtfull, then assure the minds of the Senators, whose perplexities kept them so farre off from resolving, that the Senat deferred to determine absolutely, inducing them thereunto their custome and nature, the greatnesse of the cause, and their desire to see further aduanced the preparations of the French king: the many difficulties also that by necessity hapned in the accord with the Archduke, were some causes helping to their deferring: but the matter that most increased the suspense of their minds, was, that the French king, who with great industry prepared himselfe to the warre, had sent the Bishop of Bayeux to desire them to deferre to resolute any thing till the next moneth, by whom he assured them that before that terme he would march with a greater army then had bene seene in Italy in the age of man. And as they stood in this doubt and perplexity of mind, Anthony Griman Duke of the same City died, & Andrew Gritti was chosen into his place, an election rather preiudiciall to the French affaires then otherwayes: for, as soone as he was ray-sed to that dignity, he referred wholly to the Senate the deliberation and counsell of that matter, and would neuer afterwards either in word or deede, shew himselfe inclined to either part. But at last, because the king continued to send fresh curriers to the Senate, and was importunate in offers and promises, and for that there was speciall aduertisement, that, to assure the expectation of the warre, Anne Monimorency afterwards Constable of Fraunce, and Federike Boffolo, were vpon their way to Venice, the Embassadors of the Emperour and the king of England (to whom this deferring was much suspected) began to protest to the Senate, that they would depart within three dayes, and leaue all things in their imperfection. By reason of which protestation, imploying a manner of threatening, and also that the fidelity that was gathered in the French promises, began to diminish finding nothing but vaine hopes, but chiefly by the aduertisement of their Embassador resident in Fraunce, they were constrained to determine to embrace the amity of the Emperour, with whom they entred into contract vnder these conditions: That betweene the Emperour, Ferdinand Archduke of Austria, and Francis Sforce Duke of Millan on the one party, and the Senate of Venice on the other party, should be a perpetuall peace and confederation: That the Senate, in times of need, should send for the defence of the Duchie of Millan, fixe hundred men at armes, fixe hundred light horsemen, and fixe thousand footemen: That they should administer the like proportion for the defence of the kingdom of Naples, but in case it should be inuaded by the Christians: for, the Venetians refused to be bound generally, because they would not stir vp the Turke.

against them: That the Emperour should be bound to defend against all men, all that the Venetians possessed in Italy, and that with the like number and proportion of men: That the Venetians should pay in eight yeares to the Archduke for appeasement of their ancient controuersies and for the accord made at Wormes, two hundred thousand ducats. Vpon the end of this agreement, the Senate hauing dismissed Theodor Trinnulce, chose Francis Maria Duke of Verba for gouernor generall of their men of warre with the same conditions.

It was a common iudgement of most of the wisemen in Italy, that the French king finding those aides to be turned against him, which afore had bene on his side, would put off the enterprise of Millan for that yeare: neuerthelesse, when they heard that the preparations did not onely continue, but that the army began to march, such as stood in feare of his victory, fell (the better to resist him) to make a new confederation, wherein they perswaded the Pope to be chiefe and principall.

Here is to be remembred, that where the Pope, at his first descending into Italy stood desirous to haue an vniuersall peace, and looking with great compassion into the harmes which grew vpon Christendome by the victories of the Turkes, he sent to the Emperour, to the French king, and the king of England, to depose for the time, their armes so hurtfull for the common-weale of Christendome, and euery of them seuerally to send Embassadors to Rome, with fulnesse of power to consult of the necessary remedies, and releueing of the lamentable afflictions of the Christians. This was performed by them all in apparance, but beginning to treat more particularly of things, it was presently discerned that those labours were vaine, for the infinite difficulties that fell out when they came to the point of peace-making: So many impediments do follow the deliberation of great causes, and so hard it is to reconcile controuersies of estate, which ordinarily draw with them their infinite suspitions and differences: for, a truce for a short time, was nothing agreeable to the Emperour; neither did it in any sort serue the expectation of his purposes: and the French king refused to make it for a longer time (so hurtfull was it for him to protract or temporise) that had all his prouisions for the warre aduanced. In which separation of mind betweene these two great Princes, the Pope either for the ancient affection which eftsouones began to reuiue in him towards the Emperour, or for that he discerned the thoughts of the French king to be estranged from peace and concord, discovered his inclination, and began more then he was wont, to hearken to those that encouraged him, not to suffer the French to possesse againe the Duchie of Millan. This oportunitie was obserued by the Cardinall Medicis, who, hauing remained at Florence for feare of the persecutions of his enenies, but chiefly of the Cardinall of Volterra; who stood very great & gracious with the Pope, tooké to him a new courage, and came to Rome, where he was receiued of most of the Court with great honor and respect: there, ioyning himselfe with the Duke of Sesso the Emperors Embassador, and with the Embassadors of the king of England, he fauored that cause, and furthered it all that he could with the Pope. It is seene often in the course and practise of worldly things, that the falling of one man is the rising of another by which property of reuolution is apparantly proued, that mortall men are subiect to the law of nature and fortune: for, in this aduantage of variation and change, the ill hap of Cardinall Volterra, which almost alwayes troubled his wit, his pollicie, and all his drifts, heaped vpon him a great damage and danger: and in that oportunitie was giuen to the Cardinall Medicis, a notable meane to enter into greater grace and authority with the Pope, who afore bare a constant inclination to the Cardinall Volterra, for that both by his industrie & apt insinuation of words, he had brought him to beleue that he desired nothing more then an vniuersall peace throughout all Christendome. This was the accident: one Francis Imperiale, being banished from Sicile, went into Fraunce, and being staied at Castelnoua neare Rome by the deuise of the Duke of Sesso, there was found about him a packet of letters written by the Cardinall Volterra, to his Nephew the Bishop of Xaintes. By these letters he gaue counsell to the French king, to inuade the Ile of Sicile with an army by sea, by which inuasion the Emperors forces should necessarily be turned to the defence of it, and so the enterprise of Millan would become more easie to the French. The detection of this man troubled not a litle the Pope, who was so much the more aggriued against him, by how much his dissembled demonstrations had beguiled him: and in that iust discontentment, he was vehemently furthered by the incitation of the Duke of Sesso and Cardinall Medicis, by whose industries he was committed to the Castell S. Ange, and afterwards examined by Iudges delegate as

guilty in the crime of violation of the Popes maiesty, for that he had incensed the French king to inuade with hostility the Island of Sicile, a free hold of the sea Apostolike. Wherein albeit they proceeded with lenity and fauor, and after the acts of interrogatories, he had liberty of counsell to pelad for him; yet they proceeded not with the same moderation against his goods, since the same day he was apprehended, the Pope sent to make seasure of all the moueables & riches that were in his house. And as one conspiracy reuealeth another, so by the imprisonment of the sayd Imperiale there was discovered another detection for the French king in Sicile, for the which were executed by iustice the Count Cameraco, the master of the ports, and the Treasurer. The verity and consideration of these matters, insinuated the Pope a great displeasure against the French king, in which ill disposed inclination, he began to consult more and more with Cardinall Medici; and lastly the rumor of the descending of the French armies redoubling daily, the Pope published manifestly his intention to oppose against them: for which cause he summoned the assembly of the Cardinals, to whom after his accustomed protestations of the present feares and daungers of the great Turke, he declared that as onely the French king was the cause why so great perils were not remoued from Christendome, for that he refused with great obstinacy to consent to the peace that was negociated: so, seeing it appertained to him as the Vicar of Iesus Christ and successor to Peter, to be carefull ouer the preservation of Christian peace, he was compelled by that zeale which he oweth to their vniuersall safety, to confederate himselfe with such Princes as did what they could to defend Italy from troubles, for that of the quiet or trouble of that region, depended the tranquility or vexation of the whole Christian part of the world. According to this declaration, concurring with the industry of the Viceroy of Naples being cometo Rome for that purpose, a league was concluded for the defence of Italy the third day of August, betweene the Pope, the Emperor, the king of England, the Archduke of Austria, the Duke of Millan, the Genowaies, and the Cardinall Medici and the estate of Florence ioyntly. The publication bare also, that it should continue all the time of the confederates liues, and a yeare after the death of euery of them: There was reseruatiō of place and time for any other to come in, so that the Pope, the Emperour, and the king of England thought good, with this prouision, that in matters of quarrell and controuersy, they should vie iustice, and not armes: That they should erect an army to be opposed against whō so euer wold inuade any of the confederats, to which army the Pope should send 200 men at armes, the Emperour eight hundred, the Florentins two hundred, the Duke of Millan two hundred, and two hundred light horsemen: That the Pope, the Emperour, and the Duke of Millan should make all the prouisions of artilleries and munitions, together with all expences and charges appertaining: That to leauy the bands of footemen necessary for the army, and to furnish all other expences requisite for the warre, the Pope should pay euery moneth twentie thousand duckats, the Duke of Millan as much, & the Florentins the like summe: That the Emperour should pay thirtie thousand, the Genowaies, Lucquois, and Siennois together, ten thousand, and the Genowaies notwithstanding to remaine bound to the army by sea and other defraiments necessary for their defence: To this contribution they should be all bound for three monethes, and so much time ouer the three monethes as should be set downe by the Pope, the Emperour, and the king of England: That it should be in the power of the Pope and the Emperour to name the Captaine generall of the whole warre, who it was sayd should fall vpon the person of the Viceroy of Naples, for whom the Cardinall Medici, whose authority was great with the Imperials, laboured what he could, chiefly for the hatred he bare to Prosper Colonne. The Marquis of Mantua was ioynd to this confederation by an indirect meane, for that the Pope and the Florentins entertained him for their Captaine generall at their common pay.

But neither the league made by the Venetians with the Emperour, nor the vnion of so many great Princes, contracted with so ample contributions and great prouisions; could alter the resolution of the French king, who being come to Lions, prepared to passe in person with a strong army into Italy: where the brute of his comming was no sooner spread, then new tumults began to appeare: for Lionell the brother of Albert Pio, recovered by surprise the towne of Carpy, being negligently regarded by Iohn Coscia, whom Prosper had created Gouvernor there, which he might do of good authority, for that the Emperour had giuen that towne to him after he had deposed Albert for his offence of rebellion to the Empire. But in the Duchy of Millan there was like to haue chanced a greater accident, both more terrible for the property, & for the person of greater preiudice:

This is the discourse of it: Franncis Sforce riding from Monce to Millan vpon a litle Mulet, and causing the horsemen that were for his gard to ride farre from him to auoyde the trouble of the dust that in sommer time the train of horses makes to rise in great abundance through all the plaines of Lombardy, Boniface Viscount a young Gentleman, better knowne by the noblenesse of his house, then for his wealth, estates, or other conditions, offered himselfe oonly to accompany the Duke, being well mounted vpon a Turkish horse: and as they came riding together vpon a partition of a way, Boniface being somewhat slipt behind, obseruing the oportunity of the place and the distance of the Dukes traine, spurred his horse, and ranne in a maine race with his dagger drawne to strike the Duke on the head: but what with the feare of the Mulet shrinking with the noyse of his horse, and the fiercenesse of his horse whom he could not stoppe, together with the difference of the height of his horse from the Dukes Mulet, the blow that he made at the Dukes head swarued and fell vpon his shoulders, and afterwards drawing his sword to accomplish the execution, the same impediments made it vaine; or at least the hurt was light, being but a blow slentwise. By this time many of the horsemen making in to the Dukes rescue, he fell to flying, hoping to shake off by his fortune, the daunger that by his valour he was fallen into. Many of the horsemen of the Dukes gard had him in chase, amongst whom was a generall emulation of hazard and perill to kill him that in so manifest treason sought the life of their master, but he found more safety in the swiftnesse of his horse, then his followers found remedy in their reuengefull desires. And if fortune had answered the valour and industry of the man, it might haue bene called one of the rarest and most singular aduentures that euer was, that one man without armour, at noone day, in a plaine way, durst set vpon a great Prince, in the middell of his estate, and enuironed with so great a strength of souldiers and men armed, and yet to fly away in safety. The cause of this desperate resolution of this Gentleman, was a malice that he had conceiued for the murder of Monseig. Visconte, who a few monethes afore, had bene slaine in Millan by one Ierome Moron, not without the Dukes will and priuitie as many supposed. The Duke vpon his hurt withdrew himselfe to Monce, and for that he was iealous that there were of the conspiracy within Millan, the Bishop of Alexandria brother to Monseig. that was slaine, was apprehended by Aloron and Prosper. At the first rumour of the fact, either to prevent the suspicion that might go on him, or to make his fauour the greater, he put himselfe willingly into the hands of Prosper vpon his faith, and after he was sounded by examination, they sent him prisoner to the Castell of Cremona, some holding him guilty, and some speaking much of his innocency, as the iudgements of men were diuerse. It hapned almost in the same seasons, that Galeas Bragano accompanied with the exiles of Millan, and with the ayde of certaine French souldiers which were already in the countrey of Picmont, was receiued into the towne, of Valence by the Captaine of the Castell who was a Sauoie man: but Antho. de Lena lying within Ass with one part of the light horsemen and Spanish footmen, being aduertised of the accident, went immediately to incampe before it, and taking the vantage of the weaknesse of the towne which the enemies had no time to reduce to fortification, he planted his artilleries, and tooke it the second day, and with the same successe battered the Castell. There died about foure hundred bodies, as well in the action of the towne, as in the execution of the Castell, besides many made prisoners, amongst whom was Galeas principall leader of the enterprise.

army marcheth.

According to the great preparations made in Fraunce for the warre, the army marched at last, and bands of souldiers passed continually ouer the mounts: after whom the person of the king prepared to passe, which he had effectually accomplished, had not the conspiracy of the Duke of Burbon which now beganne to come to light, giuen impediment to his going: he was of the bloud Royall, and therefore his reputation more great and generall: for the dignity of his office being great Constable, his authority was absolute and ample: by his large estates and riches; his credite was currant in Fraunce, and by his naturall valour, he was mighty and strong in the opinions of men: but he had not bene of long time in the grace and fauour of the king, and in that abiection, was not admitted to the secret affaires of the Realme, nor respected according to the merite of his place and greatnesse: he was discontented with the oppression of the kings mother, wherevniuing certaine auncient rights, made open claime to the greatest parte of his lands and dominions in the open Parliament at Paris: and for that he found in the king no disposition to do remedy to that grieve, he suffered indignation to enter into his hart, and in that discontentment

admitted confederation with the Emperour and with the king of England, solicited by Monsieur de Beaumont, of great confidence with the Emperour, and his chiefe Chamberlaine: betweene whom, ^{Confederacy betweene the Emperour, the king of England and the Duke of Burbon.} it was agreed, that the Emperour should giue him in mariage his sister Elenor the late widow of Emannell king of the Portugals. The execution of these counsels was grounded vpon the French kings determination to go in person to the war: in which resolution to nourish him the more, the king of England had giuen him cunning hopes, that he would not molest the Realme of Fraunce for that yeare: That the Duke of Burbon, alsoone as the king should be ouer the Mounts, should enter Burgundy with an army of twelue thousand footemen that were secretly leuied with the moneyes of the Emperour and the king of England: wherein he doubted not well to acquite himselfe in that seruice, both for the absence of the king, and for the vniuersall grace & opinion which he had through all the realme of Fraunce. And touching those things that should be conquered, the Earledome of Prouence should remaine to him, and in place of Earle, he should put on the name and title of king of Prouence, challenging that state to appertaine to him by the rights of the house of Aniow: and all the residue gotten by this warre to disceind to the king of England: the Duke of Burbon then abiding at Moulins a principall towne of the Duchy of Burbon, sayned himselfe to be sicke, to haue the better excuse not to folow the king into Italy. The king in his iourney to Lyons, made Moulins in his way, where being already possessed of certaine light tokens of the Dukes conspiracy, he gaue him an inkling, that albeit many went about to bring him in distrust and suspition with him, yet for his part, he beleueed lesse in the rumors and informations which might be full of incertainty and error, then in his faith and valour, whereof he had so good experience. But the dissimulation of the Duke exceeded the roundnesse & plainnesse of the king: for, keeping his intentions smothered, he gaue thanks to God that had appointed him to liue vnder such a king, afore whose equity and grauity could not stand the false accusations and imputations of malicious men: and in that compassion he promised the king to follow him wheresoeuer he would go so soone as he was deliuered of his malady, which he sayd could not continue long, for that it drew with it no dangerous accidents. But the king was no sooner come to Lyons, then he had aduertisement that many bands of Launceknights were mustred vpon the frontiers of Burgundy, which confirming the tokens of suspition that he had before, together with certaine letters surprisid, detecting more plainly the conspiracy, he committed to prison forthwith Monsieur de S. Valier, Monsieur de Bussie brother to Monsieur la Palisse, the postmaister, and the Bishop of Autun, all parteners of the practise: and thinking to make the action perfect by apprehending the head, he dispatched in great diligence to Moulins, the great maister with fise hundred horse and foure thousand footemen, to take the Duke of Burbon: but his suspition was swifter then their celerity, for, doubting no lesse the detection of things, then fearing least the passages would be stopped, by his forecast he preuented the perill that the kings indignation prepared for him, and escaped secretly into Franche count in disguised attire: so subtle in man is the suspition of perill, and so swift are the wings that carie him from the mischiefe which he feareth.

By reason of this euasion, and the importance of the conspiracy that depended of it, the king ^{The French army in Italy.} thought it best not to pursue in person the warres of Italy: and yet would he not wholly giue ouer the expedition, but retaining with himselfe one part of the souldiers prepared for this new war, he committed to Monsieur Boniuet then Admirall of Fraunce, the conduction of his army, which contained a thousand eight hundred launces, six thousand Swissers, two thousand Gascouns, two thousand Valeisens, sixe thousand Launceknights, twelue thousand Frenchmen, and three thousand Italians: with which army alsoone as the Admirall was past the Mounts, and drawing neare the confines of the state of Millan, he made shew that he would deale first with Novaro: and by that demonstration, the City being not tenable, both for the want of souldiers, and insufficiency of the rampiers, it yeilded by the consent of the Duke of Millan, who retained the Castell, Vigenena did the like suffering the same wants and impediments, and by their examples all that part of the countrey which is beyond the riuer of Thezin fell into the power of the Frenchmen. Prosper Colonne lying sicke of a long malady, would neuer beleue that the French king would stand firme in his resolution to inuade the Duchy of Millan for that yeare, both for the confederation that the Venetians had made against him, and for the detection of the conspiracy of the Duke of Burbon. and therefore he had not with that diligence and speed that was necessary, assembled the souldiers and men of war that lay disperfed in diuerfe places, & much leffe had made competent prouifions for fo great a refiftance. But now that the enemies were vpon the way and approaching, he sent to mufter his companies in all haft, the oportunity of the time being againft the fpeede he made, & his diligence as little auailable as the feafon was contrary. He thought aboue all things to ftop their paffage at Thefin, not remembring what had happened to him at the riuer of Adda againft Monsieur Lawtrech, and of that he made himfelfe fo affured promife, that he tooke no care to reedify the battillions & rampiers of the fuburbs of Millan, of which the greateft part lay already on the ground, fo fmall was the care that was had of them: he assembled his army vpon the riuer betweene Biagrasso, Bufaloro, & Turbiquo, a place very apt for that purpofe, & no leffe conuenient for Pania and Millan. But the Frenchmen who were now come to Vigeuena, finding the water of the riuer lower then Proffer beleued, began foure miles from the Imperiall campe to paffe ouer, part by the foord, and fome in botes & barkes, building a bridge for their artilleries in a place where they found neither gard nor other impediment. By the neceffity of this v unexpected accident, Proffer was driuen to change all the counfels of the warre, and therefore difpatched forthwith Ambo de Leua, with an hundred men at armes and three thousand footemen, to the gard of Pania, himfelfe with the refidue of the armie drew to Millan, where after he had called the Captaines to counfell, they were all of this minde, that if the French made their approaches forthwith, there was no poffibility to defend Millan, for the ruine of the rampiers of the fuburbs, whereof there had bene made no reckening fince the laft warres. The confidence that Proffer had to defend the paffage of Thefin, was the caufe that they were not repaired, neither could they be made defendable in the fpace of three dayes: and that they had to make a refolution afwell for the one as the other of thefe two accidents, both to labour with vniuerfall diligence at the rampiers, and alfo to ftand vpon a prepared readineffe to depart, if the Frenchmen came either the firft, the fecond, or the third day, and to retire to Coma if they tooke the way of Pania, or elfe to go to Pania if they marched by Coma. But the finifter deftiny of the French, both blinding their eyes that they could not fee, and binding their hands that they could not execute, would not fuffer them to vfe fo great and happie an occafion: for, either through their negligence, which is a chiefe enemy to enterprifes, or to expect the whole army, whereof a great part was behind, they wandered three dayes along the riuer of Thefin, and being all assembled into one ftrength betweene Millan, Pania and Binaquo, they marched afterwards to Saint Christopher within a mile of Millan betweene the gate of Thefin and Rome gate: there, after they had made the way euen to paffe their artilleries into the vauntgard, they made as though they would affault the towne: but without doing any other enterprife, they incamped in that place, and leuying their fiege from thence within few dayes after, they went to lodge in the Abbey of Cleruant, from whence they found meanes to deface the milles and cut the water from Millan; and fo they thought rather to befiege then affault Millan, for that there was within the walles eight hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horfemen, foure thousand Spanifh footmen, fixe thousand five hundred Launceknights, and three thousand Italians (befides the popular forte, which were well furnifhed with weapon, and refolute in their auncient difpofition againft the French.)

Pope Adrian.

In this eftate of affaires, paffed into the other life the foureteenth of September, Pope Adrian: his death was not without great difcommodity and damage to the confederates, for that there did not onely faile in them, the authority Pontificall, but alfo the contribution of money, whereunto he was bound by the capitulations of the League: he died, leauing behind him a very fmall opinion and eftimation, either for the little time he raigned, or for his want of experience in affaires: but his death was not a little plaufible to the whole Court, for the defire they had to liue vnder a Pope naturall of Italy, or at leaft fuch one as had his training there. By the death of the Pope, many troubles began to kindle in the townes of the Churches iurifdiction, and in them as appeared before his fickeneffe, many fmall sparkes of a fire to come, fo in the time of his life, they had eafily burft out to a flame, if they had not bene quenched, partly by chance, and partly by the diligence of others: for, where before the Popes paffing into Italie, the Colledge of Cardinals had giuen to Albert Pio the keeping of Reggia and Rubiero, the fayd Albert held ftill for himfelfe the Caflets, making fmall accompt of the inftance that was made to him to render them, wherein he had no leffe ready his colours and excufes, then he was apt to take to take occasion by the slender experience of Pope Adrian. Besides, he had solicited that as soone as the beginning of the warre appeared, Ranse de Cere with certaine horsemen and footemen should enter within Rubiero, to gouerne vnder the oportunity of that place, the way of Rome that passeth betwene Modena and Reggia: his intention was both to giue impediments to the money and other dispatches that should be sent from Rome, Naples, and Florence to Mil-lan, and to proceede to other enterprises as occasion serued: but Franncis Guicciardin Gouver- Francis Guicciardin.

nour of the same Cities, discouering in good time this plot, and communicating with the Pope to what end tended the sweete words and requestes of Albert, together with the daungers that would fall on the estate Ecclesiastike on that side, induced the Pope to make demonstration by threatnings, that he would vse force, and so constrained Albert, to restore to him the Castels: neither durst he oppose himselfe against the Popes will, for that the French were not as yet verie strong in Italy. Since the faction of Pio had recouered the towne of Carpi, Prosper in whom was no small desire to haue it againe, procured to be retained in the name of the confederates, Guido Rangon with an hundred men at armes, an hundred lighthorsemen, and a thousand footemen, ordayning withall, that a thousand Spanish footemen whom the Duke of Sesso had leuyed at Rome to ioyne with the residue at Mil-lan, should remaine for the same cause at Modena. And whilest these things were in preparing, Ranse de Cere (to whom resorted dayly both horsemen and footemen, caryed no lesse by hope of pillage then for the authority of his name) began to commaund the wayes, and trouble the whole countrey. Besides, loosing no time to the liberty he had, he began one night to assault vpon the sudden the towne of Rubiero, with two thousand footmen, but his vndiscrete attempt being resisted both by the valour of the defendants, and the difficulties of the place, he was repulled, leauing as prisoner behind him, Tristram Corso one of the Captaines of his footemen.

These forces assembled in these places for diuerse causes, were the occasion of greater things: for after the death of the Pope, the Duke of Ferrara being made wearie with the hopes that were giuen him touching the restitution of Reggia and Modena, began to consider that in respect of the absolution which he had obtrayned of Adrian, it would be lesse hard to get pardon for things taken away, then restitution of things lost: and therefore being of the vniuersall perswasion with all men, that it would be long afore they would choose a new Pope, both for the ordinary tract of time vsed in that election, and also for the discords of Cardinals, which were by many degrees increased euer since the death of Pope Leo: he determined to desir by what meanes he might recouer Modena and Reggia: and in that inclination he was pushed on (amongst other oportunities) with the commodity and offer to knit with him Ranse de Cere, who had already leuyed a strength of two hundred horsemen and more then two thousand footmen: So that after the Duke had waged three thousand footemen, and sent to Ranse three thousand duckats, he marched towards Modena, in which Citie was no other strength of men of warre, then the regiment of the Count Guido Rangon who had bene retained by the League. And albeit the people bare no affection to the iurisdiction of the house of Ferrara, yet both by the weaknesse of the walles which were not flanked after the auncient manner, and the filling vp of the ditches suffering of long time no reparation, it seemed there was neede of a greater garrison: and therefore the Gouvernour and the Count dispensing with their priuate quarrels that had bene betwene them, began to proceede with a ioynt diligence to aduance the former resolution, to let into Modena the Spanish footemen, who being arriued already in Tuscane, marched slowly, and made diuerse and doubtfull answers when they were asked whether they would remaine at Modena or passe further: neuerthelesse after many intreatings, they were at last content to enter. When this matter was related to the Duke of Ferrara, being then come to Finale with two hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horsemen, and three thousand footemen, it stayed him almost for passing further: and yet because the matter was not absolute, and hoping at least, that knitting with Ranse de Cere, he might haply take Reggia: and nothing dispayring that by the difficultie of payments, some disorder might fall amongst the footemen of the enemies, he confirmed his first intention, and determined to passe on. Those hopes were not lightly conceiued by the Duke, for that the Colledge of Cardinals, to whom the gouernour had signified with great diligence the perils that were toward, were so carelesse to make prouision, yea not vouchsafing to giue answer to the letters and messages that were sent, that there was no meane to pay the souldiers, of the publike purse: and where haply the day was come wherein the Spanish souldiers should receiue the pay of the second moneth, yet if they had bene all payed, there was no hope to wage a greater number: and bestowing part of them within Modena and the residue in Reggia, that separation would take away the suretie from both the Cities, besides that there were no souldiers within Reggia; and the disposition of the people farre other then they of Modena. Amid which difficulties, the gouernour and the Count Guido determining especially to preserue Modena, as a towne of greatest importance, both for the neighbourhood of Bologna, and nearest affinitie with the estate of the Church, bearing also the aptest oportunitie to cary to it succours and other prouisions; they sent to Reggia five hundred footemen vnder the leading of Vincent Maiato of Bologna and one of the Count Guido's souldiers, charging him, that if he were not able to defend the towne, to retire into the Citadell: which for that they hoped would hold out at least for certaine dayes, they sent money to Iohn Baptista Smeraldo of Parma, who was Captaine there, to leaue three hundred footmen, and made request (though in vaine) to them of Reggia to contribute some proportion of mony for waging of the like number, seeing there was no lesse question of their surety, then of the safety of the Church estate. Touching the danger of Modena, the Gouernour hauing no meane to defend it for want of money, called afore him many of the Citizens, declaring to them that things were drawne into that strait, that if the Spanish bands were not payed, and a rate of money raysted to furnish other expences, there would be compulsion to let the towne fall into the hands of the Duke of Ferrara. He sayd he could yet defend it if there were prouision of money, which could not otherwise be leauied but by taxing and rating themselves for the present, assuring them that either the new Pope, or the Colledge of Cardinals, would make prouision for that that might happen afterwards: That there was not one amongst them who had not proued the yoke of the Duke of Ferrara, and the gouernement of the Church, and therefore it were too superfluous to debate by arguments, which of the two were most heauy or light, and no lesse vaine to perswade by discourse of reason the thing that their owne experience and memory were against. Lastly he desired them not to stand much vpon that trifling summe of mony that was demanded by way of loane, for that both touching publike interest or profit priuate, it was a matter of small consideration in regard to haue a Lord to their more liking and contentment. These words sliding easily into the minds of them that had the same inclination, did the rather induce them to fall to taxing and rating themselves, and so leauied the money that was demanded: so easie were they to beare a light burden amongst them all, to the end to auoyde a heauier yoke which lay ready to belayd vpon them. With this money were payed the souldiers, and other prouisions accomplished for the better bearing out of the warre; a comfort both for the qualitie and oportunitie of it, which tooke from them all feare of the armes of the Duke of Ferrara: who presuming no further of his forces then was conuenient, forsooke the enterprise of Modena, and left it on the left hand, and ioyning with him Ranſe de Cere by the way, he drew neare to the towne of Reggia, which did not only receiue him, but the day following the Captaine put into his hands the Citadell, suffering but a small summons of the Cannon. Touching which action the Captaine alleaged for his iustification, that both Vincent Maiato being called by him, refused to enter, and the money sent to him by the Gouernour, was taken away neare Parma, whither he had sent to leauy bands of footemen. This iustification was accepted, though not for the equity of it, yet for the necessity of the time not seruing to further examination. As soone as the Duke had taken Reggia, Ranſe de Cere being sent for by the Admirall of Fraunce, went to him: and the Duke being followed but with a slender strength of footmen, wandred certaine dayes along the riuer of Secchia, and from thence went to incampe before the towne of Rubiero, to the keeping whereof the Count Guido had vsed in confidence the old man Coniano with two hundred footemen. And albeit the Duke had no great hope to take the town, both for the hard situation of place and good fortification of large and deepe ditches, together with great rampiers all along the wals: yet beginning the day following to execute the wall ioyning with the gate, the Captaine of the footemen, either by secret intelligence, or for feare of the townsmen who began to rise, leapt ouer the wals and presented himselfe before the Duke, offering to his discretion both himselfe and the towne; an offer so much the more precious and welcome, by how much it came vnexpected, holding more of fortune then of valour. But this being a line to leade the

Duke into the towne, and taking further courage vpon that felicity, he planted his artilleries before the Castle, which so terrified the Captaine named Tius Taillefer of Parma, that notwithstanding the Castle was strong and fully furnished of men, munition, and all other prouisions necessarie, yet being made fearefull by the fortune of the towne, he yeelded it vp before night, not abiding one halfe of the artilleries: wherein when the Duke was possessed & established, he abode there with his armie, hoping that for the long vacation of the Sea Apostolike, the regiment of footmen within Modena would either dissolue or disorder: he fed himselfe also at the same time with hope of other things, which in their place shall be declared.

About this time Monſieur Bonniuet, who lay incamped a S. Christopher betweene the gates of Theſſin and Rome, a place enuironed with waters and ditches, began to despaire to take Millan by force: and therefore after the taking of Monce he sent Captaine Bayard and Federike Bossolo with three hundred Launces and eight thousand footmen to take Loda, whither was come the Marquis of Mantua with five hundred horse and five hundred footmen, which was the regiment with the which the Church and the Florentines had entertained him into their pay: but hauing feare of his person, he retired to Pontuike, by which occasion the Citie being abandoned, receiued the Frenchmen. After the taking of Loda, Federike builded a bridge vpon the riuer of Adda, and passed with his companies vpon the lands of Cremona to succour the Castle of Cremona, which the defendants the same day that the Admirall approched Millan, had compounded to render, if they were not rescued by the xxvj. of September: to which composition they were compelled both by the extremitie of hunger, and not knowing that the French army was passed into Italy. Federike drew neare to the Castle without any resistance or difficultie, and after he had refreshed it with victuals & other relieves, he determined to assault the towne vpon this confidence, that Prosper Colomo had left a verie slender garrison; notwithstanding to helpe that feare, the Marquis of Mantua had sent thither an hundred men at armes, an hundred light horsemen, and foure hundred footmen: but he finding the difficulties too great to enter the Citie on that side towards the castle, for the fortifications which the defendants had made, the same deuiding the citie from the castle, he turned on the right hand, & determined to batter the wall in places where he found it most weake: & after he had playd a while with the artilleries, he prepared his souldiers to the assault, but without effect, which was the cause that he began againe the battery, to beat wider the breach, though with no better successe then the first, the same driuing him to retire to S. Martin, there to tarie for Ranſe de Cere, who was to come frō Reggia with two hundred horsemen & two thousand footmē: & when he was come, they encāped estloones afore Cremona, doing great execution vpon the walles for many houres to great effect, neuerthelesse what by the impedimēts of the great raines that fell, and discerning by the present difficulties how hardly they should preuaile, they forbore to do any further execution: for that the same day, Mercurio with the light horsemen of the Venetians (whose bands were mustered at Pontuike) passed ouer the riuer of Oglio, and made incursions euen to their tents. After the vaine triall of this exploit, Federike and Ranſe brake vp their siege from before Cremona, as well for lacke of victuals, as for the breaking away of the footmen which Ranſe brought thither, picking this quarrell, that they had receiued no other money then that which the Duke of Ferrara had giuen. From Cremona they marched to incampe afore Sonzin, where they found no better successe in their affaires: afterwards they fell to sacking the towne of Carauage, where they abode certaine dayes, of which lingring was bred this excuse or impediment to the Senate of Venice, for not sending to Millan those proportions of men which they were bound vnto: for that, taking their excuse in temporizing so long vpon the common opinion that the Imperiall Captaines had, that in respect of their separation with the French king, the French armie would not march that yeare, they assured to send them as soone as the companies that lay vpon the territories of Cremona should be repassed the riuer of Adda.

In this condition of affaires; both the parties distrusting not to be able to put a speedy end to the warre, either party dwelt in his securitie, and would offer nothing to hazard. The Admirall who neuer looked to take Millan by force, expected either that the enemies would dissolue for want of mony, or at least that necessity of victuals would cōpell them to abandon Millan: where notwithstanding there was come in great plenty, yet the multitude of mouthes to cate it was more innumerable; besides that, he had cut from them their water, and the vse of their milles: for this cause the Admirall called home those bands that lay along the riuer of Adda, and bestowed them betweene Monce and Millan, to the end that the people of Milam from whom was stopped the traffike of victuals by the wayes of Loda and Pania, should also remaine depriued of all such reliefe as was wont to passe from the hill of Brianzo: but these experiences were not sufficient, to accomplish the effect that the Admirall desired. On the other part, albeit Prosper Colunno (as touching his body) was vehemently oppressed with a great sicknesse, and no lesse trauelled with emulation in mind, as not brooking the coming of the Viceroy of Naples, he yet desired to be the principall man: yet, by his counsell was done what could be done, to stop the passage of victuals that came to the enemies from the parts beyond the riuer of Tessin, the rather for that the fortification of the place where they were incamped, gaue no hope to driue them away by force: therefore Prosper's care was, that the Marquis of Mantua should enter into Pania, whose coming putting the French into feare least he would win their bridge, they builded another at Torglien within fise and twentie miles of Pania. Besides, he solicited Vitelli to passe the riuer, who with the companies of men of warre which the Florentines had giuen him (and by them was sent to Genes in the beginning of the warre) together with three thousand footmen payd by the Genowayes, had commaunded all the countrey beyond Paw, except Alexandria: that was to giue impediment to the victuals which came to the Frenchmen from the countrey of Lomellina: but the Duke of Genes, would not consent to it for the feare he had of the Archbishop of Fregosa, who lay in Alexandria neare to Genes. And because the Veneissians, whose bands were passed Oglia, refused so long as that part of the Frenchmen which was gone fro Carauage remained neare Monce, to passe Adda for the perill of Bergama: Prosper wonne them to send foure hundred horsmen, and fise hundred footmen to Tressa, to stop the course of victuals wherewith they liued.

Whilest both parts were in the action of these matters, there was performed no exploit of war other then light skirmishes, incursions and pillages, wherein alwayes the Frenchmen had the worse, and so returned eftssoones with great losse and damage. It hapned one day amongst others, that as Iohn de Medicis issued out with two hundred men at armes, three hundred light horsmen, and a thousand footmen, he met with fourescore French Launces, being most part of the companies of Barnaby Visconte, and offering to chase them, he sodainly fell to retire, and by that stratageme cunningly drew them vpo an ambush of fise hundred harquebuziers which he had laid, and there made slaughter of the most of them, and tooke the residue prisoners. In like sort in another encounter, Socchor Burquignon brake a troupe of threescore men at armes of the companie of the master of the horse. Besides, the bands of Spanish footmen had many conflicts with the French footmen that warded at those trenches which were made to go in couert euen to the rampiers, where they slue manie of them that garded the trenches. And at the same time Paul Lusaquo, who remained at Pisqueton with an hundred and fiftie light horsmen, ouer-ran the countrey all about, and distressed not a litle those that were in Cremona. Neither did the ambushes succeed more happily to the Admirall, then his other exploits; for hauing conspired secretly with one Morgant of Parma, a commander vnder Iohn de Medicis, that when it should fall to his turne to ward at a Bastillion of a gate which was cast out of the rampiers, he should receiue in his souldiers: when the night appointed came, Morgant thinking it necessarie to communicate the matter with some other of his companions for the better execution, brake it with one especiall souldier of his band, who making as though he consented to the treason, gaue him counsell to go and commaund the Sentinels in the name of Prosper not to stirre, what brute or noyse soeuer they heard, as not to let him whom he would send to call the souldiers of the campe to come to the Bastillion, for that the Admirall had that night drawne neare to that side fise thousand footmen to be readie at the signe giuen, and had set in order the whole armie: But such is the infirmity of treason, that it hath no further assurance then the party hath confidence. For whilest Morgant went to execute the deuise, the other who could not be faithfull in conspiracie, reucaleth the whole practise to Iohn de Medicis, who making speed to the Bastillion, taketh the offenders, and after iudiciall examination had, he maketh them to passe the pikes according to the iustice of warre.

It seemed now that the affaires of the French began to decline on all sides, both for the fertilitie of the country about Milam, which ministred some reliefe to the wants of the towne: & for the deuise of the townes men inuenting hand-milles to supply the vse of grinding, by which engine was taken away the Admirals hope that the inhabitants would fall into want of meale. It was beleued beleueed also that the French had lost in those encounters more then fiftene hundred horse as well of seruice as of common sort, which brought them into that astonishment, that they forbore to issue out of their tents, but in times of need to guard the victuallers and forragers, and that alwaies in strong troups. The infamie whereof the Admirall conuerting to his speciall honour, he wold often say, that touching the managing of the warre, he would rather obserue the moderation and temperance of the Italians, then be gouerned by the furious importunities of the French Captaines: and yet whensoever any encounter was giuen either by their footmen or horsemen, they shewed more readinesse to flie then to fight: so that the Captaines of the Emperour being now assured of the feare of hunger, and the forces of the enemy, yea hoping to giue impediments to the victuals of the enemy, there was nothing remaining to trouble them but want of money, without the which if it were a hard matter to containe the souldiers within Millean, it could not almost but be impossible to leade them out of the towne howsoever the affaires and occurances of the warre required: So hard is it to leade souldiers to seruice wherein is no assurance of money, and more daunger to minister discipline where no pay is performed. But to remedy these difficulties, manie meanes were sought out, and amongst others, Prosper Colonne, by the priuity of the Viceroy of Naples and Duke of Sessa, had immediatly vpon the Popes death begun to treat with the Duke of Ferrara; who after he had refused many offers made to him by the Admirall since the action of Reggia, to go afore Cremona, couenanted at last with Prosper, that if he reconquered Modena by his meanes, he would pay him immediatly thirty thousand duckets, and twentie thousand more within two moneths. That conquest seemed a matter of easie execution: since Prosper commanding to depart from Modena Guido Rangon souldier of the league, and also the regiment of Spanish footmen, what other remedie remained to that Citie so abandoned, then to compound with the Duke, and lay themselues downe to his order? The benefite of the armie was one consideration that drew Prosper to this practise, but the thing that more violently ouer-ruled him to it, was his priuate affection, the ancient amitie he had with the Duke of Ferrara, a desire common also to all the other Barons of Rome, to embase the greatnesse of the Popes, and a hope that Modena and Reggia remaining no more to the Church, Parma and Plaisance would with more facility diuolue to the Duke of Millean. This matter albeit was laboured with great secrecie, yet being disclosed by the Count Guido to Guicciardin, he saw there was no other meane to stop it, but to perswade the Spanish Captaines who were well vsed and largely paid, and had good will to continue in that Citie, that where they were not subiect to the authority of Prosper Colonne, they should of themselues refuse to go from Modena, but by the commaundement of the Duke of Sessa, by whose appointment they came thither: and albeit Guicciardin was not ignorant that the whole deuise was wrought by the consent of the said Duke of Sessa, yet he considered that the Duke being the Emperors Embassador at Rome, & the Colledge making instance to him of the contrarie, would not onely not giue out such a commission, but also would refuse at the request of the Cardinals to giue open order to the contrarie. This deuise drew a successe according to the plot that was layd: for when Prosper sent to commaund Count Guido & the Spaniards to go to Millean for the necessity of the warres, the Count excused him with many reasons, and alleaged that he was subiect to the Church and to them of Modena: as also the Spanish Captaines being perswaded by him and the Gouvernour, made answer, that in that case they were to obey none but the Duke of Sessa: which matters being signified by the Gouvernour to the Colledge of Cardinals, they summoned forthwith into the Conclauie the Duke of Sessa, who to auoid suspicion as well in himselfe as in the Emperour, could not refuse their demaund to write to the Captaines that they should not stir. And moreover, as it often hapneth that in worldly dealings things oftentimes succeed farre otherwise then men thinke, so in this was discerned this accident, that certaine letters of Prosper intercepted by the Gouvernour, were read in the Colledge, by the which as was disclosed how all things went: so the Cardinals that were for the French king, by the impediment of whom the prouisions of money were lingred, which by the Cardinal Medici working was begun to be sent to Modena, knowing how dangerous it would be for the king that that matter should come to effect, began with open hand to help forward the sending of the mony to Modena: wherein the Cardinal Colonne ioyned with the, to declare to the residue, that he preferred the vtility of the Sea Apostolike afore all other things: but notwithstanding this shewed diligence was sufficient to defer the execution of the couenants made with the Duke of Ferrara, yet the foundation of those thoughts being remoued, they retained this in deuotion, that the Viceroy of Naples, who (though with slow remouings) was come to Millan with foure hundred launces and two thousand footmen, should leade away with him the regiment of Spanish footemen as he passed by Modena.

In this time at Millan did increase the plentie and abundance of victuals, for that the Admirall fearing least the souldiers within Pania would occupie the bridge which he had made vpon Thefin, by the which were conueyed necessarie prouisions to the army, he drew from Monce the armie that was there being the lesser part: and of them he sent three thousand to the guard of the bridge, called some of them to himselfe, and distributed the residue, part within Marignan, and part within Biagrasso, places verie neare neighbours to the bridge: by which meane the Imperials that recouered Monce had a farre greater commodity of victuals. The French campe stretched from the Abbey of Clerenau vntill the way of Pania, and was towards that way within gunshot of Millan: and at that time there was in the French armie eight hundred light horsemen, sixe thousand Swissers, two thousand Italian footmen and ten thousand as wel French as Gascons: they had at the bridge of Thefin a thousand Launceknights, & a thousand Italians: the like numbers at Biagrasso, where was Ranſe de Cere, two hundred Launces within Nonaro, & two thousand footmen as well in Alexandria as in Loda: and within Millan were eight hundred Launces, eight hundred light horsemen, sixe thousand Spanish footmen, sixe thousand Launceknights, and foure thousand Italians, besides the multitude of the people, who were very violent against the French both in heart & action: the Marquis of Mantua was within Pania with five hundred Launces, sixe hundred light horsemen, two thousand footmen Spaniards, & three thousand Italians: lastly, there were in new castle in Tortoneſe, three thousand footmen with Vitelli, who, as certaine French bands were passed into Alexandria, retired notwithstanding a litle after to Serranella, fearing least the way of Genes would be shut vp from him: the Venetians also had 600 men at armes, 500 light horsemen, & five thousand footmen, of whō they sent a thousand to Millā at the request of Prosper, who desired to serue his turne with the fame and reputation of their succours: and soone after they dispatched another part of their forces to Cremona, by reason of a suspition of some intelligence.

broke vp from before Millan.

At last the Admirall, what by the difficultie of victuals which grew extreame, the compulsion of the time, which was cold, the vehemencie of snowes, which were violent, and the important instance of the Swissers, whose impatiencie could not suffer so manie incommodities, determined to breake vp and go further from Millan: notwithstanding before he published his resolution, he procured Galeas Viscount to obtaine leaue to go see, and to do reuerence to Madame Clara, of great name for her singular beautie, but of greater fame for the loue that Prosper Colonne bare to her: and being within Millan, he preferred the parley of truce, whereupon did assemble the day following vpon the rampiers Captaine Alarcon, Paule Vettorie the Florentine Commissioner, and Ierome Moron: and for the Admirall, Galeas Viscount and the Generall of Normandie: they communed of a surceassing of armes vntill the end of May, and both parties to be bound to distribute their armies in the townes, and in the end they had consented to reduce all their forces beyond Thefin, had it not bene for the impediments of the Emperours Captaines, who obiecting matter of reproofe, that with the truce they went about to take from the hope they had of the victorie, made answer that they had no power to deliberate any thing without the will of the Viceroy: so that the Admirall within two dayes after caused his artilleries to march before day towards Thefin, himself following with the whole armie at the full appearing of the day: he marched in so good order, as though he would not (vpon occasion) refuse the battell: & on the other side, the inhabitants of the towne seeing his discamping, together with the souldiers made sute with vniuersall voyce that they might be led to the field to charge them: in this demand were also concurrant the Captaines and personages of greatest authoritie, who redoubling the instance to Prosper Colonne, laid before him the facilitie of the victorie, both by the aduantage of their disorder, which cast vpon them an vnappeaseable feare, the comparison of their forces nothing inferior to theirs, and their courage and resolution farre aboue them, and also the opportunity of their retract, wherein lurked some secret terrour to the most part of the armie, the same being confirmed at that instant by the relation of certaine Italians that stragled from the armie: they put him in remembrance of the infinite glorie and perpetuall memory of his name, if he would with his last reputation confirme the renouine and triumph of so many victories gotten by him: lastly, they

they perswaded him that a noble leader of warre caried as great fame by his readinesse to embrace good occasions, as by his resolution to execute when necessitie called him. But Prosper in whom was fixed a settled mind to forbear as much as he could to comitt the credite of his valour to the arbitration of fortune, told them how far it was from the office of a discrete Captaine to be caried with popular voyces, and how vnworthie the name of a General, to leade men to the fight, where was no other hope then in the force of their armes: That though many other worldly matters might be put to aduenture and hazard, yet the life and honour of men required counsel, forecast, and deepest prouidence: That they had wonne glorie enough in compelling the enemy to go his way without blood: That the desire of men ought not to be infinite, and lesse expectatiō in the surety of fortune, whose mutability worketh most in matters of warre: That that armie is ill guided, where in the event and issue of the field the losses are greater then the benefites: That he knew by experience, that the infamy that fell vpon the Generall by his rashnesse, did make a greater wound in his name and credite, then the glorie of the victorie made him rich or renowned, for that as no man would haue interest in the infamie but the leader, so almost euerie particular would communicate in the commendation: That such were the humors of men, that they would lay the losse of a field vpon the Generall only: That as he had hitherto with temperance guided all his enterprises to an honorable end, so now that he was vpon the latest yeare of his age, he would not enter into new course and new counsels, and deliuer vp to fortune so many valiant bodies as reposed their liues on him, nor exchange those rules which from the beginning had led him to that estate of glorie, reputation, and greatnesse, wherein he now standeth. The Frenchmen deuided themselves into two parts, the Admirall with the greatest entred Diagrasso within foure-teeene miles of the towne of Millan, and sent the residue to Rosa which is within seuen miles.

Almost as soone as the Admirall was gone from before Millan, the Cardinals created a new Pope, hauing already consumed in the Conclauē more then fiftie dayes: at the beginning there was in the Cōclauē but a presence of xxxvj. Cardinals, and being afterwards increated with three more, they spent much time in fundrie contentions: for they stood deuided amongst themselves not only for the different wils of the Emperour and French king, but also for the greatnesse of the Cardinall de Medicis: who being pushed on by all such as followed the kings authoritie, and some others that depended of the Emperour, had at his deuotion the full voyces of sixteene Cardinals: they were determined either to chuse him, or at least to name no other without his consent: besides, he was secretly assured of fīue other Cardinals and their voices, together with the fauour of the Emperours Embassadour, with all the residue that followed his authoritie: of all which furtherances and foundatiōs albeit he was assured almost at the death of Pope Leo, yet he entred now into the Conclauē with a more constant resolution not to abandon his hopes, neither for the tract or length of time, nor for any accident whatsoever, making this his chiefest pillar & ground, that in the election of the Pope, it was necessarie that of that presence of Cardinals that was there assistant, a third part of voyces should be concurrant. But so obstinate were the controuersies of the Cardinals, that they could not dissolue their diuisions, neither for the common daunger of Italy, nor for the particular estate of the Church, but according as the affaires of the warre proceeded, both the parts sought to prolong and deferre the election, for the supportation they hoped in the victorie of their fauorers: and it had bene yet longer deferred, both if there had bene amongst the old Cardinals of the Colledge (aduersaries to the Cardinall Medicis) one agreement to chuse another, and also, shaking off their couetousnesse particular, they had stood vpon this point, not to suffer the Cardinall Medicis to rise to the soueraigne seat: but it is a hard matter for men by cōcord to aspire to the end they seeke for, whē their cōcord is entangled with discord or ambition: the Cardinall Colōno, an ancient enemy of the Cardinall Medicis, & of a nature proud & haughtie, fell into some indignation against the other Cardinals that were ioyned with him, because they refused to elect for Pope Cardinall Iacobaccio, a Romane, a man of the same faction, and wholly at his deuotion: in which despite of mind, he made a willing offer to the Cardinall Medicis to ioyne with him in the electiō, & for recōpēce he receiued of him a very secret promise of the office of Vicechancellor which he held, and of his pallace being very sumptuous, builded by Cardinall George, and giuen to him by Pope Leo; a matter which aptly agreeing with the couetousnesse of Cardinall Colōno, so pushed him on, that he drew to him Cardinall Cornare and two others, betweene whom was made a resolute consent to chuse Cardinall Medicis for Pope: and as it often hapneth that in election example doth much, so as soone as their inclination was knowne, many others, either for want of stomacke, or by too much ambition began to presse on with the foremost, to speake in his fauour: insonmuch as the same night, he was honoured as Pope by the vniuersall agreement of the all, and the next morning being the nineteenth of Nouembre, the election was made perfect by solemne sort according to the custome: this dignitie hapned to him the same day two yeares that he entred victorious into Millan. It was thought that amongst other things, his great reuenues of benefices, and Ecclesiastlike offices did much to make him Pope: for that the Cardinals, when they entred the Conclauē, set downe this constitution, that the reuenues of him that should be elected Pope, should be shared by equall distribution amongst the others; a foule custome of couetousnesse in a Cleargie, whose hands should be no lesse innocent to take, then their hearts naked of fraud and guile; and in whose preferment should be most respected their sinceritie of life and doctrine. He would haue continued still his name of Iulio, but being caried with this superstitious obseruation of some of the Cardinals, that such as after their election refusing to changetheir name, died within the yeare, he tooke vpon him the name of Clement the seuenth, either for the nearenesse of that idolatrous festiuall, or else by allusion, that immediately after his election he had pardoned and receiued into grace the Cardinall Volterro, and reconciled all his faction: and albeit Pope Adrian in his latter dayes had declared this Cardinall to be vnablen to assist or enter the Conclauē, yet he had his place there by the permission of the Colledge, and was euen to the last houre, altogether against the election of Iulio. Great was the opinion of this new Pope throughout all the world, and as it hath not bene seene of long time that the Conclauē hath so long temporized and stood vpon the naming of one, so yet they thought the trade and expectation well recompensed in that they had raised to that supream seate, a person of so great authoritie and valour, both for that he had confounded and conioyned by his arbitrement the power of the estate of Florence with the iurisdiction of the Church, & had in the time of Pope Leo gouerned many yeares the whole Pontificacie; and was iudged a man graue and constant in his deliberations, and also for that manie things being by sinister imputation imposed vpon him that proceeded from Leo, manie affirmed that Leo was full of ambition, full of pride, full of trouble, and full of desire of innouation and new things: to which good parts that were found in him, adioyning his modestie and abstinence from pleasures, and full of care and study to attend affaires, there were few who did not expect of him verie great and extraordinarie matters: his election euen in the beginning put the estate of the Church in great surety; for the Duke of Ferrara, not a litle astonished that such a Pope was mounted into the holy seat, and hoping no longer to get Modena for the comming of the Visceroys of Naples, and lesse expectation in the French, who afore by the solicitation of Theodor Trinnico, newly come to his campe, made him great offers, so that he would ioyne with them, returned to Ferrara after he had left sufficient garrison within Reggio and Rubiero. In like sort all controuersies were reappeared in Romagnia, where John de Saffarella who had bene expelled by the power of the Gebelins during the raigne of Adrian, was elssoones reentred with a traine of Guelfes vnder colour to oppresse the contrarie faction, but in truth at the incensing of the French.

But since the French armie was distributed to Biagrasso and Rosa, the Admiral, with whom were remaining but foure thousand Swissers, dismissed (as vnprofitable for seruice) all the footmen of Dauphine and Languedocke: he sent also his great artilleries beyond Thefin, with intention to tarie there for the supplies which the king prepared for his succours, not fearing that the enemy would make any inuasion vpon him in a place so strong, and containing such plentie of victuals: and yet because he would not entertaine the time idly, he sent Ranse de Cere with seven thousand Italian footmen to take Arona, a towne of great strength, and hath his situation in the confines of the Lake Maioir. This towne was possessed by Anchises Viscount, and to the rescue of it Prosper Colonne sent from Millan a regiment of twelue hundred footmen: but because the Castle of Arona doth so much commaund the towne, that who holdeth not the Castle doth vnprofitably possesse the towne, Ranse laid his plot to winne the Castle, but his fortune being inferiour to the difficulties he found, after he had giuen many assaults wherein he lost many men, consuming almost a moneth in that enterprise, at last he leauied his siege and went away, confirming the vniuersall opinion that had bene conceiued of him for manie yeares, that his actions held no comparison with the reputation he had got in the defence of Crema.

About this time Prosper Colomo hauing lyen sicke eight monethes, began to draw to his latestt houre, not without suspition of poyson, or else some amorous potion; he was carefull by his latestt end, to confirme the credit he had gotten in the race of so many yeares past, and therefore where as he could not well brooke the comming of the Viceroy, he now solicited it with great affection, as knowing that he was no more able to manage the affaires of the warre: So agreeable was the modestie and temperance of his last dayes, with the valour and courage of his younger time: no lesse honorable was the behauiour of the Viceroy, who as soone as he came neare to Millan, stayed without and would not enter for certaine dayes, to shew what reuerence he bare to the vertue and reputation of such a Captaine: and yet when he vnderstood he was reduced to the last action of life and had lost all sense and knowledge, he entred the towne for a desire he had to see him, notwithstanding some hold that he would not enter till he was dead, which was the last day sauing one of that yeare: he was a Captaine of great name and merite during the whole time of his life, and in his latestt yeares had wonne singular reputation and authoritie: he was a father of souldiers, a director of their counsels, a framer of their dispositions, an example of vertue, and a guide to true glory and fame: he was not apt to embrace lightly all occasions that the disorders of the enemies might offer, for, this propertie was ioyned to his wit, rather to doubt too much, then beleue too hastily: and so zealous was he ouer the safetie and suretie of his people, that he would not easily giue any aduantage to the enemy to oppresse him: He would alwayes say, that in a Generall, the glorie was greater to feare a mischiefe and foresee it, then to runne with occasions which can not be without their hazardes: he was by nature easie and slow in his actions, & seeking alwayes to administer warres more with counsels then with the sword, he left to others this propertie of example, to defend estates by temporising, and not without great necessitie to commit the euent of battels to fortune: for, in our time, the managing and gouernement of warres hath farre differed, since that afore Charles the eight past into Italie, the brunt of the warre being more borne out with horsemen armed at all parts, then with footemen, and no lesse inconuenient & troublesome the engines wherewith they were wont to take townes, notwithstanding the armies came oftentimes to the shooke of battell, yet the slaughter was litle, and very rare the blood that was spilt: and townes also that were besieged defended themselves with such facilitie, not for that they had more knowledge in defence, but through ignorance to take them: that there was not so litle or weake a towne, which was not able for many dayes to resist great armies of enemies: at that time Princes did not intrude vpon the estates of others without very great difficulties. But when king Charles made his first descending into Italie, the regions of that nation were so replenished with terror and astonishment, what through the feare of new nations, and the valour of the footemen whose fight was in another maner, but most of all through the fury of the artilleries, by whose vnacquainted roaring noyse the ignorant people feared no lesse then if the frame of the world had fallē, that there was no hope for any prince to be able to defend himself, that were not strong enough to keepe the field. For, men that had no knowledge to defend townes yeilded at the first approach of the enemies, and if haply any towne stood to her defence, it was taken within few dayes, such was the furie of the artilleries, and such the ignorance of men that had yet no custome nor familiaritie with them. By that meane the realme of Naples and the Duchie of Millan were no sooner inuaded then they were conquered: in that sort the Venesians being vanquished in one battell onely, left abandoned immediatly all their iurisdiction in the firme land: and in that sort the Frēchmen hauing scarcely seene the enemies, left the Duchie of Millan. But since the wit of man comprehending better the furie of batteries, began to oppose engine and industry for their defence, and fortified townes with mounts, trenches, flanks, rampiers, & bastillions, which they made apt to bestow artilleries vpon: and being planted in a place which men seeke to defend, do farre more hurt, then that that is braked without: so that at this day it is very hard to take a towne where is any resistance made: and haply those inuentions began in Italie in the dayes of our fathers, when the towne of Ostranto was reconquered vpon the Turkes, wherein when Alfonso Duke of Calabria entred afterwarde, he found that the Turkes had made many rampiers & fortifications, such as were vnknownen to the Italians, but yet those sortes of fortifications remained rather as images in the minds of men, then that they were followed. Prosper either was the onely mā, or the first man of all other that with greatest reputation, hath twise by those meanes defended the Duchy of Millan: and as wel in offending as in defending.

and cutting off the enemies from victuals, as also in prolonging the warre with such cunning, that pouertie, disorders, and other extremities consumed them, he hath borne out the warre and vanquished without once aduenturing the battell, without breaking of a Launce, yea almost without drawing a sword: so that he standing in example to others that haue come after many warres (continued for many monethes,) haue bene ouercome more with industrie, with stratageme, and with temporising, then with the force or fortune of armes.

Borbon not able to do any thing in Bur-gōdy, commeth to Millan.*

These things were done in Italie in the yeare 1523. And the yeare following were made beyond the Mounts preparations of right great expectation, and yet brought forth no effectes worthy of so mightie Princes: for where the Emperour and the King of England had contracted and promised the Duke of Borbon to enter with a strong armie, the one into Picardie, and the other into Guyen: the mouing of the King of England was to small purpose, & the enterprise of the Duke of Borbon to inuade Burgondie was turned into a mountaine of smoke: for that wanting money to pay his Launceknights, besides the diminution of their numbers by the practise of certaine Captaines that stole away to the French King, he dispaired to do any thing in France, & in that mind went to Millan: there the Emperour hauing no mind that he should passe into Spaine, perhaps because he would not haue the mariage of his sister go forward which the Duke of Borbon desired, sent to him Monsieur de Beaurain to perswade him to stay there, and gaue him the authoritie and title of his Lieutenant Generall in Italie, to induce him with better will to abide there. Neither did things happen more happily to the Emperour on the coast of Spaine, for that albeit in a burning desire to the warres he was come to Pampeluna to passe in person into Fraunce, & had already sent his armie beyond the Mounts Pireney, where he had taken Sauuetera, which is not farre from S. Iohn de pied de Porc, yet drawing with him many other imperfections, he found at last that his readinesse was farre greater then his power, for that as for the want of money, he was not able to entertaine so great forces as were necessarie for so great an enterprise, so for that want also he was not able to assemble his armie vntill the latter end of the yeare, when the nature of the season doubled vpon him his difficulties, and tooke from him the liberty of the wayes. These impediments cōpelled him to dissolue his armie, erected almost against the counsell of all his Captaines, which made the Duke of Albe a Prince of great authoritie say in the heate of the warre, that the Emperour who in many things resembled king Ferdinand his grandfather by the mother side, did in this deliberation beare most similitude and likenesse with his grandfather by the father side.

Now came on the yeare a thousand five hundred twentie and foure, when the difficulties of the Frenchmen stirring vp the Emperours Captaines to looke to put end to the warre, they called to Millan the Duke of Urbino and Peter Pesero treasurer of Venice, to consult of the manner of proceeding in the war: in which counsell they were all of opinion, that assoone as the sixe thousand Launceknights which the Viceroy had sent to leaue, were arrived at Millan, the Emperours army ioyning with it the Venetian forces, should affront the enemies, to the end to chase the out of the Duchie of Millan, either by force or by famine: and albeit they thought themselves strong inough to performe it, yet there was one thing that hindred the execution of the counsell, which was want of money, of which for that there were great summes due to the men of war for their payes past, they thought they should not be able to get them to issue out of Millan or any other towne vnlesse their payes were first satisfied. And for that the armie was to continue in the field, it was no lesse necessarie to set downe order hereafter for the payes of the souldiers to be performed in their due time, and safelie to be conueyed to the campe to answer the dayes of payment: But the inhabitants of Millan desirous to be discharged of the burden of the war, offered to remoue these difficulties, in lending to the Duke fourescore and ten thousand duckats; an action whereunto they were the more easily induced by example of the last good dealing, whē the money which they had lent at such time as Monsieur de Lamtrech lay afore Millan, was readily repayed vpon the Dukes reuenues. In like sort the Pope, who, by the remembrance of things past, held much suspected the victorie of the French, put to his hand, notwithstanding with a wonderfull cunning he made demonstration of the contrarie to such as the king had sent to him: he caused to be deliuered with great secrecie to the Emperours Embassadour twentie thousand duckats, & solicited also the Florentines (on whom the Viceroy required a new contributiō by vertue of the league made in the time of Pope Adria) to pay as their last rest, thirty thousand duckats: and yet the Pope had no meaning hereafter to shew more propertie of fauour

to the one the to the other: but where immediately vpon his election the one of the had sent to him Monsieur Beaurain, and the other Monsieur Saint Maixan, to draw him particularly to them, yet his intention was, as soone as the present daungers should cease, to beare betweene them that moderation and temperance which orderly appertaineth to the office of Popes when Christian Princes be in discord, and laying aside all partialitie and suspected inclination, to be a worker for peace & vnitie betweene them; a resolution which was so much the more agreeable to the French King, who feared least the Pope was of the same disposition towards him that he was when he was Cardinall, by how much it was contrary & disagreeable to the Emperour, who held it not reasonable that he should separate himselfe from him, both for the last alliance that was past, and also for that by his aide he mounted to the Popedom. In which regard it brought no litle griefe to him to be certified from the Pope, that notwithstanding he willed him as much good as he did before, yet for that he was now no more a person priuate, but rather a father indifferēt to all, he was bound by the respect and office of his place, to do nothing which were not for the cōmon profite of all. But whilst the Viceroy prepared himselfe to go finde the enemies, he sent Iohn de Medicis before Marignan, which towne yeilded to him together with the Castell: and where the Marquis of Pesquero disdainig to follow the warre vnder Prosper Colōno, would not come to the campe but when he was aduertised that he drew towards his latestt houre, and hearing now that Capitaine Bayard was within Rebecca with three hundred horse and many bandes of footemen, he ioyned himselfe with Iohn de Medicis, and marching with no lesse diligence then resolution of minde, he found them of Rebecca so ouersleeping in their security, & so litle doubting of his cōming, that he tooke the most part of the footemen, and gaue the chace to the residue, returning immediatly to Millan, as not to giue leasure to the enemies within Biagrassa to pursue them. In this enterprise he was much esteemed for his industrie and for his valour, but much more for his celerity and diligence, for that Rebecca which is not past two miles from Biagrassa, is from Millan from whence they went, more then seuentene miles. But as the affaires of the warre were reduced to this degree, that to the French were left no other hopes then that wants of money would fall vpon their enemies, and the Imperials were fed onely with this expectation, that the French would suffer great scarcitie of victuals, and yet neither of them were without their hopes of succours, the one of Launceknights, and the other of Swissers: so the Admirall loosing no oportunitie wherein occasion was offered, set fire vpon Rosa, and retired to Biagrassa those bandes that were within it, disposing his forces to distresse the enemies, & make incursions and burnings ouer all the countrey. But by this time were the Launceknights arrived at the Emperours campe, which contained in the whole whole sixe hundred men at armes, fifteene hundred light horsemen, seuen thousand footemen Spanish, twelue thousand Launceknights, and fifteene hundred Italians, vnder the leading of the Duke of Millan, the Duke of Burbon, the Viceroy of Naples, and the Marquis of Pesquero. They left within Millan for the gard of the place, foure thousand footmen, and marched with the residue to incampe at Binasqua, where not many dayes after the Duke of Urbino ioyned with them, with sixe hundred men at armes, sixe hundred light horsemen, and seuen thousand footemen of the Venetians. At what time the Castell of Cremona being no more able to beare out the rage of hunger, and Federike Bossolo that was within Loda, hauing in vaine aduentured to succour it, yeilded vpon to the Imperials. Afterwards the armie marched to Casera, a towne within fiue miles of Biagrassa; there the Admirall (hauing distributed within Loda, Nonaro, & Alexandria, two hundred Launces and fiue thousand footemen) kept himselfe incamped with eight hundred Launces, & eight thousand Swissers, to whom were ioyned within few dayes after, a regiment of three thousand others, together with foure thousand Italians and two thousand Launceknights: and notwithstanding all this multitude of companies, he felt no necessitie of victuals, hauing a full prouision for two monethes as well in the armie as in the places thereabouts. It was not possible to assaile them in a place so strong without their manifest daunger: by reason whereof the Imperials who many times had assayed to passe the riuer of Thezin, to stop victuals from the French on that side, and to get into those townes which they held beyond Thezin, and also to giue impediment to the succours that were to come out of France, determined at last to passe, iudging by the confidence they had in the people of Millan, that there was no necessity to keepe there a great garrison: so that the duke, accompanied with Ioh. de Medicis, returned to Millan, where was remaining a strength of sixe thousand footmen. Thus they passed the second day of May the riuer of Thezin.

upon three bridges beneath Pavia, the battell lodging at Gambala, and the residue of the armie in the villages thereabouts: but the Admirall, when he knew they were passed Thesin, dispatched speedily Ranſe de Cere to gard Vigena, and fearing to lose that towne, with other peeces in the country of Lomellina, which being taken from him, he should stand as it were besieged, he drew thither within five dayes with the whole armie, leauing within Biagrasa, an hundred horsemen and a thousand footmen: he bestowed his vauntgard about the parts of Vigena, and sent the battell to Mortaro, a towne within two myles of Gambala where the Viceroy was. That place was full of many commodities, since besides the strength & situation, it ministred victuals at commaundement, both for the suretie of the wayes of Momferat, of Verceil, and Nouaro, and also for the continuall oportunitie and assistance of other places, yeelding course and trafficke from one towne to another, as if it had bene a streame of water. The Admirall offered two dayes together, the battell to the enemies, who refused to accept it, not that they were lesse in numbers, or inferior in valour and resolution of souldiers, but because they would not put in daunger the hope of the victorie which they held almost certaine, for that by the surprising of certaine letters, they had intelligence that the enemy began to feeble want of money and pay.

After the Emperours armie was passed Thesin, the Duke of Urbino leading the Venetian regiments, went to incampe before Garlasquo, a towne strong by situation, and well enuironed with ditches & rampiers: there was within it, a strength of foure hundred footemen Italians, and standing betweene Pavia & Trumella beyond Thesin, where he had an intention to bestow himself, it did not onely cut the course of victuals from him, but also depriued the whole residue of the armie: he had in short space made a breach, and the same day followed on with the assault, and being almost repulsed, many of his souldiers, holding all perill lesse then their valour, tooke the water and swamme ouer the ditches; by whose example certaine bands of footemen of Iohn de Medicis did the like, with whom in one resolute aduenture they began to assaile it with such furie, that their vertue vanquishing all resistance, they entred it by force, making great slaughter of such as they found within. Afterwards the army approched S. Georges, and drew towards the Parish of Cairo to go to Sartirano, a towne of good strength, and hath his situation vpon the higher shore of Paw in a place very apt to hinder their victuals, and for the keeping whereof, were Hugh de Popo and Iohn Biraguo with certaine horsemen, & fixe hundred footemen. Iohn of Urbino who was sent thither with the artilleries, and a regiment of two thousand footmen Spaniards, tooke first the town, and then the rocke, making slaughter of the most part of the men that were within, & committing the Captaines prisoners. The Frenchmen remoued their campe to succour Sartirano, but being preuented by the diligence of their enemies, they stayed all their armie at Monce, after they were aduertised by the way what was hapned. Neither had the affaires of the Frenchmen better successe in other places of the Duchie of Millan: for, those regiments of souldiers that were left within Millan, compelled to render the towne of S. George which stands about Monce, whose inhabitants constrained by the extortion of the souldiers, had called home those bands of footemen that were in Loda, Paule Lusafquo, encountering with certaine light horsemen of the French, put them to flight: and Federike Bossolo, being departed from Loda to set vpon Pisqueton, in place of the victory, brought home wounds & hurts, besides the losse of many of his men: only there were certaine light horsemen of the French who running vp betweene Plaisance and Tortoné, surprised a treasure of foureteene thousand ducats, which was sent to the Emperours armie.

Amid these difficulties the Admirall had two hopes, the one to haue the warre diuerted, and the other to be succoured: for, the king had already caused to march foure hundred Launces by the Mount Geneura, to who were to be ioyned ten thousand Swissers. Besides, Ranſe de Cere led to the territorie of Bergama by the way of Valdesafina, five thousand Grisons, who were to passe from thence to Loda to ioyn with Federike Bossolo, with whom were already many bandes of Italian footme. And lastly the Admirall stood firme in this perswasion, that the Emperour would be constrained for the suretie of Millan, to repasse the riuer of Thesin. Against these companies, the Duke of Millan sent out Iohn de Medicis with fiftie men at armes, three hundred light horsemen, and three thousand footmen, & taking to him also a strength of three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horsemen, & foure thousand footmen of the Venetians, he drew neare the enemies, who were now come to the village of Cranina betweene the riuers of Adda & Brivo eight milles from Bergama: he ran with one part of his people euen vp to the places where the

Grifons were incamped, who the third day after, complaining that they had not found at Cranina neither money for their payes, nor horsemen for their strength, nor other bandes of footemen promised by Ranſe de Cere, set themselves at libertie and returned to their countrey. The descending of the Grifons being thus turned into a mountaine of smoke, Iohn de Medicis vsing the occasion of their retiring, tooke Caranage, and afterwards passing Adda, he beat downe with his artilleries the bridge which the French had made at Bufaloro vpon Tbesin: and those townes that are betweene Millan and Tbesin there was but Biagrassa left in the power of the French: it was plentifully provided of victuals, and garded with a strong garrison of a thousand footemen vnder Ieronimo Caracciollo: but because it hath his situation vpon the great channell, and by that meane stoppeth the course of victuals which that channell is wont to bring in great plentie to Millan, Frauncis Sforce sent for Iohn de Medicis to come to him being followed with all the youth of Millan besides his ordinarie bandes of souldiers: They ioyned their forces together, and went to besiege it, and playing with their artilleries from Sunne rising vntill noone, he sent the souldiers to the assault, whose valour being no lesse to enter the artilleries were furious to make breaches, they tooke it the same day with a singular commendation of Iohn de Medicis: in whom that day was not onely discerned a vertue excelling all the other souldiers, but also a grauitie, readinesse, and gouernement worthy of a right noble Captaine: So needefull is the presence of a Generall in any action of importance, and so conducing his example to carie the mindes of his souldiers to contemne all perill, and leaue nothing vndone, that valour or resolution can finde out. Captaine Caracciollo was taken, and many of the footemen committed to the sword, besides certaine companies which Iohn de Medicis put to the gibbet, for that they had run from him a litle before. The conquest of the towne, tooke from the castell all hope of suretie, and yeelding to the fortune of the towne, it was rendred, reseruing the liues of them that were within. The people of Millan were vniuersally glad for this successe, but as there is no worldly blisse without his bale, and no prosperitie so absolute which is not intangled with alteration, so the aduersitie that hapned by it was far greater without comparison, then their ioy, for that by transporting to Millan the spoiles & booties of Biagrassa, where the plague was, they brought wrapt vp in the packes of their wealth and riches, the feedes of that pestilent contagion, which spread it selfe so vniuersally ouer all complexions, that within few moneths, there dyed only in Millan, more then fiftie thousand bodies. But the force & strength of the warre was on the other side Tbesin, where the Admirall after the losse of Sartirano, and discerning the enemies to approach him of new, abandoned Mortaro, and retired in two remoues, to Nonaro: his numbers were much diminished, for that not onely many of his footemen, but also certaine of his men at armes, were stolen from the campe and returned into Fraunce: by which weakenesse, the Admirall was driuen to temporise vntill the supplies of the Swissers were come, who were already neare to Turea, & almost eight thousand fighting bodies. On the other side, the Emperours Captaines studying to stop their coming, and to reduce the enemies into difficultie of victuals, made themselves Lordes of the townes neare to Nonaro, making slaughter of those vnhappy Frenchmen which they found in garrison: and after they had bestowed within Verceill, certaine bandes of souldiers, to defend the Swissers for entring there, they went to encampe at Biandra betweene Verceill & Nonaro, in a place enuironed on all parts with ditches, trees, and waters; matters of great importance to the fortification of a place.

At last the Admirall vnderstanding that the Swissers that had passed Turea, were stayed a long the riuer of Stessa, which they could not passe ouer for the great abundance of waters there, and desirous to ioine them to his armie, more to go away in suretie, then to fight with the enemy, he went from Nonaro to lodge at Romagnia vpon the shores of the same riuer: where, what by the want and necessitie of victuals, and the continuall diminution of his men, he was driuen to build a bridge betweene Romagnia and Catimara: and on the other side, the enemies, being come from Biandra to Briona, went to incampe within two myles of Romagnia. The Frenchmen discerning vpon what straiter termes they stood, brake vp and passed the riuer the day following, when it was beleueed, that if the enemies had bene carefull to watch their discamping, they had carried that day a most glorious & full victorie. But the Captaines being deuided in opinion & counsell, some bearing a forward desire to fight, & others to let them go without charging them, their emulations would not suffer them to vse the occasion that was offered. It seemed also that the army was not gouerned as appertained, for that as the Marquis of Pesquero only, proceeding in all his actions with his accustomed valour, seemed worthy in whom should be reposed the whole direction of affaires, so there were others that bare enuie to his vertue, and they seeking to darken his glory by detracting his doings, were content to put to hazard the whole estate of the war, rather then to ioyne themselues to his counsels. But albeit the armie Imperiall was not in sufficient time aduertised of the discamping of the Frenchmen, yet after it was once knowne, many light horsemen and many bands of footemen passed the foord of the riuer without order, & without ensignes, and followed them with such diligence, that they ouertooke the rearegard and began to skirmish with it: and albeit the Frenchmen, sometimes fighting, and sometimes marching, receiued the charge & sustained it a long time, yet in the end being not able to flie with the same valour wherewith they were followed, they were constrained to leaue on the place seuen peeces of their artilleries, a great proportion of their munitions, with no small quantitie of victuals, & many of their horsemen and footemen put to the sword, besides the losing of many of their ensignes. The Frenchmen made as though they would incampe at Cattinaro which is within a myle of Romagna, and vnder that semblance, they caused secretly to passe on their artilleries and baggage. But as the enemies who beleeued they would incampe there, had begun to retire themselues, so they drew to Rauislingua towards Turea which is fixe miles further. The Imperials without any impediment, incamped the same night vpon the riuer, which they passed immediatly vpon the rising of the Moone: but they were not followed of the Venetians, for that being entred vpon the lāds of the Duke of Sauoy, they thought they had passed the bonds of confederatiō, by the which they were bound to no further matter then to the defence of the Duchie of Millan. The Frenchmen marched with slow pāse in battell array, and had bestowed in the arearegard, the bandes of Swissers, by whom were repulsed the first horsemen and footmen that came in disorder to charge them: and albeit the French by this time were gone from Rauislingua about two miles, yet the Marquis of Pesquero, arriuing with his light horsemen, they were estoones recharged, not that they forbore notwithstanding to march, although Captaine Chabanes was slaine, and Captaine Bayard made prisoner, hauing a wound with a shot whereof he dyed within few dayes after. But the Marquis looking into the good order the enemies kept, and no lesse carefull not to follow his fortune further thē good counsell called him, notwithstanding many bāds of souldiers were come to him, yet he thought not good to pursue the enemies further, both for that he was vnfurnished of artilleries, & had not with him but one part of the army. By which meane the French were deliuered of further troubles, & returned together with the Swissers to their houses, hauing left at Vauzy beyond Turea, fifteene peeces of artilleries in the gard of three hundred Swissers & one of the Lords of the countrey: but those artilleries were no better preserved thē the others, for that the Emperors Captaines hauing aduertisemēt of them, sent out to take them. After this the Victors deuided the selues into diuerse parts: the Duke of Vrbino was sent to Loda, and the Marquis of Pesquero to Alexandria, which two Cities only were holden for the king, for that Nonaro was rendred, being fearefull of the Duke of Millan and Iohn de Medicis drawing thither with their forces: the Viceroy was appointed to go against the Marquis of Rothelin who was come ouer the Mounts with foure hundred Launces, neuertheless as soone as he vnderstood of the fortune of the Admirall, & that he was retired, he returned also into Fraunce, holding it vaine for him to follow further the enterprise when the principall forces were dispersed: besides, Monsieur de Bussie and Iulio S. Serrin to whom was committed the gard of Alexandria, made no resistance. In like sort Federike, after he had demanded respite of a few dayes, to know if the Admirall were passed the Mountes, compounded to yeeld vp Loda, vpon the condition that was accorded to them of Alexandria, so leade into Fraunce the bandes of Italian footemen, who containing a regiment of fīue thousand men, did speciall seruice to the king afterwards. This was the end of the warre that was managed against the Duchie of Millan vnder the gouernement of the Admirall of Fraunce: by the which, neither the Kings power being much weakened, nor the rootes of harmes remoued, much lesse that so many calamities were cleane takē away, seeing they were but deferred to another season, and Italie in the meane while remaining discharged of troubles present, but not of suspicion of further aduersities to come: and yet the Emperour no lesse by the incitation of the Duke of Burbon, then by the hope that the authoritie & name of that man might serue him to speciall purpose, was of minde to transferre the warre into France, to the which also the King of England shewed a readinesse and disposition.

In the beginning of this yeare, the Emperour had sent his campe to Fontarabie, a towne of very small circuit, standing vpon the debatable lands that deuide Fraunce from Spaine: and albeit the towne was very well manned, and furnished with artilleries and victuals, and leasure sufficient to them with to make it fortified, yet the fortifications being ill made through the ignorance of the Frenchmen, the towne lay open to the furie of the enemies, who heaping vpon the defendants one necessitie after another, constrained them at last to giue it vp onely with the safetie of their liues. He was not satisfied with the recouerie of this place, but stretching his thoughts further, he made his ambition no lesse then his fortune, and in those conceites being raised to further enterprise, he kept no reckening of the comforts and authoritie of the Pope, who hauing sent in the beginning of the yeare, to the Emperour, the French King, and to the King of England, to sollicite a peace or a truce, he found their mindes very ill disposed to giue ouer the warre. For, the French King, consenting to a truce for two yeares, refused to make peace, for the small hope he had to obtaine thereby such conditions as he desired: and the Emperour reiecting the truce, by the which was giuen good time to the French King to reordaine his forces to follow a new war, desired to haue peace. And touching the King of England, any sort of composition that was offered to be made by the Popes meanes, was displeasing to him, as in whom was alwayes a desire that the treatie of the accord might be wholly referred to him. To this he was induced by the ambitious counsels of the Cardinall of Torke, who (seruing as a true example in our dayes of an immoderate pride) notwithstanding he was of very base condition, and no lesse abiect for his parents and descending, yet he was risen to such an estate of authoritie and grace with the King, that in most of the actions of the realme, the Kings will seemed nothing without the approbation of the Cardinall: as of the contrary, whatsoever the Cardinall did deliberate, was either absolute, or at least had very great force. But both the King and his Cardinall kept dissembled with the Emperour that thought, and by apparances shewed a very forward inclination to moue warre against the realme of Fraunce, which the King of England pretended lawfully to appertaine to him: he grounded his claime vpon these reasons: King Edward the third, after the death of the French King Charles the fourth called the faire, who died without issue male in the yeare of our saluatio 1328. & of whose sister the said King Edward the third was borne, made instance to be declared king of France, as next heire male to the French king deceased: neuerthelesse he was put by, by the generall Parliament of the realme, wherein it was set downe, that by vertue of the law Salyke an auncient law of that kingdome, not onely the persons of women were made vnable to the succession of the crowne, but also all such as descended and came of the womens line were excluded: but he not satisfied with this order brought in to take away his right, armed himselfe soone after, and taking vpon him the title of the King of Fraunce, he inuaded the realme with a mightie army: and as in that action he obtained many victories both against Philip de Valois, published by vniuersall consent lawfull successour to Charles the faire, and also against King Iohn his sonne; who being ouerthrowne in battell, was led prisoner into England: so after long warres he forbore further to vex the realme, and making peace with the sayd Iohn, he retained many Prouinces and estates of the kingdome, and renounced the title of King of Fraunce: but after this composition which was neither of long continuance, nor of great effect, the quarrell was eftsoones renewed, & sometimes followed with long warres, and sometimes discontinued with tedious truces: vntill at last King Henrie the fift entring confederacie with Philip Duke of Burgundie, who bare a minde estranged from the Crowne of Fraunce, for the murder done vpon Duke Iohn his father, preuailed so much against Charles the sixt somewhat simple of vnderstanding, that he commaunded almost the whole kingdome together with the towne of Paris: and finding in that Citie the French King accompanied with his wife and the Lady Katherine his daughter, he tooke to wife the sayd Lady, and brought the King to consent (hauing no great vse of wit) that after his death the kingdome should appertaine to him and to his heires, notwithstanding his sonne Charles did suruiue him. By vertue of which title, as soone as he was dead, his sonne King Henrie the sixt was solemnly crowned at Paris, and proclaimed King of England and Fraunce: and albeit, after the death of Charles the sixt, his sonne Charles the seuenth, by reason of great warres hapning in England betweene the Lordes of the bloud royall, had chased the English out of all that they held in France, except the towne and territories of Callice, yet the kings of England did not leaue for all that to continue and vse the title of King of Fraunce. These causes might haply moue King Henrie the eight to the war, the rather also for that he stood more assured in his Realme then any of his predecessours had done: for that the Kings of the house of Yorke (that was the name of one factiō) hauing suppressed the kings of the house of Lancaster (which was the other factiō) & the partakers with the house of Lancaster seeing there was no more remaining of that iuse, railed to the kingdome Henry of Richmond for his proximitie and nearenesse with them. Who after he had subdued his aduersaries, to the end he might raigne with more suretie and with more authoritie, tooke to wife one of the daughters of Edward the last King but one of the house of Yorke: by which coniunction of houses, all the rights and claimes of both the one and the other houses, were absolutely and lawfully transferred into the person of king Henrie the eight borne of that marriage. These houses for the ensignes and cognizances that they bare, were called commonly the Red rose and the White rose.

But touching the mouing of the king of England to make warres in Fraunce, he was not so much caried by hope to winne the Realme of Fraunce by armes, for that he was not ignorant of the innumerable difficulties that would contend against him, as he was importunately pushed on by the ambitious desire of the Cardinall of Yorke, who layed this plot, that the long and tedious trauels & infinite necessities of the warre, would in the end bring his king to be the only arbitratour and appointer of the peace: and knowing that the negociation of it should depend much of his authoritie, he thought in one time both to make his name great through all the world, and also to entertaine himselfe in the good grace and liking of the French king, to whom he shewed secretly to beare some good inclination: and therefore the king of England sought not to bind himselfe to those conditions, whereunto it was necessarie he should be bound if he had had a forward minde to so great a warre.

Thus the Emperour was stirred vp to the warre by that occasion, but much more by a hope, that through the fauour, authoritie, and popular opinion which the Duke of Burbon caried in that kingdome, the commons of the Realme would draw to commotion: and therefore notwithstanding he was aduised by many of his firme & assured friends, that both for his want of money, which brings no small impediments to enterprises, and for the doubt of his confederats, whose fidelitie was vncertaine, he would giue ouer to begin a warre so hard and intricate, and consent that the Pope might treat vpon the surceasing of armes: yet he capitulated with the king of England and Duke of Burbon in this sort: That the Duke should enter the Realme of Fraunce with that part of the armie that was in Italie: and as soone as he should be ouer the Mounts, the king of England to pay an hundred thousand duckats for the despayments of the first moneth of the warre: That it should be in the election of the sayd king either to continue this contribution from moneth to moneth, or else to passe into Fraunce with a strong army to make warre from the first day of Iulie vntill the end of December: and in that case the countreys of Flanders to furnish him of three thousand horse, a thousand footemen, and sufficient artilleries and munitions: That if the victorie fell to them, there should be rendred to the Duke of Burbon, all those lands which the French king had taken from him: That Prouence should be transferred to him, to the which he already pretended by the resignation that was made after the death of Charles the eight, by the Duke of Lorraine, to Anne Duchesse of Burbon: That he should hold it by the title of king of Prouence: That first he should make an oath to the king of England as to the king of Fraunce, and do him homage, which if he did not performe, then this capitulation to be voyde: That the Duke of Burbon should not treat nor practise nothing with the French king without the consent of them both: That the Emperour at the same time should make warre on that side towards Spaine: Lastly that the Embassadours of the Emperour & the King of England should procure the Potentates of Italie to be concurrant with their money in this enterprise, to the end to be for euer assured against the war of the French; a matter which neuer sorted to effect, for that the Pope did not onely refuse to contribute, but blamed expressly the enterprise, prophesying that not onely it would haue an ill successe in Fraunce, but also it would be the cause to returne the warre againe vpon Italie, and that with a greater puissance and perill then before. The Duke of Burbon refused constantly to acknowledge the king of England for king of Fraunce: and albeit after the confederation was made, he gaue counsell to march with the armie towards Lyon, to the end to draw neare his owne landes and countreys: yet it was resolutely determined, that he should passe into Prouence, both for that the Emperour should with more facilitie send him succours out of Spaine, and also to be more apt to take the service and opportunity of the army by sea, which was in preparing at Genes by the commandment and with the money of the Emperour. The Marquis of Pesquero was declared Captain General for the Emperour in this warre, for that he could not be brought to obey the Duke of Burbon. The plot and proceedings of this expedition were, that the Duke of Burbon and with him the Marquis, should passe to Nice, and yet with forces farre lesse then such as were appointed, for that where, to the forces they had already with them which was five hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horsemen, four thousand footmen Spaniards, three thousand Italians, and five thousand Launceknights, there should have bene ioyned three hundred men at armes of the army in Italie, and five thousand other Launceknights: these last companies failed to come for want of money, and the Freeroy kept retained the men at armes for the guard of the countrey, having no meane to wage new companies of footmen according to the resolution set downe in the first counsels, to the end to make head against Michael Angelo Marquis of Salusse, who being departed from his estate, kept vpon the Mountaines with a thousand footmen. There was added to this, that the Emperours army at sea (one of their principall hopes) being guided by Don Hugo de Moncado, a man of much malice and wickednesse of life, & a creature of the Duke Valentino, appeared far inferiour to the naue of the French king, which being parted from Marseilles, was stayed in the port of Villefranche. Neuerthelesse the Emperours army entred into Prouence, where were Monsieur de la Palisse, Captain Fayette, Ranse de Cere, & Federike Bossolo, all Captaines of the French king, & were now withdrawn into towne, for that they were not strong enough to make head in the field. One part of the army drew along the sea side, and tooke the tower that commaundeth the port of Toulon, where were taken two Cannons that were drawn to the army. Besides, the towne of Aix (which for his authoritie and for that the Parliament is there resident, is one of the chiefe townes of Prouence) was rendred, whose example drew with it many other townes of the countrey. The Duke of Burbon in whom was no lesse emulation then valour, desired that from Aix the army might march further leauing the sea side, wherein he perswaded that seeking to passe the riuer of Rhosne, there might be lost no time to enter deeper into the bodie and intrals of Fraunce, whilest the kings provisions were yet but weak and not confirmed: for, by reason the king was consumed of treasure and money, the men at armes of Fraunce had suffered much, and were verie ill payed, and also not expecting that his enemies would passe out of Lombardie into Fraunce, his forces and companies of men of warre were fallen into that disorder that they could not be readressed with such speede. Besides, the King having no confidence in the valour of the footmen of his owne kingdom, was constrained before he could march into the field, to tatie for the committing of certaine footebandes of the Swissers and Launceknights: during which expectation, as the Duke of Burbon thought he should be able to do some matter of importance in passing ouer Rhosne, so the Marquis of Pesquero with the other Spanish Captaines were of an other aduise: they desired that both for the opportunity of the sea, and to satisfie the intencion of the Emperour, Marseilles might be conquered; a haue most conuenient to vex the Realme of Fraunce with sea armies, and also no lesse apt to passe in safetie out of Spaine into Italie. These Captaines what by the authoritie of their multitude, and the efficacy of their reasons, so preuailed against the will of the Duke of Burbon, that they pitched their campe before Marseilles, wherein was newly entred Ranse de Cere with those bandes of footmen which had bene led into Fraunce from Alexandria and Loda. They lay fortie dayes before Marseilles without doing any exploit of marke or memorie: and albeit they executed the wals in many places with their artilleries, and not preuailing with batteries laboured to worke their entrie by myning, yet they found objected many difficulties, and their great labours resisted both by the fortune and fortification of the towne: they had contending against their industrie, the strength of the wall bearing an auncient forme and building: the valour of the defendants most resolute in the quarrell of their libertie: the disposition of the people, bearing great deuotion to the name of the French King, and verie hatefull to the glorie of the Spaniards: And lastly the hope of succours aswell by sea as land, for that the French King was come to Anignon, (a Citie of the Popes; standing vpon the riuer of Rhosne) where he assembled with great diligence, a mightie army. Moreouer want of money began to fall vpon the Emperours Captaines, and their hopes no lesse diminished that the French King being inuaded in other places, would be letted to conuert to one onely part all his forces & prouisions: for that the king of England notwithstanding he had sent to the Duke of Burbon Maister Richard Pafe, did both refuse to pay the hundred thousand duckats for the second moeth, and also made slender shewes to moue warre in Picardie: no, hauing receiued into England John Ioa- chin de Spetto whom the French King had sent to him, and also the Cardinall of York making straunge answers to the Emperours Embassadours, he gaue the Duke great occasion both to doubt and distrust him. And touching Spaine and the expectation there, the powers and forces did not aunswer the wils of men nor the promises that were made: The reason was, for that the Courtes of Castille (so are called the congregations of the Deputies assembled in the name of the whole kingdome) had refused to ayde the Emperour with foure hundred thousand duckats; a contribution which they are wont to make both in the great neede of their king, and vpon any action of importance: by which occasion there could no money be sent to the armie that was in Prouence, & much lesse any leaue of men made against the French king in the frontiers of Spaine, other then very weake, and not worthy to beare reckening: so that the Imperiall Captaines, both despairing to take Marseilles, & also fearing to runne into some greater danger when the King should approach, brake vp their campe the same day that the King set from Auignon with his whole armie, hauing also marching with him a regiment of sixe thousand Swissers.

The same reasons that moued the Imperiall Captaines to leaue their siege from before Marseilles, caried them also to turne their faces towardes Italie. And as in men there is nothing more violent then the passion of feare, whose motions are swifter then the wings of the wind, so in the Imperials was seene no lesse diligence to hasten into Italie, the to breake vp their siege, shewing one care to preuent the perill that might fall vpon them, if either all or part of the French Kings armie should encounter them in the countrey of the enemie. And on the other side, the King saw a faire occasion offered to recouer his Duchie of Millan, what by the puissance of the armie he had leauied, by the fidelitie of his Captaines, by the plentie of his prouisions, by the intelligence he had of the weakenesse of his enemies, and lastly by his hope, that taking the nearest way, he should bring his armie into Italie afore those that went from Marseilles. In which estate and aduantage of things, he determined to ioyne industrie to the present oportunitie, and to follow the benefite that fortune presented to him: he imparted this resolution with all the Captaines of the armie, to whom he declared, that as he had vowed in himselfe an irrevocable promise to passe in person into Italie, so whosoever would rise vp to counsell him the contrarie, much lesse that he would graunt him audience, seeing he would not forbear to hold him in ill opinion and affection: That therefore euerie one should go to his charge, and shew the same will to execute the enterprize, which they had done to consult and to conclude it. That God who was a louer of iustice, and the insolencie and rashnesse of the enemies, had at last layed open a meane to reconquer that that had bene violently rauished from him against law, equitie, and reason: That they had to doubt no more of the victorie then for his part, he distrusted their valours, for that God doth alwayes accompanie an innocent cause with a happy successe. To these wordes was correspondent, both his constancie in deliberation, and his celeritie in execution, for that he commaunded immediatlie his armie to march, wherein were two thousand Launces and twentie thousand footemen. He tooke a contrarie way because he would not meete with the Ladie Regent his mother, who was come from Auignon to debate with him not to passe the Mountes in person, but to performe the warre in Italie by his Captaines. He gaue order to Ranſe de Cere to furnish his Gallies with those bandes of footemen which he had at Marseilles: and to auoyd all practises and negociations of peace, or at least that he somewhat distrusted the Pope, he forbad to passe further the Archbishop of Capua that was dispatched to him and so to go to the Emperour: He sent him word to tarie for him at Auignon in the Court of his mother, and negotiate with him by letters, or else to returne againe to the Pope: so firmelie had he fixed his minde vpon the warre, that nothing was more hatefull to him then to heare speake of peace, against the which he had closed his eares and shut vp all inclination: and in that resolution he followed the enemies in the meane while with the greatest diligence he could: but they making small reckening of the harmes and domages which the paylants did to them, marched alwayes in good order along the sea side: at last they got to Monaco, and there they brake into peeces their attilleries, which

For more facilitie of cariage , they laded their Mulets withall: as soone as they came to Finalo, they vnderstood with what hast the King marched after, which made them double their pasc, to the end to be able in good leason to defend the Duchie of Millan, wherein were not remaining forces sufficient to make resistance.

Thus both the one and the other armie drawing towards Italie , the same day that the French King came to Verceill , the Marquis of Pesquiero arriued at Albo with the horsemen and bandes of Spanish footemen , being followed one dayes iourney behind by the Duke of Burbon and the Launceknights : the Marquis not taking leysure to pawse , or scarcelie to breath , went the day following from Albo to Vogniero being fortie miles distant , to the end he might the next day get into Pauia : and there he ioyned his forces with the Viceroy who was come thither from Alexandria , for the gard of which towne he had left a strength of two thousand footemen : this was in a time when the French armie began to draw fast vpon the shores of the riuer Tesin , their diligence in marching being farre swifter then was the opinion of the enemies . In this place they consulted with Ieronimo Moron of the estate of their common affaires, wherein their first deuise was , that leauing sufficient garrison within Pauia , they should dispose all their forces to the defence of Millan, according to the obseruation and custome of the other warres. In this counsell, it was set downe that Moron should go thither forthwith to make prouision for things necessarie, & the Duke of Millan to follow him who they had sent for: and they their with companies marched the right way to Millan, after they had left within Pauia, Anthoine de Leua with three hundred men at armes, fise thousand footemen being all Spaniards, except certaine Launceknights: but such was the desolation within Millan, that being still afflicted with the great plague that had runne through the towne all the summer, the Citie was sore shaken, and litle remaining of the former apparence and countenance: The sickenesse had consumed infinite numbers of the people and bodies of good seruice , and many had abandoned the Citie to auoyde that mortall perill of their liues : it contained such prouisions of victuals as it was wont to do : the meanes to taxe and leaue money began to grow hard and desperate : and touching the fortifications , the aduersitie of the sickenesse had taken away all care and remembrance of them , yea through the negligence of that time , all the bulwarkes and rampiers lay reuerfed to the ground : Such are the domages of an vniuersall negligence , which euen amid perils that be manifest and apparant , takes away the studie of things that most concerne safetie and defence . And yet albeit the townes-men and popular inhabitants , expressed no want of readinesse to lay themselves downe to all daunger, and suffer all trauell whosoever : yet Moron iudging by the present estate and desolation of the towne, that to enter with an armie , would be more to the ruine then to the defence of the Citie , tooke another counsell , which he published in the presence of a great assemblie of the townesmen in this maner of speeches . We may say now and with the same perturbation of minde , the like wordes which our Sauour Christ powred out in the middelt of his perplexities : Truly the spirit is ready , but the flesh is weake : I know that in you wanteth not the same affection which hath alwayes caried you to honour , obey , and defend your Lord Frauncis Sforce : and I am not ignorant , that in him do make right deepe impressions the calamities and daungers of his deare people , for whose safetie as I know he wanteth no inclination to offer vp his life and all his mortall estate , so in your faces I discerne an vniuersall readinesse to recompence him with the same compassion : But what auaieth it to be resolute, where fortune hath made greater the perils & dangers, then either reason or nature can make assured the hope, and how vainely is employed that fidelitie which is not accompanied with his due respectes to time , place , and propertie of things . I see your forces are nothing aunswerable to your good wils and inclinations , for that your towne is made naked of people , your treasures drayned of money , your store houses consumed of victuals, and your fortifications reduced to extreame ruine; matters that of themselves do offer the Frenchmen to enter, without that you shall neede to beate open your gates or posternes. It brings no litle grieve to the Duke to be constrained to leaue you abandoned , but it would be more grieuous to him the death, if in seeking to defend you he should lead you to your last ruine and desolation . In so great a face and multitude of euils , it is holden for good discretion to make election of the least , and not to doubt of better, seeing it is giuen to mortall men to hope for all things and to dispayre in nothing. In matters of perill it is no shame to flie, when the flying profi-

"teth him that giueth place to his aduersarie, for this reason the Duke aduiseeth you to obey necessitie, and giue place to the fortune of the French King, reseruing your remedies for a better time, which we can not but hope will happen for your speedie restoring. To giue place to necessitie and follow the law of time, is an office duly appertaining to wise men: For the present, the Duke will neither abandon himselfe, nor giue you ouer in time to come. Make your sorrowes no greater then is the qualitie of your losse, and frame your mindes apt to receiue this consolation, that time triumpheth ouer all the aduersities of the world. You see your cause is iust, the power of the Emperour mightie, his fortune incredible, and your enemies no other men then such against whom your valours haue so oftentimes preuailed. God will behold your pietie towards the Duke, and his compassion towards his countrey: with him are layd vp the issues of warres, and in his sight is farre more acceptable the innocencie of your cause, then the might of your aduersarie. Lastly I wish you all to remaine thus resolute, that suffering for a good end that which our present necessitie doth constraine vs vnto, that mightie God whose rule goeth through all, will take to himselfe the reuenge of our proud enemies, & by a glorious victorie, redeeme vs from those afflictions which we haue suffered so long in his sight. After these wordes, he dismissed the assemblie, and causing victuals to be put within the Castle, he issued out of the towne.

The Duke not knowing any thing of that which Moron had done at Millan, tooke his way to go thither: but immediatly after he was come out of Pania, he met with Ferrant Castriot hauing the conduct of the artillerie, who signifying to him that part of the enemies were passed Thefin, and that they had ouerthrowen Captaine Succhar & Eurgonion with his light horsemen vpon the shores of the riuer, he returned to Pania, fearing to finde ambushes and impediments in the way. And albeit the Duke & Moron had proceeded with sinceritie in these causes, yet the Emperours captaines who were with the armie at Binasquo, being iealous least they had secretly contracted with the French king, sent to Millan Captaine Alarcon with two hundred Launces, either to follow him or to lye still according to the aduertisements that should be giuen. He was no sooner arriued there, then the people who were already compounded with certaine exiles that negociated in the Kings name, began to take hart and to publish the name of the Emperour and Frauncis Sforce. But Captaine Alarcon, waighing with the litle hope that remained of defence, the nearenesse of the French vauward which was then at hand, issued out of the gate called Rome gate, and tooke the way to Loda, whither was also marched the whole armie. This was at the same time that the enemies began to enter by the gates of Thefin and Verceill, who, if they had not turned towards Millan, but put vpon them the chase and pursuing of the Emperours armie, both being wearie with marching, & hauing lost many of their men at armes & horses, it was beleeued for certaine, that they had put the armie to the shooke and defeated with facilitie the forces which afore they feared. And moreover, if after they were approched to Millan, they had with the same diligence drawne towards Loda, either the Emperours Captaines would not haue dared to stay there, or at least passing with diligence the riuer of Adada, they had with the same fortune and facilitie put to disorder the residue of the enemies. But the King who haply supposed it a matter of great importance to establish and assure at his deuotion Millan, a towne which had made the most principall resistance against him, or haply being caried with some other cause, he did not only draw to the Citie of Millan, wherein he would not enter nor suffer the armie to enter, but stayed to bestow in it sufficient garrison, and to giue direction for besieging the Castell, wherein were seuen hundred Spanish footmen. He forbad, to the great prayse of his modestie and clemencie, that no displeasures should be done to the inhabitants, seeking by that insinuation to reduce a people whom he saw vntractable by all other meanes: after he had published his directions at Millan, he turned his armie towards Pania, not holding it conuenient for the estate of his affaires, to leaue behind his backe a Citie wherein were so many souldiers. The King had in his armie (reckening those that remained at Millan) two thousand Launces, eight thousand Launceknights, sixe thousand Swissers, sixe thousand foreriders or aduenturers, and foure thousand Italians: the number of these last increased much afterwarde.

About this time, the Marquis of Pesquero was got within Loda with two thousand footmen: & the Viceroy hauing reuietualled the townes of Alexandria, Coma, & Tressa, was entred into Sonzin: with him entred Frauncis Sforce & Charles Burbon, who amid so many difficulties & distressed drew to them some courage by the going of the king to Pania: they thought to readdress their compa-

companies if the defence of that Citie would giue them libertie: & to that purpose they sent into Germany to leaue sixe thousand footmen, with the payes of whom & other expences necessarie, there was prouision made with the fiftie thousand ducets which the Emperour had sent to Genes, to employ them in the warres of Prource: but the thing that gaue chiefe impediment to their counsels, was the necessity and want of money which they suffered: for neither had they meane to draw any out of the Duchie of Milau, and lesse hope to obtaine of the Emperour for his disability any other matter then a commission to offer to be sold at Naples the most of the reuenues of the kingdome: and touching their ancient confederates, they expected none at all or verie litle reliefe neither of money nor men: for that as the Pope and Florentines ioyntly being sued vnto for some contribution of money, gaue them nothing but generall words and hopes more hurting the curing their calamities: so the Pope alone, who after the Admirall was gone out of Italie stood resolutely fixed not to intangle himselfe further in the warres betweene the Emperour and the French king, would neuer renew the confederation made with his predecessor, nor contract new leagues with any Prince: and which more is, notwithstanding he declared himselfe inclined to the Emperour and the king of England, yet he had made a secret promise afore to the French king, not to be any impediment to him in the recouerie of his Duchie of Milau. Moreouer, when the Venetians were required by the Viceroy to furnishe those bands of souldiers which they were bound vnto by the capitulations of the league; albeit they did not flatly refuse them, yet their answers were but cold and contained small hope: their intention was to accomodate their counsels according to the traine and proceeding of things, wherein they were caried by one of these reasons: either for that in many of them was renewed the memorie of their ancient alliance with the French king, or else they iudged that he could not but remaine victorious in regard of his valour, his fortune, but specially the mighty forces he brought into Italy against enemies of so slender preparation and worse prouision; or lastly, for that the Emperours ambition was more suspected to them then before, for that he had not inuested Francois Sforce in the Duchy of Milau; a matter which the states of Italy did no lesse maruell at then grievously complaine vpon: in this maner of doing also they were much caried by the authority of the Pope, to whose counsels and example they bare no small respect in those times.

The French king made his approach to Pavia on the lower side betweene the riuer of Tbesin, and the way that leadeth to Milau: and after he had incamped his vaungard within the suburbs of S. Anthonie beyond Tbesin vpon the way that goeth to Genes, he bestowed himselfe in the Abbey of S. Lanfranke which is within a mile of the walles: there he drew into consideration all the wayes that could be deuised for the exploit of the towne, either how much the situation did help, or what might be hoped for by the industrie of men, which parts were weakest for want of fortification, and how to leaue the difficulties where were shewes of resistance, yea he made a counsell with his Captaines of all things tending to such a seruice: & after resolution set downe, he aduanced his artilleries, with the which for two dayes together he battred the walles in two places, and afterwards raunging his armie into aray of battell, he began to giue the assault: but in the verie first charge he caused effoones to sound the retrait, both finding the rampiers within verie strong and furnished, and the assurance and valour of the defendants resolute and singular, and also discerning in his owne souldiers manifest signes of feare by the spectacle of their fellowes slaine in the charge: with this also he considered how hard it would be to take by assault a towne that had for her defence so many braue men of warre, so many naturall impediments, so many artificiall difficulties; and lastly, so plentifully prepared of all those things which either experience, industrie, or counsell could prouide, that there was nothing wanting which might be made for the helpe of their danger, nor nothing vsed to their helpe which was not hurtfull to the enemy: therefore he deuised to cast trenches and platformes, wherein he employed the labour of a great number of pyoners, by whose working he sought to cut off the flanks, to giue more libertie to his souldiers when they should approach: and as to his desire to besiege the towne; there was wanting no will to follow the exploit with charges and expences, so albeit the worke was long and hard, yet he caused to make mines in many places, hoping to preuaile by that engine, though in all other wayes should fall out imperfection or errour: the riuer there about two miles aboue Pavia separates it selfe into two armes or hornes, and carying his streame of one violence and swiftnesse somewhat below the towne, he meeteth in one againe afore he fall into Pavia.

The king deuised to take the oportunitie of this riuer, wherein vsing the counsell of diuerse enginists and water workemen skilfull in the course of the streame, he determined to turne that arm of the riuer that passeth on that side to Pania, and to make it fall into the lesser, which they call Gravellone: his hope was to preuaile with greater facilitie on that side, for that the wall by reason of his suretie, which the depth of the water did giue, was not any way rampired: the number of the defendants was so great aboue his expectation, and their minds so resolute in valour and fidelitie, that he had no confidence of the victorie by any other meane then this: which made him consume many dayes in that worke, no lesse great for the labour, employing multitudes of men, then grievous for the expences, drawing with it many extraordinarie charges: The townes-men could not but be fearefull to see such a worke raised to do them harme, and yet subduing through a settled confidence those motions that made them timorous; the vertue of their minds brought them to contemne the thing that their nature and flesh made them to distrust and doubt: but such was the violent working of the water being much increased by certaine great raines and land-floods that were fallen, that it begā to reuerse the trenches & sluices which were made in the channel where the riuer was deuised to force the course of the water to enter into the lesser arme: and albeit the kings hopes made him both to recontinue the worke, and to thinke to be able to surmount the violence of the streame with the force of men and money, yet in the end experience gaue him to know, that the force of a water carying a violent course, can do more then either the trauell of men, or industrie of enginists. The priuation of this hope, together with the difficulties that were discerned to carie the towne by force, draue the king to a new counsell, wherein he determined to continue the siege, with the long tract and continuance whereof, he was not without hope to reduce the defendants into necessitie of rendring.

During these preparations and actions, the Pope hearing of the taking of Millan, was not a little moued with the fortunes and happy beginnings of the French: and therefore amid such alteration of things; he studied to assure his proper affaires, dispatching for the same occasion to the French king, Iohn Mathew Giberio Bishop of Verona, who was of no lesse fidelitie and confidence with the Pope, then gracious and acceptable to the French king: he had in charge to go first to Sonzin to induce the Viceroy and the other Captaines to peace, communicating with them his legation to the king for the same cause: but finding them recomforted by the resistance of Pania, and no lesse assured in the hope of their proper valour, they made him a braue answer, that they had no deuotion to any composition which should giue to the king any one foot of land in the Duchie of Millan: he found in the king alike, or haply a more hard disposition, raising his heart into high hopes, both by the greatnesse of his armie, and also for the good meanes he had to continue it and increase it: a foundation wherupon he assured principally his passage into Italy, and not vnder a simple hope to preuent his enemies, notwithstanding he would say, that in effect it was already succeeded to him. The king nourished in himselfe an assured hope to carie Pania, which he battred with a continuall furie and execution of his artilleries: this hope was especially grounded vpon the works which he cast about the wals, such as he was assured could not be troubled by the enemies: for the want which they had of munitions: a matter easie to be discerned by the little number of shots which they made. He saw also into their penurie of victuals and bread, and was not without hope also to be able in time to turne the streame of Tesin; an action specially importing the aduancement of his victorie: and esteeming the conquest of Millan and Genes, a recompence farre vnworthy the expences he had made, and a reward too simple for so great a glorie, he raised his mind to higher thoughts, & in that ambitio deuised to inuade the kingdom of Naples, holding nothing the hardnesse of the enterprise in regard of his fortune & glorie, & more contemning the perill then well examining the parts and circumstances of it. But after all this, the principall cause of the Bishops legation was debated betweene the, and brought forth effect with verie little difficultie, both for that the Pope bound himselfe not to giue against the king any succours, either secret or manifest; in which couenant the Florentines did also communicate: and also the king receiued into his protection the Pope and the Florentines, comprehending especially the authority which the family of Medici had within Florence. It was agreed that this accord should not be published, but at such time as should seeme best to the Pope: neuer thelesse, albeit it came not for the present, to the knowledg of the Emperours Captaines, yet they entred dayly more & more into ialousie of the Pope: & therefore to be fully made assured of the certainty of his intention intention, they dispatched to him Martin Abbot of Nagero Commissarie of the campe: his commission was to propound to the Pope at one time both hope and feare: for of the one part they made him aware of verie great things, & of the other they gaue him to vnderstand, that if the Emperour and the king came to the vttermoſt contention, the Emperour could not but hold for enemies and againſt him ſuch as ſtood in ſhew of neuters and indifferent: but the Pope answered, that nothing could be leſſe ſeeming to him, his eſtate and place, then to giue ouer neutrality in a time when warres ran betweene Chriſtian Princes, both for that the office of a Paſtour did ſo require it, and alſo ſtanding a neuter, he might with a greater authoritie interpoſe in the action of peace: of the parts and couenants whereof, he treated at the ſame time with the Emperour, at whoſe Court ſince the taking of Millan was arriued the Archbiſhop of Capua, to whom the Ladie Regent had giuen paſſport to go from Lyon into Spaine: where, after he had with the ſame reaſons excuſed the Pope in that he would not renue the league, a matter wherein the Emperour did inſtantly require him, when he vnderſtood the king drew towards Italy, he told him that in making peace or truce, he ought to lay aſide armes. But that which wrought in the Emperour an inclination to accord, was the difficulties wherein he ſaw his armie reduced, the ſlender means he had to make leauies of money to relieue the affaires of Italy, the full felicitie which followed the French king, and the ſuſpition that he had leaſt the king of England had ſecretly contracted with his enemy: he grounded that iealouſie vpon this reaſon, that not only he refuſed to ſend to the armie that was in Lombardy the fifty thouſand ducquets, for the which notwithstanding he had giuen order, and prouided at Rome for the warre of Prouence: but alſo he demaunded of the Emperour (ſuffering ſo great neceſſitie) both reſtitution of the money he had lent him, and alſo preſent payment of all ſuch ſummes as he was bound vnto: for, the Emperour ſince his paſſing into Spaine hauing a great deſire of coniunction with the king of England, and the better to remove all difficulties that might hold him in ſuſpence, bound himſelf to pay him that penſion which he had yearely of the French king, and to answer twenty thouſand ducquets for the penſions which the French king paid to the Cardinall of Yorke and others, together with thirty thouſand ducquets payable to Queene Blanch the widow of king Lewis: of all which ſummes he had made no payment till that day: neuertheſſe the Emperour amid ſo many aduerſities, made answer that it was not a matter agreeing with his dignitie, to make any conuention ſo long as the French king lay vexing with armes and hoſtility the Duchy of Millan. This was his answer, no leſſe reſolute then worthy ſuch a greatneſſe of mind, being notwithstanding no leſſe afflicted in thought and ſpirit, then very ill diſpoſed of his perſon and body, being fallen into a feuer quartaine, either for the diſpleaſure he had conceiued, when the difficulties to take Marſeilles began to appeare, or for that his mind ill diſpoſed to giue place to the enemy, was not naturally made tractable by any difficulties, or for that he had a firme confidence in the vertue of his armie, if once they came to the batell; or laſtly, for that he promiſed to himſelfe, that hereafter the fauours of fortune would follow him with as full a gale as they had done in times paſt.

The French king during theſe actions, had determined to inuade the realme of Naples, hoping that the importance of that kingdom would moue the Viceroy either to abandon Millan, or at leaſt ſurceaſe armes vpon ill conditions; a thing which the king begā to deſire for the difficulties he ſaw to obtaine Pavia, and for that expedition it was ſet downe, that Iohn Steward Duke of Albany, iſſued of the blood of the kings of Scotland, ſhould march to the realme of Naples with two hundred launces, ſixe hundred light horſemen, and foure thouſand footmen: theſe to be drawne out of the armie, the one halfe to be Italians, foure hundred Swiſſers, and the reſidue Launcet knights: and for the more glorie of the expedition and ſuretie of the victorie, Ranſe de Cere was appointed to ioine with them, and to deſcend at Lyuorna with thoſe bands of footemen that were leauied for the armie at ſea, which for the difficultie of neceſſarie prouiſions, was yet within the Bay of Villefranche: he had alſo ſent directions to the ſame Ranſe and the Urſins, to wage foure thouſand footmen in the country of Rome. This deliberation the French king ſignified to the Pope by his Embaſſour Alberto Earle of Carpy, by who he required the Pope of ſufferance to leauy bands of footmen at Rome, and to conſent to paſſage for his armie through the Church dominion. This demaund brought no litle grieve to the Pope, to whom it could not but be intollerable, that together with the Duchie of Millan, the crowne of Naples ſhould diuolue to the French king: but looking into the eſtate of the time, & leſſe hardy to make open reſuſal to the kings demand, he aduiſed

him only by way of counsell, not to embrace as yet that enterprise, and not to driue him to that necessitie not to accord to him that which for many iust regards he could not consent vnto: wherein he occupièd with him this wise discourse to proue the action to be against his proper weale and profite: That if in times past the desire to reconquer the Duchie of Millan had stirred vp so many enemies, much more would it moue in those dayes, and in that estate of affaires, which the world discerned that he aspired manifestly to the kingdome of Naples: That there was great perill least such an ambition would draw the Venetians to take armes for the Emperour, and to passe the bonds of their confederation: That he had to consider, that if his affaires found any difficultie in Lombardy, the war would proceed with small reputation in the realme of Naples: That if his warres and armies suffered declination in either of these two places, it would be a materiall cause to bring forth diminution to both: That lastly, he should remember what offices he had commended in him in putting vpon him a mind requisite in a Pope, and that therefore it was not conuenient to compell him now to do the contrary. But this discourse was made in vaine, for that the Duke of Albanie not attending for other answer, and withall halfe assured of the Popes consent, passed the riuer of Paw at the passage of Stellaro, which is in the Duchie of Millan: and yet the fift day after he turned backe againe by direction from the king, who vnderstanding that the Launceknights began already to arriue, & that the Duke of Burbon was gone to wage warre, thought best to reserue with himselfe his whole armie, vntill his campe were possessed of the new supply of Swissers and Grisons which he had sent to leaue. In this meane while were made many shewes and demonstrations of armes, though no action of importance was performed by neither partie: The king continued the siege before Pania, working continually at the trenches, & watching to vexè them within with his artilleries: and the Imperials stood quiet, expecting the returne of the Duke of Burbon: onely the Marquis of Pesquero, vpon whose prouidence and valour depended for the most part the counsels and executions of the whole affaires, issued one night out of Loda with two hundred horsemen and two thousand footemen: with which strength he surprisèd the towne of Molzo, being negligently garded by Ieronimo and Iohn Fermo Truulè, with two hundred horsemen, and in the action tooke prisoners all the Captaines with the most part of all their souldiers, of whom Ieronimo died not many dayes after of a blow which he receiued in fight. By this were arriued in the kings campe the bands of Swissers and Grisons, by reason of whose comming the Duke of Albanie repassed againe the riuer of Paw at Stadello vpon the countrey of Plaisance: from which inclination the Pope was not able to turne the king, nor that he did what he could, but haply solicited it with verie cold instance, for feare to make him enter into suspicion: and therefore he thought it now time both to manifest to the Imperials, the couenants he had made with him before, and also to renew the mention of the accord, hoping that no lesse the difficultie to obtaine Pania, then the daunger of the kingdome of Naples would make either partie lesse obstinate & lesse hard to embrace the accord: to those ends he sent Paule Vettorio to the Viceroy to signifie to him, that notwithstanding the means and meditations he had vsed, yet he could neuer diuert the French king from his purpose to invade the realme of Naples: and that (as touching his owne particular, least he should pull vpon himselfe the warre which he could not resist) he had no reason to giue impediment to his passage: neuerthelesse, albeit he was constrained by vehement compulsion to seeke his surety with him by new contracts, yet he wold neuer accord to any condition which might be preiudiciall to the Emperour: for whom, like as amid so many difficulties, he saw nothing more profitable nor reasonable thē to embrace peace: so to the end the negociatiō of peace might be aduanced afore the disorders grew greater or more immoderate, he perswaded the Viceroy to cōsent to a surceasing of armes, & to put into the hands of a person not suspected al those peeces in the Duchie of Millan, which as yet were holden in the name of the Emperour and the Duke. Vpon which doings and their full accomplishments, he hoped there would be found out some conuenient meane for peace, wherein he proponed this deuise, that the Duchy of Millan being wholly separate frō the crowne of Fraunce, the kings second son should be inuested therein by the Emperour, to whō in recōpence shold be transferred some cōpetent sum of money: that there should be ordained some reasonable estate and assignation for the Dukes of Millan & Burbon: and lastly, that the Pope, the Venetians, and the Florentins should be bound to cōfederate with the Emperour against the French king, in case he wold not obserue things promised. The Emperours Captaines discerned well of the difficulties and dangers wherein they stood, hauing

At one time to support so great a warre in Lombardy in such an yniuersall want and necessitie of money, and to provide for the safety of the kingdome of Naples, being no lesse desperate of ayde from the Pope and Florentines, then very certaine that the Venetians would abandon them: who albeit they waged new bands offootmen, and studied to entertaine the Imperials in hope to obserue the articles of the league, yet they deferred the execution with diuerse excuses: in so much as the Viceroy being for his particular nothing estranged from the accord, inclined to draw with the army to the kingdome of Naples for the surety of the same: but the Councell being assembled vpon the matter, the reasons and authoritie of the Marquis of Pesquero preuailed, who expressing an equall correspondencie of wisdom and courage, proued how necessarie it was to passe ouer the account of all other dangers, and to fixe only vpon the warre of Lombardy, vpon whose victorie all other things had their expectation and depending: he said it was not the kings intentiō to inuade the realme of Naples with those armies and forces which could not so speedily be led into the kingdome, where both were multitudes of strong townes and an absolute resolution and certaintie of resistance, by those bodies whom it concerned (for their proper safety) to defend it: by which occasion as it might be sustained for certaine moneths, so in that respite & time it was likely that the warre of Millan would be determined, of which if they obtained the victorie, there could not but follow the speedy deliuering or rendring of Naples, yea though the Emperour had no other holds or peeces there then one only tower. That holding good in Lombardy, it were easie to be victorious ouer Millan and Naples: where in marching to Naples were the only way to loose Millan, and yet the kingdome not the more deliuered from daunger, for that the whole body of the warre would be transported thither: and being once reduced to a state of men vanquished, with what hopes can we returne thither againe? where of the contrarie, the enemies would enter with such a reputation and inclination of the people, who naturally either for feare or hatred, run before the fortune of the victor: that in the kingdome of Naples would be found no more defence then in the Duchy of Millan: that no other thing moued the French king standing as yet in doubt of the successe of Lombardy, both to deuide his armie and begin a new warre (the first still hanging and continuing) then the hope he had, that for the ouermuch care and ieaousie of the kingdome of Naples, they would at last leaue vnto him as a pray the estate of Millan: according to whose counsels and appetites, if the armie should moue that so often had triumphed in victory, it were no other thing then with eternall infamie to subiect to the vanquished, by cōpulsion of their threatnings, that honour, that reputation, and that estate of glorie, which so manie times we haue won vpon thē by our armes, by our valour, & by our weapons. This aduise was embraced, and as a sentence set downe & followed by the Viceroy, who accordingly dispatched to Naples the Duke of Tracetta, with direction to make as great leauies of mony as was possible, & recomend ouer the care and defence of the kingdome to Afcanio Colomno & the other Barons of the realme: and albeit he had modestly giuen answer to the Embassage presented to him from the Pope, yet he wrote to Rome letters full of seuerity & bitternesse, such as gaue manifest significatiō, that he wold not heare speake of the accord. By reason of this, the Pope declaring how he was pushed on by necessity, for that the Duke of Albanie aduanced dayly, published (not as a thing done before) that he had contracted with the French king vnder a simple promise not to offend one another: this he signified by writing to the Emperors Agents, alleaging the causes that induced him, but specially his necessities and perils increasing: and when the said writing was presented by Iohn Corsi Embassadour of Florence with words conuenient in such a case, the Emperour, who afore could not be perswaded that the Pope would abandon him in so great a danger, fell into no litle emotion and trouble of mind: he set before his eyes the sundrie hopes he had giuen him, confirmed by manie good offices and oblations: he conferred together the seuerall demonstrations of amitie, accompanied with no lesse tokens of constancy and firmnesse: lastly, making a iudgement betweene the former promises of the Pope, and his present effects, he burst out into publike passion against him, accusing with exclamation his frailtie & light condition: & in that heat of nature he answered the Embassadour, that neither hatred, nor ambition, nor any interest particular had stirred him vp to begin warre with the French king, but only the perswasions, the suggestions, and the authority of Pope Leo, who (as he said) was drawne vnto it by the Pope reigning, being at that time Cardinall of Medici, & perswaded him with great vehemency of reasons, that it was a matter of great importance for the publike safety and vniuersal benefite, not to suffer the French king to possesse any thing in Italy: That the same Cardinal was the author of the confederation made for that cause before the death of Pope Adrian. In which respects he pronounced with great griefe how much it troubled him, to see the Pope, who aboue all others was bound not to be separate from him in those dangers, wherein by his meanes he was entred, had made a change no lesse hurtfull to him, then without all necessity: that such reuolt & separation for the time, the place, & the whole manner and proprietie of it, could be attributed to no other thing, then to a certaine seruile feare and timorous impression, such as hath fallen vpon him since they within Pania haue holden out. In this humour he forgot not to debate the meanes and fauours he had vsed to increase his greatnesse alwayes since the death of Pope Leo, and specially his authority in two Conclaues together, with his perpetuall desire to transerre vpon him the soueraigne election, onely for this opinion, that by his meane might be reestablished the common liberty of Italy: and on the other side, he made collection how litle the Pope might assure himselfe of the French king, and how farre he was either to feare or to hope of his victorie: lastly, he stood vpon this conclusion, that neither for the Popes resolution which was against all good office and expectation, nor for any other accident or fortune of what condition soeuer, he would not forget nor abandon himselfe: wherein he protested, and therewithall wished, that no man should expect that for want of mony he would change or varie from his purpose, seeing he had vowed to set vp as a last rest all his crownes and kingdomes, and his life withall, desiring of God that his irreuocable deliberation in the matter might not be preiudiciall to the health of his soule. To these complaints the Embassadour of Florence replied: That the Pope, since he was raised to the soueraigne dignity, was bound to preceede no more as Cardinall of Medici, but to put on the person of Pope of Rome, whose office was to be carefull ouer the peace of Christendome: for which reason he had often debated with him the necessity of peace and quietnesse, and for better negociation of it, he had sent to him at two seuerall times the Archbishop of Capua, by whom he protested that by the oath and ceremonie of his office, he was bound not to be particular, but indifferent: that he had also admonished him thereof at such time as the Admirall Bommet departed out of Italy, hauing no better season and oportunitie to treat of peace for him and more for his honour, whereunto neuertheless he made him no other answer, then that he could conclude no peace without the consent of the king of England: he desired the Emperour to remember how often the Pope had dissuaded the passage and iourney into Prouence, both for that it troubled altogether the hope of the peace: and also (herein he seemed a diuine Prophet of things to come) the necessity wherein it would put the French king to enter into armes, might be the occasion to stirre vp in Italy a more dangerous combustion: That the Pope by the negotiation of the Bishop of Verona, had declared to the French king, then possessor of Millan, and also to the Viceroy, how far it concerned them to hearken to peace, but neither of them bare any inclination thereunto: That since that time he had with many reasons, and verie great efficacy, refused to giue passage through the estate Ecclesiastike, to the bands of men of warre that marched against the realme of Naples: and yet neuertheless the king did not only denie to heare his reasons, but also made his forces to march along the countrey of Plaisance without tarying for his answer: That for that cause he had (lastly) sent Paule Vitorio to induce the Viceroy to a surceasing of armes vnder conditions conformable to the time, and withall to certifie him by how many reasons of necessity he was to assure himselfe of the danger imminent, seeing withall that both the Venetians stood in suspence, and also the king of England would not be concurrant in the defence of the Duchie of Millan, if at the same time both by the Emperour and by him, the warre were not moued beyond the Mounts: but seeing the Viceroy made no reckening of any offers or conditions he propounded, and that the kings men of warre and armed bands aduanced dayly, he was constrained to take faith and surety of the king without being bound to any other thing then not to offend him. The Emperour complained of the hardnesse of the condition offered to the Viceroy, for that it restrained and bound him to leaue that which he held, not expressing any mention that the French king should do the like: & lastly he said, that albeit the Marquis of Pesquero in counselling him to agreement, had signified to him that in the campe were many disorders, & no lesse danger to his affaires, yet he could not frame his mind to peace, such was his hope that through the valour of his men he should carie the victorie, if the armies came once to the triall of a battell.

All this while continued the siege of Pania: and yet for want of munitions they had somewhat

What ceased to molest it with their artilleries: but to remedy that difficulty, the king hauing newly receiued ^{his} protection the Duke of Ferrara, with obligation to pay him threescore & ten thousand ducats in ready mony, was content to accept twenty thousand of that summe in price and value of munitions, which he caused to be conueyed by Parma and Plaisance, vsing the seruice of the horses and cariages of the countrey men: wherein the king was readily holpen by the commission and direction of the Pope, not without the complayning of the Viceroy, as though in that action he had ministred manifestly to the ayde and succors of the king: who, to the end the munitions might arriue in surety, had sent afore Iohn de Medicis with two hundred horse and fiftene hundred footmen. This Medicis complaining in the beginning of the war, both of the seuerity of the Viceroy giuing him discountenance, and also of his penury of mony, not hauing sufficient to make the souldiers to march, was passed out of the Emperours pay, to the entertainment of the French king. It seemed that these forces were sufficiēt to assure the munitions, the rather because the Duke of Albanie was at hand, hauing passed at the same time the riuer of Paw. And albeit the Viceroy & the Marquis of Pisquero to stop their passage, cast a bridge neare to Cremona, & made their way ouer Paw with six hundred mē at armes & eight thousand footmē, lodging the first day at Monticello: yet they gaue ouer the enterprife, & returned againe ouer the riuer, being aduertised by credible espiall, that the king had giuen charge to the Lord Thomas de Foix, to go seekethem with one part of the army. As soone as they were retired, the Duke of Albanie passed the Appenine along the territories of Reggia & Garfagnana, only he marched slowly, the same confirming the opinion that was conceiued that the king embraced that enterprife, more to induce with such feare the Emperours Captaines either to accord, or at least to abandō the affaires of Lombardy, then through hope to make any great aduancement. Ranse de Cere ioyned with him neare to Lucqua with a regiment of three thousand footmen who were come with the army at sea. This army as they passed, tooke by composition Sanona and Varagina: and the Nauy being eftsoones returned to the west riuer of Genes, held in feare and bridle that City.

The Duke of Ferrara aydes
the French
king during the siege of Pauia.

In the beginning of the yeare a thousand five hundred twenty and five, Don Hugo de Moncada departing from Genes with the Nauy, descended and tooke land with three thousand footmen at Varagina, where were left in garrison certaine bands of French footmen. But the French Nauy, that was then at sea, being commanded by the Marquis Salusse, making to the succors of that place, the other flecte retired being naked of footemen: when also the French regiments of footemen descended and left their ships, and so fiercely charged their enemies, that the whole army being broken, diuerse were miserably put to the sword, and the person of Don Hugo vnfortunately taken prisoner.

In the beginning of the same yeare, the Duke of Albanie compelled the people of Lucqua to contribute to him 12000 ducats, & to lend him certaine peeces of artilleries: with which munitions and prouisions he marched further through the lands of the Florentins, by whom he was receiued in amity & friendship: & in that sort did he stay with his army neare to Sienna at the Popes request, who for that neither by authority, nor with armes, he could not meete with all things that troubled him, resorted to his natural cōditiō, & begā to manage his purposes with art & industry. It nothing displeased him that the French should get the Duchy of Millan, for that he made this coniecture, that whilest the Emperor & the French king abode in Italy, both the sea Apostolike and his Pontificacy shold stand assured from the ambition & greatnesse of either of them, because they would keepe iealous eyes the one ouer the other: and yet by the same reason it was grieuous to him to see the French make a conquest of the kingdom of Naples, for feare least at one time that kingdom and the Duchy of Millan were reduced vnder the power and commandement of one so puissant a Prince: wherein to cast impediments against the doings and fortunes of the king, he sought occasion to stay the Duke of Albanie, & made instance to the king, that as he passed he wold readdress and reorder the gouernement of Sienna, which the Pope (for the oportunity and seate of that City, standing in the midway betweene Rome & Florence) desired greatly might fall into the hāds of some of his friends, like as was hapned not many monethes before by his meane & working: for as the Cardinall Petrucchi dying during the Pontificacy of Adrian, his nephew Francis pretended to succeed him in the gouernment: so by reason of his insolency, the chieftaines of Montenouo being neuerthelesse of the same faction, opposed vehemently against him, and made solicitation to the Duke of Sesse the Emperours Embassadour, and to Cardinall Medicis, to giue them another forme of gouernement, as either to reduce it into liberty, or else to referre the whole authority into the hands of Fabio sonne of Pandolfe Petrucci, notwithstanding somewhat before he was secretly stolen away to Naples. This matter was long debated, and at last when Clement was elected Pope, the common consent of him and the Emperour concurring, Fabio was by Caesars re-established in the place of his father: but both for that he had not the full authority of his father, and for the present inclination of the City bearing vniuersally to liberty, and also because the family and faction of Montenouo, was neither firmly knit with him, nor of no assured agreement amongst themselves, the estate of things drew to other effects then answered the expectation: for, by the debility that was discerned to be in the power of one only, both hauing no foundation vpon the affections and good wils of the Citizens, and also holding no gouernment absolute, and without regard to the course and maner of tyrants, there hapned one day by the incensing of his aduersaries, a popular tumult, by the which without the ayde of any forreiners, he was easily driuen out of the City, notwithstanding he had alwayes in the place a gard depending vpon him. The Pope making his aduantage of this deuision, and reposing no confidence neither in the populars, nor in any other faction, determined to put the authority into the hands of the Montenouaes, to the end afterwards to create chiefe Ruler either Fabio, or any other of them that should be best agreeable to him: a matter which as when men be entered into suspicion, they are wont for the most part to take all things in the worst part, so the manner of that dealing increased this opinion in the Imperiall Capitaines, that the capitulation made betweene the Pope and the French king, contained on all sides some matter of more aduantage, and a greater obligation then the band of neutrality. It hapned by the staying of the Duke of Albania vpon the confines of Sienna, that the inhabitants there, to redeeme their domages which they receiued of the army, gaue a most ample voyce and authority touching the gouernement to those Citizens who were most of the Popes confidence and faction: and afterwards the Siennois sent certaine quantities of munition and money to the Duke of Albania, who passed on marching notwithstanding as slowly as he was wont. He went from Mountiasco to Rome to speake with the Pope, and afterwards passing Tiber to Fiano, he abode vpon the lands of the Vrsins, where did assemble the bands of footmen that were leuiued at Rome by the permission of the Pope, who gaue semblable succorance to the Colonnos mustering at Marina for the defence of the realme of Naples, to wage regiments of footme at Rome: but both for that they aduanced not much, & that vniuersally they were ill provided of mony, there was no great accopt made of those leuies or mustings, since the eyes, the eares, the expectation, the spirits and contemplations of all men were altogether settled vpon the affaires of Lombardy: which pretending to one end and by diuerse accidents, increased in both parties indifferently the humor of hope and feare.

The defendants of Pavia in necessity.

They that were within Pavia suffered no small necessity of mony & munitions, the store of wine beginning also to faile and all other sorts of victuals, except bread: by reason whereof the Launceknights assembled, and almost in maner of a tumult demanded their payes, wherunto, besides their owne insolent dispositions, they were pushed on by the incitation of their Captaine, who was feared to haue made some secrete contract with the French king. On the other side, the Duke of Burbon approached, and led with him from Germany fife hundred men at armes Burgomani, and sixe thousand Launceknights payed vpon the treasure of the king of Romaines: The Viceroy also was gone to Loda, where they meant to assemble the whole army, pretending that it should be nothing inferiour to that of the enemies. But as there was no present store of money, and lesse expectation to get so much as would make march the souldiers and entertaine them: so also they were destitute of all hope to be ayded by the Pope or by the Florentines: neither had they confidence in the Venetians, who after many excuses and delayes, had at last answered Caraccioll the Pronotary, and the Emperours Embassador at Venice, that they would proceede according to the example of the Pope, by whose meane and working it was supposed that they had secretly made a contract of neutrality with the French king: yea it was thought, that they priuily solicited the Pope, to procure to descend into Italy at their common charges, an army of ten thousand Swissers, to the end they should not neede to feare the victory of either of the armies. This was well allowed by the Pope, but both for want of mony, and by the custome and property of his nature, so slowly executed, that he sent too late into Switzerland the Bishop of Verculo to dispose the minds of the Swissers.

The necessities & wants of Pania were somewhat releued by the industry of the Viceroy and other Captains: for, sending certaine victuallers of wine into the French camp, Antbo. de Lena hauing a signall sent out certaine troupes to offer the skitmilsh on that side; by which occasion the bruite & alarme following, the victuallers breaking their greatest vessell, ran into Pania with a litle vessel enclosed in the great, and wherein were beltowed 3000 duckats: which though it did not to the full remedy their wants, yet it wrought such an operation of comfort amongst the, that the Launceknights seeing by that litle summe the difficulty to send them mony, bare afterwards with more patience their other extremities, wherein also the death of their Captaine did conveniently concurre at the same instant. It was beleued that Antbo. de Lena procured him to be poisoned, to the end to take away both the matter and occasions of tumults. In this time the Marquis of Pesquero went to incampe before Casciano, where were in garrison fifty horsemen and foure hundred Italian footmen, whom he compelled to render themselves to discretion.

After the Duke of Burbon was arrived with his Launceknights, there was nothing that more retayned the Captaines (being very carefull ouer the danger of Pania) then the want of mony, such as they had not only wherewith to pay the regiments of the men of warre, but also there was not to defray necessarily the conduction of the munitions and artilleries. In this necessity, they were driuen to haue recourse to perswasions; wherein they forgot not to recommend to the bands of footmen, the glory and riches which the victory would cast vpon them, and reducing to their memory the reputation of their conquests past, they labored also to inflame their minds with the fire of enuy and hatred against the Frenchmen. By which commendation of glory and profitte, they brought the Spanish footmen to make promise that they would follow the army one whole moneth more without receiuing any money: and the Launceknights were contented with that which should suffice for the prouision of their nurriture and necessary victuals. But they found many difficulties to winne the men at armes and light horsemen being lodged in the townes of Cremona and Guaradadda: they alleaged, that hauing receiued no money of long time, it would be grieuous to them to follow the army, where of necessity they must be driuen to buy victuals to nourish themselves; and forrage to feede their horses: they brought also into complaint this iniury, that their paines and seruice was holden lesse acceptable and recommended, then the infantry, to whom neuerthelesse had bene made many distributions of money, without releuing of them with one penny of long time. In which griefe they forgot not to insinuate their many merits, and making comparison of their reputation and valor, much lesse that they yeilded to be inferior to the infantry either in valor or fidelity, but they challenged place about them, both by their nobility and for their seruings past. It was necessary for the expedition of the seruice to reapease this murmure, & by some present industry to reasssure the minds that began so manifestly to shake; which office the Marquis of Pesquero tooke vpon him, who traueilling to their particular lodgings, vsed those meanes that best agreed with the state of the matter he had in hand, taking his obseruation of the wife Phisition, who hauing found out the humor that offendeth, prepareth that ministracion & medicine that is most apt to cure and remedy: sometimes he serued histurne with excuses, which in such cases haue their operation, and sometimes he whetted them on with words of comfort, which to minds wauering giue no litle edge and reuiuing: sometimes he reprehended them, which according to the persons might worke some notable office, & sometimes he confessed the equity of their complaints, wherein he ouercame their generall griefe with his proper compassion. And hauing thus by the singularity of his wit and industry, reduced to moderation their present murmures and discontentments, he followed his purpose with new encouragements, that by how much more they stood to make their vertue apparant, and their valor manifest, by so much more were they bound not to suffer so noble harts to be ouercome by an estate of infantry or footmen, either in fidelity or affection to the Emperour. And as the present quarrell did not concerne the glory and honor of the Emperour alone, but also the successe of the condition and whole estate of Italy was concurrant, so if they expressed not their readinesse and valor equall with the greatnesse of the occasion offered, they could hardly acquite the expectation that was conceiued of them, but sitting downe with dishonor & infamy, they would leaue to the Emperour an vnthankfull recompence for his benefits past. Lastly he told them, that seeing they had so many times offered their liues to hazard in the Emperours quarels, and no lesse often had made waie by their vertue thorough all perils of warre and fortune for his sake, it could not but intangle with shame and infamy the memory of their merites past, if now they should refuse to go to the warre for so vile a thing as a small quantity of money. What by these perswasions, and the authority of the Marquis, they consented to receiue for one moneth a small allowance of pay: insomuch that the whole army being thus assembled, which was supposed to containe seuen hundred men at armes, as many light horsemen, a thousand Italian footemen, and more then sixteene thousand Spanish Launceknights: they brake vp from Loda the five and twentieth of Ianuarie, and marched the same day to Marignan, making as though they would draw towards Millan, either to make the king, being touched with the daunger of that City, to leaue his siege from before Pauia, or else to giue cause to the souldiers to go from Millan that were there in garrison. Neuerthelesse hauing afterwards passed the riuer of Lambra neare to Vidigoso, they tooke manifestly the way to Pauia. The king payed in his army thirteene hundred Launces, ten thousand Swissers, foure thousand Launceknights, five thousand Frenchmen, and seuen thousand Italians: and yet what thorough the abuses and robberies of his Captaines, and corruption and negligence of his officers, the numbers of the footemen were farre lesse. Theodor Trinulce lay in garrison within Millan with three hundred launces, sixe thousand footemen Grisons and Valsiens, and three thousand Frenchmen. But assoone as the king discerned that the Imperials turned towards Pauia, he reuoked to the army all the regiments of footemen, except two thousand.

Assoone as the army of the Imperials had taken the field the French king began to deuise what was best to be done: and calling to counsell his Captaines, Trimonille, Palissa, and Monsieur de Foix with many others, aduised him to retire his army from before Pauia, and to go incampe either in the monastery of Charterhouse, or at Binaquo, which are places of good strength, and likewise are found many such in the countrey there, for the oportunity of the channels deriuing, and do serue for the watering of meadowes. They told him that in taking this course, he should speedily cary the victory without bloud or danger, the wants and necessities of his enemies not suffering them to hold out many dayes, but would constrain them either to dissolue, or disperse their companies into seuerall villages: That the Launceknights that were within Pauia, to the end to cut off all imputation that they sought to couer their feare and timerousnesse with the excuse that they were not payed, were content to beare with patience the prolonging of their payes for many moneths: but assoone as they saw the siege remoued, they would in insolency demand their payes, & not finding in their Captaines any assured meanes to satisfie them, and lesse expectation to entertaine them with credible hopes, it was to be feared they would draw to some daungerous tumult: That the enemies with no other thing kept themselves so orderly together, but with hope to giue speedily the battell, but when they should see the war drawne out into longnesse, & the commodity of offering the battell not presented, their expectation wold be frustrate, & the whole army replenished with difficulties & confusion: That it could not be but daungerous to remaine betweene a towne wherein were five thousand footemen of a most warlike nation, and an army that came to rescue it, which was no lesse mighty in numbers of men, valour and experience of Captaines and souldiers, then braue and resolute by the glory of their victories obtayned in times past, and who now had reposed all their hopes in the battell. That in warres it was no shame to flie, when the flying profiteth him that giueth place to his aduersary: That there could be no infamy in a retraite that was made by discretion and not by timerousnesse, when it is done vpon this confederation, not to put in doubt things that be certaine, and when in the issue & successe of the warre is to be expressed to all the world the maturity of the counsell: That there is no victory more profitable, more honourable, nor more glorious, then that which is obtayned without the damage, the spoyle, and bloud of souldiers: Lastly that the first and chiefe commendation of the discipline of warre consisted in this, that a Generall should not oppose his army to daungers without necessity, and rather with industry and patience to reuerse and make vaine the enterprises of his aduersaries, then through valour & courage to hazard the battell, which fortune and accidents may make doubtfull. The Pope concurred in the same counsell, & signified no lesse to the French king though not so much for the kings interests, yet for the necessity of his owne affaires, for that the Marquis of Pesquiera being not without his feare in so great a necessity, had aduertised afore hand the difficulties of the Emperors army to be such, as they almost cut from him all hopes of happy successe: neuerthelesse the king (a destiny inuitable can not be auoyded) who in his deliberations followed only the counsels of the Admirall, seemed to set before his eyes rather the rumors of men and brutes varying for every light accident, then the firme and assured substance of the effects of things: he interpreted it to a great shame and infamy, that an army royall led by his owne person, should shew more feare then valour, and basely give place to the coming of the enemies, wherein he was also pushed on by this vaine suggestion; that he was bound to follow and performe with deedes, the words that his rash tongue had vainely promised; a resolution most vndiscreete and dishonorable to a Captaine: for, both he had vnder protestation assured all the world, and many times signified by messengers into France & al the parts of Italy, that he would sooner chuse to sacrifice himselfe to death, then to retire from before Pavia without the victory: he stood fixed vpon these hopes, that in the place where he incamped, he might easily fortifie himselfe to auoyd all inconueniences by surprise: That through want of money every small delay, or the least necessity that might driue the enemies, to temporise, would put them into disorder, and hauing no meane to get victuals but by raiue and pillage, they could not remaine long in one lodging: Lastly he hoped to giue impediment to the victuals that were to come to their camp, whereof he knew the greatest part was appointed from Cremona, wherein he was furthered by this helpe, that he had newly taken into his pay Iohn Lodowike Paluoyfin, either to the end he should impatronize himselfe vpon Cremona, where was a very slender garrison, or at least to lie to cut off the suretie of victuals that had an ordinary traffike from that city to their campe.

For these reasons the king stood resolute not to leaue the siege of Pavia; and to haue the better way to impeach that the enemies should not enter, he dislodged in other maner, and gaue another forme to the incamping of his army: for, the king was lodged before in the Abbey of Saint Lanfranke, situated about a mile and an halfe beyond Pavia, beyond the way that leadeth from Pavia to Millan, and vpon the riuier of Thesin neare to that place where was proued the diuersion of the waters: Monsieur Palissa with the vanguard & the Swissers lay within the suburbs neare S. Justines gate, hauing fortified himselfe in the Churches of S. Peter, S. Apolline, and S. Ierome: and Iohn de Medicis with his horsemen and regiments of footemen, was bestowed in the Church of Saint Sauoir. But now, the king hauing information that the enemies were departed from Loda, he went & incamped within the Parke in the right sumptuous & stately house of Mirabell, situate on this side Pavia, leauing at S. Lanfrank the Grisons footmen, & yet changed not the lodging of the vanguard. At last the person of the king was lodged in the monasteries of S. Paule, & S. Iames, places besides other commodities, very eminent and neare Pavia, & command the champion, but are somewhat without the ring of the Parke. In the kings place M.^r Alenfon with the areargard went to incampe at Mirabell: and as for their more conuenient succouring one another, they bracke downe on that side the parke wall, so they held and commanded betweene them all that space of circuit that stretcheth towards Thesin on that side below, and vntill the way that leadeth to Millan towards aboue: so that holding Pavia enuironed on all sides, and hauing also at their deuotion the riuers of Granalone, Thesin, and Touretta, which is right against Darsina, the Imperials could not enter Pavia, vnlesse they passed the riuier of Thesin, or else made their entry by the Parke. The king for the managing of the army, reposed himselfe, wholly vpon the counsels of the Admirall: he had singular confidence in his fidelity, & so absolutely referred things to his direction, that he dispensed with himselfe and passed the most part of his houres in idlenesse and vaine pleasures, without any study or care of his affaires, or once to thinke vpon expeditions of importance: wherein such was either his wilfull negligence or willing partiality, that if at any time he sate in counsell amongst them, he would referre the sentēce & resolution of all things to the Admirall, without accepting the aduise of other experienced Captaines. By him were ordered all the kings deliberations, though at times he suffered his eares to be gouerned by Anne Montmeraucy, and Philip Chabot Lord of Bryon, personages very agreeable to him in his sports, but of slender experience touching matters of warre. Moreouer the estate and numbers of his army were not according to his desire and opinion, and much lesse answering to the brute that went: for, one part of his horsemen being gone with the Duke of Albanie, & another part left for the gard of Millan with Theodor Triuulce, and many also being disperfed into seuerall villages and boroughs thereabouts, there was not found in the campe aboue eight hundred Launces; and touching the footemen the numbers were farre lesse then was supposed, as well by the negligence of the kings officers, as though the deceit of the Captaines, of whom the greatest abusers were the Italians, who notwithstanding standing they receiued payes for great numbers offootemen, yet their bandes were farre from their full complements, many of the French Captaines tooke counsell also by their corruptions: and lastly the regiment of two thousand Valefions that were bestowed at Saint Sauoir betwene Saint Lanfranke and Pania, being suddenly assaulted by those that were within, were disperfed and broken.

The Imperials
take the Castell
S. Angelo.

In this estate of affaires, the Captaines Imperiall hauing passed Lambray; they made their approaches to the Castell S. Angelo, which hauing his situation betwene Loda and Pauia, would haue giuen great impediments to the course of victuals that were brought from Loda to their campe: it had not bene at their deuotion and in their power: Pirrhus, the brother of Federike de Bosolo lay there in garrison with two hundred horse, and eight hundred footmen, and the king not many dayes before, to the end he would not rashly commit his people to daunger, had sent to visite and consider the place the same Federike and Iames Chabanes, who brought report that that strength and garrison sufficed for the defence of the place: but experience made it knowne immediatly after, how farre they were deceiued in their reckening, for assoone as Ferdinād d'Amalo made his approaches with the regiments of Spanish footmen, and had cut off with his artilleries, certaine defences and resistances, the feare of the defendants became greater then their valor, and in those humors of timorous cowardise, they retired the same day into the Castell: and not many howers after (feare hath a vehement operation in the minds it possesseth) they compounded that Pirrhus, Emilio Boriano, and the three sons of Phebus Gonsaguo, should remaine prisoners and all the residue depart the place, without armor and horse, and being sworne not to beare armes for one moneth against the Emperor. In this time the king sent for from Sauona a regiment of two thousand Italian footmen, parcell of those companies that had bin at the siege of Marseilles: but being come vpon the territories of Alexandria neare the riuer of Urba: Gaspar Maine lying there in garrison with a regiment of seuen hundred footmen, issued out of Alexandria with a very slender strength, and set vpon them: he found them very weary with the long way they had made, & without gard, for that they doubted no daunger by reason of which aduantages he disordered and brake them easily, and in their feare being fled within the Castell, they rendred themselues immediately with seuentene Ensignes. There hapned no better successe to the enterprife that was committed to the charge of Iohn Lewis Paluiofin: who, after he was entred with foure hundred horse & two thousand footmen within Casalmajor, where was no wall, but ramparts which he had made, & hauing afterwards won S. Iohn in Croce, he began from that place to make incursions into the countrey, laboring with all the meanes he could to cut off their victuals. By reason of which violences, Francis Sforce lying then within Cremona, leauied with great celerity foureteene hundred footme, and sent them to Casalmajor with certaine troupes of horsemen of the band of Rodolfo Camerino and the horsemen of his gard, vnder the leading of Alexander Bentiuole. As they were drawne neare to that place, Paluiofin repofing confidence in the aduantage of his numbers without tarying for certaine succours of Francis Rangon, issued out the eightene of February and occupied skirmish with them: but he payed a deare price of his rashnesse, & fell by equity into the punishment of his hasty rashnesse, for that in laboring to sustaine his troupes that fought & begā to draw to retraite, he was stricken from his horse and made prisoner, and all his souldiers broken and disperfed. There was also added to the affaires of the French king, this further difficulty of great consequence: Iohn Ia. Medicis of Millan Captaine of the Castell of Mus, whither the Duke of Millan had sent him for the murder he had done of the person of Monsieur Viscounte, hauing placed by night an ambush on the side of the rocke of Chiauenna standing vpon a hill side at the head of the lake, and somewhat distant from the houses of the borough: tooke the Captaine prisoner as he walked without his Castell, & led him presently before the gate of the rocke, where threatning to kill him if he put not the rocke into his hands, his wife in whose presence his life was threatned to death, deliuered vp the rocke. After this first fortune, he caused to discouer another ambush with three hundred footmen with whom he tooke the towne making his entry by the Castell. Whereupon it hapned that the Cantons of the Grisons, taking suspicion vpon that accident, reuoked a litle before the battell, the regiment of fixe thousand Grisons that were in the kings army.

About this time, arriued in the Imperiall army, the knight Casalo, whom the king of England sent thither with great promises: that king beginning to be iealous ouer the prosperity of the French king, & pushed on also with a certaine despite that in the Scottish seas the French had taken

certaine vessels of the English, [threatned manifestly to make warre vpon Fraunce] and in that humour desired the well aduancing of the Imperiall army: in which forwardnesse of disposition, he sent to his Embassador Pace remayning at Trent, to go to Venice, and protest in his name the obseruation of the League; to the which his Maiesty hoped they would be so much the more easily induced, by how much the Emperour had sent to the Viceroy the inuestiture of Francis Sforce with authority to dispose of it by his discretion, and according to the necessity and respect of his affaires. The king of England also solicited the Pope by his Embassador to minister aide to the Emperour in his affaires: but the Pope excused him vpon the capitulation made with the French king for his owne surety, and not offending the Emperour, whereunto he added this complaint, that since the army was returned from Prouence, he was not able in the space of twenty dayes to vnderstand their purposes, nor whether they pretended to defend or abandon the estate of Millan.

But now, litle auailed the treaties and intelligences of Princes, and of lesse seruice were the negotiations and labors of Embassadors, for that by the affronting and approching of the armies, the whole estate of the war, together with the difficulties and daungers sustained for many moneths, were reduced to the fortune and hazard of a very few houres: for the army Imperiall passing further since the taking of S. Angelo, marched and lodged the first day of February at Vistarino, and the second day at Lardiraguo and S. Alexis beyond the litle riuer of Lolono: alodging distant from Pauia foure miles, and from the French campe three miles. The third of February they marched towards the gate of S. Iustine, the place of their incamping being stretched out betweene Prati, Treueno, la Motto, and a wood on the side of S. Lazarus, places within two miles and a halfe of Pauia, within halfe a mile of the French vauntgard, & not halfe a mile from the rampiers & trenches of their camp: by reason they were so neare affrōted one the other, they escaped not without their feuerall damages by the artilleries. The Imperials commanded Belioyense, with all the villages & country that lay vpo their backs, except S. Colombin where lay a garrison of French, but so straitly besieged as no person could issue out. They found within S. Angelo & Belioyense great quantities of victuals, and to haue more plenty and abundance, they labored to command Tbesin, as they did Paw, by the commodity of which they gaue impediment to the French victuals. They held Saint Crosse, and albeit the French king at that time when he went to incampe at Mirabel had abandoned the Charterhouse, yet they forbore to go thither, least their market of victuals should be cut off. The Frenchmen kept S. Lazarus, but the fury of the artilleries of the enemies put them in feare to abide there. There was betweene the two campes a litle brooke or riuer of running water called Vernacula: his head or spring was within the parke, and from thence making his course in the middest betweene S. Lazarus and S. Peter in Verge, hath his fall afterwards into the riuer of Tbesin: This brooke the Imperials to the end they might come on with lesse difficulty, labored to passe, as a matter of great importance: but they found a valiant defence made by the Frenchmen, hauing both the ayd of the channell which was very deepe, and the commodity of the shores or bankes that were very high. By which impediments there was no possibility of passage without great difficulty: euery one with that art & care that the perill required, fortified their lodging and quarter: The kings lodging had in front, in backe, and in the left flanke, thicke and huge ramparts, enuironed with ditches & fortified with bastillions: & on the right flanke was the wall of the parke of Pauia, which was supposed to make the lodging very strong: The lodgings of the Imperials carried the same forme of fortification, hauing also the liberty of the whole countrey from S. Lazarus drawing towards Belioyense, euen vntill the riuer of Paw, which ministred to them great abundance of victuals. Betweene the ramparts of both the one & other lodging, was no more distance than xl. pases, and the bastillions so neare neighbours, that the small shot played in great liberty. These two armies were thus lodged and incamped the eight day of February: and albeit they lost no time in skirmishing, yet euery one kept himselfe within his fort, not willing to do any thing to his disaduantage: The Imperiall Captaines made their reckening, that they had gained much til that day being approached so neare Pauia, that if it came to a day of battell, they might be aided with the garrisons that were within the towne: And because the souldiers within Pauia suffered want of munitions, the Imperials ventred to send in fifty horsmen, euery one carying in croupe or behind him, a litle bag full of powder: who taking by night the way of Millan, and obseruing the instant wherein their campe by a token giuen should giue the alarme to the Frenchmen, they got safely into Pania, their fortune being nothing inferiour to their valor. Antho. de Luna made many sallies out of the towne, bringing with him in diuerse maners many harmes & domages to the enemies, in one of which sallies he charged those that had the gard of the borough of S. Lanfranke, whom he did not only defeate & breake, but also with the same felicity tooke from them three peeces of artilleries, & foure wagons laden with munitions. In this condition it was wonderfull to behold what was the study, the industry, & perpetuall toyle of body & mind of the Marquis of Pesquero, who omitted no oportunitie wherein occasiō was giue to vex the enemy, sometimes prouoking the with skirmishes, sometimes traueilling the with alarmes, & neuer ceassing to keepe them awaked either with vndermining, intrenching, or raising of mounts to annoy them. They caused to erect a cauallier or mount vpon the channel: & for that the Frenchmē with two peeces of artilleries planted vpon S. Lazarus, made dangerous executiō of those that wrought vpō it, they planted there certaine peeces which reuerfed the sayd place of S. Lazarus & compelled the French to abandon it. And as the artilleries of this cauallier annoyed them much, so also they were no lesse beaten by another mount or cauallier which they had made within Pania. Besides, the Spaniards had so fortified themselves with bastillions & ramparts, & other preparatiues defensue, that they had great meane to greue the French Campe, without receiuing much offence themselves: for which cause the Frenchmen remoued their artilleries to beate them in the flanke, the Spaniards not ceassing for all that to aduance & come on, & to win aduantage by footmeale: & in this estate of proceedings in such a neare neighborhood & affronting of the armies, the skirmishes were very rise, wherein the Frenchmen for the most part caried the worse: & yet the practises and negociatiōs of truce did nothing cease, being cōtinually solicited by the Popes Nuncios resident in both the armies: to whom were adioyned many of strait familiaritie & fauor with the king, who ceased not to admonish him, the Popes counsell also concurring, that to auoyd so great a perill it were his best to retire his army frō before Pania, by which meane the victory could not but fall vpō him with facility, & without effusion of blood, the rather by the necessities of the enemies, suffering the great want of mony. The xviij. dayes of February the souldiers within Pania made a sally, & charged the regiment of John de Medicis, who gaue them a braue repulse, & with no lesse valor compelled them to retire: but immediatly afterwards as he returned to shew to the Admiral the place of the incounter, with relatiō of things as they passed, certaine loose shot lurking in a house, gaue him a wound with the bullet a litle above the heele which brake the bone, for the curing of which hurt he was constrained to be caried to Plaisance. This was an vnfortunate hurt, or else vnhappily chanced on that mā, for that like as immediatly after his wounding, the fury of the french campe in skirmishing and assaulting began to diminish & abate, so it seemed to giue to them of Pania a greater and more ready resolutiō, for that their sallies were more familiar and furious, in which vehement inclination they burned the Abbey of S. Lanfrank, & ceased not fiercely to execute the Frenchmē, taking aduantage of the diminution of their courage & fortune. In so much that the night betweene the xix. & xx. day of February, the Marquis of Pesquero issuing out with a regiment of three thousand Spanish footmē, assaulted the French bastillions, and winning the ramparts, he slue more then five hundred footmen, and cloyed three peeces of artilleries.

It was now not possible to the Imperiall Captaines any longer to maintaine their army in that place, for want of money: They considered also that if they should breake vp and retire, the estate of Pania would not onely remaine desperate, but also there would be left little hope to be able to defend their other peeces which they possessed in the Duchy of Millan: There was also in them all a wonderfull confidence to obtaine the victory, both for the resolution and valour of their souldiers, and also through the infinite disorders in the French armie, and the insolent departing away of diuerse of their footemen, in so much as the bodies to fight did not by farre aunswere the numbers that were inrolled in their pay-bookes. Therefore partly to determine these difficulties, and partly to follow the humour of their hopes, the night before the five and twentieth of Februarie, a day dedicated by the Christians to the Apostle Saint Matthias, and also the day of the Natiuitie of the Emperour, they detemined to march to Mirabell, where lay incamped certaine companies of horfemen and footemen. In this march they stood vpon this intention, that if the Frenchmen moued, then they had set at libertie the siege of Pania: and if they moued not; then to aduenture the fortune of the battell. Therefore the better to aduance this determination, all the beginning of the night they gaue many alarmes, the more to keepe trauelled travell'd and weary the Frenchmen, making semblance as though they would charge them on that side towards Paw, Thesin, and S. Lazarus, and about midnight every souldier by the commandement of the Captaines, put on a white cassakin over his armour to be knowne from the Frenchmen: they were cast into two squadrons of horsemen, & foure of footemen in the first were six thousand footemen equally compounded of Launceknights, Spaniards & Italians: This Squadron was led by the Marquis of Gnast: the second stood onely upon certaine bands of Spanish footemen under the charge of the Marquis of Pesquero: the third and fourth Squadron were of Launceknights commanded by the Viceroy and the Duke of Barbon: they arriv'd at the Parke wals certaine houres before day, and by the working of their Masons and ready wils of their souldiers, they cast downe to the earth threescore fadom of wall by which breach being entred within the Parke, the first Squadron drew towards Mirabell, and the residue of the army tooke the way to the campe. As soone as the king understood that they were entred the Parke, thinking they would draw to Mirabell, he issued out of his lodging to fight in plaine and open field, desiring to draw the battell rather to that place then to any other, for the advantages which it gave to the horsemen: he commanded to turne the artilleries towards the enemies, which beating them in flanke, brought great damage to the arcaregard: but in the meane while, the battell of the Imperials gave a furious charge upon the kings Squadron which ordinarily was the battell, but as the Spaniards went, it was the arcaregard. The king fought valiantly, and sustayned with great courage the violence of his enemies, who with the fury of their harquebuziers constrained his men to give ground, untill the rescue of the Swissers came, when the Spaniards were repulsed as well by them as by the horsemen that charged them in flanke. But the Viceroy being called in by the Marquis of Pesquero, who brought to the fight his Launceknights, they were easily broken, not without great slaughter of the Swissers, who that day did nothing answer the opinion of valour which aforesometimes they had wont so honorably to expresse in battels. The king kept alwayes the middle of the battell, being environed with a great gard of men at armes, & albeit he did what he could to containe and confirme his people, yet after he had fought long with his owne hands, his horse being slaine under him, himselfe lightly hurt in the face and in the hand, he was stricken downe to the earth and taken prisoner by five souldiers that knew not what he was. In which misfortune the Viceroy pressing into the throng, his Maiesty disclosed himselfe to him, who, with great reverence kissed his hand and receiv'd him prisoner in the Emperors name. At the same time the Marquis of Gnast with the first Squadron, had defeated the horsemen that were at Mirabell, and Anthony de Lena, who as was sayd, had to that end cast downe to the earth so great a quantity and space of wall, as an hundred and fifty horsemen might sally forth in front, issued out of Pavia, and so charged the Frenchmen behind, that he put them wholly to flight: and in that feare they were almost all stripped and trussed, except the arcaregard of the horsemen, which being led by Monsieur d'Alençon from the beginning of the battell, retired almost whole. It is holden for certaine, that in this battell were slaine more then eight thousand men of the French campe, part by the sword, & part of bodies drowned in the riuer of Thesin seeking their safety by swimming: of this generall number were about twenty of the most noble & apparant Lords of Fraunce, as the Admirall, the L. James Chabanes, the L. Palissa and Trimouille, the Maiter of the horse, Monsieur d'Aubigny, Monsieur de Bussy, and Monsieur de l'Escud, who being taken grievously wounded by his enemies, gave to them his life in steede of a rancome: The prisoners that were taken were the king of Nauarre, the bastard of Sauoy, the L. Monmerancy, Saint Paule, Brion, Aual, Monsieur de Chandion, Monsieur d'Imbercourt, Galeas Viscount, Federike Bossolo, Barnabie Viscount, Guidanes, with many Gentlemen, and almost all the Captaines that escaped the slaughter of the sword: there was also taken prisoner Ierome Leandro Bishop of Brunduſo the Popes Nuncio, but by commandement of the Viceroy, he was eftsloones set at liberty: as also Monsieur Saint Paule and Federike Bossolo committed to the Castell of Pavia, brake prison a little after by the corruption of the Spaniards that had them in charge. Of the Imperials side the vniuersall slaughter exceeded not 700 bodies, and not one Captaine of name except Ferrand Castriot Marquis of S. Angelo. The Marquis of Pesquero was wounded in two places, & Antho. de Lena lightly hurt in the leg. The pray & spoyle of this battell was so great, as there had not bin scene in Italy more rich souldiers. Of so great an army, there was preserued but the arcaregard of 400 Launceknights commanded by M. d'Alençon, they neuer came to the fight, neuer suffred charge, nor neuer were followed, but leaving behind them their baggage, they retired whole to Piemont, their feare making them more hasty to fly, then carefull of their honor. And as one calamity followeth another, so the losse of the battell was no sooner reported at Millan, then Theodor Triunlce who lay there in garrison with foure hundred launces, departed and tooke his way to Musocquo, all the souldiers following him by troupes, inso much as the same day that the king lost the battell, all the Duchy of Millan was made free from the iurisdiction of the French.

The day after the victory, the king was led prisoner to the Rocke of Pisqueon, for that the Duke of Millan in regard of his proper surety, consented hardly that the person of the king should be kept within the Castell of Millan: he was garded with great ieaiousie and watch, but in all other things except his liberty, he was vsed and honoured as appertained to the estate and maiesty of a king.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Pope is accorded with the Emperour. Many practises are made for the kings deliuey. Ierom Moron conspireth against the Emperour. The king is deliuered out of prison and returneth into Fraunce.

IN the booke before, you haue scene set downe the ouerthrow of the French army in the battell of Pania, a wretched successe, where was so great expectation of victory: you haue scene a mightie king deliuered vp prisoner into the hands of him with whom he contended for glory & imperie; a spectacle most tragicall amongst all the calamities that fortune bringeth vpon mans mortality: you haue scene the most part of the Nobility and honourable Captaines of Fraunce slaine in the seruice and presence of their king; a matter that made more lamentable his owne condition and aduersity: you haue scene the residue of that army, so vniuersally perplexed with feare and confusion, that the same thing that should haue retained them in so great affliction, made them the lesse assured and further off from confidence. Lastly you haue scene the loose hearts and pusillanimity of the Swissers, a nation which in the warres past, had fought in Italy with so great name and glory. But the thing that most wonderfully increased the reputation of the victors, was the generall feare and astonishment of all the Potentates in Italy, who looking into the fecility of the Imperials, carying so honourable a victory with so little losse to themselves, could not but make a desperate reckening of their owne safeties. In which astonishment, they set before their eyes all those dangers which either doubt or dispaire could stir vp their feare would not let them hope for the things that reasonably might comfort them: and whatsoeuer their amazed minds suspected, the same did they feare would assuredly happen vnto them. Lastly when they saw themselves disarmed on all sides, and the Emperours forces most mighty in the field without impediment of enemies, they could not but giue a grieuous sentence against their owne estate and condition: and in this confusion they could not be so much assured and comforted by the opinion which many had of the good intention of the Emperour, of his honorable inclination to peace, and of his vertuous mind not to vsurpe the estates of others, as their passions were redoubled by the consideration of their great dangers, most manifest to the eye, and no lesse fearefull to their minds, in which lay suppressed all that resolution and constancy which reasonable men should expresse chiefly in times of aduersities: They doubted least the Emperour, pushed on either by ambition (naturall almost to all earthly Princes) or by insolency (which commonly accompanieth victories) or by the importunate couetousnesse of those that gouerned his affaires in Italy, or lastly set on by the vniuersall perswasions of his Counsell and court: They doubted I say, least in these vehement respects, and in an occasion so sufficient to set an edge vpon the dullest spirit that was, he would dispose his thoughts to make himselfe absolute Lord ouer all Italy: wherein they were not ignorant how easie it is to euery great Prince, but much more to an Emperour of Rome, to iustifie his enterprises with titles appearing comely & reasonable. This feare and astonishment did not onely occupy those Potentates that were of meane force and authority, but also euen the Pope and the Venetians were no lesse trauelled then the others. The Venetians began to call into remorse and conscience, the fault they had committed against the Emperour without iust cause, in not following the capitulations of the confederation: and also the memory of ancient hatreds and iniuries betweene them and the house of Austrich, together with the great warres they had had of many yeares before with his grandfather Maximilian: by which they feared would be reuiued in the estates which they possessed in the firme land, the name and memory of the rights of the Empire which were almost buried and forgotten: as also they cast this coniecture, that whoeuer had any purpose to make himselfe great in Italy, would haue his first recourse to lay plots to embale and pull downe their too much puissance and greatnesse. And for the Pope, his passion was this, that except the maiesty of the Popedome which euen in the times of the auncient reuence that the world bare to the sea Apostolike, was oftentimes ill assured of the greatnesse of the Emperours, he was in all other regards very easie to be endamaged, as being disarmed of forces, depriued of money, the Church in an vniuersall weakenesse for want of strong townes, the minds of the people not vnitd nor firme in deuotion to their Prince, all the free holds and dependances of the Church full of diuisions and factions, the one part being Guelfer, & the other part Gebelins, and the Gebelins by an ancient and naturall impressiō; inclined to the name of the Emperours; and lastly the City of Rome more then all other places, defiled and weakened with these seedes and rootes of diuisions: The Pope also called into care and reckening the estate of Florence, which depending vpon him, and being the very peculiar and ancient greatnesse of his house, it was happy no lesse deare to his heart then the estate of the Church, and assuredly no lesse easie to be inuouated and changed: for as that City, since the passage of king Charles, hauing chased out the family of Medicis, and vnder the name of liberty, was diuolued to a gouernement popular for eightene yeares space, stood so ill contented with the returne of the Medicis, that there were very few to whom indeede was agreeable their puissance and greatnesse: so also the Pope feared vehemently least to so mighty occasions, were added a forward will and desire to offend that late. Wherein also he had reason to doubt that that same desire and enuy was not lesse, not so much for the regard of ambition in the most mighty, from which who is least puissant, is neuer wholly assured, as for feare that for many reasons, his name in that time were not odious to the Emperour: and albeit he made discourses in himselfe how much, both in the life of Pope Leo, and afterwards since he was Cardinall, he had trauelled for the greatnesse of the Emperour, so farre worth as Pope Leo and he with their great expences and dangers, had opened him the way in Italy to so great a puissance, and that for his owne particular, since his election to the Popedome, he had giuen mony to his Captaines, & made the Florentins to contribute during the Admirals being in Italy, without reuoking from his army the regiments of the Church and the bands of Florence: yet, either in consideration of his office, wherein he is a father and pastour indifferent betweene Princes Christian, and rather the author of peace then the nourisher of warres: or else for that he had begunne very lately to suspect and feare such a greatnesse, he was retired, and so giuen ouer to run the same fortune, that neither he would renew the confederation made by his predecessor for the defence of Italy, neither ayde him with money when the yeare before the Duke of Burbon entered with his army into Prouence. And albeit those matters had not giuen the Emperours Capitaines any iust cause to complaine, seeing he was not as yet bound by the League of Adrian to be concurrant against the Frenchmen in the warres of Italy: yet they were beginnings to make him not esteemed the same man with the Emperour, but diminished much of the faith that til that day they had in him, as men who caried onely either by their appetites or by necessitie, thought themselves offended, if, to their particular enterprises dressed to occupie Fraunce, others did not as it were lay to their hands, according to the exāples before of others begun, vnder title to assure Italy against the power of the French. The complaints and displeasures began to discouer themselves at such times as the French K. passed the mounts to recouer the Duchy of Millan: for albeit the Pope according to the cōplaint he made afterwards to the Emperour, by a letter which he wrõte to him, had secretly distributed certaine quantities of mony to the Frenchmen at their returne from Mailles, yet afterwards he had no strait familiaritie or intelligence with them: but as soone as the king had made a conquest of the Citie of Millan, he entred into capitulations with him, taking his reason vpon the good euent and traine of his affaires; of which he excused himself to the Emperour with this allegation, that in that time, his Captaines forbearing to communicate with him any part of their plots or purposes by the space of twentie dayes, and despairing afterwards of the preseruatiō of that state, not without some feare of the kingdome of Naples, for that the Duke of Albanie drew with his regiments towards Tuscane: he was constrained to looke to his surety, and yet neuertheless the regard of his proper daunger did not so much cary him, but that he did accord with conditions no lesse fauourable and providing for the Emperours affaires then his owne, and did refuse very great offers which the French king tendred, to the end to make him enter into the alliance ioyntly with him. And yet neuertheless these excuses had not such operation, but that the Emperour and his Captaines were much troubled, not so much for that they saw themselves wholly depriued of hope to haue any more succours of him, as for the doubt they had that the capitulation containd not some further matter then the obligation of neutrality. Besides, they construed that in all sortes he had giuen too great reputation to the enterprise of the Frenchmen, and had this further feare also, least the Pope were the meane that the Venetians were not brought to follow his example; a matter which afterwards was discerned to be true by certaine letters and billes found in the kings tent after the victorie. Lastly the Pope had kindled these suspitions and discontentments when he consented that the munitions lent by the Duke of Ferrara to the French king when he lay afore Pauia, should not onely passe through his lands, but also he gaue ayde to the conduction of them. But much more were these quarrels broached at such time as the Duke of Albanie went to the enterprise of the Realme of Naples, not onely for that he was receiued and honored as a friend along all the estates of the Church and the Florentines, but also he stayed certaine dayes about Sienna to reforme at his instance the gouernment of that city; which albeit was the cause to prolong the Dukes voyage into the realme of Naples, and that it was a matter solicited principally by him to that end, as being a thing troublesome to him, that vpon one man should be layd the iurisdiction of Naples & Millan: yet the Imperials in that respect had made an interpretation, that betweene the French king & him was a further bond, then a simple promise not to offend one another. So that it was not without good reason that the Pope did not only feare together with the other Potentates, to be inuaded by the Imperials vpon euery concurrence of time and occasion, but also he had his feare particular, that without expecting an opportunity more great, they would bring on their fortune presently euen to set vpon the estate of the Church, or to execute some action against the common-weale of Florence. But the thing which more redoubled his feare, was, that the Duke of Albanie as soone as he was aduertised of the kings calamity, retired from the Mount Rotondo towards Bracciano for his safety: and hauing also sent thither a cornet of an hundred and fifty horfmen that were within Rome, whom the Pope caused to accompany him thither for his gard, fearing the preparations which the Duke of Sessa and the Imperials made to defeat the regiments of the Duke of Albanie: and comming from Sermoneta about foure hundred horse and twelue hundred footmen of the bands of the Vrsins, being followed by Iulio Colonna with many troupes of horfmen and footmen, it hapned that he ouerthrew them at the Abbey of tree fountaines, who flying for their safety into the City of Rome, where they entred at the gates of S. Paule and S. Sebastian, the bands of Iulio entred with them pellmell, and in their rage killed diuerse of them in the field of Flora and other places of the City. Vpon which occasion the whole City drawing into tumult tooke armes, first with a great feare, and afterwards with no little indignation of the Pope, for the slender regard and reuerence that was

giuen to his authoritie: but in such a doubt and generall trauell of mind, he had occurrant the counsels and offers of the Venetians, who being of themselves entred into the like feire, laboured to perswade him with no small instance, that by their common aide and meanes there might be procured to descend into Italy with all speede a regiment of ten thousand Swissers, and calling also into their pay another Colonie of Italians, they might ioyne in grosse to oppose against so manifest and huge daungers: wherein they promised for their parts (which is their ordinary custome) farre greater things then they are wont to obserue: they alleaged that it was many months since the Launceknights within Pania had hene payd, who seeing since the victory the same difficulties of payment to continue, were become mutinous, and seazing vpon the artilleries, were drawne into a setled strength within Pania: that because the Captains had no mean to make good their paiement, all the residue of the armie was drawne into tumult, & murmured euery day more and more: in so much as both he and they falling speedily into armes, both their common estates were assured, and the occasion was entertained by the which they would of themselves fall into disorder, being no lesse imbarcked into those difficulties, then constrained to keepe continually great forces for the guard of the king that was prisoner. To this they added, that there was no doubt that the Ladie Regent through whose hands passed the gouernement of Fraunce, and in whom was no small desire to further that vnion, would not onely make march at their instance the Duke of Albanie with his regiments, and the foure hundred Launces of the arearegard reserved of the battell: but also would induce the vniuersall consent of the kingdome of Fraunce to be concurrant for the safetie of Italy, with a great summe of money, as knowing that thereupon depended the greatest part of their hope to recouer the king. Lastly, they vrged this deliberation to be good and necessarie, if it were with the same speede put in execution: but to deferre and temporize, were to giue meane to the Imperials to reduce their condition and reordor themselves, the rather for that whosoever tooke not a resolution to enter into armes, stood in case of constraint to compound with them, and to giue them money: which was no other thing then to become an instrument and meane to deliuer them from all their difficulties, and submit themselves wilfully vnder a yoke of perpetuall subiection. Moreover they put him in hope, that the Duke of Ferrara would follow them, who like as both for his ancient dependancy of the French, and for the aide which in that war he had administred to the king, was not without his feare: so also his coniunction seemed of no litle importance, no lesse for the commoditie of his estate in the warres of Lombardie (Ferrara being a verie strong towne) then for his great store of munitions and artilleries, and (as the brute went) for his right huge wealth of gold and siluer. But neither the hope to ouercome an enterprize so hard and dangerous, which with wise men ought to carie no litle care and impression, nor the consideration of perils furthest off and remoued, to the which time is wont to bring those remedies which the wit of man could not find out, nor anie other thing of what propertie or operation soeuer, could not encline the Pope to open his eares to such speeches and perswasions, had not a feare to be inuaded presently, induced him to lay himselfe downe rather to the daunger least certaine, then to the perill that seemed most assured and most present: and therefore the practises were so farre aduanced betweene them, and they staying vpon nothing but to set downe the capitulations by writing, there was expectation from houre to houre to contract and accord: in so much as the Pope, who perswaded himselfe of the conclusion, dispatched in post to the king of England, Ieronimo Ghinuccio a Siennois, and Auditor of the Apostolike chamber, whose commission was to labour to dispose the king to oppose his forces against such a greatnesse of the Emperour. In the verie instant of this expedition, arriued with good oportunitie the Archbishop of Capua, his ancient Secretary & Counsellour, and for many yeares of great authority with him: he as soone as he was aduertised of the victorie of the Imperials, departed from Plaisance, & went to the campe of Don Charles de Lauro Viceroy of Naples, and being resolved of his intention, he tooke post horse to go to the Pope, to whom he caried an assured hope of accord: for at that time the Viceroy and the other Captaines were occupied with two thoughts and perplexities: the one to provide money to content the armie, which for want of pay they saw began to decline into manifest confusion: the other, to carie the person of the French king into such a place, as the difficultie to gard him should not keepe them in continuall care and feare: which two things being established, they iudged them to stand in degree and condition alwayes able to execute and put to effect their purposes. In which respect they desired accord with the Pope, pretending thereby to draw from him a great quantity of money whereunto seeking to dispose him the rather by feare, and also in relieuing the estate of Millan, which was almost waisted with the burthen of souldiers, they sent to lie vpon the countrey of Plaisance foure hundred men at armes and eight hundred Launcelknightes not as enemies, but alleaging sometimes the pouertie of the Duchie of Millan to be farr vnable to nourish so great an armie, and sometimes threatening to make the march vp to the terrace of Rome to seeke out the Duke of Albany, if the regiments of men of warre that had bene leauied by the Vrsins were not retired and dissolued. But these industries and diligences were superfluous, for that as soon as the Pope was assured to auoid the dangers present, he left there all his other thoughts and disposed his mind wholly to the accord: in which inclination concurring also the reasons & counsell of the Archbishop, he sent after the Auditor of the chamber, to countermaund him backe againe. And to take away all occasions that might hinder the accord, he wrought so that the Duke of Albany dispersed his whole armie, except those bands of footmen & horfmen that were of beyond the Mounts: he lodged the Duke within Corneto, after he had on the other side receiued promise of the Emperours Commanders, to giue leaue also to their souldiers that lay vpon the passages of Rome, and cause to stay Ascanius Colonno with the other companies that came from the kingdome: he also was an interposer with the Colonnois, beginning to molest the lands of the Vrsins, to defist and depose armes.

The Pope both desired and did all he could to bring the Venetians comprehended within the accord which he solicited with the Viceroy, but the only difficultie that resisted was, that they refused to pay so much money as the Viceroy demanded of them: for he required of them so much money as had bene spent in the warre, to the which they ought to contribute, and that hereafter they should make their contribution not with men, but with money: the like demaund did he also make to all those that were comprehended in the confederation made with Adrian: but it made well for the Pope that the Venetians shewed themselves hard and strait, because they put the Viceroy in suspicion that they layd for new stirres and commotions: and whilest these matters were negotiated with a verie assured hope of conclusion, the Florentines by the Popes ordinance sent xxv. thousand duckets to the Marquis of Pesquero for the entertainment of the armie, hauing first receiued promise from Iohn Bart. de Gattinaro who negotiated with the Pope for the Viceroy, that that summe should be parcell of the principall summe which was to be paid to him by vertue of the new capitulation. And not many dayes afore the resolution and conclusion of the said capitulation, the Duke of Albanie, who for his returning into Fraunce had taried for the Nauie at sea, which being now come, and also the Galleys that were sent him, he embarked himselfe in them together with the Galleys of the Pope, which were sent to him by consent of the Viceroy, and had neuertheless no safe conduct, neither for the one nor for the other: Ranse de Cere was imbarked with him, together with the artilleries which he had had from Sienna and Lucqua, and foure hundred horse, a thousand Launcelknightes, with a very smal troupe of Italians, the residue of the regiments being retired and gone away by troupes: the residue of the horses were partly sold, and partly left there. It was discerned clearly by the dealing and proceeding of the Duke of Albany, that the purpose of his sending thither, was either to diuert the Imperials from the Duchie of Millan for feare of the kingdome of Naples, or else through that feare to induce them to accord, and as wel for that cause he had marched slowly, as for that the forces which the king had giuen him, were not sufficient for such an enterprise.

But at last leauing out the Venetians, the confederation was concluded within Rome the first day of Aprill, betwene the Pope and Florentines on the one part, and the Emperour of the other, for whom the Viceroy vnderooke, being his Lieutenant generall in Italy, & for the Viceroy, Iohn Bart. de Gattinaro, nephew to the Emperours chiefe Chauncellour, being in Rome with full and ample commission. The effect of the capitulations most importing was this: That betwene the Pope and the Emperour should be a perpetuall amitie and confederation, by the which both the one and the other should be bound to defend with a certaine proportion of men the Duchie of Millan, being then possessed vnder the name of the Emperour by Frauncis Sforce, who was named as principall in this capitulation: That the Emperour should take into his protection all the estates which the Church held, together with those which the Florentines possessed, and particularly the house of Medici, with all the authoritie and preheminences which that familie held held in that Citie: That the Florentines should pay presently an hundred thousand duckets, for recompence of their part of contribution in the last warres, by vertue of the league made by Pope Adrian, which the Emperour pretended not to be dissolued by his death, for that it was manifestly expressed vpon the capitulations to endure one yeare after the seuerall death of the confederates: That the Imperials should retire their forces from off the Church estates, and not to send afterwards any bands of souldiers to harbour or lodge there without the Popes consent. There was place left for the Venetians to enter into this consideration within the terme of twentie dayes vnder reasonable conditions, which were to be dedared by the Pope and the Emperour. Moreouer, it was accorded, that the Viceroy should be bound to bring in within foure moneths the Emperours ratification to all these capitulations: and those that were delegates and deputies for the Viceroy, were bound seuerally to a capitulation confirmed by oath, that if the Emperour within the said time did not ratifie the said capitulations, the Viceroy should repay ouer againe the said hundred thousand duckets: and yet so long as they were not repayed, the league should haue his full obseruation, to the which were added these three articles, not being any of the text of the capitulation, but set downe in articles apart, and confirmed also by oath: That in all causes and actions of benefices of the realme of Naples, it should be permitted to the Popes to vse the same authoritie and iurisdiction as was disposed by the inuestitures of the kingdome: That hereafter the Duchie of Millan should make all their prouision off salt from Cernia, according to the price and order which had bene afore time couenanted betweene Pope Leo and the French king now raigning, and confirmed in the capitulation which the sayd Pope Leo made with the Emperour in the yeare a thousand five hundred twentie and one: That the Viceroy should so worke and labour, as the Duke of Ferrara should immediatly render to the Church, Reggio, Rabiera, with such other townes as he had taken during the vacation of the Sea by the death of Adrian: and that in consideration thereof, the Pope as soone as he should be repossessed of them, should pay to the Emperour an hundred thousand duckets, and at the first request to be made to him, to absolue the Duke of Ferrara of the censures and priuations which he had incurred, but not of the penalty of an hundred thousand duckats, which he had promised in case of breaking the bond made with Adrian: and yet neuerthelesse after the Pope had recouered possession, there should be search and examination made in law, whether those townes, together with Modena, appertained to the Church or to the Empire: and if they were found to be the rights of the Empire, then they should stand holden and recognized in chiefe of the Emperour, and otherwise to remaine free to the sea Apostolike.

This deliberation of the Pope was diuersly interpreted, according to the diuersity of mens passions and iudgements: but especially did varie the construction of the popular sort, to whom such counsels as cary the sayrest shewes seeme commonly more acceptable and pleasing, then those that are digested with good maturity of reasons: the common people also according to their lightnesse and credulity, do for the most part esteeme for wise and noble, such men as measure things not by discretion and experience, but by affection and light relation. There were also some that professed to desire the liberty of Italy, who blamed the Popes dealing, as though through pusillanimity and infirmity of courage he had let slippe the occasion to vnite it against the Emperour, and to deliuer himselfe from all disorders: but most men of deeper iudgement and insight in matters of state, were of another opinion: They saw how farre it had bene from wise counsell, to oppose resistance with new companies against so glorious and victorious an army: They considered by how many reasons the comming of the Swissers might be long and dilatorie, and with what difficulties they should passe notwithstanding they were ready to descend: and yet wayghing with their custome and inconstancy of their nature, the fresh wound which they had so lately receiued, there was no assurance of their comming. These wise-men sawe also that there was no better hope or expectation on the French side, either for that by reason of so great an ouerthrow they stood depriued both of courage and counsell, or else there remained no prouision of money, nor any supply of men of warre to refutnish the bands (those few that escaped the lamentable slaughter of the battell being so spoyled of their furniture and baggage, that they stood in neede both of time and money to readresse them: so that this vnion carryed no other foundation apparant or probable, then a naked hope that the army of the enemies would not come on nor moue for want of money: a matter which though it came so to passe, yet they remayned not for all that depriued of the Duchie of Millan, which so long as it stood at the deuotion of the Emperour, the Pope could not be without a perpetuall occasion of feare: and yet that hope was not without his vncertainties, for that it drew with it this feare, that the Captaines, either by their authoritie, or by their pollicie, or lastly, by propounding to the souldiers the sacke of some rich towne of the Church or of Tuscane, would dispose the armie to march: & of this inclination was discerned this manifest tokē, that one part of the Launce knights to seeke a place of harbor of more benefite & conueniency, were passed the riuier of Paw, & come vpon the lands of Parma and Plaisance: in so much as if they had any intētion to passe further; it could not be but all remedies would come too late, and also so great a deliberation was grounded with too great a danger, vpon a bare hope of the disorders of the enemies, who neuerthelesse had it in their power & will to rid themselues out of their disorders. Then the counsell of the Pope seemed discret & well considered according to the time that then ran, but it had haply bene more commendable, if in all the articles of the capitulation he had vsed the same discretion, and disposed his wit rather to close vp and make whole all the wounds of Italy, then to open and make sharpe any one of consequence: wherein he had wisely imitated the order of the skilful physicians, who when the remedies they prepare to cure the indisposition of the inferiour members, augment the malady of the head or the heart, they throw away all care of griefes and infirmities most light, and with the fauour of time they proceede carefully to the cure of that which most importeth and carieth most necessity of remedy for the safetie and good health of the patient: but the better to explaine and signifie such a matter, it is necessarie we descend more deeply into the discourse of one part of those things which we haue set downe seuerally here and there, and reduce them into one place and order.

The rights and pretensions of the family of Esse.

They of the family and house of Esse, besides that they haue bene possessed of long time vnder the title of the Vicars of the Church, of the iurisdiction of Ferrara, were Lords also for many yeares of Reggia and Modena by vertue of inuestiture from the Emperours, for that in those times there was none that called into doubt why those two cities were not subiect to the Empire: they were enioyed peaceably vntill Pope Iulio the second (he whose custome was to recouer the ancient titles and rights of the Church, long buried with tract of time, and vnder shadow of piety, was the author of many ills) began the warre with Duke Alfonso, to reduce wholly Ferrara vnder the obedience of the Church: by the occasion and accidents of this warre, the Pope tooke from him Modena, & at the beginning retained it for himself, as though together with all the other townes euē to the riuier of Paw, it had appertained to the Sea Apostolike, as being part of the partage or diuision of Rauenma: but a litle after he gaue it to the Emperor Maximilian for feare of the Frenchmen, and yet he ceased not for all that the warre against Alfonso, but tooke from him afterwards Reggia: yea, it was beleueed that (in that humour of authority and ambition) if he had liued longer, he would haue depriued him also of Ferrara: not that he accompanied his action with equity, but for the hatred and enuy he bare to Alfonso, wherein he not onely sought to couer his ambition with piety, pretending vnder that pretext to recouer to the Church all that he could find had bene holden by her in any time: but also vnder such a shadow, he pushed on the disdain he had to Alfonso, for that he followed rather the amitie of Fraunce, then depended of him: yea in this malicious disposition was haply concurrant the vnappeasable hatred which he bare to the memorie and reliques of Alexander the sixt his predecessor, whose daughter called Lecrece had bene married to the Duke Alfonso, of which mariage were procreated many children. The said Pope Iulio left by his death to his successors not only the succession of Reggia, but also the same thirst and desire to get Ferrara, whereunto they seemed to be inclined, for the glorious memorie he had left of himself to posteritie: for which reason that ambition was more mighty in Leo his successor, then the regard to the greatnesse which the house of Medici had in Florence, on whose behalfe it seemed more profitable that the puissance of the Church should diminish, then to haue it made more redoubted to all her neighbours, by annexing of Ferrara to it: and indeed after he had bought Modena, he disposed his spirits and studie wholly to the getting of Ferrara, & that more by practise and ambushes then with force open & disclosed, for that it wold haue bene an enterprize of too great difficulties, since Alfonso by the consideration of his owne dangers, fortified himselfe on all sides, & made plentifull provision of artilleries & munitions, and as the brute went, had confirmed his strength with huge proportions of wealth & treasure: it may be his hatred were greater then the hatreds of Iulio, euen so were they managed with more secrecie and subtilty: wherein besides many plots which he layd to take Ferrara, either by surprize or by fraud, he passed such manner of obligations, with those Princes, that he made alliance withall, that at least they were restrained to hinder him in this enterprize: that held him, not only during the life of Luian his brother, and Lawrence his nephew, for whose greatnesse and exaltation it was thought he was caried with that ambition, but also euen after their death: yea he was so ouer-ruled with that running desire, that many were perswaded that thereupon proceeded his last deliberation (more then discrete) to knit with the Emperour against the French king: insomuch that by necessity Alfonso was constrained to satisfie the French king (being his only founder & hope) in making warre vpon them of Modena, at such time as the armies of Pope Leo & the Emperour held Pavia besieged: in which warre, albeit he had received a verie ill successe, yet he had bene reduced into more greater difficulties, if Pope Leo, euen amid the course and dayes of his victories, had not bene called into the other life by sodaine death; an accident which assuredly chaunced no lesse aptly and conueniently to him & to his affaires, then the death of Iulio. And it may be doubted, whether at last Adrian that was successor to Leo, was not infected with that property of couetousnesse, although both for his new creation, and want of training in the affaires of Italy, he gaue him absolution of the Censures in the verie first times of his coming to Rome: he granted him also of new the inuestiture of the Duchie, with permission to retaine all that he had possessed during the vacation of the Sea: he brought him also into a generall hope to make restitution of Modena & Reggia, although after wards vpon better information of the estate & condition of things, he well expressed how farre his will was estranged from his promise. But by the creation of Pope Clement, Alfonso entred into a great feare to returne eftsouones into the same dangers wherin he was intangled before: he tooke his reason of this feare, for that if things had happily succeeded with Clement, the same propertie of disposition would haue bene found in him, which had alwayes followed Iulio and Leo: but as the occasion was not yet ripe for Ferrara, so he made his next practise and preparation to haue againe Reggia & Rubiera, as an enterprize of more facilitie, and better to be iustified by the late possession which the Church had of them, and as though in that regard he could not but beare dishonour and infamie, to leaue them vnrecovered. Vpon which selfe suggestions & reasons, he tooke occasion both in many other sorts afore, and lastly in the capitulation with the Viceroy, to occupie his memorie with that deuise more often then manie desired: who as they looked into the daungers hanging ouer euerie mans head by the greatnesse of the Emperour, and to breake the same, saw no better remedie then a ready and generall vnion of all the estates of Italy together, that the time might cut out occasions & necessities euerie day to take armes. So they iudged it a better course for the Pope not to stirre and kindle the Duke of Ferrara, and much lesse to put him into necessity to seeke his rescue betweene the armes of the Emperour, against whose forces, whose fortune, & whose felicities, the time gaue them no power to oppose: & for the particular of the Duke, he was a Prince rich, which in conference of actions and enterprises, is not of the least consideration, and for his training and experience, well able to foresee and auoyd; a vertue most commendable in a Prince, whether his case be to defend or offend. Besides, as well for the congruencie of his estate, as for his other conditions, the present diuisions and conspiracies of the time, required rather to cal him into affection and assurance, then to leaue him perplexed with hatred or feare: and yet it may be doubted, whether to do benefite and pleasure to one perswaded that he hath receiued iniuries, be sufficient to wipe out of a mind ill disposed and full of iealousie, the memorie of wrongs and offences, specially when the pleasure is done at a time, when it seemes to proceedes more by necessitie then of good will.

After this capitulation was resolved, the Pope not to omit any conuenient office to so great a Prince as the French king, by permission of the Viceroy, sent the Bishop of Pisfoya to visite and comfort him in his name: there past betweene the king and him but generall speeches, and that in the presence and hearing of Captaine Alarcan, wherein he chiefly besought the Pope to make some good solicitation for him to the Emperour: he asked him also, in such secrecie as the licence of a prisoner would suffer, what was become of the Duke of Albanie, and was answered to his great grieve, that one part of his armie being broken and retired, he was returned with the residue into Fraunce. In these times they of Lucqua accorded with the Viceroy, who receiued them to the protection of the Emperour, vnder condition of ten thousand duckets: by whose example also the inhabitants of Sienna contracted with him for fiftene thousand duckets without binding him to maintaine more the one forme of gouernement then the other, for that of the one side, the family of Montenono, who at the instance of the Pope, and by the meane of the Duke of Albanie, had resumed the authority, which neuerthelesse was not as yet well confirmed: and on the other part, those who by the profession they made to desire liberty, were commonly called Liberlines, tooke heart by reason of the battell of Pania, and would not endure the pollicie & gouernment induced by the forces of the French king: both parts sent messengers to the Viceroy to incline him, and to worke him favorable to their seuerall doings, and receiuing from him no certaine resolution touching the forme of gouernment, they ioyned both together and solicited readily composition: which being established and set downe, and the men arriued whom the Viceroy sent to receiue the money, it hapned both in their presence and in the very action of counting the money, that Ierome Senerino a Citizen of Sienna, who had bene sometime with the Viceroy, flue Alexander Dichio, both chiefe of the new gouernment, and also to whom the Pope had assigned at that time the whole reputation: the residue of the Citizens of faction and conspiracy with him, vpon that alarme tooke armes, concurring with them the commotion and confociation of the populars, being ill contented that the pollicie should estsoons returne vnder the yoke of tyranny: in which vniuersal emotion and rising they chased out the Chieftains of the family of Montenono, and reducing the Citie to a reformation, they readdressed estsoones the gouernment popular, being both enemie to the Pope, and adherent to the Emperor. It was beleueed that this alteration of pollicie was either done directly with the priuie of the Viceroy, or at least not without his great allowing & approbation, seeing it brought no litle commodity to the affaires of the Emperor, to haue at his deuotion that Citie, which for her forces is very mighty and puissant, for the oportunitie of her ports and hauens, of great regard for marine enterprises, for her fertility of countries very rich and plentifull, for her neighbourhood to the realme of Naples, verie congruent and apt, and for her situation betweene Rome and Florence not of least respect and reason to fauour his affaires, and yet both the Viceroy and Duke of Sessa had giuen hope to the Pope not to alter the gouernment introduced with his fauour. There were many other townes in Italy, who taking example of the inclination of them of Lucqua and Sienna, followed the fortune of the victors: amongst these was the Marquis of Montferat, who compounded for fiftene thousand duckets: & the Duke of Ferrara made a loane to the Viceroy of fiftie thousand duckets, vnder promise to haue them repaid if they did not capitulate together: he tooke his reason of that loane vpon the present condition of his affaires which could not be established so speedily, both for the respects they bare to the captulation made with the Pope, and also for the necessitie to vnderstand first the will of the Emperour: but with the money of that loane, together with a hundred thousand duckets, which were promised from the Duchie of Millan, and the imposition of Sienna and Lucqua, together with some proportion of treasure sent to Genes by the Emperour for the supportation of the warre (which neuerthelesse came after the victorie) the Captaines set downe the payes of the armie according to the rate and quantitie of the money that came, meaning to pay the souldiers for all that was past, and to send backe from hand to hand the Almaines into Germanie: so that no tokens appearing that there was any intention at that time to follow the course of the victorie against any man, since the Viceroy both had ratified the capitulation made with the Pope according to his request, and also had put in negociation at the same time a new appointment with the Venetians which hee greatly desired. The eyes of euery man were set to beholde with what propertie of affection the Emperour would receiue his glad some newes, and to what endes his thoughtes were disposed: who so farre as exterior demonstrations made shew of, expressed great tokens of a mind much moderated, and verie apt to resist easily the prosperity of fortune: yea the signes and inclinations appearing seemed so much the more incredible, by how much he was a Prince mightie and young, and as yet had neuer tasted but of felicitie: for after he was informed truely of so great a victorie, whereof he had the report the tenth of March, together with letters of the French kings owne hand, written rather in the spirit and condition of a prisoner, then with the courage of a king: he went forthwith to the Church to make his holy oblations to God with manie solemnities, and the morning following he receiued with signes of right great deuotion the Sacrament of the Eucharist, and so went in procession to our Ladies Church out of Madriil, where was his Court at that time.

The moderation and temperance of the Emperor vpon the newes of the victorie.

His temperance and moderation was about the expectation of his estate, and farre contrary to the custome of the time in matters of that nature: for he would not suffer any belles to be rung, nor bonfires to be made, nor any other manner of publike demonstrations: such as are vsed for glorie or gladnesse, alleaging with a minde more vertuous then insolent, that such propertie of feasting and reioycing was due to victories obtained against Infidels, but thought to haue no shew where one Christian ouercame another: neither were the actions and gestures of his person and speeches differing from so great a temperance and continencie of minde, which he well expressed in the answers he made to the congratulations of the Embassadors and great men that were about him: to whom he sayd he was not glad of the accident according to the glorious operation of flesh and blood, but his reioycing was in that God had so manifestly ayded him; which he interpreted to an assured signe that he stood in his grace and fauour, though not through his owne merite, yet by his celestiall election: both for that he hoped now to haue occasion to reduce Christendome to peace, and to prepare warre against the Infidels, and also to haue meane to do good to his friends and to pardon his enemies: he said that albeit he might iustly appropriate to himselfe the whole victory, for that the helpe of none of his friends did concur in the action, yet he was contented so great a prosperitie should runne common to them all without any separation of glorie. Wherein after he had heard the Embassadour of Venice, who iustified afore him the seruices done by his common weale, he sayd to such as stood about him, that though his reasons and iustifications were not true, yet he would both accept them and repute them for true: and after he had continued certaine dayes in these speeches and demonstrations full of wisdom and moderation, he called his Counsell together; to the end that according to his obseruation and custome, nothing were proceeded in, which were not well measured with maturitie of reasons and counsell: He required them by a manner of proposition, to aduise him in what sort he was to deale with the French King, and to what endes he was to adresse and dispose his victorie, commaunding them all to deliuer freely in his presence their seuerall opinions. Amongest them the first place of speaking was referred to the Bishop of Osimo his Confessor, who reasoned in this manner.

It is not vnknown to your excellent Maiestie, that God hath authoritie to dispose all things, by the same power wherewith he hath created them of nothing: and albeit all accidents and mortall euentures what so euer falling in this inferiour world, take their proceedings and dayly mouings of the prouidence of the eternall God, yet we finde it oftentimes more especially declared in some nature of things then in others, as manifestly hath appeared vpon the successe of your present victorie: for, both for the greatnesse of the glorie gotten, which is the most honourable end and reward of warre, and for the facilitie of the victorie, which iustificeth the innocencie and goodnesse of your cause, and also for your happinesse to haue subdued enemies most puissant and better prepared for the warre then you, by which your valour and felicitie shineth with a clearer light, I thinke it can not be denied, that in the action hath not bene expressed an especiall will of God drawing almost to a miracle: Therefore by how much the eternall God hath layd this great blessing vpon you both manifestly and publikely, by so much more stand you tyed in obligation and office both to acknowledge it with humilitie and submission, and by demonstration to declare how thankfull you are for it. This is the sacrifice that God requireth at your hands, and to this calleth you the consideration of the benefite, and your Christian pietie: the action whereof consisteth principally that you adresse your victorie to the exaltation of the seruice of God, which is the end for the which you ought to beleue that he hath throwen it vpon you. And for my part, when I looke into what termes and degrees the estate of Christendome is reduced, I see no way more holy, more necessarie, nor more agreeable to God, then to worke an vniuersall peace betwene the Princes of the imperie and regiment of Christendome. Wherein I am so much the more touched in conscience, in office, and in calling, by how much I discern by the generall face and shew of things, that without peace, both religion and all her lawes and rules, and faith which mortall men repose in it, together with all obseruation of the commaundements of God, which is the foundation of our Christianitie, are sliding into manifest ruine. Your Maiestie is not ignorant, how on the one side we haue the nation of the Turkes, who besides they haue wrought great things vpon the Christians by our owne discords & diuisions, do now manifestly threat the kingdome of Hungary which appertaineth to

 " assuredly they will take if the Christian Princes do not draw into one vnitie and amitie together,
 " the way is made open to them to carie the whole Monarchie of Germanie and Italie ; a losse
 " irreparable, and no lesse tyed to a perpetuall infamie to the name of Christian Princes ; then
 " the seruitude and yoke of barbarisme will be alwayes intollerable to the generall posteritie of all " Christian soules . On the other side we haue the infection of Lutheranisme , so flaunderous to " those that haue power to oppresse it , and so dangerous for the spreading it makes in all partes,
 " that if it be not restrained , the world is in hazard to be replenished with Heretickes ; there
 " is no other remedie for that euill, then by your authoritie and puissance , which yet you can not " aduance for the cure of this maladie , so long as you stand embarked in other warres . But
 " be it , that for the present there were neither feare of the Turkes , nor daunger of Heretickes,
 " yet to a Prince professing pietie and charitie , what can be more fowle ; more sinfull , or " more to be abhorred , then for our passions , and emulation of ambition , to liue in a confu" sion of so much Christian blood , which either with greater glorie might be spent in the quar" rel of the faith of Christ , or at least with better oportunitie be reserued for times more neces-" sarie . The warres that you now prosecute, draw after them a bottomlesse gulfe of violations and " whoredomes , an infinitie of sacrileges and blasphemies , and a world of other impious and " execrable deedes ; such as who so euer is a voluntarie authour of them, can not but stand in a
 " weake estate of grace or hope of pardon at Gods hand , seeing that if necessitie leade him into

 " euils so speedily as he hath the meane . It is not good to be the authour of euill , but we are es" pecially bidden to beware to continue in those euils which our conscience doth assure vs to of" fend God : so that this ought to be the end of your Maiesties thoughtes and counsels , and the " especiall marke whereat you haue to shoote , to reduce the Princes and Potentates of Christen-
 " dome to an vniuersall peace, as a matter most honourable , most holy , and most necessarie ; for
 " the maner and reall effecting whereof , your Maiestie may take three deliberations touching the " French king : The first to keepe him a perpetuall prisoner : The second to deliuer him friend" ly and brotherly without other conditions then such as may induce betweene you a perpetu-
 " all peace and amitie , and tende to cure and readdressse the harmes of Christendome : The " third , to exact by his libertie as great a profite as you can . Of these , two of them in my o" pinion do augment and prolong the warres : but the third which is his absolute libertie in ami-
 " tie and brotherhood , is the onely remedie to remoue the warre , and resist for euer all moti" ons and occasions to renew it : for it is not to be doubted, but that the French King (for so sin" gular a liberalitie as the free benefite of his libertie) will remaine more assured to you in minde

 " shall runne a league of true vnion and concord , all other Christian Princes will embrace recon" ciliation and agreement , and by your vertuous example ; will labour to reclaime to the bodie
 " of Christendome , such members as liue now in separation . But if you make a resolution to de-
 " taine him alwayes in prison , besides the apparant crueltie in the act , which is contrarie to
 " the pietie of a Christian Prince ; and besides the imputation of ignoraunce touching the muta" bilitie of fortune , which in matters of victorie draweth deepe consideration , you shall nou" rish the seedes of mutuall warres betweene you , which no doubt will grow increasing and mul" tiplying to the indifferent ruine of you both : for in so doing you will make the world clamorous
 " against your vehement thirst after the crowne of Fraunce or some member thereof, and driue him
 " in reason and equitie to rise into new warres , to resist so great an ambition . And to chuse the " way to deliuer him vnder capitulations for your most profite and aduantage , can not be but " the worse way, and an election more daungerous then both the others : for , make what alli" ance you will , what capitulations you can, and what obligations you thinke good , yet by how " much you seeke to tye his liberty to such conditions, by so much will he take occasion to be more
 " & more your enemy, wherein he shall neuer want the assistance and companie of all those Princes
 " whom whom he can induce to be iealousse ouer your greatnesse . In cases of iealousie and emulation „ for imperie and estate , it is hard to containe the courage of man , though in all other occasions „ nature hath assigned him an ordinarie bridle and restraint : and such is mans infirmitie , that „ when the heart is possessed of the iniurie , the whole body is caried with a violent motion to the „ passion of reuenge . I am not ignoraunt how farre this opinion differeth from the tast of ordina- „ rie men , neither how new it is to their eares , nor how little confirmed with examples : but „ I know againe how much it agreeth with the Maiestie of the Emperour to dispose his minde „ to deliberations extraordinarie and singular : such as the conceptions and capacitie of other „ men can not reach vnto , whom if your Maiestie exceede in dignitie , you ought by so many „ degrees to surmount in magnanimitie , which will not onely leade you to the merite and effect „ of true glorie , but also it will open your sacred eyes to discerne what greate comelinesse it „ brings to you to pardon and vse liberalitie , then to punish and be couetous in getting . By this „ your Maiestie shall know that God hath not giuen you in vaine , yea almost miraculously , the „ power to reduce the world to a peace : and that it appertaineth vnto you , after so many victo- „ ries , after so many graces and blessings throwen vpon you by the goodnesse of God , and after „ you haue brought so many Princes prostrate at your feete , to proceede no more in the person „ of anemie to any man , but to prouide in the affection of a common father , for the safetie of „ all men . That glorie is vniust that is purchased with the iniurie of another , and nature hath „ sown in man as well seedes of equitie and clemencie , as of iniurie and furie . The magnanimitie „ which Alexander the great and Iulius Caesar haue shewed in pardoning their enemies , and „ restoring kingdomes to those they had vanquished , hath made their names more glorious , then „ their infinite victories and many triumphes : whose example it importeth most those men to „ follow , who not making glorie their onely end (though it be a right great reward) do desire „ principally to do that which is the true and proper office of euery Christian Prince . But to the „ end to conuince such as measure humane things onely with humane endes , let vs consider fur- „ ther if there remaine yet any other deliberation more conformable then this ; For my part I be- „ leeue , that in all the greatnesse and soueraigne estate of your Maiestie , there is no part more „ wonderfull nor more worthy , then this commendation and glorie , that you haue stood till „ this day inuincible , and haue guided all your enterprises to a most happie end , drawing with it „ both felicitie and reputation : which as you can not but interprete to be the most precious iewell , „ and most singular treasure that God hath indued you withall , so he hath left to your Maiestie „ no better way to establish it , nor fitter meane to assure and conserue it , then in leauing the „ warres with an end so honourable and worthie , to take out of the handes and power of for- „ tune the subuersion of your glorie gotten , and to reduce from the middest of the sea to the port „ of safetie , this vessell loaden with marchandise of value inestimable . It belonges to wise men not „ to referre euen soones to the arbitrement of fortune , the things which they haue once atchieued by „ their valour and wisdom : and this hath bene alwayes an obseruation with wise men , that the „ greater their fortune was , the lesse did they trust it . But let vs passe further , there is no man doub- „ teth that that greatnesse which is preserved willingly is not more agreeable , then that which is „ maintained by violence , for that it is so much the more stable , so much the more easie , so much the „ more agreeable , and so much the more honorable : If your Maiestie bind the Frēch king to you by „ so great a liberalitie , and by so great a benefite , will it not be the proper degree to put vpon you the „ absolute authoritie & iurisdiction both of himselfe and his kingdome ? If you giue to the Pope and „ other Princes so manifest a certaintie , that you are cōtēted with the states which you haue , & that „ you liue in a speciall care and watching ouer the vniuersall safetie of Christendome , will not they „ remaine without suspition ? Yea hauing no more to feare you , nor nothing to quarrell with you , „ they will not only loue you , but they will honor in your person so great a bountie . By this meane „ you shall draw to you the hearts of mē , which are not to be subdued by fiercenesse , you shall giue „ lawes to all nations for that they see you deuided from ambition , and by this meane shal you dis- „ pose more Christians with good wil and authoritie , then with forces & subiection . By this meane „ being followed and aided of all men , you shal haue good oportunitie to turne your armes against „ the Lutherans & Infidels , with greater glory & with more occasion of greater conquestes . Which „ I know not why they should not be also desired in Affrike , in Greece , or in Lenant , seeing that as „ you haue had so great facilitie to amplifie your dominion amongst the Christians , & the puissance „

" of your Maieſtie ſo augmented, that it is almoſt become terrible to them all , ſo when they ſhall
 " ſee your purpoſes extended further, and your ambition breake out of limit, all the world will con-
 " ſpire by neceſſitie againſt you, whom they finde armed with a minde ſo prejudiciall to their libe-
 " tie. In all times, in all climats, and to all natures, ſeruitude hath bene hatefull , and libertie ſweete
 " and acceptable: the Pope feareth your power, the Venetians tremble vnder your puiſſant hand,
 " your forces haue put all Italy into aſtoniſhment, and by the tokens that are diſcerned, it is credi" ble that the king of England enuieſh your felicitie : you may for certaine moneths entertaine the " Frenchmen with faire hopes and vaine practiſes , but in the end, either the king muſt be deliue-
 " red , or they muſt be ſent backe deſperate : if they reape diſpaire, they haue reaſon to conſpire
 " againſt you with all the confederates they can procure : and if you deliuer the king with conditions
 " of little profit to your Maieſtie, what ſhall you winne, to loſe the occaſion to uſe ſo great a magna" nimitie? which if you expreſſe not at this beginning, when afterwards you would ſhew it, it will
 " haue neither prayſe, glory, nor the like grace : if you tie to his deliuerie couenants that bind him
 " to your profite and commoditie, he wil not obſerue them , for that no ſuretie that he ſhall giue
 " you can ſo much import him , but that it will import him much more not to haue his enimie to " become ſo great as afterwarde he ſhall not be able to oppreſſe him : and ſo ſhall we haue ei" ther a peace vnprofitable , which ought to be farre from the deliberation of your Maieſtie , or " elſe warres verie daungerous , whole end is as vncertaine as the action is iealous . Beſides , the " chaunge of fortune is to be feared of him to whom ſhe hath giuen ſo long a fruition of felicitie,
 " and much more grieve and heauineſſe by the ill ſucceſſe of things , is to be doubted of him who " hath had power to aſſure them : Thus haue I ſatiſfied the commaundement of your Maieſtie,
 " though not with grauitie and wit that was expected , yet with affection and fidelitie according " to a ſubiect , beſeeching God to inſpire you with the election of that deliberation , which " may be moſt acceptable to his will and agreeable to your glorie , and alſo be moſt conducible
 " to the benefite of the common weale of Chriſtendome , of the which both for your ſupreme di" gnitie , and correſpondencie of the diuine will of God , there is neceſſarily transferred to your
 " perſon the name of patron and protectour.

The opinion of the Duke of Alba touching the kings impriſonment.

This Oration was heard of the Emperour with great attention , and yet he made no declaration by any ſigne or geſture, whether he allowed or condemned it: but giuing the ſigne to the re-ſidue to ſpeake, Federike Duke of e Alba, a man of great authoritie with the Emperour, roſe vp & reaſoned in this ſort: There be in the ſoule of man two principal powers neceſſarily concurring to
 " every good action, the vnderſtanding and the will, of both which wiſedome is the full perfection:
 " The one we neede not doubt to be the free gift of God , and the other we may aſſure to be bred
 " in nature: the one an inſpiration to leade vs to the knowledge of things, & the other a diſpoſition
 " carying vs to the operation and action of the ſame , and they both no other thing then the effect " of that perfection which is referred to wiſedome: And as this wiſedome deſcended by grace, and " is not giuen by nature, ſo yet in the adminiſtration of worldly things, we ſee it both much holpen
 " and well confirmed by learning and induſtrie . In which reſpect (right ſoueraigne Emperour) I " pray to be excuſed, if my iudgement differ not from the common iudgement of others, and if by
 " the facultie of my ſpirite I be not capable to pierce ſo deepe as the vnderſtanding of others can " not reach vnto: yea I hope to deſerue more commendation, if in my counſels I perſwade you to " follow the ſame way which your fathers and elders haue alwayes taken : for albeit counſels new
 " and without uſe , at the firſt ſight may haply bring with them glorious ſhewes and apparances,
 " yet no doubt in the end they are found to draw with them more daunger and deceite , then ſuch
 " as being meaſured by reaſon, example and experience, haue bene in all times approued by gene-
 " rall ſentence of all men: yea all things are put to aduenture, that are done by raſhneſſe and not by " reaſon . Your Maieſtie hath receiued principally by the will and working of God , and second" ly through the valour of your Captaines and armie , the greateſt victorie that in many ages hath
 " bin transferred to any Chriſtian Prince : but the chiefe fruite to vanquiſh conſiſteth in the well
 " ſing of your victorie, and who ordereth not his felicitie ſo, incurreth a farre greater infamy, then if " he knew not how to vanquiſh. Greater is the fault of that man who ſuffreth himſelfe to be decei-
 " ued by thoſe things which he holdeth in his owne power, then by ſuch as depend vpon the arbi" tration or fortune : ſince for the moſt part whom fortune doth bring to belecue in her , ſhe " maketh them more deſirous of glory, then apt to receiue it, or able to gouerne it . Your Maieſtie hath

hath to take heede to enter into any deliberation which in the end may bring shame to others & repentance to your selfe : and by how much the importance of this negociation is great, by so much doth it call your Maiestie to proceede with great aduise in your resolutions, in which the faults that are once committed, can not be corrected. If you once deliuer the French king, you can no more retaine him but so long as he remaineth your prisoner, it is alwayes in your power to giue him libertie. In cases of captiuitie he that hastily enfreeth his enemie, worketh to himselfe the occasion of his owne harme : and therefore it can not but be an iniurie to obiect your slownesse to set him at libertie, since the King knoweth in his owne conscience how he would vse the Emperour if he were his prisoner. Truly it was a great felicitie to take the French king, but in conference & comparison of things, it would proue a far greater infelicitie to let him go. I hope your Maiestie is not ignorant, that follie and rashnesse haue no societie with wisdom, nor fortune no communitie with good counsell, and therefore touching the deliberation of his deliuerie, it ought to be debated with grauitie of counsell, calling to you a long assistance and course of times I might happily change this opinion, if I saw any reason to perswade me, that the king being presently deliuered, would reasonably acknowledge the benefite according to the consequence of it, and that the Pope & the other potēates of Italy, would be brought to lay away together with their suspicions, all their couetousnesse and ambition: but who knoweth not how dangerous it is, to ground and establish a resolution of so great importance vpon a supposition both vntrue and vncertaine: the consideration of the condition and maner of mortall men induceth the contrarie, for that ordinarily there is nothing endureth so litle a season as the remembrance of benefites receiued, and the more greater they be, the more commonly are they recompenced with ingratitude, for that he that either can not or will not make them good with recompence, seeketh oftentimes to deface them with forgetfulnesse, or at least to make the lesse, by perswading that they were not so great: and as to some men it is a more shame to cōfesse a fault, than to do it, so, we haue seene many who being reduced to such necessitie as they haue stood in neede of a benefite, do yet receiue it with mindes grudging and not contented : in whom commonly hatred beareth more rule for the remembrance of the necessitie wherein they were fallen, then the obligation and thankfulness which ought to follow the fauour and benefite that was done vnto them. Moreouer there is no nation vnder the couer of the skie to whom insolencie is more naturall, and lightnesse more familiar, then to the Frenchmen: and where is insolencie, there is inconsideration: and where is lightnesse, there is no knowledge of vertue, there is no iudgement to discern of the actions of others, nor grauitie to measure that which concerneth themselves: then what other thing may we hope for in the French king, for his custome so insolent, and for his greatnesse so proud and hawrie, then that he burneth with rage and disdain to be prisoner to the Emperour, at a time when he looked to triumph ouer him: he will keepe alwayes before his eyes, the remembrance of this infamie, and being deliuered, he will neuer beleue that the meane to quench it, is to be thankfull & acknowledge, but in struing to be superiour, he will perswade himself that you let him go for the difficulties to hold and retaine him, and not through your bountie and magnanimitie: Such is for the most part the nature of men, and such hath bene alwayes the condition of the Frenchmen, from whom who looketh for a constancie or magnanimitie, expecteth a renouation and new rule in humane things: so that in place to haue peace, and to reorder the regions of Christendome, we shall see rise vp, warres, both more doubtfull and more daungerous then those that are passed, such as for their confederacies will be intollerable, and for their calamities horrible. The reason of these is, for that your reputation will be lessened, and your armie, which now expecteth the fruite due vpon so great a victorie being deceiued of their hopes, will haue no more the same vertue, nor your affaires followed with the same fortune : who if she be hardly holden by him that retaineth her, much lesse will she tarie with such as chase her and driue her away: she hath a freewill to come & go when she list, & is not stayed by the power of mortall Princes, whom with other earthly creatures nature hath made subiect to the law of reuolution & change: neither haue you reason to repose any thing in the bountie of the Pope, or the modestie of the Venerians, for that repenting themselves to haue suffred you to go away with the victorie past, they will seeke to cast blocks in your way for going any further, wherein will be concurrant the present feare they haue of you, which wil cōpell them to oppose against your new fortunes & victories to come: yea where you haue now in your power to hold all men bound and astonished, your selfe with a dissolute bountie will be he that will vnbind them and giue them hart: I know not what is the will and resolution of God, neither do I thinke others can reach to the knowledge of it, for that we are made assured by the Scriptures that his iudgements are secret and deepe. But if it be lawfull to interpret matters by coniecture, which is the onely way to comprehend things to come, I see many tokens that God fauoureth your greatnesse: neither can I beleue that he extendeth his graces vpon you in so great abundance to the end you should dissipate and dissolue them of your selfe, but thereby to raise you and make you superiour ouer others, as well in effect, as you are in title and right: and truly to loose so rare an occasiō which God doth send you, would be no other thing the to tempt him, and make you vnworthy of his grace. In cases of conquest and victorie, Princes are hardly contented with that which occasion doth offer, for that the things which they winne first do not satisfie them, so long as they hope to get better. Reason hath alwayes taught, & experience doth well confirme it, that seldome do those things draw good successe which depend vpon the counsels of many: by which argument I doubt whether he measure rightly the nature of the world, who beleueueth that he is able to roote out the Heretikes, or suppress the Infidels, with the vnion of many Princes. They be enterprises that haue need of a Prince so mightie and great, as to be able to giue lawes and rules to others. If that be not obserued and considered, they will haue their passage hereafter with the same successe, wherewith they haue passed in times before: for this cause do I beleue that God hath cast on you so great victories, and for the same reason hath opened you the way to the whole Monarchie, which onely may make you able to bring to passe so great and holy effectes: to the which it is not amisse that you be slow to giue the first beginnings, to the end to accomplish them with more better and more certaine foundations. Let not the feare of so many puissant leagues and confederations as are contracted against you, estrange you from this deliberation, for that both the occasion which you retaine in your hand is sufficient to aduaunce it, and also if things be well negociated, the Kings mother, for her affection to her sonne, and for the necessitie to recouer his liberty, wil neuer cast off her hopes to redeeme him of you by accord. Besides, the Princes of Italie will neuer enter vnitie with the gouernment of Fraunce, knowing that it remaineth alwayes in your hand, setting the King at libertie, not onely to separate him, but also to turne him against them; a matter which as for the time it will keepe them in astonishment and suspence, so in the end it must needs come to passe, that they must be the first to receiue lawes of you, and then it can not be but an action full of glorie, to vse towards them clemencie & magnanimity, euen when matters shall be reduced to that estate and degree, as they can not chuse but acknowledge you for superiour. Such was the maner of dealing of Alexander and Cesar, who were forward and liberall to pardon iniuries, and not slow and inconsiderate to readdress their estate of themselves, amid those difficulties and daungers which they had already surmounted: he that doth so, deserueth prayse, for that he doth an act which hath verie few examples; but that man can not but beare notes of imprudēcie & indiscretion, who doth that which hath no law of example nor rule of time. By these reasons I am bold to induce your Maiestie to draw of your victory as great a profit as you can, and alwayes vsing towardes the King those offices and oblations that appertaine to him, either to send for him into Spaine, or at least to haue him conueyed to Naples: and for aunswere of his letter sent to your Maiestie, it were good to returne to him some speciall man to visite him with wordes full of grace and hope, and withall to propound vnto him conditions of his deliuerance, such as (vpon more particular consultation) may be worthie recompences and rewardes of so great a victorie. In this sort your foundations being layed, and your thoughts extended to these endes, the time and the operations and accidents thereof, will make either more quicke or more slow, the deliuerie of the King, and will also beget occasiōs of peace or warre with the Italians, whom for the present you may entertaine with good hopes: so shall you with art and industrie augment the fauour and reputation of armes, and auoyding to tempt euery day a new fortune, we shall be prepared and readie to accord either with this Prince or with that common weale, either with all together or with one in particular, as occasiōs and accidents shall induce vs. These be the wayes which wise Princes haue alwayes followed, and particularly those who haue left to you the foundatiōs of such a greatnesse: They were neuer curious to reiect occasiōs that made to raise them higher, nor slow to push on the fauour of fortune when they saw her well disposed: to you belongeth the interest of their example, as of right appertaineth vnto you that which in any of them might seeme to be ambition. Your Maiestie must remember that that you are a Prince, and that it is one office in your calling to follow the trace of Princes, much lesse that any reason either diuine or humane perswadeth you to leaue the occasion to relieue and redresse the authoritie of the Empire vsurped and defaced, seeing all lawes of God and nations bind you by strait obligation, to arme your courage and intentions to recouer it rightfully: occasions are precious if they be executed in the ripenesse of time, but being foreflowed, they turne to the preiudice of those that hoped in them: your Maiestie must be iealous ouer them, knowing how easily they are lost, and with what difficultie they are recovered: you must not be curious to make your profit of them, nor doubtfull to aduance them when you see they draw with them a correspondencie of time, of place, and all other circumstances helping to your enterprises: You are not to make your foundation vpon the bountie or wisdom of those that be vanquished, seeing all mortall men draw with them their corruptions, and the whole world is full of infirmitie and error: dignities and greatnesse are the effectes and rewards of valour, and where is a resolute mind to execute, there neuer wanteth a good fortune to establish and confirme. Lastly, seeing the estate of Christendome can not be defended by any other meane then by your greatnesse, it is a iust office in your Maiestie, to lay to your hand though not for the interest of your owne authoritie and glorie, yet for the seruice of God, and zeale of the vniuersall benefite.

This Oration was heard with a wonderfull fauour and inclination of the whole Councell, in whom, for the authoritie of the man, and for the spirite and efficacie of his reasons, might be discerned an vniuersall impression of ambition almost to the whole Empire of Christendome. There was not one amongst them, who without replie, did not confirme his opinion, which the Emperour also approued, though more for colour not to seeme to swarue frō the counsell of his friends, the in disclosing what was the propertie of his inclinatio. Monsieur Beauvain, by office his great Chamberlaine, and by fauour verie gracious with him, was dispatched both to impart with the Capitaines of the army, the Emperours deliberation, and also to visite in his name the French King, and to propound to him the conditions by the which he might obtaine his deliuerance: he tooke his way by land, for that the Kings mother had made free and open all passages for messengers and curriers to come and go to the Emperours Court, for the more easie and safe negociation of her sonnes affaires: and so together with the Duke of Burbon and the Viceroy, he went to Pisqueson, where the King remained as yet: There he offered him his libertie; but with so vnequall and heauie conditions, that the verie hearing of them was intollerable to the King: for, besides the resigning of all his titles and rights which he pretended in Italie, the Emperour demaunded to haue rendred vnto him the Duchie of Burgondie as appertaining to him in proper, and to giue to the Duke of Burbon Prouence, with all the dependencies thereof; and he required besides, as well for himselfe as for the King of England, other conditions of verie great moment. It seemed the vertue of the king had ouercome the aduersities of his imprisonment: for, to the Emperours demaunds he answered constantly, that he had rather offer vp his life in prison then to depriue his children of any part of the Realme of France, and though he should consent to a composition so preiudiciall, yet it was not in his power to execute it: for that the auncient traditions and constitutions of Fraunce did not suffer alienation of any member or apertenancie to the crowne without the consent of the Parliaments, and others in whose hands rested the authoritie of the whole kingdome, and who in like cases had bin alwayes wōt to preferre the vniuersal safetie of the maine bodie of the realme, afore the particular interest of the persons of their Kings: That if they would demaund conditions which were in his power to performe, they should finde him most ready to ioyne with the Emperour, and to fauour his greatnesse: but such was his desire of libertie, that here he ceased not to offer conditions diuers, making no difficultie to graunt large parts of other mens estates, without promising any thing of his own. This was in effect the summe of the things he accorded: He offered to take to wife the Emperours sister, a late widow by the death of the king of Portugall: He made confession that he would hold Burgondie as in dowrie, and that it should appertaine to the children issuing of that marriage: That he would restore to the Duke of Burbon, the Duchie that had bene confisked from him, enlarging it with some other estate: That in recompence of the Emperours sister who had bene promised to the Duke, the King would giue him in marriage, his sister a late widow by the decesse of Monsieur d'Alençon: That he would satisfie the King of England with money, and pay to the Emperour a great treasure for his ransom: That he would resign vnto him his interests and rights in the kingdome of Naples and Duchie of Millan: That he would send to accompanie him both with a nauie by sea and an armie by land, at such time as he would go to Rome to take the crowne Imperiall, which was as much as if he had promysed to giue him in pray the whole Monarchie of Italie. Beaurain returned with these capitulation to the Emperour, to whom went with him also Monsieur Montmorancie, a personage then verie agreeable to the King, and afterwarde great Maister of Fraunce, and at last by the Kings libertie, indued with the dignitie of high Constable of Fraunce.

and feares of Fraunce for the imprisonment of the king.

But now let vs say somewhat of the sorowes and feares of Fraunce: After they were possessed of the newes of the ouerthrow of the armie, & taking of the King, there ranne through the whole kingdome an vniuersall astonishment and confusion: for, besides the incredible sorow which the accident of the Kings imprisonment brought to that nation, naturally verie deuout and louing to their Kings, there appeared on all sides infinite mournings and heauinesse, as well publike as priuate: priuate men lamented and made sorrowes apart, for that as well of the Court as of the Nobilitie, there were verie few who had not lost in the battell, their children, their brethren, or other their parents and friends of marke: they wept and could not be comforted, because they iudged their sorrow could not be greater then the qualitie of their losse: and in the publike and generall bodie of the realme might be discerned nothing but an vniuersall face of desolation and dispayre, euerie one crying out of so great a diminution of the authoritie and glory of so flourishing a realme: a perplexitie so much the more grievous and intollerable to them, by how much naturally they are hawtie and presuming of themselves. In this estate of aduersitie they set before their eyes all that feare and dispayre could imagine: They doubted least so great a calamitie were not the beginning of a further ruine and subuersion: They saw their King prisoner, and with him either take or slaine in the battell, the Chieftaines of the kingdome, which in the imagination of their sorowes they held a losse irreparable: They beheld their Captaines discomfited, and their souldiers discouraged; a calamitie which stopped in them all hope to be readdressed or reassured: They saw the Realme naked of money and treasure, and enuironed with most mightie enemies, an affliction which most of all caried their thoughts into the last cogitations of desperate ruine: for the King of England, notwithstanding he had holden many parleys and treaties, and shewed in many things a variation of minde, yet not many dayes before the battell, he had cut off all the negociations which he had entertained with the King, and had published that he would descend into Fraunce if the things of Italie tooke any good successe: so that the French men feared least in so great an oportunitie the Emperour & he would leaue war against Fraunce, either for that there was no other head or Gouvernour then a woman and the litle children of the King, of whom the eldest had not yet runne eight yeares accomplished: or else because the enemies had with them the Duke of Burbon, for his owne particular a puissant Prince, and for his authoritie in the realme of Fraunce verie popular and strong in opinion, a mightie instrument to stir vp most daungerous emotions. Besides, the Lady Regent, as well for the loue she bare to the king, as for the dangers of the realme, was not without her passions both proper & particular: for being full of ambition, and most greedie of the gouernement, she feared that if the Kings deliuerie drew any long tract of time, or that any new difficultie hapned in Fraunce, she should be constrained to yeeld vp the administration of the Crowne to such as should be delegate and assigned by the voyces of the kingdome. Neuerthelesse amid so many astonishments and confusions, she drew her spirites to her, and by her example were recomfited the Nobles that were of counsell with her, who taking speedy order to man the frontiers of the Realme, and with diligence to leauy a good prouision of money: the Lady Regent in whose name all expeditions and dispatches went out, wrote to the Emperour letters full of humility & compassion, wherein she forgot not by degrees vehement & inducing to solicit a negociation of accord, by vertue whereof, hauing a litle after deliuered Don Hugo de Moncado, she sent him to the Emperour, to offer him, that her sonne should renounce and disclaime from all rights of the kingdome of Naples and the estate of Millan, with contentment to referre to the censure and arbitration of the law, the titles and rights of Burgondie, which if it appertained to the Emperour, he should acknowledge it for the dowrie of his sister: That he should render to Monsieur Burbon his estate together with his moueables and goods which were of great value, and also the fruits and reuenues which had bene leauied by the commissioners deputed out of the regall chamber: That he should giue to him his sister in marriage, and deliuer vp to him Provence, if iudgement of the interest and right were made of his side: and

For the more facilitie and speedie passage of this negociation, rather then for any desire she had to nourish her inclination to the warre, she dispatched immediatly Embassadors into Italie, to recommend to the Pope and the Venetians the safetie of her sonne: to whom she offered, that if for their proper securitie they would contract with her, and raise armes against the Emperour, she would for her particular aduance five hundred launces, together with a great contribution of money. But amid these trauels & astonishments, the principall desire aswell of her as of the whole Realme of Fraunce, was, to appease and assure the minde of the King of England, iudging truely that if they could reduce him to amitie and reconciliation, the Crowne of Fraunce should remaine without quarrell or molestation: where, if he on the one side, & the Emperour on the other, should rise in one ioynt force, hauing concurrant with them the person of the Duke of Burbon, and many other oportunities and occasions, it could not be but all things would be full of difficulties and daungers. Of this the Ladie Regent began to discern many tokens and apparances of good hope: for notwithstanding the King of England immediatly after the first reports of the victorie, had not onely expressed great tokens of gladnes & reioycing, but also published that he would in person passe into France, & withall had sent Embassadors to the Emperour to sollicite & treat of the mouing of warre ioyntly together: yet proceeding indeede with more mildnesse then was expected of so furious shewes & tokens, he dispatched a messenger to the Ladie Regent, to send to him an expresse Embassador: which accordingly was accomplished, & that with fulnes of authoritie & comission, such as brought with it also all sortes of submissions & implorations which she thought apt to reduce to appeasement the mind of that King so highly displeased: he reposed him selfe altogether vpon the will and counsell of the Cardinall of Torke, who seemed to restrain the King and his thoughts to this principall end, that bearing such a hand vpon the controuersies and quarrels that ranne betweene other Princes, all the world might acknowledge to depend vpon him and his authoritie the resolution and expectation of all affaires. And for this cause he offered to the Emperour at the sametime to descend into France with a puissant armie, both to giue perfection to the alliance concluded betweene them before, & also to remoue all scruple & ialousie, he offered presently to consign, vnto him his daughter who was not as yet in an age and disposition able for mariage. But in these matters were verie great difficulties, partly depending vpon him selfe, and partly deriuing from the Emperour, who now shewed nothing of that readinesse to contract with him which he had vsed before; for the king of England demaied almost all the rewards of the victory, as Normandie, Guyen, and Gascoigne, with the title of king of Fraunce: and that the Emperour, notwithstanding the inequalitye of the conditions, should passe likewise into France, & communicate equally in the expences & dangers. The inequalitye of these demaundes troubled not a litle the Emperour, to who they were by so much the more grieuous, by how much he remembred that in the yeares next before, he had alwayes deferred to make warre euen in the greatest dangers of the French king: so that he perswaded himself that he should not be able to make any foundation vpon that confederation: and standing in a state no lesse impouerished for money & treasure, then made wearie with labours and perils, he hoped to draw more commodities from the French king by the meane of peace, then by the violence of armes and warre, specially ioyning with the king of England. Besides, he made not that account which he was wont to do of the mariage of his daughter, both for her minoritie in age, and also for the dowrie for the which he should stand accomptable for so much as the Emperour had receiued by way of loane of the King of England: he seemed by many tokens in nature to nourish a wonderfull desire to haue children, and by the necessitie of his condition, he was caried with great couetousnesse of money, vpon which two reasons he tooke a great desire to marie the sister of the house of Portugall, which was both in an age able for mariage, and with whom he hoped to receiue a plentiful portion in gold and treasure, besides the liberalities of his owne peoples offered by way of beneuolence in case the mariage went forward: such was their desire to haue a Queene of the same nation and language, & of hope to procreate children. For these causes the negociation became euery day more hard and desperate betweene both those Princes, wherein was also concurrant the ordinarie inclination of the Cardinall of Torke towards the French King, together with the open complaints he made of the Emperour, aswell for the interests and respects of his King, as for the small reputation the Emperour begā to hold of him: he considered that afore the battel of Pania, the Emperour neuer sent letters vnto him which were not written with his owne hand, and subscribed, your sonne and Cofin Charles; but after the battell, he vsed the seruice of Secretaries in all the letter he wrote to him, infixing nothing of his own hand but the subscription, not with titles of so great reuerence & submission, but onely with this bare word Charles. In this alteration of affection of the Cardinall, the King of England tooke occasion to receiue with gracious wordes and demonstrations, the Embassadour sent by the Lady Regent, to whom he gaue comfort to hope well in things to come: and a litle afterwarde, estrauing his minde wholly from the affaires which were in negociation betweene him and the Emperour, he made a confederation with the Lady Regent contracting in the name of her sonne, wherein he would haue inserted this expresse condition, that for the kings ransome and deliuerie, should not be deliuered to the Emperour any thing that at that time should be vnder the power or possession of the crowne of Fraunce.

This was the first hope which fell vpon the Realme of Fraunce, and this was the first consolation in so many aduersities, which afterwarde went on increasing by the disorders of the Imperials in Italie: They were become so insolent for so great a victorie, that perswading themselves that all men and all difficulties should yeeld and giue place to their will, their glorie made them loose the occasion to accord with the Venetians, and gaine say things which they had promised to the Pope, and lastly brought them to fill full of suspitions both the Duchie of Millan and all the other regions of Italie: and so going on to sow seedes of new innovations and troubles, they reduced the Emperour to this necessitie, to make a rash deliberation, dangerous for his estate in Italie, if his auncient felicitie and the hard fortune and destinie of the Pope had not bene of greater force: Matters assuredly most worthy of a knowledge particular, to the end that of accidents and things so memorable may be vnderstood the foundations and counsels, which being oftentimes hid, are for the most part reuealed and published after a manner most farre from the truth.

But scarcely had the Pope capitulated with the Viceroy, when were presented vnto him the great offers of Fraunce, to stirre him vp to the warre: wherein albeit he wanted not the perswasions of many to induce him to the same effect, and lesse diminution of the distrust which he had before of the Imperials, yet he determined to take such a course and proceeding in all things, as he would leaue no cause to either of them to suspect him for his actions: Therefore he had no sooner vnderstood that the Viceroy had accepted and pronounced the contract made at Rome, then he caused publication to be made within Saint Iohn de Latran, and as he taried not for the ratification of the Emperour which was promised to be sent first, so the better to demonstrate his intention, he honored with his presence, and with the same solemnitie he was wont to vse at his coronation, the publication which was made the first day of May: he solicited also the Florentines to make payment of the money promised, and interposed as much as he could, to draw the Venetians to enter appointment with the Imperials. But on the other side, were presented to him by them, many iust causes of complaint, since in the payment of the money promised, they would not accept the siue and twentie thousand duckats payed by the Florentines according to his ordinance during the negociation of the accord, for that the Viceroy alleaged impudently, that if other promise were past, it was made without his commission: besides, that they had not retired their souldiers from off the landes of the Church, but replenished the townes of Plaisance with garrisons. To these things which some way might haplie be excused, both for their want of money, and necessitie of harbour and lodging, was added also, that not onely in the mutation of the state of Sienna, they gaue suspicion to beare a minde estraued from the Pope, but also they suffered afterwarde the Citizens of Montenouo to be ill handled and spoyled of their goods by the Libertines, notwithstanding vpon the Popes often complaints, they gaue him hope to remedie those disorders. But that which vexed him most of all, was the dealing of the Viceroy, who did not onely incline suddenly to the solicitations of the Duke of Ferrara, but also put him in hope not to force him to leaue Reggia and Rubiera: he promised him also to induce the Emperour to take his estates into protection, notwithstanding he made dayly promises to the Pope, that when the Florentines had performed to pay that which they ought, he would make him essoones repossessed of those townes: and to the end the Pope should the better sollicite the effectes of these promises and hopes, and also to obtaine to haue the companies of men of warre to retire from the territories of the Church, he sent vnto him the Cardinall Saluatis, his Legate in Lombardie and Deputie Legate with the Emperour, to whom the Viceroy made beleeue beleue that he was determined to procure restitution of Reggia by armes, if the Duke refused to render it by good will : But the effect of things answered nothing the promises and wordes; a manner and manner of dealing which could not be excused by the necessitie of money, for that vpon the rendering of those townes, there grew to them a greater quantitie : and there was taken good reason and matter to interpret the likelihood of that matter to proceede of a desire they had either to haue him embased and pulled lower, or else to winne the Duke of Ferrara, or lastly, to go on still with better degrees and preparations for the oppressing of Italie. These matters brought to the Pope a suspition and grieve of minde almost incredible, but much more was he perplexed to see and consider that the Emperours intention was nothing different: who hauing dispatched to the Pope letters of ratification of the confederation made in his name to the Viceroy, deferred to confirme the three articles accorded apart and separate from the capitulation : he alleaged, that touching the restoring of the townes holden by the Duke of Ferrara, he had no power to do an act preiudiciall to the rights of the Empire, nor to force the Duke who protested to hold them in chiefe of the Empire, in which respect the Emperour offered to referre that controuersie to the triall of law and iustice, or else to be resolved by some friendly composition. It was easily comprehended that he could haue bin contented they should still haue remained to the Duke, but vnder his inuestiture, and to pay him an hundred thousand duckats, and as much to the Pope for the inuestiture of Ferrara, and for the penaltie imposed vpon the contract which he had made with Adrian: he alleaged that it was a thing impertinent to accord with his ministers touching the trade & prouisiō of salt frō the Duchy of Millan, because the soueraigne profite of that Dukedome by the cōpositiō of the inuestiture though not as yet cōsigned, appertained to Francis Sforce: & that therefore the Viceroy was not simply bound by the article to cōpell him to take it, but to do what he could to induce him to cōsent: which promise for that it was extended to the actiō of a third person, was notoriously of no force touching the effect to bind either himselfe or another. Neuerthelesse for desire he had to gratifie the Pope he would haue practised to induce the Duke to consent, if the matter had not become no more his owne interest but the interest of another, seeing the Duke of Millan in recōpēce of the succōrs which the Archduke had sent him, had cōuenanted to take salt of him: and yet notwithstanding, he sayd he would interpose & do all he could to induce his brother (receiuing recōpence of money) to accord & cōsent to it, not for euer is the article expressed, but during the Popes life, which was most agreeable to reason : he would not admit also the article of benefices & benefices, vnlesse, together with that which was expressed in the inuestitures, were ioyned such things as had bin obserued by his predecessours kings of Naples. In regard of these difficulties, the Pope refused to accept the letters of ratification, nor would he send his to the Emperour, but insisted this demaund, that seeing the Emperour had not ratified within the terme of foure moneths according to the promise of the Viceroy, that the hundred thousand duckats might be restored to the Florentins: which demaund was answered with subtleties & rather cauillations, thē with firme & good foundations: that the conditiō of restitution of the hundred thousand duckats was not affixed to the instrument, but promised in an article apart by the *Viceroy*s Agents by oath, & that it was not referred to the ratification of the league which the Emperour had not onely ratified within the terme of foure moneths, but also had sent out letters of it in due forme. Moreouer the Pope had aduertisement that the Emperours Court was vniuersally ill disposed to the things of Italie, & he was not ignorant that the Captaines of his army rose up to perswade him, that for the more absolute assuring of his enterprises in Italie, it were good to cause Modena to be rendred to the Duke of Ferrara, to repesse the familie of Bertinoleis of Bologna, & to take the iurisdiction of Florēce, of Sienna, & of Lucqua, as townes appertaining to the Empire: yea, so full was he of doubt and suspition, & so farre from stay and resolution, and knowing withall that the Frenchmen offered as a pray to the Emperour the regions of Italie, that by necessitie he went temporising, hauing not whereupon to fixe his foundation.

In this time the accord betweene the Viceroy & the Venetians was solicited continually, wherein besides the Viceroy sought to bind of new the Venetians to the defence of the Duchy of Millan, he demaunded great summes of money to satisfie their fault of inobservatiō of the cōfederatiō, passed: The Venetians had many reasons to incline thē to giue place to necessitie, but of the cōtrarie, they were caried with more reasonable perswasions to remaine in suspēce: amid which incertaintie of estate, their counsels were full of varietie & irresolution: Neuerthelesse after many conferences & meetings, their astonishment being no lesse then their neighbours for so great a victory of the Emperor, & their estate onely being abandoned & reduced to priuatiō on all sides, they addressed new commissions to P. Pefero their Embassador resident with the Viceroy, to cōfirme the league in the same maner it had bin made afore, paying ouer to the Emperour fourescore thousand ducats for satisfactiō of penalties past. But the Viceroy being made so much the more obstinate, by how much they seemed fearefull, answered them resolutely, that he would not renue the confederatiō, vnlesse they payed in the hundred thousand ducats: which obstinacie drew with it this ill accident, as oftentimes is seene to happen in matters deliberated with lōgnesse of time & no readinesse of will: for, so long a tract was taken in the disputing and debating of this litle summe, that the Venetians had aduertisement how the king of Englād bare no more so ill a mind to the aduersities of France as was feared in the beginning, & besides, the Imperiall armie had both payed and dismissed many regiments of Launceknights: matters which the Venetians interpreting to their aduantage, and better suretie from vexation, they determined to dwell as yet in suspence, and to reserve in themselves (as much as they could) power and election to take those deliberations, which by the traine and euent of generall things, they knew were best for them.

The person of the French king led prisoner into to Spaine.

The Viceroy and the other Capitaines Imperiall were not a litle stirred vp by these variations to transport the person of the French King into a place of suretie, iudging that for the ill disposition of others, they could not without perill keepe him garded in the Duchie of Millan. In which feared ioyned to their continuall desire so to do, they resolved to conuey him to Genes, and from thence by sea to Naples, where his lodging was prepared within the Newcastell. This determination brought no litle grieffe to the King, who from the beginning of his captiuitie, had vehemently desired to be eased into Spaine: perhaps he had opinion (measuring happily another man by his owne nature, or else running with the common error of mortall men being easily beguiled in things they desire) that if once he were brought to the presence of the Emperour, he doubted not of some easie passage for his libertie, either through the Emperours benignitie, or by the conditions he meant to offer. The Viceroy was of the same desire for the augmentatiō of his owne glory, but being retained for feare of the French army by sea, they dispatched by common consent Monsieur Montmerancie to the Lady Regent: she graunted to him sixe light gallies of those that lay in the port of Marfeilles, w^{ch} promise to haue the restored as soone as the king was arriued in Spaine. With these gallies he returned to Portofino, where the kings person was already arriued, & ioyning them to sixteene Gallies of the Emperour, which was the nauie appointed at first to conduct him to Naples, he reduced them all into one fleete, and armed them all with footemen of the Spanish. The Capitaines Imperials & the Duke of Burbon, were perswaded that the kings person should be led to Naples; but on the contrary, setting saile the seuenth of Iune, they tooke such course, that the eight day they arriued with a happy voyage at Rosa a haven of Catalognia: their coming brought no small ioy to the Emperour, who till that day had vnderstood nothing of that resolution: and as soone as he was made assured of the kings being there, he dispatched commandments to all places where he should passe, to receiue him with great honors, onely till it should be otherwise determined; he gaue order to keepe him in the castell of Sciatiua neare to Valence, a castell anciently vsed by the kings of Aragon for the garding of great personages, & wherein had bin kept prisoner for many yeares, the Duke of Calabria. But the deliberation to keepe him in that place, seeming farre too rigorous to the Viceroy, & nothing agreeable to the promises he had made to the king in Italie, he won so much of the Emperour, that till he had taken another counsell; the Kings person might remaine neare Valence in a place apt for hunting & other delights of the fildes. There he left him lodged with sufficient gard vnder the charge of Capitaine Alarcon, in whose custody he had alwayes remained since his vnfortunate day: and fro thence the Viceroy together with Montmerancie, went to the Emperour to make report of the estate of Italy, & the discourse of things which till that day bin debated with the king, with whō he perswaded the Emperour with many reasons to draw to accord, for that he could not haue a faithfull amitie & conjunction with the Italians. The Emperour after he had heard the Viceroy & Montmerancie, determined to conuey the King into Castille to the castell of Madriill, a place far removed fro the sea & the confines of France, where being honoured with ceremonies & reuerences agreeable to so great a Prince, he should neuertheless be kept vnder carefull & strait gard, with libertie to take the ayre abroad certaine times of the day, mounted onely vpon a moyle. The Emperour could neuer be brought brought to admit the king to his presence, if first the accord were not either established, or at least in an assured hope of resolution: & to the end there might be interposed in the negotiation a person of honorable, and almost equall with the king, Montmerancie was sent in great diligence into Fraunce, to bring the Duchesse of Alençon the kings sister and a widow, with fullness of authority to debate and contract: and to the end this negotiation of accord were not hindered by new difficulties, there was made a litle afterwards a truce vntill the end of December, betweene the Emperour and such as administered the gouernement of Fraunce. Moreouer the Emperour gaue order that one part of those galleys which were come with the Viceroy, should returne into Italy to bring the Duke of Burbon into Spaine, without whose presence and priuie he gaue out that he would make no conuention: and yet the galleys what for want of money, and other impediments, were prepared but with slow diligence. The Emperour shewing himselfe vehemently disposed to establish an vniuersall peace betweene the Princes of Christendome, and also at one time to giue some reasonable forme to the affaires of Italy, solicited instantly the Pope to hasten away the Cardinall Saluatió, or some others, with sufficient authority: he sent also to be excused to the king of England, taking the reasons of his excuse vpon this, that he could not resist the generall will and vniuersall inclination of his peoples: and sent withall to the Pope Lopus Virado, for a dispensation to marie the infant of Portugall his cousin german, and by that meane conioyned to him in second degree: he sent also by the same Lopus, who departed vpon the end of Iuly, the inuestiture of the Duchy of Milano to Frauncis Sforce, but vnder this condition, to pay presently an hundred thousand duckets, with obligation to pay fiftie hundred thousand more at diuerse tearmes, and to take the trade of salts of the Archduke his brother: the same Lopus caried also commission to dispose of his men of warre in this sort; that except the regiments of Spanish footmen who were to remaine in the Marquisdome of Saluzzo, all the others should be dismissed; that sixe hundred men at armes should returne to the realme of Naples, and the residue remaine in the Duchie of Milano: and lastly, that the Marquis of Pesquero should be Captaine generall of his army. The Emperour added to this commission, that those moneys which he had sent to Genes to defray foure Carackes with the which he intended speedily to passe in person into Spaine, should be conuerted to the necessities and vsage of the armie, for that he was now determined not to depart out of Spaine: the Commission bare also to send in the Emperours name the Protonotarie Caraccioll to Venice, to induce that Senate to a new confederation, or at least to insinuate his disposition, and leaue them satisfied that all his actions tended to an vniuersall peace amongst Princes Christian. But the going of the French king into Spaine brought no litle perplexitie to the Pope and the Venetians, who seeing the Emperours armie was much diminished, considered that into what part of Italy the kings person should be transported, the Imperials could not but find many impediments by the necessity to haue him well garded; so that by that meane either there might easily arise some occasion to deliuer him, or at least the difficultie to carie him into Spaine, and the litle surtie to keepe him in Italy, would constrain the Emperour to giue some good forme to the generall affaires: but when by transporting his person into Spaine, both his owne hopes were disappointed, and meane giuen to his enemies to leade him into sure prison, they discerned that all treatises and negotiations were wholly in the hands of the Emperour, and that there could be established no foundation vpon the practises and offers of the French: in so much as the reputation of the Emperour rising into augmentation by dayly degrees, all men began to expect from his Court and from his hand lawes and rules to dispose all affaires. In these discontentments were concurrant also (but for diuerse causes) the displeasures of the Duke of Burbon, & the Marquis of Pesquero, for that the Viceroy took vpon him without their priuie to leade the French king into Spaine: Such is the emulation of men in the case of glory or reputation, which more then all other worldly passions, hath a naturall propertie to cary their minds headlong into ambition of other mens merite. The Duke of Burbon tooke the reason of his discontentment vpon this, that being expulsed Fraunce for the alliance he had made with the Emperour, he challenged a more interest then any others to be called & to communicate in all the practises of accord: in regard whereof he determined to passe also into Spaine, and yet he was driuen to stand longer vpon his going then willingly he would, for that he taried for the returne of the galleys that caried the Viceroy. The Marquis tooke displeasure with the Viceroy for the small estimation he made of him: and was no lesse ill contented with the Emperour, for that he was not thankfull as appertained to his merits and many seruices done in the last warres, and lately in the battell of Bellinaria, touching which victorie albeit he had deserued more praise and glorie then all the Captaines of the armie, yet the Emperour, contrarie to the law of equitie & reason, had transferred the whole reputation to the Viceroy, with many high honours & demonstrations. This the Marquis could not digest with sufferance, but in the passion of his wrong, as he thought, he wrote letters to the Emperour full of detraction against the Viceroy, tempered with complaints, to be so much disfa- uoured of him, as not to be thought worthy at least to be made priue to such a resolution. And that if in the warre and dangers thereof, the deliberation of things had bene referred to his coun- sell and proper arbitration, the French king had not onely not bene taken, but also as soone as the losse of the Duchie of Millan had followed, the Imperiall armie being driuen to abandon the de- fence of Lombardy, would necessarily haue retired to Naples: lastly, he charged the Viceroy to be gone to triumph of a victory, wherein it was manifestly knowne to the whole army he had no part at all: yea for prooffe that in the heate and most furie of the battell, he was both without coun- rage and without counsell, there were many that heard him crie many times, We are lost and van- quished: and that if he would denie this challenge, he offered to iustifie it vpon his body by the exe- cution of armes, according to the lawes and rules of warre: the Marquis also was further incensed vpon this, that sending immediatly after the victorie to take possession of Carpy, thinking the Em- perour would deliuer it to him, he was not satisfied in that desire: the reason was, that the Empe- rour hauing graunted it two yeares before to Prosper Colonne, assured that notwithstanding he neuer had the inuestiture, yet in memorie of him that was dead, he would to the profite of Ves- pasian his sonne, leaue to his house the same recompence, which in his life time he had intended in recordation of his valour and actions: which reason albeit was iust, and that such examples of gratitude ought to be acceptable to the Marquis, though not so much for the excellency of them, yet for the hope they brought, that his great seruices should be brought into liberall consideration by the Emperour: yet it was not embraced of him, not for that it was not iust & equall, but because for the opinion he bare of himselfe, he held it conuenient that that peculiar humor and appetite of his, proceeding of a couetousnesse and irreconciliable hatred which he bare to the name of Prosper, should be preferred before all other interests, how iust soeuer they were. In this intem- perancie of passion, he cried out of the Emperour and the whole counsell, sending his com- plaints through all the regions of Italy, and that with such detestation of the Emperours ingrati- tude, that by his exclaiming others tooke courage to build new plots. Of which, if the Emperour thought to proceed no further in the matters of Italy, did rise a iust occasion, yea almost a necessity to take other resolutions: but if he stood vpon ends and purposes ambitious, he had means to co- uer them with the most honest occasion and fairest colour he could desire: and seeing from thence was deriued the very beginning and cause of right great stirres and alterations, it is necessary we re- duce it to some particular rehearfall.

Occasions, giue
to the Emperour of new emotions

The warre which in the life of the late Pope Leo, was begun as well by him as by the Empe- ror, for the chasing of the French king out of Italy, was leauied vnder colour to reestablish Fraun- cis Sforce in the Duchie of Millan: and albeit for the execution hereof, after the victory was obtai- ned, promise was made to transerre to him the obedience of that state, together with the castle of Millan, & the other places of strength, when they should be recouered: yet such was the magni- ficency & oportunitie of that Duchie, that the former feare ceased not, which men had of the Em- perours ambition to aspire to it. They interpreted the impediments which he receiued by the French king, to be the cause that he kept cloked as yet so great a thirst, for that he had alte- red those peoples desiring vehemently to haue Frauncis Sforce for Lord, and had stirred vp all Italy against him, being not content to suffer the French to rise to such a greatnesse: so that Frauncis Sforce held that Duchie but with a hard yoke and subiection, and tributes and charges intollerable: for all the stay & foundation of his defence against the French consisting in the Empe- ror & in his army, he was constrained not only to respect him as his Prince, but also to liue subie- cted to the will of his Captaines: by whom he was miserably compelled to entertaine his regi- ments of men of warre not payd by the Emperour, sometimes with money which he leauied vpon his subiects with grieuous imposts & great difficulties, & sometimes in suffering them licentious- ly to liue vpon his people by discretion, and that in all the seuerall parts of his estate, except the Citie of Millan: oppressions which albeit of themselues were heauie and grieuous, yet the nature nature of the Spaniard being greedy, and when he hath the meane to discover his inclination very insolent, made them intollerable: neuertheless the daunger which was had of the Frenchmen, to whom the inhabitants were enemies, and the hope that those vexations would one day draw to end, wrought in the hearts of men a greater sufferance then their forces or faculties could well beare. But after the victorie of Pavia the people could no more endure, seeing the same necessities no more continuing, for that the king was prisoner, yet their calamities continued notwithstanding, and therefore they required to be somewhat eased of their burthens, by withdrawing from the Duchie, either all or the most part of the armie. The like instance was also made by the Duke, hauing enioyed of the Dukedome no other thing till that day, then the bare name and title: he feared least the Emperour, being now assured of the French king, would occupie and retaine the Duchie to himselfe, or at least bestow it in donation vpon some of his followers and dependancers. In which feare and suspition, deriued of the verie nature of the affaires occurrent, he was specially nourished by the insolent words spoken by the Viceroy afore he conueyed the king into Spaine, together with the demonstrations expressed by the other Captaines, wherein much lesse that they published any reputation to be holden of the Duke, seeing they desired openly that the Emperour would oppresse him: Besides, the Emperour, after many delays and deferring, hauing sent to the Viceroy the expedition and priuiledges of the inueltiture, the Viceroy when he presented them to the Duke, demanded for recompence of charges for conquering and defending that state, to pay to the Emperour within a certaine terme, the summe of twelue hundred thousand duc-kets; a demaund so excessiue and intollerable, that the Duke was driuen to haue recourse to the Emperour to moderate and abate the summe. But these difficulties drew a doubt least the demands so immoderate were not interposed to make the matter alwayes deferred: moreouer such as sought to excuse the necessity of Franncis Sforce, alleaged manie other generall causes of his iust suspition, and particularly the knowledge he had that the Imperiall Captaines were resolued to restraine or retaine him. In so much as being summoned by the Viceroy to a certaine counsell or Dyot, he refused to go, sayning to be sicke, couering himselfe with the like excuses in all places where they had power to do him violence: he nourished this suspitiō whether it were true or false, and ioyned withall this consideration, that the state of Millan was well disburdened of the regiments of men of war, part of the Spanish footmen being gone into Spaine at seuerall times with the Viceroy and the Duke of Burbon, and also diuerse bands being made rich with pillage and pray, were retired by troupes into fundrie places: and considering also the great indignation that was shewed to the Marquis of Pesquero, he deuised by these aduantages to assure himselfe of the present danger, and entred into hope that the army might be easily defeated, vsing the cōsent and valour of the Marquis. The author of this deuise was Ierome Moron his Chauncellour, a man of high authoritie and place with him, and for the faculty of his spirit, facility of inuention, flowing eloquence, familiar readinesse, and great experience, and lastly, for his resolution and magnanimi-tie, hauing oftentimes made singular resistance against aduersities, was in our age a personage of right worthy memory: which parts or gifts had tied vpon his name a perpetuall fame and honour, if they had gone accompanied with such sincerity of mind, such care and zeale to integrity, and with such maturitie of iudgement, as his counsels for the most part had not bene dis-cerned to hold more of precipitation and impudencie, then of circumspection or honestie. This man founding the intention of the Marquis, made such insinuation into his mind already deeply grieued, that they began to commune to cut in peeces the remainder of the regiments remaining within the Duchie of Millan, and to make the Marquis king of Naples; an enter-prise which they held of easie action, if the Pope and Venetians would be concurrant with them: and touching the Pope, whose mind was drawne with suspition and doubt, after he was founded by the aduise of Moron, he shewed himselfe no whit disagreeing to that counsell, and yet he aduertised the Emperour vnder colour of friendship to entertaine his Captaines in deuotion and well contented, not that he meant to disclose the practise, but to prepare to himselfe a refuge if the matter declined to some ill euent: but the Venetians imbraced the deuise with reso-lution and sincere affection, perswading themselves that no lesse readinesse of mind and will would be found in the Lady Regent, who began to perceiue, that since her sonne was arriued in Spaine, the negociations of his deliuerie were not continued with that facilitie that was looked for. There is no doubt but these counsels had easily succeeded, if the Marquis of Pesquero had proceeded sincerely in that confederation against the Emperour: but whether at the first he entertained the practise or not, there was diuersity of opinions aswell amongst the Spaniards, as in the verie Court of the Emperour. Many that were obseruers of times and euents of affaires, beleueed that at the beginning he was simply concurrant with the residue, but afterwards he disclaimed from the enterprise, and made new deliberations both for the consideration of many difficulties that might happen with the time, & also fearing the continuall solicitations of the French with the Emperour, with the resolution that the Duchesse of Alençon should go to him: yet some do assure that he deferred so long to aduertise the Emperour of these conspiracies pretended in Italy, that hauing receiued knowledge of them by Anthony de Leua and Marino Abbot of Nagero, Commissarie in the Emperours armie, all the whole Court maruelled at the silence of the Marquis: but howsoeuer his dealing was then, it is certaine, that a litle after he sent to the Emperour Iohn Baptista Castaldo, who imparted the reall discourse of the conspiracie: and with the priuie of the Emperour did not only entertaine the practise, but also the better to defeat the thoughts of euerie man, and to take from them all the meane to deny that they had consented, he communed by mouth with the Duke of Millan, and perswaded Moron to induce the Pope, who a litle before had indued him with the perpetuall gouernment of the Citie of Beneuent to send Dominicke Sawlo with a letter of credence to conferre with him of the matter. The conclusions of the treatise were these: That betweene the Pope, the realme of Fraunce and the governments of Italy should be a league, ouer the which the Marquis of Pesquero should be Captaine general: That for the first action he should bestow the Infanterie or footbands of the Spanish seuerally in sundry places of the Duchy of Millan, and so drawing to himselfe so manie as would follow him, the others should be spoiled and put to the sword, together with Ambo. de Leua, who next to himselfe was the chiefe Commander of the armie: & then ioyning to him the forces of all the confederates, he should execute the enterprise of the kingdome of Naples, whereof the Pope was to indue him with the inuestiture. The Marquis seemed to find no other difficulty in these actions, sauing that afore he put any thing to triall, he desired to be satisfied, whether without blemishing his honour and fidelity, he might embrace such an enterprise in case the Pope put it vpon him by his authoritie: whereupon was brought into question & consideration, to whom, he being a Baron and subiect of the realme of Naples, ought to obey, either to the Emperour, to whom the profitable iurisdiction of the realme appertained, by the inuestiture he had receiued of the Church, or to the Pope, in whom was the direct soueraigntie, being absolute and soueraigne thereof. Vpon which article both at Millan by the ordinance of Frauncis Sforce, and at Rome by the appointment of the Pope, were called very secret consultations of excellent Doctors with suppression of their true names. These hopes against the Emperour were augmented by the offers of the Lady Regent, who iudging that either the necessitie or the feare of the Emperour, would aduance much the matters that were treated with him for the deliuerie of her sonne, solicited earnestly to take armes, promising to send into Lombardie a strength of fise hundred Launces, and to be concurrant in the expences of the warre with great contributions of money. Moron for his part ceased not to confirme the minds of the residue in that opinion: for, besides the perswasions he made how easie it would be euen without the aide of the Marquis of Pesquero, to defeat that armie so much diminished in numbers, he promised in the Dukes name, that if the Marquis should not stand constant, but swarue from the resolution of the treatise, immediatly after order given to the other businesse, there should be apprehended prisoners within the Castle of Millan, aswell he as the other Captaines, hauing daylie accessse thither to consult. But albeit these occasions seemed great, and no lesse importing the circumstances and dependances which they drew, yet they had not bene sufficient to cary the Pope into armes without the Marquis of Pesquero, if at the same time he had not heard of prouision sent to Genes to arme foure Carackes, & with all had not had some token & intelligence from Spaine of the Emperours inclination to passe into Italy; a matter which did not a litle afflict him, aswell in regard of the conditions of the time present, as also for the ancient obseruation and disposition of the Popes of Rome, to whom nothing hath wont to bring more terrour and astonishment, then the comming of Emperours with armed hand into Italie: in so much as desiring in his feare to meet with this danger, he tooke the consent and priuie of the Venetians, & dispatched secretly into Fraunce to conclude the matters negociated with the Lady Regent, Sigismund Secretarie to Albert Carpi, a man experieced in affaires of estate, & of singular confidence confidence with the Pope: but as he ran post towards Fraunce, he was set vpon by night by theeves and robbers, and slaine neare the lake of Isea, vpon the territorie of Bressia; which accident for the secret keeping of it many dayes, brought to the Pope great suspicion that he was secretly taken and stayed in some place by the Imperiall Captaines, and haply by the Marquis himselfe, whom they began to distrust much for his maner of proceeding, but more for the delayes he vsed.

In this estate and condition of affaires, arriued the dispatch of Lopus Vitrado, who remaining sicke in Sauoy, sent his expedition away to Millan by a man expresse: he brought the letters patents by the which the Marquis of Pesquero was declared Captaine generall, who to continue with others in the same semblance, made as though such a charge was not verie agreeable to him, and yet he accepted it immediatly. The same Lopus sent also to the Pronotarie Carraccioll, the commission to go to Venice in the Emperours name, to induce that Senate to a new confederation, or at least to insinuate into them what desire the Emperour had to liue in peace with all

In this time Franncis Sforce was fallen into a disease verie dangerous for his life, and accepted the inuestiture of the Duchie, paying for it fifty thousand duckets, and ceased not for all that to continue the practises begun with the Marquis. The opinions were diuerse touching this dispatch of the Emperour: some beleued that he had simply determined to assure the Italians: but others iudged that for feare of new innouations & stirres, he sought to hold men in suspence with diuerse hopes, and going on still winning of time, to agree to the inuestiture, and in apparence graunt a commission so agreeable to all Italy to make retire his armie, though on the other side he had giuen directions to his Captaines not to stirre nor remoue: yea there were some that had this opinion, that he had intelligence from the Marquis of the practises entertained with Moron, and therefore he sent out such a commission, not to be obeyed, but to get some iustification, & with his hopes to keepe lulled asleepe the mindes of men, yntill he saw apt time to aduance and execute his purposes. In which diuersitie of humors and opinions, albeit it was verie hard to sound out the simple truth, seeing withall it was not knowne whether Lopus Vitrado was dispatched at the same time that arriued at the Court Iohn Baptista Castaldo, sent by the Marquis to aduertise the Emperour of the negociation: yet considering by many accidents and euents sithence, what course the Emperour hath taken, it is without doubt that it is lesse fallible to hold for true the better and the more easie interpretation. But in this meane while the Marquis omitted no oportunitie wherein occasion was giuen to entertaine Moron and the others with the same hopes, deferring notwithstanding with many excuses the execution of things: wherein he tooke one occasion of the sicknesse of the Duke of Millan, which increased on him by such dangerous degrees, that euerie one held almost for certaine, that it would leade him to his last time: for all the Captaines pretending that in case of the Dukes death, the estate of that Duchie should returne to the Emperour, as soueraigne Lord in chiefe, it was not only not conuenient for him to retire his armie, but also it was necessarie to call in a new strength of 2000 Launceknights, & prepare a greater number to be in readinesse: so that the Souldiers for their numbers and valours being puissant in the Duchie of Millan, there was no meane either to dissolue them, or at least to offend them: he gaue also hope to execute the counsels of the conspiracie as soone as there was apt concurrance of time and meane: in expectation whereof he said he proceeded with a great respect to the Pope, and for gratification of him, he leauied from off the estates of the Church his garrisons of men of warre, who gaue him occasion of right great complaints.

But about this time almost all things were chaged by a new accident which hapned in Spaine: The French for the French king falling sicke in the Castle of Madril, and hauing in vaine desired the presence of the Emperour, was caried by his discontentment and melancholy into such extremity and danger of his life, that the Physitions appointed for his cure, told the Emperour that they stood desperate of his recoverie, if himselfe in person came not to comfort him with some hope of his deliuerie. The Emperour obeying more compassion then the reason of things, was not curious to condescend to performe so good an office: and as he prepared to visite him accordingly, his high Chancellour seeking to turne him from the iourney, told him with many strong reasons, that he could not go to him in honor, but with intention to deliuer him presently, and without any covenant: otherwise as it would be a humanity not royall but mercenarie, so it wold disclose a desire to recouer him, not moued of charitie, but pushed on by his proper interest, as not to loose by his death the occasion of the profite hoped for by the victorie, a counsell assuredly both graue and honorable touching the man that gaue it, & no lesse worthie to be followed by so great a Prince as the Emperour: and yet being more caried by the reasons of others, he tooke post to go to him: but for the daunger of the king being almost at the extremitie, the visitation was short, and yet for the time accompanied with gracious words, full of hope that he would deliuer him immediately vpon his returning to health. In so much that whether it was by the comfort that he breadd into him (in the sicknesse of captiuitie the promise of libertie exceeds all medicines) or by the benefite of his youth, which with the fauour of nature was stronger then the maladie, he began: for this visitation to resume so good disposition, that within few dayes he was out of danger, notwithstanding he could not recouer his former health but with very slow time. And now neither the difficulties that were shewed on the Emperours side, nor the hopes which were giuen by the Italians, nor any other nature of impediments whatsoever could stay the voyage of the Lady Alençon into Spaine: for that as nothing was more hard or heauie to the Frenchmen then to leaue off the practises and negociations of accord begun with those that had power to restore their king: so nothing was more easie to the Emperour, then feeding the French with kopes, to draw their minds from taking armes, and by that meane so to keepe the Italians in suspence, as not to dare to enter into new deliberations: and in that cunning maner, sometimes vsing delayes, and sometimes pressing forward the affaires, he thought to keepe the minds of all men confused and entangled. The Lady Alençon was receiued by the Emperour with verie gracious demonstrations and hopes, but the effects fell out both hard and heauie: for when she ministred speech to him for the mariage of his sister the widow with the king, he made answer that it was a matter which could not be done without the consent of the Duke of Burbon: the other particularities were debated by deputies of both partes, wherein as the Emperour insisted obstinately to haue the Duchy of Burgundy restored, as appertaining to him: so the French refused to consent, vnlesse he would accept it for dowrie, or else to referre it to the sentence of the law and iustice to decide the true title: and albeit they could easily haue condescended to the residue, yet for that they were so far off for the demaund of Burgundy, the Lady Alençon returned at last into Fraunce, without winning any other grace then a fauour to see the king her brother: who growing more and more into distrust of his deliuerie, desired her at her departing, to admonish his mother and all the Counsell fro him, to looke carefully to the profite of the Crowne of Fraunce without hauing any consideration of him, as if he liued not. But notwithstanding the departing of the Lady Alençon, the solicitations for the kings deliuey did not cease, for that there remained behind the President of Paris & the Bishops of Ambrun and Tarbe, who had till then followed the negociation but with verie litle hope, since the Emperor would not hearken to any condition, if first Burgundy were not rendred, which the king could not be brought to restore, but in a last necessity.

Cardinal Saluatiato the Popes Legate in the Court of the Emperour.

About this time the Cardinal Saluatiato the Popes Legate arriued at the Court, where being receiued of the Emperour with great honour and fauours, he debated vpon his commissions, which principally contained the ratification of the articles promised by the Viceroy, and secondly a demaund to transerre the inuestiture to the Duke of Millan, for the common surety of Italy. But the Viceroy notwithstanding his promises, dissuaded the restitution of Reggia & Rubiera: & by his counsell, & through the hopes he had in him, the Duke of Ferrara, desiring to sollicite his owne cause before the Emperour, and hauing the Popes promise not to execute any enterprize vpon his estate for sixe moneths, tooke his way to the frontier of the realme of Fraunce, with intention to passe further, but being denied passage & safe conduct by the Lady Regent, he returned backe againe to Ferrara. The Legate and the Emperour conferred together, touching a dispensation to take to wife the king of Portugals sister; a mariage which the Emperor was determined to contract notwithstanding he had promised the king of England by oath to take no other wife then his daughter: but the Pope temporized this demaund, and stood long to accord to the dispensation, for that many perswaded him that the desire to obtaine such a grace, would reduce the Emperor, and make him the more easie to his desires touching the matters in negociation: and at least wise, in case he would warre vpon him, it were far from pollicie and discretion, to giue him meane to heap together so great a masse of money as would grow to him by that mariage, for that the king of Portugall offered him for a portion, nine hundred thousand duckets; of which, deducting so much as was set downe to defray the debts contracted betweene them, it was thought there would come to his hands at least a summe of five hundred thousand duckets: besides, the subjects of Spain consented to rayse a contribution of foure hundred thousand, vnder the title of a beneuolence or seruice, which taking his beginning in times past of the proper wils and motion of the people to relieue the necessities of their kings, was reduced by custome and working of times, into a Spane or rather an ordinary Subsidy: yea they offered him moreouer to enrich him with a further summe of foure hundred thousand duckats, if he went through with the mariage. On the other side, the Pope had no power to resist the importunities of the Duke of Sessa the Emperours Embassador, for that by the property of his inclination, there appeared for the most part in him a repugnancy betweene that he purposed, & things which he executed: for being by nature very far off to accord any grace that was demanded of him, he was not apt to vse difficulties, nor easie to make deniall: only by the facility of his nature, he suffered oftentimes his will to be won and ouerruled by the importunity of such as sued to him, and in that disposition seemed to accord to things more through feare then by grace, wherein he proceeded neither with that constancy of minde, nor with that Maiesty of title and place, which was required of the greatnesse of his dignity, and was agreeable to the importance of the affaires that stood vpon negotiation. And in that maner did he deale touching the dispensation required by the Emperour, for as on the one side he was caried by his proper profite, and on the other side ouerruled by his ordinary facilitie and softnesse, so according to his custome, he discharged vpon the backe of another the thing which himselfe was not sufficient to sustaine, neither with his body nor with his minde: he dispatched by writte the dispensation in the same forme the Emperour demanded it, and sending it to the Cardinall Saluatio, he tied to it this commission, that if his affaires with the Emperour sorted to a resolution according to the hope he had giuen asloone as the sayd Cardinall should come to the Court, he should deliuer the writ, otherwise to retaine it to himselfe; a commission wherein the minister or seruant (as shall be sayd in his place) shewed himselfe no more firme nor more constant, then the maister.

But whilest the Cardinall disputed the Popes commissions with the Emperour, and was alwayes entertained with hope to haue the expedition he desired, there fel out in Lombardy very diuerse effects: for the Duke of Millan being so well recouered of his sicknesse, that at the least he was holden out of danger of sudden death, the Marquis of Pesquero hauing receiued by Castaldo the Emperours Commission to prouide for those daungers as he thought good, determined to enter vpon the Duchy of Millan, vnder this colour, that the Duke by reason of the conspiracies and practises holden by Moron, was falne from the rights of inueltiture, and the chiefe or Soueraigne freehold reuerted vpon the Emperour and supreme Lord: and to giue a beginning to this resolution, the Marquis lying at Nouaro very sicke, notwithstanding he had bestowed one part of the army within Pania, and lodged the Launcelights neare Loda, which two Cities he had fortified: yet vnder colour to dispose the army through all the state of Millan, he reuoked to Nouaro when was least doubt of such a matter, the residue of the bands dispersed in Piedmont and the Marquisdome of Salusse, which state the Imperiall Captaines had occupied almost immediately after the victorie. He called also to Nouaro, Moron, in whose person rested almost the importance of all things: and as it was certaine that Moron being made prisoner, the Duke of Millan would be made depriued both of men and counsell: so the Marquis by that meane thought to take away all impediments and resistance, where, if he should suffer him to liue in liberty, it could not be but that Moron, with his spirit, with his experience, and with his reputation, would entangle the estate of his affaires, and giue many impediments to his plots and purposes. Besides, it was necessary for the Emperour to haue the person of Moron in his power and possession, for that being the author and speciall instrument of all the conspiracies, he thought to draw from him by his proper confession all those treasons and intelligences which were charged vpon the Duke of Millan. There is nothing more hard then to auoyde destiny, nor no remedie auaylable against the euils determined to fall vpon vs. And as it is easie to suffer a mischiefe when we are sure of the remedie, so, for that aduersitie is of his owne nature quarrellous, there is no ill that happeneth which is not so much the more grievous and troublesome, by how much it happeneth on a sudden, shaking so much the more vehemently the resolution and constancie of the minde. Moron might now discern that the practise he had with so great secrecie enttayned with the Marquis, was a matter vayne and dissembled: he knew himselfe to be followed with an vniuersall hatred of all the Spanish souldiers, amongst whom ranne already many rumours of his infidelity: Antho. de Lena gaue out pulke threats that he would kill him. It is not credible that he did not consider the importance of his person, and discerned to what estate was reduced the Duke of Millan at that time vnprofitable, and as a body dead. Betweene them many dayes before, all things were suspended and full of suspicion, every one connelled him not to go thither: himselfe wauered betweene feare and ambition: and yet either for that he suffered himselfe to be flattered with the faire semblances of the Marquis, or making a foundation vpon the great amity running betweene them, or reposing confidence in his faith assured by a letter subsigned with his hand, or lastly being pushed on by that fatall necessity which violently draweth on men that will not be led, he resolved to go as it were to a manifest prison; a matter so much the more wonderfull, by how much he hath bene oft heard say in the time of Pope Leo, that in all Italy there was not a more impious and disloyall man then the Marquis of Pesquiero. The Marquis receiued him with gracious demonstrations, & leading him into a chamber apart, they began to renew betweene them the discourse of the former conspiracies, both how to kill the Spaniards and to murder Anth. de Lena, whom the Marquis had secretly conuayed behind a hanging of Tapestry, to heare what past betweene them. But as soone as the Marquis was parted from him, which was the fourteenth day of October, Antho. de Lena entred the chamber and apprehended him prisoner, sending him in that fortune to the Castell of Paui. Thither the Marquis went in person to examine him vpon the matters they had debated together, which Moron confessed from one end to the other together with the whole conspiracy, charging the Duke of Millan both as guiltie and consenting to all that had bene past, which was the matter that principally was sought. Thus the Marquis hauing Moron vnder gard and keeping, proceeded by other degrees to reuerse vtterly the Duke: and being already possessed of Loda and Paui, he required the Duke for the surety of the Emperours estate, to deliuer vp Cremona and the Castels of Bressia, Lecqua, and Pisqueton, places supposed to be the keyes of the Duchy of Millan, for that they haue their situation vpon the passage of Adda. And as he promised to introduce no alteration nor innouation, so the Duke both abandoned of counsell, and deprived of hope, made present deliury according to the demaund, departing willingly with the things which his destinie denied him to detain. Being possessed of these places, of no lesse importance for the surety of the Marquis and his drifts, then most apt to pull on the extreame reuerfement of the Duke, he passed to further insolencies, requiring to be receiued into Millan to haue conference with the Duke as he alleaged: which being graunted to him with the same facility, he demaunded estsoones to be possessed of the Castell of Cremona: and albeit he forbore to require the Castell of Millan as being a demaund not reasonable, for that his person was lodged within it, yet he insisted vehemently that for the surety of the Emperours armie he would consent the Castell might be enuironed with trenches: he required also to haue deliuered into his hands John Angeo Riccio, his Secretarie, and Politian Secretarie to Moron, to the end examinations might be imposed vpon them for the conspiracies against the Emperour. To these demaunds the Duke answered: That touching the Castels of Millan and Cremona, as he held them in the name and at the instance of the Emperour, to whom he had alwayes bene a most deuout and faithfull vassall, so he could not but iudge it preiudiciall to his fidelity, to deliuer them vp to the hands of any without his priuie and will. Wherein for his more full vnderstanding and satisfying, he sayd he would dispatch forthwith a messenger expresse, so farre forth as the Marquis would giue him surety of passage: That in the meane while he held it neither comely nor conuenient to consent to be inclosed or intrenched within the Castell; a violence which he would defend with all his power: That he could not depart with John Angeo, being the only man that was instructed in all his affaires of importance, and at that time the only officer about him: And that as touching the Secretarie of Moron, he had a greater care to detain him, to the end to present him to the Emperour, and to proue by that meane, that during the Dukes sicknesse, his master had embraced and dispatched in his name, and without his priuie many expeditions, which sinisterly might be charged vpon him, if by that meane he iustified not his innocency, and shewed that the practises of Moron were farre different and separate from his operations. But the effect was, that after manie offers and protestations past by writing as well by the one as the other partie, the Marquis compelled the peoples of Millan to passe an oath of fidelitie to the Emperour, in whose name he bestowed officers through all the estate of the Duke dome, to the great displeasure displeasure and discontenting of the inhabitantes : and in that authoritie he beganne with trenches to incompasse the Castels of Cremona and Millan, in the which the Duke was resolved to remayne with eight hundred choise footemen and such reasonable store of victuals as by the shortnesse of the time he could provide : he gaue himselfe ouer to that besieging, partly through the necessitie of the time, and partly for the comfortes and hopes of succours giuen him by the Pope and the Venetians, not sayling withall with the vse of his Artilleries to hinder as much as he could the working of the trenches which were drawne on that side without, and of more distance from the Castell then those which Prosper Colonna caused to be cast.

All the Regions of Italy were reduced to a great astonishment for the vsurpation of the Duke-dome of Millan, which they saw could not but fall into manifest seruitude, when so euer an Emperour of nature ambitious and stirring, and for his forces mighty and warlike, should be Lord ouer Millan & Naples. But aboue all others the Pope was especially afflicted, seeing in that action his pretences were disclosed, with the which he had pretended not only to assure Millan, but also to confound the Emperours army, and take from him the kingdome of Naples. Touching the Marquis of Pequero, it may be, that by these operations he won great fauour with the Emperour, but with all other sorts of men he purchased perpetuall infamie, not only for the opinion that most conceiued of him, that in the beginning he extended his intentions to double with the Emperour & to bandy against him, but also notwithstanding he intended fidelity to the Emperour, yet he ran a course of infamy in this, to set on men, and with so great art and infidelity to draw the into conspiracy with him, to the end to haue occasion to detect them, and to make himselfe great of the transgressions of others, solicited with words dissembled and artificiall. This alteration made hard the hope of accord that was negociated with the Senate of Venice by the Protonotarie Caraccioli: who hoped that (for the tearmes wherein things stood) the Senate would speedily draw to a conclusion to renew the former confederation with the same conditions : and to pay to the Emperour fourescore thousand ducats in recompence that in times past he had withdrawne his ayde, leauing there wholly all demaunds to contribute hereafter with money. But the accident of Millan reduced the Senate to no little perplexitie : for on the one side they stood grieued to be the onely people in Italy that with so great daunger contended against the Emperour, seeing they were threatned by the Marquis of Pequero to transport the whole warre vpon their estate, whereof they discerned already certaine preparations : and on the other side, they were not ignorant that in case the accord went through, the Emperour should with greater facility make himselfe absolute Lord of that Duchy, which being ioyned to so many estates, and so many other opportunities, they saw was the onely line to leade him to subdue them together with the residue of Italy; a matter which was continually declared to them by the Bishop of Bayeux; whom the Lady Regent had sent to sollicite an vnion with the Italians against the Emperour: for which purpose, in so great a doubt, and in so daungerous apparances, they made many assemblies, but without any resolution for the diuersity of opinions. And albeit to accept the accord, was a thing more conformable to their custome and maner of proceeding, for that it tooke them out of daungers present, as they might hope in the tract of times and benefite of occasions which common-weales may attend (who in comparison of Princes are immortall) yet it seemed to them a matter of too great importance, to suffer the Emperour confirmed in the estate of Millan, and to see the French remaine excluded from all hope of alliance in Italy: therefore after they had at last resolved to be bound to nothing, they made this answer to the Protonotary Caraccioli: that the forme of their actions past gaue faith to all the world, and he himselfe being present at the conclusion of the confederation, could well testifie, with what great affection they had alwayes desired the amity of the Emperour: with whom as they contracted a confederation in a time when if they had hearkned to the French, it had bene (as all the world knew) an operation of right great consequence, so they had preseuered and would for euer continue in the same disposition towards him: only the necessity of things kept them in suspence, both for that they saw in Lombardy many changes and innouations of great importance, and also for that they remembered that their confederation with the Emperour, together with so many mouings & stirs hapned that yeare in Italy, drew no other end or meaning, then to transerre Francis Sforce to the Duchy of Millan as the principall foundation of the liberty and suretie of Italy. In which regard they besought his Maieſty, that maintaining in that caſe himſelfe, & deducing afore al the world his bounty, he wold remoue and make ceaſe ſo great an innouation, and eſtabliſh the tranquility of Italy: which he was in his power to do, being now the ſtarre that guided the whole firmament, ſo for their parts, he ſhould find them alwayes diſpoſed and prepared both with their authority and, with their forces, to follow ſo holy an inclination, and honor him beſides with all other ſort of office and humilitie, whether he wold extēd them generally, or apply them to his particular intereſts. This anſwer albeit it contained no hope of concluſion, yet it bred not for all that any ouerture or beginning of war: for that both the ſickneſſe of the Marquis of Peſquero which aggrauated dayly in worſe degrees, & the deſire to impatroniſe himſelfe firſt of the whole eſtate of Millan, and to eſtabliſh and aſſure that conqueſt, together with the inclination of the Emperour extending to put end and reſolution to ſo many other affaires which he had in hand, would not ſuffer him to giue beginning to an enterpriſe of ſo great conſequence.

The Duke of Burbon in Spaine.

About this time the Duke of Burbon was arriued in Spaine, and came to the Emperours Court the ſiſteenth day of Nouember: concerning whom it is not reaſonable I omit, here to touch by the way, that albeit the Emperour receiued him with all honors and demonſtrations of Court, embracing him with the title and grace of his brother in law, yet all the Lords and Nobles of the Court accuſtomed in all other things to follow the example of their Prince, abhorred him as a perſon infamous, & called him traitor to his king: ſuch was their hatred againſt him, that one of them being required in the Emperours name to ſuffer his houſe to be made ready for the Duke of Burbon, answered in the courage and ſtoutneſſe of a Spaniard, that as he would not deny the Emperour any thing he would demaund of him, ſo his Maieſty ſhould well vnderſtand, that aſſoone as Burbon was gone out of his houſe he would burne it as a pallace infected with the infamy of Burbon and vnworthy afterwards for the dwelling of men of honor. The graces and honors which the Emperour ſhewed to the Duke of Burbon, augmented greatly the diſtruſt of the Frenchmen, who, ſomewhat by that meane, but more for the returning of the Lady Regent without effect; began to haue cold hopes in the accord, notwithstanding it was continually negociated by men expreſſe remaining with the Emperour: in reſpect whereof, they labored as much as they could to aduance the league with the Pope: wherein did concur the perſwaſions and authority of the king of England, and the redoubled and vehement inſtances of the Venetians, together with this oportunitie not of the leaſt conſequence. The death of the Marquis of Peſquero, who about that time, which was the beginning of December, made his laſt end happily by the juſt ſentence of God, who wold not ſuffer him to enioy the fruit of that ſeede which he had ſowne with ſo great malignity: He was of the houſe of Abalos originally deriued from Catalignia, and his predeceſſor came into Italy with king Alfonſo of Aragon, he who the firſt of that houſe made conqueſt of the kingdome of Naples: he began to follow armes at the battell of Rauenna, where, being very yong he was taken priſoner: and afterwards aſpiring to a reputatiō of a Captaine, he followed all the wars which the Spaniards had in Italy: inſomuch as though he had hot paſt the age of xxxvj. yeares, yet for experience he was old, for inuention ſuttle, in counſell graue, in execution reſolute, wiſe to foreſee a danger, and quicke to auoyd a miſchiefe: he bare great authority and credit with the infantry of Spaine, ouer whom as he had bene of long Captaine generall: ſo both the victory of Pania and all other actions of merit executed by that army ſince certaine yeares, were principally ſucceeded by his counſell and by his vertue: he was aſſuredly a Captaine of great valor, but one that with art and diſſimulation, knew how to draw fauor and grace to his doings, being beſides, proud of mind, of wit deceitfull, of nature malicious, of counſell and action without ſincerity, and ſo ſingular in his owne weening, that oftentimes he hath bene heard ſay, that he was more worthy to haue Spaine for his countrey then Italy. His death as it kindled a great confuſion in the whole army with whom he ſtood in no litle grace and reputation, ſo alſo by his death the contrary ſide tooke occaſion to hope, that eaſily they might be able to bringe all the ſouldiers to ruine and oppreſſion, ſince there was taken from them a Captaine of ſo great authoritie and valour. And by this occaſion like as with the Pope were more vehement and importunate the inſtances of ſuch as ſolicited the proceeding of the league, ſo alſo the doubts which detayned him in ſuſpence were nothing leſſe, and that with good right, ſince on all parts he was touched with motions of right waightie reaſons, ſuch as might ſuffice to hold confuſed and ſuſpenced any man of right good action and counſell, and much more a Pope Clement to whom it was familiar to proceede alwayes in his affaires affaires with slownesse and doubt. There was no further expectation of the Emperour for any way or deuise to assure the regions of Italy, and he was manifestly discerned to sollicite vehemently the taking of the Castell of Millan: in which action was layed a foundation to conuert many other patrimonies into apparant pray or spoyle, but specially the states of the Pope, who being reduced to a generall weakenesse, had his being planted betweene Lumbardy and the Realme of Naples. And if it were in the Emperours power to oppresse the Pope, there was no doubt that he would not execute it either for ambition which is almost naturally inuelted in Emperours against the Popes, or for his owne surety which wise men preferre afore all other regards, or lastly for reuenge, being drawne both to disdain and distrust for the conspiracies which he entertained with the Marquis of Pesquero: and if the necessity to provide for this danger, was great, the foundations and hopes to doe it seemed not light, for that if the remedy were not to succede by the meane of so mighty a league and vnion, it was to be thought desperate for euer. The Regent of Fraunce made promise of fise hundred launces, & to contribute for euery moneth so long as the warre should endure, forty thousand duckats, with the which it was intended to wage ten thousand Swissers: the Pope and the Venetians in one ioynt ayd, were to leuy eightene hundred men at armes, twenty thousand footemen, and two thousand light horsemen: the Frenchmen and the Venetians promised to take the sea, and with a great Navy to do inuasion vpon Genes, or the Realme of Naples: lastly the Lady Regent of Fraunce was bound to begin the war immediately with a strong army vpon the frontiers of Spaine, to the end to stop the Emperour for sending of men and mony to relecue the warre in Italy. The Emperours army that remained in Lumbardy was not great, neither for the numbers & quality of souldiers being much diminished, nor for the presence of Captaines of conduct and authority, seeing both the Marquis was dead, & the Duke of Burbon and the Viceroy of Naples abode as yet in Spaine: they were without meane to recouer mony for their payes, and had no plenty of victuals to serue them for foode: The generall inhabitants there, were enemies to them for the quarrell and desire of their Duke, and no lesse for the intollerable exactions imposed by the souldiers both in the City of Millan and elsewhere: the Castels of Millan and Cremona held good as yet for the Duke: and lastly the Venetians gaue hope that the Duke of Ferrara would also enter into his confederation, if the Pope would accord to him Reggia, which by one meanes or other he had alwayes possessed: these were the hopes of the confederates, which reduced to good manner of proceeding, caried their manifest reasons of happie issue: these were the foundations they layed against the ambition and puissance of the Emperour, shadowed neuerthelesse vnder the cloke and liuery to assure their proper liberties. But on the other side, the difficulties which they discerned, rested in the subtlety and vertue of the enemies, who had this by custome and property of condition, to temporise a long time with litle mony, and endure many necessities with much patience: they saw the townes which the enemies held, were well fortified, and no lesse facility to reduce them to better strength with ramparts, & other sort of fortification, for that they were townes whose situation was in the plaine or champion: by which oportunitie they were able to entertaine themselves together vntill there came from Germany a sufficient succor to draw and driue the whole warre to the fortune of a battell. Moreouer they saw that touching the souldiers of the league, they could not be but bodies raw & vntrained, in comparision of the others resolute and nourished in so many victories: besides they wanted the conduct and presence of a Captaine generall, for that in the Marquis of Mantua then Captaine of the Church, they reposed not sufficient ability to manage and beare out such a charge, neither could they with any surety commit themselves to the fidelity of the Duke of Ferrara nor the Duke of Urbino, whom they had so much offended, and much lesse would they rest contented with the greatnesse of the Pope, whom they enuied with no litle murmure and grudge of minde. Lastly they were not ignorant that naturally the armes and weapons of the Church had but dull edges and cut slowly, and no lesse inferiour was the valor of the Venetians, of whom if either of them apart and seuerally were weak and feeble, what opinion or expectation of their forces being accompanied and conioyned? This was also brought into consideration, that in the armies of leagues and confederates, was seldome seene a concurrancy of prouisions at conuenient time, and much lesse a correspondencie of willes and minds, for that amongst such a diuersitie of humors which draw with them diuersities of interestes and ends, are easily kindled disorders, disdain & distrusts, at the least there is seldome an vniuersall readines to follow resolutely the fauor of fortune when it is offered, nor a ioynt disposition to resist with constancy those stormes and aduersities which either the disfaour of the time or malicious instrument may stirre vp in an army. But the matter that in this counsellor deliberation drew with it great feare and difficulty, was a suspition conceiued of the Frenchmen, that whensoever the Emperour should be constrained by the necessities of this warre to offer the deliuey of their king, that nation would not onely handon the league, but also ioyne in ayde with the Emperour against the Confederates. And albeit the king of England gaue for them his faith and word of a Prince, that they should not accept of such a renuntiation, and that there was deuise to giue assurance in Rome, in Florence, or in Venice for three moneths pay, yet all this sufficed not to assure such a suspition. For, as the Frenchmen had no other end nor intention then to recouer their king, and did manifestly professe to beare no inclination to the warre, but when they saw no hope to effect the accord: so it was a thing verie congruent and likely, that whensoever the Emperour should be disposed, they would preferre afore all other regards and interestes, to compound and accord with him, and like as they were not ignorant that by how much were great and mighty the preparations and forces of the league, by so much more readily would the Emperour be inclined to compound with the French king: euen so it seemed a matter full of perill, to enter a confederation to make a warre in the which the strong prouisions of the confederates might do as much hurt as helpe. With these reasons did the Embassadors and agents of Princes labour the Pope on all sides, and no lesse was he solicited by his owne officers & ministers, for that both the multitude of his Court, and the people peculiar of his counsell, were deuided: of whom euery one in particular fauored his proper inclination, with so much lesse regard, by how much greater was the authority they had gotten vpon him, who till that time was accustomed to suffer himselfe to be caried for the most part by the will of such as in reason ought to haue obeyed the twinkling of his eye, and to serue no other office then as ministers and executers of the direction and ordinance of their maister: for the better information whereof and of many other occurrences, it is necessary to set downe a more large and particular discourse.

Pope Leo and Clement.

Leo was the first for the familie of Medicis that bare any Ecclesiasticall dignity, who in the state and authority of Cardinall, did so wel support both himselfe and his house, fallen from a wonderfull greatnesse into much declination, that it was reduced to respire and reexpect the returne of a great fortune: he was a man of great liberality, if such a name do worthily become him being of so excessiue expences as they passed all rate and measure. At such time as he was raised to the Popedom, he bore a presence of such magnificence and Maiesty, ioyned to a port and shew royall, that the representation he made might be thought wonderfull, euen in one that by long succession had descended of king and Emperours: he was not only prodigall of money and treasure, but also of all other graces and distributions belonging to the prerogative and power of a Pope. These he disposed in such immoderate liberality, that he made vile and base the authority spirituall, disordered the stile and course of the Court, and through his prodigall expenses, reduced himselfe to necessity to seeke mony alwayes by means extraordinary. This great facility was accompanied with a most deepe dissimulation, with the which he beguiled all the world in the beginning of his pontificacy: The thing that made him seeme a good Prince (I speake not of the goodnesse Apostolike, for that in those corrupted times, then is praised the bounty or goodnesse of the Pope, when it exceeds not the malignity of other men) was the opinion that was conceiued of his clemency, hauing a desire to do good to all men, and far estranged from inclination to offend any. Amongst his other felicities which were many & great, it was no litle happinesse to him to haue about him Iulio de Medicis his Cousin, whom notwithstanding he was not borne in lawfull mariage, yet he raised him to the estate of Cardinall, being before Knight of the order of Rhodes: for, Iulio being by nature graue to sound deeply into things, diligent in office and seruice, watchfull ouer affaires, not delighted in securitie and pleasure, but ordered and regulated in all things, & for his modesty hauing vnder his hands the administration of all the affaires of importance of the Popedom, did beare out and moderate many disorders which proceeded of his prodigall facility: yea such was his temperance and vertue working with a perpetuall care ouer the Pope, that forsaking the custome of all other cousins and bretheren of Popes, he preferred alwayes the honour and greatnesse of Leo, afore all friendships and foundations, which he might apply to his owne stability after the Popes death. And being withall no lesse obedient to him then faithfull, he seemed seemed in all his behauiours to be a second himself to him by whom he had receiued so high confidence. For this cause the Pope raised him euery day, and pushed on by gratifications and benefites the mind that serued him with so great studie and fidelitie: he reposed him selfe more and more vpon him touching affaires of greatest consequence, which being managed by two natures so different, shewed how wel oftentimes doth agree together the mixture of two cōtraries, straitnesse with facilitie, watchfulnesse with securitie, measure with prodigalitie, grauitie of manners with pleasures and idlenesse. Which things and the gouernment of them, made many belecue that Leo was caried by Iulio, being not able of himselfe to rule so great a charge, and no disposition to hurt any one, together with a vehement desire to enioy the fruits & delights of the Popedom. But of the contrary, they interpreted Iulio to be of a spirit ambitious, stirring, & addicted to innovations: so that all the rigours, all the actions, and all the enterprises of Leos time, were by imputation heaped vpon Iulio, whom they reputed a man malicious, though he caried a mind of magnanimitie and courage: which opinion of his valour was confirmed and increased after the death of Leo, for that amid infinite contradictions and difficulties objected against him, he supported the estate and countenance of his affaires with such a dignitie as resembled the person & place of a Pope: yea he so conserued his authoritie with the Cardinals, that making his entrie into two Conclaues absolute commander of sixteene voyces, he was at last made Pope within two yeares after the death of Leo, notwithstanding the many obtrusions and emulations of the most auncient Cardinals: and he entred into his Popedom with such an expectation, that it was thought he would become the greatest Pope, and bring to passe greater matters then euer did any that til that day had sate in that supreme seate. But it was found out afterwards how farre men were abused in their iudgements, both concerning Leo and him, since in Clement were discerned many conditions farre different from that which men beleueed of him before: for, there was not in him either that ambition or thirst after innouations and chaunges, or that greatnesse of courage and inclination of mind to noble and high enterprises, which was supposed before; yea he was interpreted to be about Leo, rather an executer and minister of his plots and purposes, then a framer and introducer of his counsels and wils. And albeit he was of wit verie apt and capable, and had a deepe science and insight in all the affaires of the world, yet when it came to points of resolution and execution, that propertie of gift was not correspondent to himselfe, for that it was not onely hindered by a certaine timorousnesse of spirite which was not little in him, together with a desire of niggardnesse and sparing; an humour hurtfull in a minde raised to high things: but also he was followed with a certaine irresolution and perplexitie, which was so naturall in him, that for the most part it kept him contained in suspence and doubt, euen when he was at point to establish things which he had aforetime with great foresight considered, measured, and almost resolved. By which it happened, that as well in his deliberations, as in the execution of his counsels, every trifling regard rising of new in his conceite, and every light impediment that appeared, seemed sufficient to leade him into the same confusion wherein he was afore he deliberated, being alwayes perswaded that after he had consulted, that counsell was the best which he had reiecte: for, in that case, calling onely into reckening and representation those reasons which he had not esteemed before, he forbore to reduce into discourse the arguments which had moued him to make such election, which being conformed and compared with the contraries, would haue made weaker the force and strength of the others, neither did he take experience by the memory of his naturall timorousnesse, to beware to slide into the passion and humour of vaine feare. In which disposition intangled, and maner of dealing confused, he suffered himselfe oftentimes to be transported and gouerned by his officers, in which case he seemed rather caried then counselled by them: of whom, these bare most authoritie with him, Nicholas Scombergh a Germane, and Mathew Gibert a Genouay: the one almost reuerenced and feared of the Pope, and the other loued and fauored with a singular affection: Scombergh was a disciple of Ierome Sauonarola, and of the order of Frear preachers whilest he studied the lawes, but afterwarde leauing his religion and profession, he retained onely the habite and the name, and followed the vocation of secular affaires: Gibert had bene bestowed verie young in the function of religion, but afterwards he left that vocation by the priuie of his father, and notwithstanding he was not borne in lawfull mariage, yet he disclaimed both the habite and the name of his profession. They two were of one societie & agreement together whilst he was Cardinall, & also in the beginning & entrie to his Popedom, bearing such a hand on him as they gouerned his thoughts, and drew his will to their wayes: but as amongst mortall men, there can be no perfect concord, where is no conformitie of conditions, beginning afterwards to disagree, either through ambition, or by the diuersitie of their natures, they brought ruine vpon him whom they had before supported, and led his affaires into greay confusion. For, Friar Nicholas either for that he was a Germaine of nation, which caried him to fauour immoderately the affaires of his countrey, or for some other regard mouing, bore great affection to the name of the Emperour, by which occasion, concurring also his obltinacie in his opinions which oftentimes were different from others, the Pope stood many wayes suspitious that he preferred more the profite of another, then was studious ouer the aduancements of his affaires. And touching the other, both by nature and all other respects of office, he was very deuout to the person of the Pope, whom he acknowledged alone for his Lord and maister, and simply caried verie carefull and studious impressions ouer his affaires. And albeit in the time of Leo he had bene a great enemy to the French, and fauored highly the affaires of the Emperour, yet after the death of that Pope he was conuerted into another humour and habite.

Thus these two principal ministers of the Pope being in manifest discord betweene themselves, neither proceeded in his affaires with soundnesse of counsell, nor for the honor of his person, with reuerence and regards agreeable; by which diuision, euery one knowing how irresolute and weake the Pope was of his owne condition, he was made contemptible and scorned to the world, by those men who ought with better modestie to haue couered his imperfections: insomuch as being priuie to his owne weakenesse, & by the propertie of his nature alwayes irresolute, he knew not what course to take in a deliberatiō so slippery & full of difficulties, seeing that those to whom it appertained to stay and resolue him, were the men that caried him into greatest confusion: so dangerous is it for Princes to haue faction and diuision in their counsels, which of all others haue the greatest facilitie to leade their persons and estates into perill of ruine and subuersion. Neuerthelesse at the last, more by necessitie to deliberate something, then by resolution or firme iudgement, and standing chiefly in these termes, that to deliberate nothing was in a kind to deliberate, he inclined to go through with the League, and in companie of the residue to begin the warre against the Emperour: wherein they fell to accord, and drew the capitulations into particulars, wanting no other thing then to giue his full perfection at such time as he receiued newes that the Commandator Erraro whom the Emperour sent to him, was arriued at Rome. He was thought to be sent in diligence with some good and gracious dispatch; in which respect the Pope determined to attend his comming, which droue the Embassadors to complaine, whom he had assured to passe the same day the confederation. The cause of his comming was; that the Emperour after he had sent such a commission to the Marquis of Pesquero, to retaine at the least in his power to impatronise him selfe vpon the estate of Millan, and fearing least by that occasion there were incensed some new stirres in Italy, did begin to debate more straitly and sincerely of the accord with the Legate Saluatio, so that there passed betweene them one capitulation (reseruing neuerthelesse the condition of the ratification by the Pope) wherein both he was satisfied touching the restitution of Reggia and Rubiera, & also the defence and conseruation of the Duke of Millan was comprehended in it; matters which the Pope did principally desire. Moreouer it was expressly set downe, that if the Duke should die, the Emperour neither should retaine that Dukedome, nor giue it to the Archduke his brother, but should inuest it in the Duke of Burbon, which the Pope very vndiscreetly by the setting on of the Archbishop of Capua, had accorded vnto, together with George of Austria brother to the Emperour Maximilian, at such time as the life of Francis Sforce was almost holden desperat. Assoone as the capitulation was made, the Legat not tarying for Pope Clement to giue it perfectiō, either could not or would not refuse to present the Emperour with the writ of dispensatiō for his mariage so much desired: which for that it was made before, only with mentiō of stop & impediment to the second degree without naming the king of Portugals daughter for offending the king of England, or because there was betweene the a double bond of affinity, there was no mentiō made but of the bond that was most strōg: it was thought necessary to make another, which with expresse mention of the persons, contained all the impediments. The Commandator Erraro departed from the Emperours Court with the dispatch of this cōfederation, about a day or two after the Emperour was aduertised of the imprisoning of Moron: & coming to the Popes court the vij. of Decēb. he was brought to his presence, where after he had presented presented to him many offers, with the like information of the good will of the Emperour, he delivered him the capitulations, in which albeit the articles touching the salt and matters of benefice within the realme of Naples, were contrarie to that which had bene solicited and resolved by the Viceroy: yet for that his principall end was to be assured of suspitions, he had allowed and accepted them, if he had found a sincere proceeding touching the Duchie of Millan. But seeing in the article concerning Frauncis Sforce, was contained no mention of the imputation made against him, neither promising to render the estate that was taken from him, nor to pardon his faults committed, their art and subtleties were easily discerned, the rather for that the Emperour in the conclusion made with the Legate, and in the instructions given to his Agent, seemed to take no knowledge of such things: for the confederation made to defend and preserve Frauncis Sforce in the Dukedome of Millan, deprived not the Emperour of power to proceed against him as against his vassall, and to declare the freehold to be confiscated for the conspiracie supposed vpon him, against his Maiestie: and Burbon suborned to be Duke in case of his death, was also to succcede in case of his priuation, for that by the lawes is considered the death naturall and the death ciuill, by which they iudge that man to die, who is condemned for such a crime. For this cause the Pope answered with verie graue speeches, that as he had no particular matter of discord with the Emperour, so touching all differences and contentions that might happen betweene them, he would for his part chuse no other arbitrator or iudge then his Maiestie: only he held it necessarie to establish so good an order for the publike affaires, as Italy might remaine assured, which could not be done vnlesse he restored to Frauncis Sforce the Duchie of Millan. Lastly he layed afore him reasons, prouing why a Capitulation so generall was not sufficient, concluding that it would bring no small grieffe to him to be driuen to that necessitie, to enter into new deliberations and counsels, and to be made estranged from the Emperour, with whom he had alwayes bene most firmly conioyned. To these the Duke of Sessa replied with reasons iustificatorie, that as the Emperour had alwayes a sincere and vpriight intention: so he assured that his Maiestie was well contented that notwithstanding the accidents happened and past, the Duchie of Millan should remaine to Frauncis Sforce: onely if the article especiall of that clause (through mistaking) were not set downe in sufficient and ample forme, it was referred to the Pope to reforme it according to his will and discretion, promising for the Emperour, to present to him within two moneths the ratification, so farre forth also as he would giue his word not to conclude during that time the League which was negociated with the gouernment of Fraunce and the Venetians. It was clearly discerned, that this offer had no other foundation then a desire to temporise and winne a respite or time of two moneths, to the ende to giue vnto the Emperour a better leisure to take good counsels, and leaue conuenient remedies against so strong a League. Neuerthelesse after many contentions and disputations, the discontentment of the Embassadors concurring, the Pope consented to that demaund, as well by desire and reason to enter as slowly as he could into expences and troubles, as also for this pollicie, that so long as the French king continued in the condition of a prisoner, all contracts and confederations made with the Regent of Fraunce would be fealous and dangerous, for that the Emperour would alwayes retaine a power to dissolue and breake them as often as he list. Also he iudged, that by this respite or delay interposed, the Emperour might with more facilitie obtaine his purpose, notwithstanding there was no great apparance of hope: and if by that were wrought the accord betweene the two kings, he made this deepe consideration (though many iudged against it) that it were better to passe in a time when the Emperour stood in least necessitie, for that by how much his affaires were aduanced or stood in good traine, by so much more rude would be the conditions he would offer to the French king, which being seuer and rigorous, he supposed the king wold not obserue them after he were possessed of his libertie. There was also added to that treatise, that during the said time there should be no new enterprise embraced, nor no action executed against the Castle of Millan, so far forth as Frauncis Sforce wold be bound not to do any molestation vpon those that lay without, which condition he would not accept.

The yeare of the natiuitie of the sonne of God 1525 being runne out in these actions more disposed to warre then to peace, there followed successiuelly the yeare 1526, which being replenished with great accidents, brought a face of wonderful troubles. In the beginning of this yeare the Commandator Erraro returned to the Emperour with letters subsigned & written with the Popes owne hand, by the which he neither denied nor confessed the conspiracies practise against him, but laying the fault vpon the Marquis of Pesquero, he laboured to excuse Frauncis Sforce, whom he alleaged (if he had offended at all) to be abused by the counsels of Ierome Alaron, beseeching him with termes of great affection, that for the benefit and quiet of all Chusterdome, he would preferre his clemencie afore his iustice. At this time the Emperour expecting the answer of the Pope, held in suspence the negotiations and practises of all Princes, and albeit he had exercised great grace, fauour, and honor vpon the Duke of Burbon, promising with speed to aduance the consummation of the mariage betweene his sister & him, yet when Burbon vrged the accomplishing of his word and promise, he was answered with euasions and delays, such as made the matter doubtful and the Duke discontented. Neuerthelesse to satisfie him with some reasonable or apparant excuse, he was caried ouer with this, that the Emperour wold first giue perfection to his owne mariage with the infant of Portugal, who was expected from one day to another, but in true meaning that excuse drew this draught, to leaue alwayes in the power and will of the Emperour (notwithstanding his promise to the Duke of Burbon) to giue her to wife to the french king if the accord went on: such is the ordinarie humor of some Princes, to be caried rather with considerations of profit, then with care of honestie. Now after the Emperours mariage was consummated at Seul in Spaine, the commaundator Erraro arriued at the Court, with the breuiat of the article concerning Frauncis Sforce; which article the Pope had deduced at large in his fauor. So that the Emperour, being also assured that the Legate Saluiario had no commission to conclude any thing but according to that article, and his whole Counsell thinking it necessarie to stop and hinder the league that was in hand, & no lesse dangerous to haue to do at one time with so great a number of enemies, he saw himselfe reduced to these termes, either to content the Pope & the Venetians by restoring Frauncis Sforce to the Duchie of Millan, or else to compound with the French king, who for his part, after long arguing and disputation for the countrey of Burgundie, and finding that without the price of it, he could not hope for his deliuerie by the Emperour, offered to render it with all the apertenances and dependancies, and to renounce all titles and rights which he had to the kingdome of Naples and Duchie of Millan, and to assure the obseruation of his promise by the ostage of two of his sonnes. The disputations were great vpon the election of the one or the other way, wherein the Viceroy insisted more vehemently then euer, both for that he had the conduct of the French king into Spaine, & had nourished him with many braue hopes of his deliuerie vnder easie conditions. His authoritie was great with the Emperour, and his reputation nothing inferiour, both for that the Emperour reposed much in his fidelitie, and trusted him because he knew he loued him: but there opposed against him Mercurio Gattinaro, a man of base descending in the countrey of Piedmont, and by his vertue raised to the place of high Chauncellor to the Emperour, and for his experience and credit, had managed of long time all the affaires of the Court of most importance. One day the Emperour sitting really in counsell to resolve absolutely the matters that had bene discoursed so many moneths, these two were also present, of whom the Chauncellor tooke occasion to reason in this sort.

married to the daughter of Portugall.

Oration of the Chauncellor.

I haue alwayes feared, least our too great greedinesse concurring with the immoderate endes we aspire vnto, would be the cause, that of so singular and honorable a victorie, we reaped in the end neither glorie nor profite: but I could neuer be induced by any argument or reason, that by your victorie. (ô gracious Emperour) either your estate or your reputation should fall into danger; a matter which now appeareth manifestly, since there is question to conclude an accord, by the which all the regions of Italy shall be reduced to a condition desperate, which can not but bring infamie to your name; and the French king deliuered vp to his libertie, but vnder so vnequal conditions, that he will continue a greater enemy to you then before, though not of will which haply he may restraine and temper, yet by necessitie, which is alwayes a mightie motion to moue men to reuenge. For my part, I could wish with as great shew of affection as others, that at one time and by one meane, your Maiestie might recouer Burgundy, and also establish foundations of your imperie in Italy: but vaine is the wit that aspieth to hold the thing which the hād is not able to gripe; and in the propertie of worldly things, there is nothing more full of error, then that ambition which goeth on working in the humor of weening only, and lookes not back to order and reason, which are the assured lines that lay out the infallible successe of euery mortal actiō. But this I know, that that Prince who suddenly embraceth many things, is in perill to effect nothing,

For that all those things are put to aduenture, that are guided by will and not by reason. That fire, that is mightily kindled hath much ado to be quenched, but when vpon one fire riseth manie flames, whose propertie is to flie with the wind into many places, it can not be that the burning will not be great, yea oftentimes extended to the consuming of him that first kindled it. I see no reason to induce vs to thinke, that the french king being deliuered, will obserue the articles of so great importance, since he is not ignorant, that in making you Lord of Burgundy, he layeth open such a gap to leade you into the bowels of France, that it will be alwayes in your electioⁿ to run vp to the gates of Paris: and he knoweth well enough, that when he hath once put into your hand the power to vex France in so many places, he hath left to him selfe no possibilitie to make resistance against you. Doth not he know & all the world see, that to consent that you go to Rome with an armie, is no other thing then to giue you a raine, with whose bridle you may checke all Italy, & authoritie to dispose according to your liking, of the estate spirituall and temporall of the Church, and by that meane your puissance being redoubled, you shal for alwayes after neuer want money nor forces to offend him? And who doubteth that of this greatnes he maketh this conclusion, that he shall be constrained to accept all such lawes as it shal please you to impose vpon him. Is it then reasonable to beleue, that he will obserue an accord by the which he is made your slaue and you his Lord? Where is feruitude hatefull, if not in the mind whom nature hath borne to so ueraigntie? and how can it be thought that he will liue vnder the yoke of subiection, whose ambition could not hitherunto be contained within the large limits of France. But be it, that in the king will be found no want of conscience to obserue the conditions of the contract, yet he may be ouercaried by a naturall compassion by the complaints and lamentations of his kingdome, and by the perswasions of the king of England accompanied with the incitation of all Italy. It may be that by the law of amitie that is betweene you two, he will repose confidence in you, or at least looke into the power you are of: but was there euer two Princes betweene whom haue bene greater causes of hatred and contention? There is not onely betweene you a recipocall ielousie of greatness; a matter apt to stirre vp one brother against another, but also your common emulation is pushed on by many ancient and great quarels begun in the times of your fathers and great grandfathers, many long warres betweene those two houses, many peaces and accords not obserued, many harmes done, and many iniuries receiued. There is no quarell more mortall then that which rakech his nouriture in tract and prescription of time, nor atie hatred so daungerous as that which lyeth smothered like fire couered with hote imbers, by whom the heate is preserued to a greater power of burning. To the minde that is iniured, there is nothing so sweete as the passion of reuenge; and by how much the offence is auncient and inueterate, by so much more incurable is the humour of reuenge, and more heauie the stroke where it lighteth. We may beleue that the Kings minde burneth with disdain, when he remembreth how manie moneths he hath bene your prisoner, with what seueritie he hath bene kept vnder straite and sure gard, and neuer was fauoured so much as to speake to you or see you. Besides, in this calamitie of imprisonment, he hath passed so many perplexities and perils as had almost brought him to the ende of his mortall life; causes not litle materiall to make him highly incensed, besides the despite of his other iniuries, sufficient to draw on his desire to be reuenged: and now he seeth we go about to deliuer him, not through magnanimitie or amitie, but by necessitie and feare of so great a confederation conspired against vs. Do we thinke that parentage made by necessitie, is more mightie, then so many vehement incitations? Do we not know how much Princes esteeme of such bonds? And who can yeeld a better testimonie then our selues, of the estimation and reckening of parentages? But it may haply seeme to some, that we shall be greatly assured by the faith he will giue to returne againe into prison. O weake foundations and full of frailtie! O hopes vnperfect and drawing more perill then suretie! O counsell vndiscreete, which hath no societie with wisdom and forecast! The grieve I haue to see vs disposed to take a course so hurtfull and daungerous, makes me burst out into this libertie of plaine speech. This boord is not ignorant, what reckoning is made of faith and word giuen, when there is question of interests of estate, neither are we to learne of what force are the promises of the Frenchmen, who though they be open and plaine in all other things, yet in this regard let vs thinke them Schoolemaisters most perfect in deceiuing and abusing. And for the King, he hath naturally a readie tongue to promise, and a slow hand to perfourme, and by custome is so much the more hard and sparing in effects, by how " much he is plentifull and prodigall in wordes and speeches. Vpon which I gather this reasonable

 " conclusion, that neither the respect of good will betweene two Princes, who haue for an auncient " inheritance, iniuries and offences, nor the memory of benefites, which neuer was any, nor the con" sideration of faith & promises, which in controuersie of matters of estate importeth nothing with
 " the Frenchmen, will haue any force to induce him to follow an accord, which listeth vpon his enemy
 " into heauen, and throweth his own person & his kingdome into manifest subiection: where it may " be objected that for feare of these things, & the better to assure your Maiestie, you demand two " of his children (of whom one to be the eldest) whose loue wil containe him more, then the price of " Burgondie: I answer that the loue of those children will rather cause the contrarie, specially when
 " the memorie of them shall moue in the cogitations of his minde, & consideration that to obserue
 " the accord, would be the beginning to make them your slaues: it is doubtfull that such a pawne
 " will not be sufficient, if he should be altogether desperate to recouer it in other sort: for that as it " is a thing that much importeth to put his Realme in daunger, which being once lost is hard to be
 " recouered: so neuertheless he may haue many hopes to redeeme his children either with the fa-
 " uour of time, or by the benefite of accord, or by the oportunitie of some other occasion, and yet
 " in respect of their base age the expectation wil not be grieuous to him. Besides, standing in termes
 " to draw into vnicie against you almost all the Princes of Christendome, who doubteth not but he " will confederate with them? who seeth not that he will seeke to moderate that accord by the " way of warre and armes? and who knoweth not that case, the gaine and profite which we shall
 " reape by this victorie, will bring vpon vs a most strong and daungerous warre, stirred vp by the " desperate hatred of the French King, by the burning ielousie of the King of England, and by the " generall necessitie of all the Potentates in Italie: against whom how shall we be able to defend
 " our selues, vnlesse God continue dayly to worke the same miracles for vs which he hath so often " done till this time, or vnlesse fortune for our sakes, chaunge her nature, and reduce her inconstan" cie and lightnesse to an example of constancie and firmenesse contrary to all experience past? how " many monethes haue we concluded in our counsels, to do all that we could to let the Italian
 " for vnicing with the house of Francke: and now we throw our selues rashly into a deliberation
 " which takes away all difficulties that till this houre haue kept them in suspence: a matter which
 " multiplieth our daungers, and increaseth the forces of our enemies, since it is not to be doubted
 " that that league will be more strong and mightie which shall haue for a head, the French King
 " standing in his freedome and in his kingdome, then that which should be contracted with the " house of Francke and the King remaine your prisoner. There is no other thing which till this day
 " hath detained the Pope from entring confederation against you, then the feare he had that you " would alwayes separate the French from the residue, in offering to them the libertie of their king" dom but lesse will be their feare of such a matter, when you shall haue the children who import not " much, and dismisse the father vpon whose person resteth the ballancing of all things: so that by " this meane, the medicine which we haue sought to apply to preuent our daunger, will become " without all comparison the chiefe poyson and instrument of our perill, and in place to breake this
 " vnion we shall be the meane to enforce it and make it more firme and puissant. But me thinkes I
 " see some ready to aske my aduise: and whether I will counsell your Maiestie to draw no profit
 " of so great a victorie, and to suffer you to dwell alwayes vpon these doubtles and perplexities; to " whom I answer & confirme eftsloones the similitude I haue spoken many times, that it is a matter
 " too hurtfull to receiue so much meate at one time as the stomacke can not beare: and that it is " necessarie, either by returning into amitie with Italie, which demaunds nothing of vs but to be " assured, to get of the French King both Burgondie and as much else as we can: or else to make a " composition with him (by the which Italie may remaine at our discretion) but so easie touching
 " his interests, as he may haue cause to obserue the conditions of it. In the election of the one of these " two wayes it appertaineth to your Maiestie in pollicie and forecast to preferre that which indeed
 " is most stable and iust, afore that which at the first shew may haply seeme most great and most " profitable. I confesse the Duchie of Millan is an estate more rich and more commodious for ma" ny regards, then Burgondie, and that there can no amitie passe with Italie, vnlesse Millan be tra" nsferred either to Frauncis Sforca; or to some other of the Popes liking: and yet I rather allow to " do this, then to accord with the Frenchmen, for that Burgondie appertaineth to you with better
 " equitie and iustice then Millan, & beareth more facilitie to be maintained then a countrey where no person that willett you good . To seeke to get Burgondie your auncient inheritance , is an action of great worthinesse and prayse: but to aspire after Milane either to your owne vse, or for any other that dependeth wholly vpon you, can not be without manifest notes of ambition. The one calleth you to it by the honorable memorie of so many your predecessors, whose bones lying buried in captiuitie, call vpon you to be deliuered & redeemed by your vertue, whose compassion accompanied with their iust, pitifull, and holy desires, may haply moue God to be more fauorable to the action. Your Maiestie must consider that it is a more discret and easie counsell, to establish an amitie with him that vnwillingly becomes your enemy, then with one who in no time can be your friend: for there will neuer be in the French king but a perpetual hate and desire to oppose against your doings : where the Pope and the other Potentates of Italie being once assured of all suspicion by the reuoking of your armie that is in Lombardie, wil haue no occasion of controuersie with you, neither through ielousie wherein they will be satisfied, nor by feare which then will be resolved into assurance, and remaining your friends, you shall draw from them both now and alwayes a greater commoditie and profite : so that there are to leade your Maiesties inclination to this amitie , not onely the consideration of honour, which ought to be most familiar with great Princes, not only the regard of profite, which fashioneth haughtie mindes to reason and facilitie: not onely the respect of iuretie , which to Princes and peoples is the sweetest end and reward of their warres and contentions , but also the operation of necessitie , which about all other motions in the mindes of men, carrieth them violently to resolution and accord. For, be it that you compound with the King , and bind him to no other thing then to ayde you in the enterprises of Italie, yet it is not likely he will obserue it, since this will be his opinion, that in leauing you Italie for a pray, he should so much the more imbarke his owne Realme in perill and desperate danger: where on the other side, his hopes and oportunities will be great that by the compulsion of so mightie an vnion he shall be able to vex and trauell you, and in the end to reduce you to accord vnder easie conditions: so that of a king whom we hold prisoner, we shall not only giue him libertie, but also prepare him to be our enemy, & send home to the realme of France, a soueraigne chieftaine or leader, to the end that ioyning with the residue, he might raise war against vs, both with greater forces and with more profite. How much better were it to confederate with the Italians, who haue the same conformitie of reasons with vs? How much more necessary to contract a firme and true alliance with the Pope, who hath continually desired it? And how much assured to remoue from the French all hope to ioyne with the Italians, seeing that in that case not onely necessity or feare of new leagues, but also euen your owne will and quality of the conditions, will draw you to accord with the French. Then shal you see that their vniuersall necessity and dispaire of their common condition, will constrain them not onely to deliuer vp Burgondie into your handes, and to follow you with greater offers, but also to assure them with such obligations and ostages, that you shall not need to doubt the obseruation: for the which his children are not sufficient pawns so long as they hope to effect so great an vnion : and scarcely will suffice the townes of Bayon & Narbona if they put them into your hands, nor an army at sea. This is the way to draw of your victory a fruit plentiful, honorable, comely and sure: and otherwise (if I haue any insight in the matters of the world) by this accord you shall embark your estate into so great dangers, that I see no way to deliuer you, vnlesse the indiscretio of the french king may haply be greater than ours.

This oration, what with eloquence and good disposition of the matter, ioyned with the reputation and wisdom of the man, wrought much in the mindes of the greatest parte of the councell : but the Viceroy being of an other humor, pronounced a contrary opinion in this sorte:

If it be a fault blameable in such men as through the motion of worldly appetite and ambition, Oration of the Viceroy. seeke to embrace more then they are able to hold, the offence is no lesse in mine opinion, in others who eyther by too many suspitions or too much incredulity, do willingly deprive themselves of great occasions gotten with many difficulties and dangers: but if there be property of honour in both, obseruing the quality of the persons in whome they raigne, that which proceedeth of feare and abiection of mind, is more to be reprehended and condemned in a great prince, then that which moueth of an inclination heroicall and true greatnes of spirit and courage. And seeing it is to great things that the thoughts of great princes ought to be raised and dressed, it cannot but be more agreeable to their merite and vertue, to seeke to winne much with hazard and danger, then by avoiding of perill which is but casuall, to lose or corrupt such occa-fions as very rarely happen to mortall men. This is the very course laid out to your Maieſty by the Lord Chauncellor, who doubting that by this accord Burgundy and Millan may not be obta-ned, (we muſt not think he is pulled on eyther with the loue of Italy which is his country, or with the benefit or good turne that he wiſheth to the Duke of Millan) hath made a reſolution of a way by the which as he ſaith, we ſhall get Burgundy and loſe Millan, an eſtate without compariſon of greater importance. But I feare that in following that deuife, as we ſhall not onely loſe Millan and not winne Burgundy, ſo alſo where your Maieſty hath with great glory opened you a way to the imperie and iuriſdiction of all Chriſtendome, there will remaine no other fruite of it if you take your direction by his counſell, then great damage accompanied with perpetuall infamy; effects which in all reaſonable ſort your Maieſty is to auoid, leaſt through indiſcretion and ſiniſter counſell of one priuate man, you blemiſh the reputation and valour of ſo many princes and braue Captains, who vnder the felicity and fortune of your name fought for the victory which you now haue: ſo wil the world thinke you more apt to get then able to hold, & leſſe worthy of glory then meet to manage it. For my part much leſſe that I can diſcerne any ſurety in the counſell he hath giuen, ſeeing of the contrary it brings lurking vnder many tokens of manifeſt danger, and ſome apparances of a litle profite and yet eaſy to ſlide out of our hands, not without our ſhame, and your indignity: Where on the contrary, in compounding with the French king, your Maieſty ſhall reape glory, which eſpecially followeth the name of Emperours, it will bring you profit which is a ſweet reward of victories, and it will giue you a ſufficient affu-rance of your eſtates, which is the happieſt end and conſequence of warre and controuerſies betweene Princes. I aſke this queſtion of the Lord Chauncellor, vnder what reaſon, vnder what ſurety, and vnder what fidelity he doth warrant or promiſe that the Italians after we haue left them the Duchie of Millan, will obſerue the accord, and will not intermeddle with the affaires that ſhall paſſe betweene the French king and vs? Yea rather after they haue embaiſed our reputation, after they haue corrupted the army that now holdeth them in bridle, and after they ſhall be aſſured that no new companies of Launceknights can come into Italy, becauſe there is no place of retrait for them, I aſke againe with what humor the Lord Chauncellor can answer for the Italians, that they will not recontinue their practiſes, and threatening the kingdome of Naples which will almoſt remaine at their diſcretion, they will not riſe and force vs to deliuer the French king?

 If it be good to prouide that a miſchiefe happen not, it is better not to looſe the oportunity of the remedy that is proper for it, ſince there can be no great danger to defend the harme that ſtandes in feare of a remedy to reſiſt it. It is farre from reaſon for my Lord Chauncellor to repoſe confidence in Francis Sforce, to acknowledge the benefites that your Maieſty ſhall do to him, ſeeing he hath already ſo ill obſerued your honorable liberalities, and with treaſons hath recompenced the fauours you haue vſed to him. But what expectation of conſpiracie and worſe dealing, when he ſeeth a deſire to call him to iuſtice, and to puniſh by ſentence of the law, the vn-thankfulnes he hath pretended with ſo great iniquity: and what feare will he haue of your puniſhment, when he expecteth his ſafety by the deliuerance of your enemies? He will not care to offend you, that feareth not your puniſhment: and that puniſhment will he not hold grieuous, which either he ſuppoſeth to ſuffer for innocencie, or is aſſured of his meane of deliuerie. And leſſe reaſon is there to induce you to haue confidence in the Venetians, for that beeing by nature enemies auncient to the Crowne of the Empire and the houſe of Austria, cannot yet but tremble vnder the memorie of Maximilian your grandfather, who tooke from them manie of thoſe townes which they poſſeſſe at this daie. The mind poſſeſſed with iniurie and wrong, can neuer be made aſſured: and where the remembrance of the harmes done remaineth without recompence or conciliation, there is nothing leſſe certaine then fidelitie, and nothing more fraile then the freindſhips they profeſſe. Touching Pope Clement, there is no reaſon of confidence, either in his vertue, or in his inclination to the Emperour, ſince the firſt alliance that Pope Leo made with him after he had attempted manie things againſt vs, was, for deſire either to be reuenged, or to be aſſured againſt the frenchmen, and for ambition to occupie Ferrara: and after him, the Pope raigning being hated of the one moitie of the world, continued by neceſſitie (after the death of Leo) in your amitie, but beeing become Pope, he returned immediatlie to the nature of Popes, which is both to feare and hate the Emperours, and for his part he hath nothing in more horror then the name of the Emperour. I confeſſe theſe reaſons may be answered with excuſes,

excuses, and it may be alleged that their complots and enterprises tooke no proceeding of hatred or ambition, but only of suspition and ieaousy of your greatnesse, which being ceased, all their conspirations will take ende. But it may be answered, that either this is not true, or if at the beginning it hath bene true, it hath now by necessitie taken other roote, and become an other humor, for that it is a thing naturall that hatred followeth suspition, and offences and vexations come after hatred, and after offences men draw to alliance and amity with the enemies of him whom they haue offended, labouring to raise practises not onely for their proper suretie, but also to make their profite of him whom they haue offended. Nature hath sowne in man seeds of hatred and reuenge, and though the lawes hold it more iust to reuenge an iniurie then to do it, yet kind and nature sheweth that both the one and the other proceede of one imbecillity. Besides, the remembrance of wrongs is farre greater and more stirring in the mind of him that doth them, then in him that receiue them: so that where in the beginning suspition onely would set them vp and make them to moue, the same would be also the cause to make them become our enemies, to cary them both in inclination and in hope to the French part, and then to beginne to cantonize and make a diuident of the Realme of Naples, as they haue done in all contracts past. And now let vs giue them what surety we will, and inferre what accord we can, we shall find kindled in their stomackes the same hatred and feare that before, with mindes not disposed to repose confidence in that, which to their seeming we shall do through necessity. In so much as vnder an opinion they may haue the more easily to raunge vs to their wils, and fearing least in the end there runne betweene the French king and vs a new appointment semblable to that which was made at Cambray, and lastly desiring according to their owne phrases to deliuer Italy of strangers, they will not stick to presume to rise vp to giue you lawes, and to demand at your hands the deliuey of the French king; a matter which if your Maiesty refuse, I see not how you can defend against them the kingdome of Naples, and in according that, you lose all the fruits of your victory, besides a manifest dishonor and reiectiō that will stand vpon your name for euer. But let vs lay the case that Italy will performe and obserue the accord, and necessity constrainē you either to leaue Millean or not to recouer Burgundy, yet in iust comparisō there is great difference betwene the one and the other: Burgundy is a countrey of litle circuit, of small reuenue, and nothing answering the commodities that are perswaded to be there: where the Duchie of Millean, both for the riches and reputation of so many Cities; for the number and noblenes of subiects, for the liberall and plentifull reuenues, and for the oportunitie and sufficiencie to nourish all the armies of the world, carieth more value and price then many kingdomes: and yet besides the amplitude and puissance of it, you haue to make a greater reckening of the commodities that may reuert to you by conquering it, then of the simple accompt and valuation of it selfe: for Millean and Naples being at your deuotion, it followeth by congruent necessity that the Popes, as aunciently they are wont, must depend vpon the authoritie of Emperours: That all the region of Tuscane, the Duke of Ferrara, and the Marquis of Mantua must be your subiects: and the Venetians being enuironed with Lombardy and Germany, stand in case to accept lawes at your hand: and so not with force & armes displaid, but with a glorious reputation of your name, with the only summons of a Herald, & with the enseignes of the empire, you shall comand absolutely ouer all Italy. Lift but vp your Maiesties mind to the consideratiō of Italy, & you shall find it with great right esteemed the supreme seate of all other prouinces, both for the oportunitie of situation, for temperature of aire and Climate, for the excellency of wits enclined to all honorable enterprises, for the fertility of all things necessary to the life of man, for the stately representatiō of so many noble Cities, for the soueraigne seat of religion, and for the ancient glory of the empire. To which praises as I may aptly adioine the comodity of imperry which it brings, extending so far in your person, that if you comand ouer it, the sound of your name and authority runneth fearful in the eares of other Princes: so it can not but belong to your greatnes and to your glory, to raise your thoughts to this which is an actiō more agreable to the bones of your elders (seeing they are brought into counsell) who for their bounty and piety, we are not to belieue do desire any other thing then what is most couenient & agreeable to the glory of your name: so that, according to the counsell of the Lord Chauncellor, we shall lose a matter of great price and value, for a thing of right small conquest, & yet wrapt in many vncertainties, wherein we ought to stand warned by that which was like to happen certaine moneths past. Do we not remember the great greife that fell amongst vs when

" the French king lay in danger of death, which griefe proceeded of no other humor then a know" ledge we had that with his life we should lose the fruit we hoped for by the victorie. And who can " now assure vs that the like accident will no more reuert vpon him: yea who feareth not the relapse
 " with more facilitie, both for that the reliques of his malady do yet possesse him, and also the hope
 " which till now hath supported him, being taken away, who doubteth not but his griued mind
 " will heape vpon him greater fits of sorrow and discontentment, the only cause of his sicknesse, es-
 " specially new condicions and assurances being interposed, it can not be that for their hardnesse
 " they make not the negociation long and tedious; a matter subiect to the former accident and " haply to others both more great and dangerous. We are not ignorant, that nothing hath so long
 " retained the gouernment and counsell of France, as an opinion they haue had of the speedy de" liuery of their king. In which humor of expectation the Nobles and Chieftaines of that Realme, " haue remained peaceable & conformable to the Lady Regent: but when they find the foundati" ons of this hope to faile, who doubteth not that the Barons of that Realme will not easily enter-
 " to minds of despite and reuenge, and with an vniuersall conformity, change the course of the go-
 " uernment: strong is the operation of ambition, and no lesse violent the passion and thirst after im-" pery and soueraignty, specially where is seene no meane to make resistance against so mighty mo" tions: which I allude to the disposition of France, where, if the greatnes of the kingdome get once
 " the bridle in their hand, much lesse that they will be carefull ouer the deliuary of their king, see" ing of the contrary their ambition will cary them to maintaine an estate of liberty, and aspiring to " establish supremacy in them selues, what will it offend them to suffer the captiuitie of their king?
 " and so in place to get Burgundy and so many other great conquests, what other thing do we re-
 " taine, then a desperate hope both by his imprisonment, and by his deliuary? But this further que" stion may be asked of the Lord Chauncellor, whether the Emperour in this resolution ought to " regard the reckening and reputation of his dignity and his maiesty: then what greater infamy, or
 " what more diminution of his honor, can he receiue then to haue his clemency forced, and con" strained to pardon Francis Sforce, he who lately being half dead, detected of manifest rebellion,
 " and a singular example of ingratitude, not coming to humility nor imploring your mercy, but run" ning betweene the armes of your enemies to seeke to force you to render to him the estate which
 " so iustly hath bene taken from him, and compell you to take lawes of him, who by equity of con" demnation ought to beare subiection to your imperiall name. It were better for your Maiesty,
 " more agreeable to the dignity of the Empire, and more worthy your greatnes and puissance, to lay " out your selfe to a new fortune, and to referre estoones all things to hazard and danger, then in " blemishing the authority of the Prince soueraigne ouer all Princes, and the name of the Emperour,
 " and hauing so oftentimes vanquished so mighty a king, to receiue at the hands of Priests and Mar-
 " chants, such condicions, as if you had bene ouerthrowne there could not haue bene offered to " you either more vnjust or more vnworthy. Honor and dignity are the gifts of god, which by how " much they are basely esteemed of those to whome they are transferred, by so much more is highly " offended the eternall goodnes that gaue them, who will estoones reuokethem with no small indig-
 " nation. That man can not be accompted worthy of honor, that declareth him self not able to vie
 " it, since honor is a reward or effect of vertue, who enableth to honor and dignity those persons to " whome her selfe is conioined. So that, most gracious Emperour, calling estoones into considera" tion all these reasons, both how litle profit may resort to you by the accord with the Italians, and
 " by how many accidents it may easily slide out of your hands, how litle assurance or shew of fide" lity is in them, and how vnworthy a thing it is to leaue the estate of Milan. And lastly that it is " necessary for vs to sort at last to a resolution, and that the imprisonment of the king profiteth vs
 " not but in regard of the fruits that may be drawne of his deliuary. I stand firme & conclude vpon
 " this aduise, that we compound rather with the king then accord with the Italians; a matter which " can not be denied to be more glorious, more reasonable, and more profitable, so farre forth as " we may be assured of the obseruation. Wherin I discern some good foundation in this, that for a " more thankfull acknowledging of your benefite, he offereth to take to wife your sister, a Lady for " her vertue and staied condition, very well able and conuenient to entertaine you in amity. Besides
 " the oblation of two of his sons, of whom one to be the eldest, which is such a property of pawne
 " and ostage, as amongst worldly men & to assure worldly things, there can not be offered nor recei-" ued a more worthy nor more important. And seeing our necessitie driueth vs to determine some

For some thing, it is more reasonable we repose confidence in a French king vnder such nature of ostages, then in a nation of Italians of no lesse infidelity then without gage: and rather to trust the word and faith of so great a king, then to be caried with the immoderate couetousnes of priests and suspicious basenesse and bartring of Marchants: & lastly, according to the exāple of our ancestors, we may with more facility keepe amity for a time with the Crowne of France, honorable for his proper dignity, then with a cōfused people of Italians our naturall & perpetuall enemies. Taking this course, I do not only discern a greater hope of obseruancy and due keeping of faith, but also a lesse estate of danger in case of promise breaking: seeing if the king refuse to render to vs Burgundy, at least he will not dare (his childrē remaining ostages) to rise vp to offend vs againe, but will labour by solicitation and sute to moderate the rigour of the accord: and being but as it were yesterday vanquished by you, he will retaine a working feare of your forces and armes, and being likewise this day deliuered out of prison, he will not be so hardy to make a new prooofe of your fortune. And if he take no armes against you, you need not to doubt of the mouing of others, since vpon his exāple dependeth ordinarily the valor of the residue. By which mean you shal haue good oportunitie to conquer the Castle of Millan, and so to establish your surety in that estate, that hereafter you shal not need to feare the malice of any man. But if you come now to accord with the Italians, and they in their infidelity come to double with you, I see remaining no bridle able to retaine them, and as their power increaseth to vex you, so looke that their will will likewise rise greater to conspire, and their hands more free to execute: so that I can not but interpret it to timorousnes and want of counsell, that for an humor of too great suspition and incredulity, we should loose the benefit of an accord so full of glory and many aduantages, and no lesse accompanied with sufficient surety, following in place of it a resolution no lesse dangerous in the effect and substance, then iealousie in all his partes and circumstances.

This oration of the Viceroy drew the residue of the councill into diuersity of opinion: It seemed to such as were of iudgement sound and vpright, that to accord with the French king according to the maner declared, could not be but full of danger: and yet such was the partiality of the Flemings desiring to recouer againe Burgundy the auncient patrimony & title of their Princes, that their affection would not suffer them to discern the truth. Besides, it was said that the gifts and great promises made by the French men wrought not a litle to corrupt and carry many: but the Emperour about all the residue, either for that such was his first inclination, or for that the authority of the Viceroy could do much with him, hauing concurrancy with the opinion of the Count Nausan, or haply because he held it too great indignitie, to pardon by compulsion Francis Sforce, who had offended him by so great malice, seemed to heare with ready and willing eares all such as counselled him to compound with the French king. So that after he had caused to be sounded againe the Legat Saluiatio, to know if he would consent that the estate of Millan should be transported to the person of the Duke of Burbon, and that the Legate had certified him that he had no commission to allow that drift, and therewithall had made offer to him of the Popes amity, he determined to go on with the accord with the French king, with whome things hauing already past many disputations and acts, he grew in very few daies to conclusion, not respecting at all the community or interposing of the Popes Legat: and for the better perfection and stability of the accord, the Emperour had obtained before the Duke of Burbons consent to giue in mariage to the French king, his sister whome he had promised to him. The Duke was driuen to passe this consent, not so much for a desire he had to cary the Duchy of Millan, which was promised him contrary to the authority of the Chancellor and Viceroy, vnder obligation notwithstanding to pay a great summe of money: as for the necessity of his affaires which were reduced to those tearmes, that neither hauing nor could haue any other piller or stay then the Emperour, he was constrained to accommodate his condition to the Emperours will: and as soone as he had in all things accomplished this consent, to take him out of the presence of the Court in a time so vnconuenient, he departed forthwith by the Emperours order, taking his way by Barfeloma, whither was appointed to be sent to him necessary prouisions to passe into Italy, which for want of mony and lacke of vessels, had slow proceeding, for that in Spain were but three gallies at that time.

The solicitation of the peace which was resolved the xliii. of February 1526. contained these covenants: That betweene the Emperour and the French king should be a peace perpetuall, in which should be cōprehēded all such as should be named by their cōmon cōsent: That the French king by the sixt day of the next moneth of March, should be set at libertie vpon the marches of the coast of Fontarabie: That within sixe weekes after hee should consign to the Emperour the Duchie of Burgondy, the Countie of Charrolois, the iurisdiction of Noyers, the Castle of Chinon dependancies of the said Duchie, the Vicountie of Aussone, the resort of S. Laurens & la Roche a dependant of Franch County, together with all the apertenaunces as well of the said Duchie as Vicountie, all which for hereafter should be seperate and exempted from the soveraignty of the Realme of Fraunce: That at the same and very instant that the king should be deliuered, there should be put into the Emperours hands the Daulphin of Fraunce, and with him either the Duke of Orleanse the kings second sonne, or else xij principall Lords of Fraunce, whom the Emperour did name: it was left to the election of the Lady Regent, either to deliuer the kings second son, or the xij. Barons, and they to remaine as ostages vntill restitution were made of the lands and places aforesaid, and the peace sworne and ratified together with all the articles by the estates generall of France, and inregistred in all the Courts of Parliament of the kingdome with forme and solemnities necessary: for the accomplishing whereof there was set downe a terme of foure moneths: at which time returning the ostages, there should be put into the Emperours hands, the Duke d' Angoulesme the kings third sonne, to the end to traine him vp with the Emperour the better to entertaine and assure the peace: That the French king should renounce and giue vp to the Emperour all his rights to the Realme of Naples, together with all such titles and preheeminences as were to come to him by the inuestiture of the Church: That he should do the like touching his interestes in the estate of Millan, of Genes, of Ast, and likewise of Arras, Tournay, of the Ile, and of Doway: That he should render vp the towne and castle of Hedin as a member of the county of Artois, with all the munitiōs, artilleries, and mouables that were in it when it was last taken: that he should disclaime and yeeld vp all soueraigntie in Flaunders and Artois, & all other places or peeces which the Emperor possessed: and that on the other side, the emperour should resigne & giue vp to him all the right, title and quarell which he pretended to any place possessed by the French men, and especially the townes and Castledomes of Perone, Chandeler, Roye, the Counties of Bullaine, Guines, and Pomhieu, with other townes standing vpon the one & other shore of the riuer of Somme: That there should be betweene them a league & consideration perpetuall for the defence of their estates, with obligation to aide one another when need required, with 500 men at armes, and 10000 footmen: That the Emperour should promise to giue in mariage to the king the Lady Eleoner his sister, whom as soone as the dispensatiō shold be obtained from the Pope, he should contract or handfast with words obligatory for the present, & afterwards she shold be led into France to consummate the mariage at the same time that according to the capitulatiōs the ostages were to be deliuered: That she should haue for her portio 200000 crownes, with Iewels according to her estate, the one moiety of the monie to be paid within 16 moneths, & the other halfe in one yere after: That a mariage should be made betweene the Daulphin and the daughter of the king of Portugall, daughter to the Lady Eleoner, at such time as their age would suffer: That the French king should do all that he could to induce the auncient king of Nauarre to giue vp to the emperour the rights of that kingdome, which in case he would not performe, then the king not to aide him with any succors: That the Duke of Guelbres and the Count of Zurphen & the principall towns of those estates, shold promise with sufficient securitie, to giue themselues to the emperour, after his death: That the king should giue no succours to the Duke of Wittenberg, nor likewise to Robert de la March: That he should furnish and rigge for the emperour, both when he should passe into Italy, and two moneths after heeing so required, twelue gallies, foure shippes, & foure gallions, all well munitioned and appointed, except men of warre, and the said vessellsto be rendred 3 moneths alter accompting from the day of his embarking: That in placē of the armie by land which the king offred for Italy, he should pay him two hundred thousand crownes in mony, the one halfe within sixteene moneths, and the other halfe within a yere after: And that at the time when the ostages should be deliuered, he should be bound to giue bills of exchange for the pay of fixe thousand footmen for fixe moneths immediately after the emperours arriual in Italy: That he should also furnish for his seruice five hundred Launces payd, with a band of artillerie: That he should saue harmelesse the emperour of his promise made to the king of England by pensions which the French king should pay to him, the arerages wherof amounted to 500000 crownes, or else to deliuer so much in ready money to the Emperour: That they should both ioyne to beseech the Pope to call a generall Councell with all speede, to the end to consult vpon an vniuersall peace amongst Christians, to aduance an enterprise against the infidels and heretikes, and to graunt to all the Croisade for three yeares: That within sixe weekes the king should restore the Duke of Burbon in most ample forme, into all his estates, goods, mooueable and vnmoueable, and fruits and teuenues receiued: not to molest him for any thing past, nor constraîne him to dwell or go to the realme of Fraunce: That it should be lawfull to the sayd Duke of Burbon to demand by the way of law and iustice, the Earledome of Prouence: That in like sort all those that had followed him should reenter in safety into their goods and states, and namely the Bishop of Autun and Monsieur de Saint Valier: That the prisoners taken in the warre should be deliuered on both parts within fifteene dayes: That there should be restitution made to the Lady Margaret of Austrich of all that she possessed afore the war: That the Prince of Orange should be set at liberty with restauration to the principality of Orange, and all that he possessed by the death of his father which had bene taken from him for following the faction of the Emperour: That the like should be done to other Barons: That there should be made restitution to the Marquis of Salusse of his estate: That the king as soone as he arriued in the first towne of his realme, should ratifie this capitulation, & be bound to procure the Daulphin to ratifie it when he should come to the age of foureteene yeares. Many were named by common consent, & chiefly the Swissers: but there was not one of the Potentates of Italy, except the Pope, whom they named as conseruator of this accord, and that more for manner sake and ceremony, then in effect and true meaning. Lastly it was expressed in the sayd capitulation that in case the king for any occasion, would not accomplish these matters promised, he should returne true prisoner.

This accord, for the parts it contayned, brought no small astonishment to all Christendome: for when it was vnderstood that the first execution thereof consisted in the deliury of the king, all mens opinions were, that being in his liberty, he would not deliuer vp Burgundy, as being a member of too great importance for the Realme of Fraunce: and except a few who had counsell'd the Emperour to it, all his Court had the same iudgement, and namely the Chancelles, who reprehended and detested the matter with so great vehemency, that notwithstanding he was commanded to signe the capitulation according to the office of chiefe Chauncellors, yet he refused to do it, alleaging that in such matters daungerous and hurtfull as that was, he ought not to vse the authoritie that was giuen him: neither could he be altered from this opinion notwithstanding the Emperour was angrie with him: who seeing him so resolute in his opinion, signed it himselfe, and within few dayes after went to Madriill to confirme the alliance and make a foundation of amity and good-will with the king, whom he entertayned in familiar and priuate sorte. Great were the ceremonies and demonstrations of amitie betweene them: oftentimes they shewed themselues together in places publike: and as often did they passe in secrete familiar discourses: they went together in one coach to a Castell not halfe a dayes iourney from thence, where was Queene Eleonor whom the king married: and yet in all these great signes of peace and amity, he was obserued with as carefull and strait gard as before, without any aduantage of libertie: so that he was embraced as a brother, and garded as a prisoner; a matter which made manifest to the world, that it was an accord full of discord, an alliance without amitie, and that vpon euerie occasion their antient ielousies and passions would be stronger in them, then the regard of that alliance made more by force then friendship.

Many dayes were spent in these offices and ceremonies of amitie, when was brought from the Lady Regent the ratification, together with the declaration, that with the Daulphin of Fraunce, they would rather giue in ostage the kings second sonne, then the twelue Barons. Then the king departed from Madriill, taking his way to the frontier of his Realme, where was to be exchanged his person for his sonnes who bare very small age. There was sent to accompany him the Viceroy the worker and author of his deliuerie, to whom the Emperour had giuen the Citie of Ast, with other estates in Flanders and in the kingdome of Naples. At this time the Emperour wrote to the Pope a letter of Court, wherein he certified him, that in regard to haue peace, and for the common benefit of Christendome, he had subdued all passions of injuries and emulation, and restoring the French king to libertie, he had confirmed the league of amity betweene them with the mariage of his sister, and seeking to continue alwayes his obedient sonne, he had chosen him for conseruer of the peace. Not many dayes after he wrote to him another letter of his owne hand, which he sent by the same Commandator Erraro, who brought him the Popes letter written with his owne hand. This was a letter responsum indifferently tempered with words mild and gracious, and matter hard and rigorous, wherein he concluded that if Francis Sforce were not found guilty of the action of his accusation, he will render to him the Duchie of Millan, and touching the triall of the cause, he referred it to the arbitration of the lawes vnder such Iudges as himselfe would appoint as his superiour: but in case his innocencie were found insufficient, he could do no lesse then in that state to inuest the Duke of Burbon, to whom the Pope was the cause that he had promised it, aduising him thereupon that Francis Sforce lay sicke. He added further in this letter to the Pope, that as well to satisfie him, as to assure all Italy, he would neither retaine that Dukedome for himselfe, nor passe it by donation to his owne brother, vnder which testimonie he assured the Pope vpon his faith that such was his simple intention, the which he desired him to allow and approue, offering to him alwayes his authoritie and his forces as a sonne obedient to the sea Apostolike. By the same Erraro was sent also the aunswere to the particulars of the Article which had bene set downe at length by the Pope in fauour of Francis Sforce, which the Emperour continuig in his first resolution, would not allow. The Emperour sent also by him to the Duke of Sesse the forme of the accord as he was determined to do the last time, with authoritie and power to contract if the Pope would accept it: in which was expressed that Francis Sforce should be comprehended in the confederation, so farrefoorth as he were not found guiltie in the crime of treason: but in case of his death or deprivation, the Duke of Burbon should take place in the confederation, and receiue of him the inuestiture for the Duchie of Millan. The obligation was confirmed which the Viceroy had made for restitution of the townes holden by the Duke of Ferrara, but vnder condition that the Pope should be bound to passe to him the inuestiture of Ferrara, and forgiue him the article of contrauention; a matter contrary to the Popes driftes, who had determined to exact a paine of an hundred thousand duckats, to make payment of the fine of an hundred thousand which he had promised to the Emperour, in case that restitution went on. He did not admit the estate of Millan to make prouision of salt of the Church, and touching the collation of benefices in the realme of Naples, he would not be referred to the tenour of the inuestitures, but to the custome and vsage of the kings afore, who in many cases had contemned the rights and authority of the sea Apostolike. And because a treaty had bin made with the Legate, that to remoue the army out of Lumbardey which was a great charge to all Italy, the Pope and he as king of Naples, and the other potentates of Italy, should pay an hundred and fifty thousand duckats, and then the sayd army to retire to Naples, or into some such place out of Italie as should seeme good to the Emperour, who sayd he would transport it into Barbarie: yea it was added that because there was more due to the army then at that time, there should be exacted a pay of two hundred thousand duckats. A copie of these Articles was presented to the Pope by the Duke of Sesse and the Commandator Erraro, with protestation that it was not in their power to alter or chaunge one filable: and yet all other difficulties had easily taken forme, if the Duchie of Millan had bene so disposed as the Pope with the residue had had no cause to enter into suspition. But in the consideration of the Duke of Burbon and the minde he bare, they made this iudgement of him, that he was so implacable an enemy to the French king, that either for his surety or for a desire to enter Fraunce, he would be alwayes most deuout and subiect to the Emperour, and retaine in himselfe nothing lesse then humours of ambition and desire to be great. They thought that Article to remoue the army out of Lumbardey (so greatly desired of all, and for the which they would haue bene brought to haue aduanced any summes of money) would be to litle purpose, so long as there remained at Millan a Duke, who not only vpon euery gracious offer or motion of the Emperour, would be ready to accept the gift of it, but also for his particular interest, would ambitiously aspire and thirst after it. In these regards, the Pope, who for that in the accord which the Emperour had made with the French king, was made no particular mention of him, nor the surety of the states of Italy, stood more and more confirmed in his former opinion, that the ambition and greatnesse of the Emperour would in the end be his seruitude and thraldome: and therefore he determined not to accept the accord in the maner it was offered to him, but to reserue himselfe free until he were assured what course the French would take touching the obseruation of the peace. In which resolution he stood so much the more firme, by how much besides the apparance and likelihoodes of it, he had heard by the relation of certaine speeches deliuered by the king asore his liberty, and spread abroad by some that were familiar in counsell with him, that the king had a mind altogether estranged from performing the things he had promised to the Emperour: and the better to confirme the king in that deliberation (his owne surety also depending vpon it) he sent in post into Fraunce, Paule Vittorio a Florentine Captaine of his Gallies: his charge was to be at the Court at the same time the king should arriue, vsing that diligence not only to know his intention as soone as might be, but also the king hauing a ready hope to be able to draw into league against the Emperour the Pope & the Venetians, he might take occasion the sooner to resolute himselfe. It was enioyned also to the expedition of Paule, to congratulate in the Popes name the kings deliury, and to discourse with him at large what he had done to that end, and how much did induce the Emperours inclination to his liberty, the practises of confederation that were enttayned with the Lady Regent. Lastly that he should impart with the king the Popes vehement desire to haue an vniuersall peace in Christendome, and that the Emperour and he would performe together the enterprise against the Turke, who was reported to make mighty preparations to inuade that yeare the realme of Hungary. These were his Commissions apparant & knowne, but this was his direction most substantiall & secret, that about all things he should sound throughly the kings inclination, who if he found resolute to obserue the resolution of Madrid, then to passe no further, least vainely he should make his case more desperate with the Emperour then before, but if he found him to haue other thoughts, & to hang in doubt, that he should labor to confirme him in that disposition & seruing his turne of all occasions, he should specially compel him to take that course, giuing him knowledge of the Popes desire to ioine with him for the common benefit. He dispatched in like sort into England the Pronotory Gambaro, to manage the like office with that king, & to the same end. Besides, he procured the Venetians to send into Fraunce their Secretary Andrew Rosse, with semblable commissions. As Paule past by Florence vpon his voyage, he fell sicke and died, by reason of which accident the Pope sent to performe the legation in his place, Capui de Mantua, taking it to an ill prediction, that now the second time the ministers which he had sent into Fraunce to aduance those practises, were in the way intercepted by death. In the meane while making no omission of time nor oportunities, he together with the Venetians, did all that they could to keepe in courage the Duke of Millan, and to entertaine him in hopes, least the peace of Madrid led him not both with feare and rashnesse to make some accord with the Emperour.

By this time the French king was come vpon the confines of Fontaraby, a towne appertaining to the Emperour, standing vpon the Ocean sea, and is a frontier betweene Biskay and the Duchy of Guyen: and on the other side, the Lady Regent was arriued with the children of Fraunce at Bayon not many leagues from Fontaraby: the torments of the gout tooke her by the way, which was the cause that she had lingred some time longer then the day appointed of permutation: but at last, the eighteenth day of March, the French king accompanied with the Viceroy and Captaine Alarcon with fifty horse, was presented vpon the shore of the riuer that deuideth the realme of Fraunce from the kingdome of Spaine. And on the other side, vpon the shore opposite appeared Monsieur Lawtrech with the kings children and like number of horse: there was in the midst of the riuer a great barke made fast with ankers, in which was no person: the king was rowed neare to this barke, in a litle boate wherein he was accompanied with the Viceroy, Captaine Alarcon, and eight others, all armed with short weapons. And on the other side of the barke were likewise brought in a litle boate, Monsieur Lawtrech with the ostages and eight others weaponed according to the others: After this the Viceroy went into the barke with the person of the king, and all his company: and also Monsieur Lawtrech with his eight that accompanied him, so that they were within the barke a like number of both parts, Alarcon and his eight being with the Viceroy, and Lawtrech and the others, with the person of the king: and when they were all thus within the barke, Lawtrech fetched out of the boate into the barke, the Daulphin, who being giuen to the Viceroy and by him committed to Captaine Alarcon, was forthwith bestowed in their boate, and after him followed the litle Duke of Orleans, who was no sooner entred the barke, then the French king leaped out of the barke into his boate, which he did with such quickenesse and celerity, that the exchange or permutation was thought to be done at one selfe instant. As soone as the king was on the other side of the shore, his new liberty making him fearful of ambush, he mounted vpon a Turkish horse of a wonderfull swiftnesse, which was prepared for the purpose: and running betweene feare and gladnesse vpon the spurre, he neuer staid till he came to Saint Iohn de Lus, a towne of his obedience foure leagues from the place, and being there diligently relieved with a fresh horse, he ran with the same swiftnesse to Bayon, where, after he had past ouer the offices of Court done to him by his people, he dispatched with a great diligence a gentleman, to the king of England, to whom he wrote with his owne hand letters of his delivery, charging the messenger vnder very louing commissions, to tell the king of England, that as he acknowledged the effect of his liberty to be wrought wholly by him and his operations, so, in recompence, he offered to remaine to him a perpetuall and assured friend, and to be guided in all his affaires by his counsell: and afterwards he sent another solemne Embassage into England to ratifie the peace which his mother had made with him, as one that reposed a very great foundation in the amity of that king.

THE SEVENTEENTH BOOKE OF THE historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Pope and the French king, the Venetians, and the Duke of Millan, draw into league against the Emperour. The Duke of Burbon comes to Millan. The armie of the league breaks from before Millan. The Castell of Millan rendered to the Imperials. Many enterprises are devised against the Pope. The confederates send their armies by sea to Genes. Rome is surprised by the Cononnois, the Pope makes truce with the Imperials, which hurteth the denises of Lumberay. The Duke of Ferrara confederates with the Emperour.

Notwithstanding the pledge of the two children of Fraunce (of whom the eldest being heire apparant to so great a succession, was one) was added to the oath and faith that passed betweene the Emperour and the French king, for confirmation of the accord solemnely made at Madriill, and notwithstanding for the full perfection of the assurance, the king had contracted the Emperours sister in his owne person: yet, by his deliuey, both straunge for the manner, and seuer for the assurance and pawns that were enforced, all the Princes of Christendome drew into no small expectation what would be the issue of things. And as during his captivity, the eyes of men stood fixed vpon the Emperour, to behold vnder what raunsome he would restore him to liberty, so being deliuered, they began now to turne all their thoughts and contemplations vpon the king, for that they discerned sundry and great effects, depending vpon his deliberation, either to obserue or not obserue the capitulation of Madriill: for, as in obseruing the contract they saw a destiny of present seruitude to hang ouer the regions of Italy, both for the authority and greatnesse of the Emperour, which went encreasing, and for the imbecility of the prouinces to whom was left neither fortune nor vertue, to make head against so great a course of victory. So in not performing the articles of the accord, they saw the Emperour would be driuen, either to put vp in forgetfulnesse the conspiracies and enterprises dressed against him by the Duke of Millan, and to restore to him that Duchy, least the Pope and Venetians tooke occasion to conioyne with the French king, by which meane he should stand in hazard to loose the great profits he hoped to reape by his victory : or else (making his indignation against the Duke of Millan more mighty, together with his desire to haue no impediment of the French in Italy) he should be compelled to assure the accord made with the king, conuerting into certaine payments of mony, all his obligations and promises to restore Burgundy : or lastly, neither yeelding to the one nor the other, he would be driuen to suffer to be brought against him by so many enemies a war very grieuous almost by his owne confession, since to auoyd it, he was reduced to this strait, to let the king go with so great a danger.

But the world stood not long in doubt of the will and intention of the French king : for that as soone as he was got into Bayon, being required by a gentleman of the Viceroyes, to ratifie the accord according to the obligation of his word, being come into a place free and assured, he deferred it from one day to another interposing reasons and excuses generall : wherein to the end to hold still the Emperor in hope, he sent to aduertise him by a man especiall, that he forbore for the present to accomplish the ratification, nor by omission or willing negligence, but vpon this necessity, that before he proceeded really to such an act, he was to labour to reapease and reduce the minds of his subiects ill contented with the obligations he had made, tending to the diminution of the Crowne of Fraunce : neuerthelesse he would in his time resolue all difficulties, and obserue with fidelity all that he had promised to him, both in substance and circumstance. By this dealing, no lesse doubtfull for the maner, then dangerous in meaning, might easily be comprehended, what were his intentions, the same being more manifestly detected at the arriual of the messengers sent to him not many dayes after by the Pope and Venetians, in whom was no great neede of industry or labour, to sound out the plaine course of his inclination : for, after he had receiued them with many demonstrations and offices of Court, he entertayned them seuerally and apart with sundry speeches of compassion, such as tended to manifest complaints against the inhumanitie of the Emperor: who he sayd did neuer administer to him during his captiuitie, any one office appertaining to the ranke of a Prince, nor at any time shewed himselfe touched with that affectio and compassion which one Prince ought to expresse vpon the calamities of another : and much lesse would vse any course of common comfort, either to relieue the heauinesse of his conditio with any property of apt consolation, or once to enter into consideration, that the same accident that had fallen vpon him, might also be as heauily heaped vpon his owne head. In this complaint, he alleaged the example of Edward king of England, called of some Edward Long-shankes : to whom when was presented as prisoner John king of the Frenchmen, taken by the Prince of Wales his sonne in the battell of Poytiers, he did not onely receiue him with great comfort and compassion of his afflicted case, but also, all the time of his imprisonment within the Realme of England, he let him go at liberty vnder a free gard, he had daily familiar conuersation with him, he would oftentimes haue him to accompany him on hunting to communicate in the open ayre and solace of the field, and was not curious to call him to eate with him at his table : and by these humanities much lesse that he lost his prisoner, or raunged him to an accord lesse fauorable, but of the contrary, by the operation of those graces and good offices, there grew betweene them such a familiarity and confidence, that the French king, after he had continued many yeares in Fraunce, made a voluntary voyage into England, to honor and gratifie vnder that property of office the liberalitie and frankenesse of the king: He alleaged, that as there was onely remembrance of two kings of Fraunce that had bene taken prisoners in battell, king John and himselfe : so the diuersity of the examples was also worthy of singular memorie, seeing vpon the one was exercised all facility and mildnesse of the victor, and to the other were ministred all those rigours and severities which tyrants in the height and pride of their fortune are wont to vse : That much lesse that he bore towards others a dispositio either more peaceable or better qualified, seeing he gathered by the construction of his speeches vsed at Madryll, that following the humor of his ambition, he employed his thoughts most, how to subdue vnder seruitude the imperie of the Church, the potentacies of Italy, and all other Princes of Christendome. In which regard he wished the Pope and Venetians to provide for their proper safety, wherein he offered himselfe with great affection to be concurrant with them in the quarrell of their common safety, and to establish against the Emperour a strait alliance, not that he intended to reconquer to himselfe the estate of Millan, or otherwise to encrease his puissance, but onely that by the meane of warre he might make recouerie of his children, and reasssure the libertie of Italy, seeing the too grea couetousnesse of the Emperour had taken from him all colour and reason of bondes to obserue the articles of the capitulation : a liberty which he insisted the rather for that at the first whilest he was in the Castle of Psiqueton, & afterwards in Madrill, he had oftentimes protested to the Emperour for the iniquity of his demands, that if through necessity he were driuen to compound vnder conditions vnequall or such as were not in his power to performe: that much lesse that he would obserue them, but of the contrary, taking the aduantage of the iniury in constraining him to make promises reasonable and vnpossible, he would omit no occasion wherein opportunity were offered, to be reuenged : and that he had not forborne to tell him that which of themselues they might know. & which he beleeued was obserued in other realmes. That it was not in the power of a king of France, to bind himselfe to the alienation of any thing depending vpon the Crowne, without the consent of the estates generall of the realme: That the lawes of Christians did not beare, that a Prince made prisoner by the accident of war, should be detayned in perpetuall prison, a punishment proper for malefactors, but not rigorously executed against such as had bene persecuted, with the cruelty of fortune: That no man doubted, that all obligations made by constraint in prison, were of no value, & that as such capitulations were of no force, so likewise the faith which was but the accidents, & the confirmatiō of the same, could not be bound: That the oathes which he had made at Rhimes, where the kings of France are consecrated with so great ceremony & with the sacred oyle, were first, by the which he was bound according to the presidēt & custome of all other kings of France, not to make alienatiō of the patrimony of the Crowne: That for these reasons he was no lesse free then ready to moderate the insolency of the Emperour, & rise vp against his ambitio : wherein the kings mother made apparant the same desire, together with his sister, who taking vpon her in vaine a long iorney to go into Spaine, complained grieuouly against the rigour of the Emperour, and the seuerity of his Court, and namely such as were most familiar with him in Councell: for end, the king affirmed that if commissions and directions were once addressed from the Pope and Venetians, it should not be long ere the league were accomplished, which he sayd were best to be negotiated in France, to the end to draw in with more facility the king of England, in whom they shewed to haue a great hope.

This was the discourse of the speeches which the king held with them, being in like sort assured and confirmed by the vniuersall inclination of those that gouerned him : but in secret, his thoughts were farre others : for, albeit he had no disposition to deliuer vp Burgundy to the Emperour, yet he bore a mind farre estranged to moue warre against him, vnlesse he were compelled by great necessity: only he hoped, that in laboring to be confederate with the Italians, the Emperour, to auoyd so great a gulf of difficulties, would be induced to conuert into obligation of mony, the article of the restitution of Burgundy: in which case, not one regard touching the matters of Italy, should stay him from couenāting with him, for the desire he had to retire & reuoke his children. These Agents of the Pope and Venetians, made speedie relation of the hopes and good inclination which they found in the French king, and that at a time, when were much increased in Italy, both the necessity and occasion to confederate against the Emperour: this was the necessity. The Duke of Millan in the beginning of the siege, partly by the fault of his officers, and partly for the shortnesse of time, had bestowed within the Castell, a very small proportion of victuals, and yet the store he had prouided was more immoderately expended, then men reduced to so hard tearmes, are wont to do, for which cause (hauing notwithstanding the straitnesse of the siege, good meane to write out of the Castell) he gaue knowledge of his wats, which if they were not remedied by the next moneth of Iune, he should be constrained to giue himselfe vp to the discretion of the Emperour: And albeit it was beleeued that (according to the custome of such as are besieged) the Duke set downe a greater want and scarcety of victuals then in deede there was, yet there were many reasons to perswade that the store could not be sufficient for any long time: and to suffer the Castell to fall into the hands of the Emperour, was a matter that made more hard the recouering of that state, besides that it would increase not a litle the reputation of the Emperour. But it seemed not that the occasion was the lesse increased, seeing the people were reduced to the last dispaire: for, as the Emperour sent no money to the army, to the which many payes were due, and lesse meane to leaue any in any other place: so the Captaines to stop as well as they could all course of mutinie amongst the souldiers, had bestowed all the regiments of the men at armes and light horsemen, in seuerall places of the countrey, taxing euerie towne ratelike with with bands and numbers, and compelled the townes to compound for mony with the Captaines and with the souldiers; a taxation executed with such excesse, that it was assured by the credible information of many that had priuity with the affaires of that state, that the Duchy of Millan payd every day to the Emperours souldiers, five thousand duckets, of which came to the priuate purtie of Anthony de Lena, thirty duckets dayly. By the example of the horfmen, the bands of footmen that were disperfed in feuerall lodgings within Millan and other townes, were insolent vpon the owners of the houses wherein they lay, whom they constrained not only to make prouision of all things which they thought meet for their feeding and clothing, but also many of them being lodged in one house, enforced the seruice of the good man for the prouision of them all; and such houses as had not meane to feede them, were compelled to compound with them for money at their owne rate: & as it often fell out, that one only souldier had to himfelfe a whole house with absolute commandement of all, so he taxed to furnish him of money all the residue, except him whom he vsed in the prouision of his diet. This miserable condition exercised with so great crueltie, made desperate the whole inhabitants of that Duchie, and namely the townesmen of the Citie of Millan, to whom had bene neither custome nor president, before the entrie of the Marquis of Pejquero, to be charged either with victuals or contribution for the lodging of souldiers: their custome in times of warre before, running in a course of greater humanity and facilitie, made the yoke of this innouation more heauy to them; in which respect looking into their owne estate, both to be mightie in numbers and armes, and remembering the law and obligation of their freedome and libertie, they began to murmure, as men not able any longer to endure so great insolencie and most grievous exactions: and therefore to make some honest way to be deliuered, or at least to reduce them to some comely moderation, the towne of Millan sent Embassadors to the Emperour, who brought from him no other expedition then words generall, and that without any remedy to their afflictions: the towne of Millan principally and ouer, and besides all the other townes of the Duchie, being charged according to his proportion with a greater number of souldiers then the other townes, was also taxed to prouide money for expence publike, such as were set downe by the Captaines for the conseruation of the Emperours things: the ministers of which exaction proceeded with no lesse rigour and seuerity then the others: for remedie of which aggreeuances, since by solicitation they could neither be eased nor pitied, the people pushed on with the impressions of men in a desperate state, determined to resist with their weapons in hand those fore exactions which the iniquity of the war had laid vpon them, to eate them vp. They gaue order, that whosoever were oppressed by the crueltie of the exactors, should call vpon his neighbors to come to his defence; who, together with the vniuersal multitude of all the residue should run at the commandement of certaine Chieftaines assigned in many parts of the citie, to resist the furie of the officers and repress the insolency of the souldiers that should rise in their fauour. After this order and direction was established amongst them, the first experience fell vpon a Marchant of retaile, who being vexed by the Collectours of the exactions, stirred vp for his defence his neighbours, who calling to the alarme a great part of the populars, the whole towne was forthwith in a tumult; which, by the diligence of Antho. de Lena, and the good office of the Marquis of Gnaft, and other of the principall Gentlemen of Millan, was eftsorones reapeased: but vnder this condition & promise that the Captaines had assured the people to rest contented with the publike reuenues, and would not lay vpon them other impositions, nor bring into the towne other bands of souldiers. This was an accord but for a verie short time, since it endured no longer then till the day following: for the people hauing aduertisemēt that new regiments of souldiers approached neere the towne, they fell againe into armes, but both in a greater tumult, and better gouerned, and with a greater assistance of the people then the day before: yea, what with the rage of the populars, which in their furie is dangerous, and what with their well ordering of the vprore, being taught by the example of the day before: the Captaines feareng not to be able to resist so great a furie, were vpon the point to go out of the towne with their bands: a matter which indeed the humour of their feare had drawne them to do, if the people with a settled resolution had marched on to be reuenged of them and their souldiers: but as in tumults and popular vprores there is alwayes something of imperfection, and that aswell by the property of the action which holdeth of disobedience and rebellion, as by the ignorance of the leaders, who for the most part haue more passion then reason: so first of all they went without all order or skill to sacke the old Court, a place where lay the Captaine of criminall justice with certaine bands of footmen, making their beginning with that which should haue bene the last act of their execution; a matter which gaue no litle life and aduantage to the Imperiall Captaine, who in that oportunitie omitted not to fortifie their straights and places of access, and reuelling from the siege the most part of the footmen that kept the Castle enuironed, they assembled all into one strength, to make head against the people, if they offered to inuade them. By that occasion the besieged within the Castle made a sally out to set vpon the ramparts cast on that side within: but when they saw the people made not on to their succours, they retired eistsoones into the Castle, leauing vnperfect the enterprise, which with due execution would haue done much to haue established their libertie: the people, partly for want of experience in actions of warre, and partly for the care of the pillage they had made at the old Court, did not onely omit to do that which appertained, but also began to breake and separate themselves, euery one being more mindfull to preferue the pray he had made, then to follow further the victorie which their fortune offered to them: by which occasion the Captaines of the armie, concurring the aide of certaine Gentlemen of the towne, reappeared eistsoones this tumult, with promise to leade out of the towne and countrey of Millan all the souldiers, except those bands of Launceknights which held the Castle besieged. In this sort the Captaines and men of warre, by their pollicie and industrie quenched a daungerous fire, which the furie of the people had kindled in their rashnesse, and rightly scorned their disorders and ignorance to manage armes and weapons; errors which familiarly do follow a communitie drawne into mutiny, hauing no leaders of experience and valor: but by these appeasements and accords all intelligences were not broken, and much lesse laid downe the armes of the people, but retaining still many tokens of a disposition to stir vp a greater emotion, it seemed that whosoever would take vpon him to trouble the affaires of the Emperour, need not want a fit occasion, considering principally both the small forces and other great difficulties which the Imperials had, and also that in the last wars, the wonderfull valour of the people of Millan and of other townes expressed in their sauour, had bene a great foundation for the defence of that estate.

These were the termes and estate of the affaires of Italy, when were brought out of France the reports of the ready disposition and offers of the king; together with his request for the sending of Commissions: and at the sametime the Embassadors of the king of England resident with the Pope, laboured to induce him by reasons and perswasions to deuise how to moderate the greatnesse of the Emperour, and to encourage the French king not to obserue the capitulation: by reason of which inducements, accompanied with the authority and inclinations of their Princes, not onely the Venetians, who in all times and in farre lesser occasions had giuen counsell to take armes, but also the Pope notwithstanding his hard disposition to enter into that trauell, iudged now that by necessity he was to reduce and gather together the summe of all those discourses, and no more deferre to take some deliberation: the reasons which in the moneths before had made him inclined to the war, were not only the selfe same in nature and propertie, but also were more mightie and of greater consideration: for as the Emperour for his part, by how much the practises and treatises had bene holden out in tract and longnesse of time, was apt and able to discover what intentions the Pope bare against his greatnesse: so the Pope tooke occasion by the contents of the accord which the Emperour had made with the French king, to enter into a iust suspicion not to be able to obtaine of him any reasonable conditions, and that he had a secret resolution to proceed to oppresse the residue of Italy: wherein the daunger was more apparant then euer, for that the Castle of Millan being not able to hold out any long time, stood almost vpon the point of rendering: he was also prouoked with the consideration of new iniuries redoubled by the Imperiall Captaines, who since the capitulation of Madril, had sent to be forried vpon the territories of Plaisance and Parma, certaine Ensignes of Italian footmen, such as executed vpon the places many insolencies and domages: and when the Pope complained of their oppressions, they made him answer, that they were drawne thither of their proper authority, for that there was no pay distributed in the army. He was likewise incensed with matters haply more light and fraile, but taken in the worse part, as often cometh to passe in suspitions and quarrels, which haue this in propertie, to take nothing in good that is not agreeable to the humor of their will and liking, and to turne all things to blame that haue no correspondencie with their owne intentions and

and meanings: for as the Emperour had published in Spain, certaine edicts pragmatike against the authoritie of the Sea Apostolike, by vertue whereof his subjects were forbidden to treat of causes of benefices within his realmes: so vnder that warrant a Spanishe Notarie tooke boldnesse to be in the Court of Rome, and in the Chamber of audience, to commaund certaine men in the Emperours name, to desist to pleade anie more in that Auditorie: and also it did not only seeme that by the deliuerie of the French king, the knot was vnfastened which had bound euery man in doubt, that the French men to haue againe their king would not sticke to abandon the league: and withall it was well discerned, that the society and preface of the kings person was of farre greater importance for the enterprise, then the fellowship of his mother & the generall gouernment: but also there were scene other farre greater occasions: for as the commotion of the commons of Millan seemed to draw with it a matter of great consequence, so by the penurie of victuals that passed generally ouer all that estate, it was thought it could not be but a great aduantage to set vpon the Imperials, before they fell into the oportunitie of the haruest to reuietuell and returnish their strong places; and before necessity compelled the Castle of Millan to yeeld, and before the Emperour had time to send into Italy new supplies of men, or releuee them with prouisions of money. Moreouer, there fell into consideration, that the French king, in whom for the memory of things past, was great likelihood of distrust against the Pope, and now finding not in him a zeale and forwardnesse to make war, would estioons resolute to obserue the accord made at Madriill, or else to reconfirm it of new: and it was not doubted, that so great forces both by sea & land being conioyned in one, together with sufficient means to continue for long time the expences of the war, that the conditions of the Emperor standing both abandoned of all other Princes, & made naked of all store of mony, wold be far inferior in the war: only there was one scruple to the contrarie, caused by a feare, that the French king to redeeme his children, would leaue abandoned the other cōfederats, according to the doubt that was had of the gouernmēt of Fraunce at such time as the king was prisoner: & yet there was esteemed great difference, for that in taking armes against the Emperour with so many good occasions, there was so great hope to recouer them by force, & the action to succeed with so great a reputation of the king, that he would haue no reason to open his eares to any accord particular, which would not only bring infamy to him, but also would be preiudiciall to his affaires, though not for the present, at least in time to come: for that it could not but be a matter most dangerous for the realme of Fraunce, to suffer the Emperour to dispose of Italy according to his owne arbitration. Of which reason did likewise follow, that he wold not faile to make sharpe warre vpon him, since it could not be but a naked Counsell in confederating against the Emperour, to depriue himself of the recouering of his children by the obseruation of the accord: and yet on the other side, to lay apart all things by the which he might hope to redeeme them gloriously by armes, such as made their discourtes in this sort, considered haply more that which reasonably he ought to do, then they looked with iudgement into the nature of the Frenchmen; a fault wherein men do oftentimes fall, in matters of deliberations and iudgements that are made of the disposition and will of others: perhaps also they did not sufficiently consider, how much Princes that are culpable, who of their proper inclination do oftentimes preferre vility afore fidelitie, are easily perswaded the semblable of other Princes: and that therefore the French king suspecting least the Pope and the Venetians wold become negligent and carelesse of his interests, when by the conquest of the Duchie of Millan they should stand assured of the power of the Emperour, would iudge that the longnesse of the warre would be more profitable to him then the victorie, as a meane more easie to induce the Emperour to restore his children vpon some new composition, being already made weary of the long trauels and expences of warres. So that partly by the reasons afore rehearsed, making deepe impression in the mind of the Pope, but more for repentance that he had stood an idle beholder of the issue of the battell of Pavia, and somewhat for that, he was reproched by euery one of timorousnesse, & lastly, for the common murmure of all his Court, and of all Italy, who cast in his teeth, that by his fault the Sea Apostolike, together with the whole estate of Italy were reduced into so great dangers: he derermined in the end, not onely to enter confederation with the French king and the residue against the Emperour, but also by his labour and sollicitation, to aduaunce and pursue to speedy conclusion: in which good inclination, he was pushed on partly for the other regards, but principally for this, that in time might be aduaunced the prouisions for the reliefe of the Castle of Millan, before the extremitie of famine compelled them to repose more in the mercie of the enemies, then in the remedie of their friends: that necessitie was the cause of all the aduersities which followed: for that otherwise the Pope proceeding more slowly (vpon whose auctoritie the Venetians depended much in this action) had expected if the Emperour being moued with the inobseruation of the French king, would not propound for a common surety, those conditions which had bene set downe before, specially when he should see himselfe constrained to take armes: and being not compelled to shew to the French king so great a necessity, he had easily obtained of him as well for himselfe as for the Venetians better conditions: and it had bene without doubt that thereby the articles of the confederation had bene better set downe and particularized, together with more assurance of the obseruation, and that the warre had not begun but that the Swissers had stirred, and all the prouisions necessarie had bene ready: and lastly, the king of England might haply haue bene drawne into the confederation, with whom for the distance of places, there was no leisure to negotiate. But for that by the danger of the Castle of Millan, the Pope and the Venetians saw that celeritie was of great importance, they dispatched with speed (but secretly) commissions to their seuerall Agents, to go thorough with the confederation, wherein they were enioyned to follow almost all those articles which had bene debated before with the Lady Regent of Fraunce, the more to hasten the expedition. There were sent dayly aduertisements of the necessity of the Castle, which made the Pope enter into consideration, that whereas it was necessarie, for that the high way from Rome to the Court of Fraunce was stopped, to send his messenger and curriers by a long circuit of way through Switzerland, and where he thought that in the action of capitulation might fall out some difficultie, which necessarily might draw some intermission and tract of time, it might happen that they might stand so long vpon the conclusion of the confederation, that if till then the Castle were deferred to be rescued, there were daunger least the succours would come too late: for which consideration, importing almost the effect and substance of the whole, he called to consult of the present perill the Venetians, by whose counsell, together with the importunate sollicitation of the Agents of the Duke of Millan resident at Rome and at Venice, and concurring also the counsell of manie others of his faction, they resolved to prepare a sufficient force to giue rescue to the Castle, to the end to be ready to employ them as soone as the conclusion of the league were come out of Fraunce, and in the meane while to giue hope to the people of Millan, and to nourish many practises, which they entertained in the townes of state: they made then a resolute conclusion, that the Venetians should send the Duke of Vrbino to their frontiers towards the riuer of Adda, accompanied with their men at armes, and sixe thousand footmen Italians, and the Pope to send to Plaisance the Count Guido Rangon with sixe thousand footmen: and for that it was necessarie to so great a war to haue many numbers of the Swissers, of which nation the Duke of Vrbino counselled to leaue twelue thousand for the assured obtaining of the victorie, who also aduised the Pope and the Venetians, that not to disclose themselves so much against the Emperour, so long as they were not assured that the league was made, it were not good to send out their Agents to leaue the Swissers. They gaue care to Iohn la. de Medicis of Millan, who of a Captaine of the Rocke of Mun, had made himself Lord of the place, partly by a knowledge he had of the situation and fortresse, and partly by the occasion and fauour of the time running: he told them that many moneths before he had practised to that effect with many of the Swissers-Captaines, and did offer vnder an imprest of sixe thousand duckets, to make discend an armie of sixe thousand Swissers, which should not be leauied by the decree of the Cantons, but particularly, and then to proceed to furnish their pay, as soone as they were discended into the Duchy of Millan: so that as it often hapneth in enterprises which of the one side are esteemed easie, and on the other side are pressed with the shortnesse of time, the offer of this man was accepted by the Pope and the Venetians, being also approved by the Agents of the Duke of Millan, and by Ennia Bishop of Verula, in whom the Pope reposed wholly for matters of the Swissers, for that he had long time followed the sollicitation of those affaires in the name of the Church, & in that action had lyen many moneths at Bressia by his directiō, & was at that time with the Agent of the Venetians, where he treated continually with manie of that nation. In like sort they harkened at Venice to Oetanian Fregosa Bishop of Loda, who offering to make an easie leaue of many numbers of that nation, had immediatly his expedition (without communicating with the Pope) for Switzerland to wage sixe thousand, in the sea and at the same rate of payes: of which deuises, both ill vnderstood and worse ordered, was bred: (as shall be recited in his place) a beginning to put to confusion the enterprife, which was dressed with so great hope.

Whilest these preparations were in hand in Italy, the Emperour beginning to enter into suspicion for the delays that were interposed to the ratification, dispatched into Fraunce the Viceroy of Naples & Captaine Alarcon, to be fully informed of the kings intention, who was now gone from Bayon to Cognac: the Viceroy had stayed all that while in the towne of Victoria, hauing with him the ostages and the Queene Eleoner, to the end to present them to the king assoone as he had accomplished the contents of the capitulation: and albeit the Viceroy was receiued with verie great honour, both for that he was Embassadour from the Emperour, and also the king acknowledged in him and his working, a great part of his deliuerie, yet he found the king wholly estranged & far off to leaue Burgundy, sometimes taking his excuse vpon obstinacy of the estates of the realme whose consent he could not obtain: & sometimes alleaging that willingly he neuer passed a promise, which for that it was verie preiudiciall to the Crowne of Fraunce, it was impossible for him to obserue: only in respect of his great desire to entertaine the league of amitie begun with the Emperour, and to giue perfection to the mariage promised, he said he was contented, obseruing all other couenants betweene them, to pay vnto him two millions of crownes, in place of the resignation of Burgundy: to which excuses he added, that no other thing induced him to confirme with this moderation the accord made at Madrid, then an inclination he had to continue in good intelligence and correspondencie with the Emperour, the rather for that he wanted not the working of offers and motions from the Pope, the king of England, and the Venetians, to incense him to the warre: which answer comprehending his last resolution, the Viceroy signified to the Emperour the message, being accompanied with one of the kings Secretaries, to confirme the same. By this it hapned, that notwithstanding the commissions from the Pope and Venetians so much desired before, were now come to the Court, yet the king bearing a more inclination to haue agreement with the Emperour, and in that regard had determined to expect his answer vpon the new offer, wherein the Viceroy had giuen him some hope, began openly to defer the conclusion of the confederation, not altogether dissembling (since it was impossible to hide it) that he solicited a new accord with the Emperour, which being propounded by the Viceroy, it was a matter which could no way do hurt to be vnderstood. Besides, he assured the (notwithstanding he had other intentions) that he would neuer make any conclusion which should not containe the restoring of his children, the release of the Duchy of Millan, & vsayned prouision for the surety of all Italy: an alteration of it selfe sufficient to consume the Pope, if for his impressions of suspicion & feare, he had not iudged that the only remedy for his affaires, was to confederate himselfe with the French king. But it is not to be doubted with what discontentment and perturbation of mind the Emperour receiued the newes of the Viceroyes aduertisements, confirmed by the relation of the Secretarie of the French king: for, as it brought no litle grieffe to him to fall from the hope he had to recouer Burgundy, a matter which he vehemently desired, as well for the augmentation of his glorie, as for the oportunitie of that Prouince: so his indignation seemed redoubled, for that the French king by finding euasions to shift off his promises and faith giuen, made manifest declaration to all the world, that he reiected and despised to performe the thing he had promised: but the thing that bred most torment in his mind, was a certaine shame and reprouing of himselfe, for that both contrarie to the counsell of all his Nobles, and against the vniuersall iudgement of all his Court, and also contrarie to the prediction or foresheewing of the countie of Flaunders related to him by the Lady Margaret his Aunt, and by all his agents and officers in Italy, he did not measure with better reasons and more maturity of counsell, the importance and condition of affaires, but lulled simply in the humor of affection, perswaded himselfe that the French king would obserue the accord. And as amid these impressions and variety of thoughts, he had diligently considered that which concerned his dignity, and foreseee in what termes of daunger and difficulties his affaires would stand at all assayes, he determined to alter no one iote of that article or chapter which spake of the restoring of Burgundy: no he rather resolved to accord with the Pope, and to consent to the reintegration of Frauncis Sforce, as though it had bene more agreeable or comely for him to pardon a Princelesse then himselfe, then by yielding to the will of a king ambitious and puissant, and enuious of his greatnesse, to make as it were a voluntarie confession of feare : wherein his passion caried him into this resolution, to rather a most dangerous war with euerie one, then to remit the iniury receiued of the French king :

for he feared least the Pope seeing his amity contemned, was wholly estranged in mind from him, wherein his suspicion was augmented by the aduertisement he receiued, that besides the Pope had sent into Fraunce a particular messenger to congratulate with the king, he had also sent pub-likely an Enibassadour : but much more did he suspect, for that he had newly taken into his pay vnder colour to assure against the *Moore*s the sea shoares of the Church, Andrew Dore with eight Galleis vnder the pay of thirtie thousand duckets for entertainment, and pensions for euery yeare:
a matter which both for the quality of the man, and for that neuer heretofore the Pope had any thought to make himselfe strong vpon the sea, and also because Andrew Dore had bene many yeares in the pay of the French king: made him enter into suspicion least that practise were suborned of intention to trouble the estate of Genes. For these reasons he prepared himselfe to endure all accidents, and leauied at the same time many prouisions of warre, both to offend and defend:
he solicited the passing of the Duke of Burbon into Italy, who made but slow preparation to that expedition, before he gaue order to that end, that the seuen Gallies which lay at Monaco in Italy, should be brought about to Barcelona to be ioyned with the residue, & that there should be sent to releue the necessities of Italy, an hundred thousand duckets, for that without them the going of the Duke of Burbon would serue to nothing : he dispatched to the Pope Don Hugo de Moncado, with commission (as he said) to satisfie him : but his directions were to passe first by the Court of Fraunce: to the end that learning of the Viceroy if there were any hope that the king would obserue, that either he should passe no further, or if he did, that he should chaunge his instructions and commissions according to the estate and necessitie of affaires. But to euerie good counsell that was giuen to the Pope, was opposed the daunger of the Castle of Millan, which being almost consumed with want of victuals, he had great feare least it would be rendered to the enemy : he was also timorous that by some meane were contracted a new accord betweene the French king and the Emperour : he was vncertaine of that which might be wrought by the comming of Don Hugo, whose legation was made so much the more suspicious, by how much he was to passe first by the Court of Fraunce : and he was iealous of the dissimulations and cun-nings that would be vsed when he should be passed into Italy. In which regard, the Pope, together with the Venetians, soliciting with great instance the conclusion of the confederation, the king at last began to hearken with better inclination to the resolution of the league: whereunto he was induced partly for that he did vnderstand by the comming of Don Hugo, that the Emperour wold alter nothing of the articles of the capitulation, and partly through feare, that if he should deferre further the action of confederation, the Pope would be caried into new counsels : he iudged also that by this confederation his affaires should stand in better estate of reputation with the Emperour, in whom feare might haply plie or moderate the rigour of his mind : and lastly, he wanted not the incitations of the king of England, who more with perswasions and reasons then with effects and sound meanings, seemed to fauour that conclusion. This league was concluded the tenth day of May in the yeare a thousand siue hundred and sixe, at Cognac, betweene the kings Councell, deputies for the king, on the one part, and the Agents of the Pope and Venetians on the other part : That betweenthe Pope, the French king, the Venetians, and the Duke of Millan (for whom the Pope and the Venetians assured the ratification) should be a league and confederation perpetuall, to the end to repoesse Frauncis Sforce freely of the Duchie of Millan, and restore to libertie the French kings children : That the league should be signified to the Em-perour, to whom was graunted power to enter into it within three moneths, vpon condition to redeliuer the kings children, receiuing a competent ranfome, such as should be arbitrated by the king of England : which condition also was extended to leaue wholly the Duchie of Millan to Frauncis Sforce, and the other potentates and estates of Italy, as they were afore the last warre began : That for the deliuerie of Frauncis Sforce, now besieged within the Castle of Millan, and for the recouerie of that estate, a present warre should be made with eight hundred men at armes, seuen hundred light horsemen, and eight thousand footmen for the Popes part : and for the Venetians, the warre to be furnished with eight hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and eight thousand footmen : for the Duke of Millan foure hundred men at armes, three hundred light horsemen, and foure thousand footmen : this proportion to be furnished as soone as should be able, and in the meane time the Pope and Venetians to accomplish for him: The French king to send immediatly into Italy five hundred Launces, and so long as the warre should endure, to pay to the Pope and to the Venetians fourtie thousand crownes monethly which money was to be employed in the leaue of bands of Swissers: That the French king should immediatly open the warre against the Emperour beyond the Mounts on what side he should thinke most conuenient, and that with an armie of two thousand Launces, and tenne thousand footmen, with sufficient numbers of artilleries: That the French king should arme xij. light Gallies, and the Venetians thirteene, at their proper expences: That the Pope should ioyne to those Gallies that proportion of Nauie, with the which he had entertained into his pay Andrew Dore: That the charges should run in common touching necessary ships for the said armie by sea, with the which they should addresse their course to Genes: That after the Emperours army in Lombardy were either vanquished or weakened, they should mightily inuade the kingdome of Naples aswell by land as sea, which being once conquered, the possession and inuestiture should be transferred to which of the confederates it pleased the Pope: and yet in an article separate was set downe, that the Pope could not dispose of it without the consent of the confederates, only there was reseruatiō made of the tributes and contributions which anciently were vsed to be paid to the Sea Apostolike, together with one singular estate of fourtie thousand duckets of reuenue, to gratifie whom it pleased the Pope: That to the end the French king were certaine, that by the victorie to be obtained in Italy and the conquest of Naples, might be made easie the deliuerie of his children: That if the Emperour in that case would within foure moneths after the losse of that kingdome, enter into the confederation vnder the conditions aforesaid, the kingdome should be rendred to him; but if he would not accept that power to reenter into the league, then the French king should take and enioy the yearely and perpetuall rent of that realme: That the French king should not at anie nor time, for any cause, molest Francois Sforce for the Duchie of Millan, but should be bound together with the others, to defend him against all men, and to do what he could to introduce betweene him and the Swissers a new confederation: only the king should receiue of him yearely a perpetuall tribute, such as should be set downe by the arbitration of the Pope and Venetians, and that not to be lesse then fiftie thousand duckets: That Francois Sforce should take to wife such a Ladie of the blood of Fraunce, as it should please the king to provide for him, and should be bound to entertaine, as appertained, his brother Maximilian, in place of the yearly pension which he receiued of the king: That the king should reenter into the Earldome of Ast: That if Genes were recouered, the king to retaine the same estate of superioritie which he was wont to do in times past: and that if Anth. Adorne, who then was Duke there, wold compound with the League, he should be receiued so farre forth as he would acknowledge the French king for superiour, in the same sort and maner as Ottavian Fregosa had done a few yeares before: That all the confederates should demand of the Emperour the deliuerie of the children of Fraunce, and if he refused to restore them, that it should be denounced to him in the name of them all, that the League would do all that they could to haue them againe: That as soone as the warres of Italy were finished, or at least the realme of Naples taken, and the Emperours armie so weakened as there was no feare of it, all the confederates should be bound to aide the French king against the Emperour beyond the Mounts with a thousand men at armes, a thousand five hundred light horsemen, and ten thousand footemen, or else with money in place of men at the kings choise: That not one of the confederates without the consent of the others, might not contract with the Emperour, to whom it should be permitted, in case he would enter into the confederation, to go to Rome to take the Imperiall Crowne with such a traine of men as should not be feared, the same to be rated by the Pope and Venetians: That though any one of the confederates were taken away by death, yet the League should stand good and absolute: That the king of England should be protector and defender of the League, to whom was left power to enter into it: And in case he wold enter, there should be giuen to him in the realme of Naples an estate of thirty thousand duckets of reuenue, and another of ten thousand to the Cardinall of York, and that to be leauied either in the same realme, or in some other part of Italy. The Pope would not suffer the Duke of Ferrara to be comprehended within the confederation, notwithstanding the French king and the Venetians did greatly sollicite it: yea he procured that the confederation should beare (though vnder generall words) that the confederates should be bound to aide him to recouer those places; for the which the said Duke was in contention with the Church. Touching the Florentines, there was no doubt that they were not effectually comprehended in the confederation, for that the Pope made his reckening not only to serue his turne with their men at armes and their forces, but also to reduce them concurrat with him, yea euen to make them sustain the greatest burthen of the expences of the warre: but, not to hinder the traffike and intercourse which that nation had with the subjects of the Emperour, as also not to put in danger their Marchants and factors, they were not named vnder the title of confederates: one it was set downe that they should enioy all the exemptions, priuiledges, and benefites of the confederation, as if they had bene expressly comprehended, the Pope assuring for them that they should be in no sort against the league. There was no prouision or nomination of the Captaine generall of this armie and warre, for that by the shortnesse of the time they had no leasure to bring into counsell and election vppon whose shoulders they should lay so great a burthen, both for the authoritie and qualitie of the man, and the confidence that euerie one had in him: neither was it easie to finde out such a man, in whose person were concurrant so worthe conditions.

The League being thus contracted, the French king, who had not as yet altogether withdrawn his minde from the practises which he entertained with Viceroy of Naples, both deferred to ratifie it, and to begin to make to march his companies of men at armes, and also to send the fortie thousand duckets for the first moneth; vntill the ratification of the Pope and the Venetians were accomplished: and albeit such an intermission was not a litle troublesome to them; yet being pressed by their necessities to pursue their purpose, they dispatched the ratification, and entred immediatly to giue beginning to the warre, vnder the title that they would rescue the Castle of Milan. In which action the Pope, who had before sent to Plaisance, Guido Rangon General of the Church armie, with his companies of men at armes, and a strength of fise thousand footmen, sent thither of new with other regiments of footmen, and the men at armes of Florence, Virella Virelli their Captaine and Gouvernour, together with John de Medicis Commaunder ouer the Italian Infanterie: he created Frauncis Guicciardin at that time President of Romagnia, his Lieutenant generall ouer the armie, and ouer the whole iurisdiction, enduing him with most ample and almost absolute power. The Venetians on their side increased their army, which remained at Chiura in the countrie of Bressa, ouer the which was constituted Captaine generall the Duke of Fribin, and for their treasurer was appointed Peter Pezero: both the one and other armie had one direction, which was to endamage the Imperials, and to inuade them without deferring or suffering for any respect. In this meane while was arriued at Milan Don Hugo de Mécade, who albeit the League was still kept from the knowledge of the Viceroy and him, yet distrusting by the kings answers, that matters could not be reduced to the contentment of the Emperour, he had followed his way into Italy; and there carying with him into the Castle of Milan the Pronotarie Caraccioll, he laboured to assure the Duke of the facility and clemency of the Emperour, seeking to perswade him to referre himselfe to his will; but the Duke made answer, that in regard of the iniuries which the Emperours Captaines had done to him, he was driuen to haue recourse to the Pope and Venetians, without whose priuity and participation he could not dispose of himselfe. Don Hugo put him in hope that the Emperours intencion was, that the crimes that were charged against him, should be summarily viewed & examined by the Pronotary Caraccioll, who was a Prelate of great confidence with the Duke; a course which he said the Emperour tooke, rather to restore vnto him his estate with a better conseruation of the Emperours reputation, then for any other occasion, & yet he wold not consent that the siege might be first leauied, nor promise to innouate any thing according to the instance of the Duke. It was beleueed that the authority & power which the Emperour gaue to Don Hugo was very ample & large, the same extending not only to enable him to contract with the Pope according to the reintegration of the Duke of Milan, but also his commission bare to compound with the Duke alone, taking assurace, that being restored to his estate, he should do no act prejudicial to the affaires of the Emperour: only this commission was vnder limitation according to the traine of times & necessity, so that Don Hugo considering into what extremity was reduced the castle, & that to compound with the Duke profited nothing the affaires of the Emperour, but instrumentally, or as a meane to establish the accord with the Pope & the Venetians, judged it wold be a matter vnprofitable to contract with him alone. Afterwards Don Hugo &

the Pronotary caused to be brought frō Monce, Moron, kept prisoner within the rocke of Trezzo the same being for this cause, that the Pronotary who was to be iudge of the cause, should take his information of him. Immediately after this, Don Hugo tooke his way from Millan to Rome, having first written to Venice, that they should send sufficient authority to their Ambassador at Rome to negotiate & debate of the affaires occurrent: being come to Rome, he was brought to the presence of the Pope, together with the Duke of Sesso, to whom he declared with braue words, that it was in his electiō to accept either peace or war, for that the Emperour, notwithstanding by his good intention & inclinatio was not estranged frō peace, yet he was neuerthelesse both in courage & in preparation ready disposed both to the one & to the other. Wherunto the Pope answered generally, and complained that what for the hard termes which the Emperours officers had vsed to him, & the very late arriual of Don Hugo, he stood now bound to others, where afore he was in his owne libertie: they returned to him the next day, signifying that the Emperours intention was to leaue wholly the Duchy of Millan to Frauncis Sforce, so far forth as the castle might be consigned into the hands of the Pronotarie Carraccioll, vntill for the Emperours honor there were examination made of the cause, though not to the bottome & substance, yet in apparance & by ceremony: that also the Emperours intentiō was to put end to the quarrels between him & the Venetians, by some reasonable & comely mean, & to withdraw his army out of Lōbardy with the payes which had bene treated vpon at other times: and that in counterchange & recōpence of all these, he demanded no other thing of the Pope, then that he would forbear to interpose betweene him and the French king. To these propositions the Pope answered, that he doubted not that all the world had taken sufficient knowledge, how carefully he had alwayes desired to keep amity with the Emperour, and that he had neuer demanded greater thing, then those which the Emperour himselfe did willingly offer him: matters which could not be more to his contentment, for that his desire was alwayes greater to the common benefite, then for his profite: that still he continued in the same inclination, though there were giuen to him many occasions to fall from it: neuerthelesse that he heard now with a greater griefe of mind the matters which were offered to him by accord, then he had heard them at such time as they were denied him; an alteration which had not proceeded of his fault, but of the slownesse of the Emperour deferring so long to resolute by which occasion, ioyning also that there was neuer brought vnto him any hope of the assurance of the common affaires of Italy, and seeing in the meane while the perill of the castle of Millan, he had bene constrained for his owne safety & for the cōmon interest of others, to ioyne confederation with the French king, without whom he had no power to determine any thing. This was the constancie of the Pope, verified with many other replications and circumstances tending to assure his faith giuen: against the which, after Don Hugo had in vaine obiected his reasons and inducements, he departed from Rome ill contented with the Popes answers: by whose example also all the Imperiall Captaines fell to murmure, for that the hopes of peace being cut off, they saw things tend to manifest warre; which both for the might and power of the league, and for their owne extremities and disorders, they supposed it would be verie heauy for them to sustaine.

About this time the Popes Lieutenant surprised a packet of letters, written by Ant. de Lena to the Duke of Sesso, by the which he gaue him aduertisement of the ill disposition of the people of Millan, and touching their affaires, there was no other remedy then the grace of God: he also intercepted letters written from him & the Marquis of Gualf to Don Hugo after he was gone from Millan, wherein making earnest solicitation to aduance the peace, they insisted greatly to know forthwith what would ensue of the negotiation, not failing with words of great compassion to recommend vnto the danger wherein their liues stood, & the perillous condition of the Emperours armie: but there was not so great assurance in the minds of those that were to dispose of the forces of the league, as the feare was great ioyned with incertaintie of resolution amongst the Imperiall Captaines: for the Duke of Vrbino, who for the title he had of Captaine generall ouer the Venetian army, & also for his singularity of estate, authoritie, & reputation aboue the others, managed in effect the absolute gouernment of the whole armie: he esteemed haply more then was conuenient, of the valour of the Spaniards & Launceknights, & doubted no lesse of the vertue of the Italian souldiers: in which distrust he had resolved in his mind, not to passe the riuer of Adda, if he had not at the least in the armie a strength of 5000 Swissers: & fearing also least the Imperials would passe Adda & set vpon him, if onely with the cōpanies of the Venetians he passed the riuer of Oglio, he made instance that the armie of the Church which was then at Plaisance, passing over the riuer of Paw beneath Cremona, might march to ioyne with the Venetians, & so in one maine strength draw neare the riuer of Adda, & vpon the shores of the same in some place of strength to auoid the coming of the Swissers: who contrary to their custome & nature were slow to defend, being then with many impediments & difficulties, the rather for that the charge to leaue the was vndiscreetly committed to Captaine Mus & the Bishop of Loda: of whom, as the Bishop being a man full of humors of vanitie & lightnesse, was not apt to manage that businesse as appertained; so Captaine Mus according to his couetousnesse sought chiefly to possesse himself of one part of the mony that was sent to distribute in imprest to the souldiers: & for other respects neither of them both caried such authoritie with that nation, as vnder so small a quantity of money to make leauy of so great a number, and that with that speed which the necessity of the seruice required. Besides, the expedition was corrupted by the imperfection of the parties, the one being caried with ambition, and the other with vanity, and they both more disposed to respect their interests particular, then to obserue the generall cause of the seruice. Against this action also the French agents that lay in the countrey of Swisserland opposed some difficulties, for that they neither knew what wil & inclination their king bare to it, nor whether it was contrary or conformable to his intentions: for not by omission or forgetfulnesse, but willingly & expressly they had sayled to aduertise the king of that expedition, following haply those counsels which oftentimes seeming very discreet and well ranged, are found in the end very suttile and fallible: for Albert Pio the kings Embassadour resident with the Pope, had signified to them, that if the king vnderstood before the conclusion of the League, of the direction giuen to make a leaue of Swissers, there would be danger least he would defer longer to conclude, for that seemed to him euerie way that the warre against the Emperour had bene begunne without him by the Pope and Venetians. Thus for the long tarying of the Swissers, was foreflowed one of the most principall and most mightie foundations laid for the rescue of the castle of Millan, notwithstanding both the Bishop & Captaine Mus gaue dayly most certaine & present hopes that they would be speedily at the campe. But when the Captaines Imperiall saw that the war was prepared openly, and that their former doubts & secret coniectures were now resolued and turned to manifest assurance, they determined, least at one time they were trauelled with enemies both within & without, to stand assured of the people of Millan, who rising euerie day more insolent, did not only deny to answer all those prouisions that were demanded vpon them, but also accompanying their disobedience with fiercenesse & bloud, they failed not to make slaughter of the souldiers in the city, when they found any single or separate from his fellowes: so that the Captaines Imperiall taking occasion of the disorders that were done in the towne, required that certaine heads & chieftaines of the populars shold depart the citie of Millan: which demand could not so easily be digested, but that the commons beginning to draw into tumult, there was a new slaughter made of certaine Spaniards going alone in the streets: & to meete with that mischief before it proceeded to greater degrees, A. de Lena & the Marquis of Quast after they had secretly drawne neare to Millan their forces, & denounced to the people that they were now no more bound to the accord made certaine dayes before, they gaue the alarme to the tumult, by killing in their presence foure of the commons, who wold do no reuerence to them in passing by the: & then issuing out of their lodgings with a troupe of Launceknights, they gaue occasio to the commons to sound their alarme: But as in all popular comotions there are many errors, & the people for the most part more rude & obstinate, the skilful to order a fight, run in their ignorance to their owne destruction with cries & showtes: so notwithstanding in their first fury they had forced the old Court & the gresstower of the Bishoprike, garded by manie Italians, yet partly by their owne disorders, and partly by the importunity of certaine shot bestowed in places of aduantage, which the Spaniards had furnished before, many of them fighting in their wilfull humor of libertie, found wretchedly at one instat the priuation of their life & liberty together: insomuch as their disorders & feare increasing by equal degrees, & their latest perils hastning with a desperate swiftnesse, for that the Launceknights were vpon point to put fire into the next houses, besides the calling into the citie the regiments of Spaniards, attending the token or signe to be giuen by the Captains. The commons in their last feares offered to parley with the Imperials, wherein they agreed that their leaders & many other persons of suspect shold go out of Millan, & that the popular multitude shold depose armes and submit themselves to the obedience of the Captaines Imperiall: who for their parts receiving the conditions, made haste to reappease and cease the tumult before the Regiments of Spanish footmen entred within the towne, fearing least both parts being in armes, it would be hard for them to gouerne or bridle the furie of warre, or to restraine the souldiers in their readinesse, from sackinge the towne; a matter which they doubted, & yet were loth it should happen, as well for feare least the armie being made rich with so great a bootie, would grow into corruption and great diminution, as also considering what want of money and other difficulties they might suffer in the warre, they iudged it a pollicy more profitable to preserue the citie, in which they might long nourish the armie, then in one day, and in one furie to consume the force & liuely spirit which it had. Thus it seemed that the affaires of the league proceeded not with that prosperity, which men in their imaginations had promised in the beginning. both for that there were manie difficulties in the descending of the Swissers, and also the foundation of the people of Millan was shaken and quailed: But as there is no estate or condition of worldly things, which is not full of vncertainties and casualties, so by a new accident that hapned, both their reputation was estoones restored, and the facility of victory made both more great, and more apparant then before. In so great a discontentment, or rather a last despaire of the Duchie of Millan, there was entertained for certaine moneths by the working of many persons, sundrie intelligences and practises of innouation, almost with all the townes of the Duchie: amongst the which, one succeeded to good effect in the Citie of Loda, being managed by the Duke of Vrbino and Treasurer of Venice, with Lodowike Vistarin, a Gentleman of the same City: who, what with the impression that he had bene an ancient seruant to the house of the Sforces, & with the inducement of compassion ouer the calamities of his countrey, being no lesse rudely dealt withall by Fabricio Maramo Colonell of xv. hundred footmen Neapolitanis, then Millan was by the Spaniards & Launceknights, deternined to helpe into the towne the Venetian regiments, notwithstanding he was in the pay of the Imperials: but he assured, & the Duke confirmed it, that he had before both demaunded and obtained his leaue to go away, taking his excuse vpon this reason, that he was no longer able to maintaine without money the bands of souldiers which were committed to his charge. This was the order & direction of the enterprise: that vpon the xxiiij. day of Iune by night, Malatesta Babilon with three or foure thousand footmen of the Venetians, should about the vanishing of the day, Loda surprised by the Venetians approach the wals of the citie on that side where was a certaine bastillion, to the end to be receiued in by Vistarin, who a litle before, with two others that accompanied him, being come neare the bastillion, which fixe souldiers garded, as it were to search, & being followed with some others of his faction, who he had hidden within certaine houses thereby, he leaped vpon the bastillion, and began to fight with the souldiers that garded it: for albeit he had pronounced before the watchword, according to the custome of warre, yet the souldiers being doubtfull of treason, were come to handstrokes with him, when others running by the brute of the alarme that was made, the bastillion was in great danger to be recovered by the furie of the fray, wherein Lodowike was hurt: but as he was almost reduced to the last necessity, Malatesta arriued with his bands, and scaling the bastillion by the help of their ladders, they entred the towne, which they had so long desired: by which entry both by force and intelligence, the alarme running through the towne, Fabricio Maramo prepared himselfe to go to the wals with a great part of his souldiers, but comming too late to the rescue of that which was already lost, he was constrained for his safety to retire into the castle. Thus the towne was surprised, & the most part of the souldiers that were lodged in sundry places of the city were stripped & made prisoners. A litle after the Duke of Vrbino arriued with one part of his regiments, who to make his approaches the better, was marched the day before to lodge at Oragno, vpon the riuer of Oglia, which he passed the same night by the fauor of a bridge made in haste, & vnderstanding of the entry of Malatesta within Loda, he passed also vpon a like bridge the riuer of Adda: & after he had bestowed a greater garrison within Loda, for the better defence, in case succors shold be ministred by the meane of the castle, he returned immediatly to the armie. But as soone as the knowledge of this accident was come to Millan, the Marquis of Gnast with certaine troupes of light horsemen, & a strength of 3000 Spanish footmen, amongst whom was Iohn of Vrbino, made with great celerity to Loda, & hauing without impediment bestowed his bands of footmen within the castle, by the benefit of whose situation he might enter with safety by a way naturally couered & defended, without danger to be annoyed with shot coming from the flanks of the city: he made a sodaine irruption into the citie by the Castle, and got to the market place, where the forces that Malatesta brought with him, & the succors that came afterwards, had made their strength or place of defence, & put diuerse houses vnder gard, together with the street, that led to the gate by the which they were entred, to the end they might be able to retire & issue with safety, if it had hapned that the Imperials became maistrs. The fight was valiantly performed, at the beginning, which valour if it had continued in the Spaniards, the iudgemēt ran that they had recouered Loda, for that the Venetian souldiers declined no lesse to cowardise thē to wearneesse: but as in surprises, when the enterprise cometh to an execution, distrust is for the most part greater then confidence, & feare far aboue resolution and assurance: so the Marquis of Gnast, either for that he found a greater number of souldiers then he had esteemed in the beginning, or for that he had a conceit that the Venetian armie was at hand, retired presently from the fight, & returned to Millan after he had furnished the Castle with a garrison. Immediately after this skirmish the Duke of Vrbino came againe to Loda, making no litle glorie, that without staying he had passed his armie ouer two great riuers by the benefite of bridges: and the better to assure the victorie, he resupplied the regiments that were within Loda, to the end to make the better resistance, in case the enemies would returne to recouer the thing from the which they had bene repulsed: he caused artilleries to be planted round about the castle, the better to assure the siege, and cut off the rescues that might be sent. Neuerthelesse the defendants both for their small expectation of succours, the means of their reliefe being cut off, and lesse ability to defend the castle, which for his small circuit was not capable of many men, left the castle abandoned the night following, being receiued by certaine horsmen sent fro Millan for that purpose. This conquest of Loda hapned very conueniently, & gaue great reputation to the affaires of the league, both for that the Citie was well fortified, & bare a name to be one of those which it was thought the Imperials would defend to the last. From Loda the victors might march without impediment, euen to the gates of Millan & Pania, for that those cities bearing a situation in triangle, are twenty miles one fro another, for which cause the Imperials dispatched with great expedition 1500 Launceknights to Pania. Moreover the League had won the passage of Adda, which before was supposed to be very troublesome: all impediments were remoued that might hinder all the armies of the league to ioyn together: all means take away to succor Cremona, in which citie lay in garrison Captaine Conradin with 1500 Launceknights, & the enemies depriued of place apt to trauell & vex the state of the Church & the Venetians. Insomuch as the comon opinion of the whole army was, that if they aduanced with speed according to their fortune, the Imperials could not but be reduced into great perplexity & confusion: but the Duke of Vrbino was of another iudgemēt, holding it an enterprise of great perill to draw neare to Millan without a great strength of Swissers: and yet for that he would not discouer to others that which he retained in his secret opiniō, he was contented to seeme to do the thing he intended not, & in that resolution marching slowly, & reposing alwayes one day at the least in euery lodging, he determined neuerthelesse to giue time to the descending of the Swissers, hoping that within few dayes they would be with the armie: yea he had so great expectation of their coming (notwithstanding by the experience of their long tract and deferring there was great doubt) and reposed such assurance in their valour, that vnlesse they came, he contemned all motions and inducements to action and enterprise, what reason or property of likelihood soeuer they bare. After the conquest of Loda, the Church armie marching to S. Martin, within three miles of Loda, it was resolved there by common counsell, that after the two Armies, that is to say, the Ecclesiastikes and the Venetians, had sojourned there one day, they should draw the next day towards old Loda, about five miles from Loda, where it is written that Pompey builded Loda, and so taking the high way that leadeth to Pania, they pretended vnder that marching to threaten Millan & Pania; a deuise to hold the Imperials in greater feare & suspence. The same day the armies Ecclesiastike & Venetian ioyned together in the field as they marched, being almost equall in numbers of footmen, & containing in all few lesse then xx. thousand: only the Venetians exceeded thē in nūbers of men at armes & light horsmen, & in prouisions of artilleries, munitions with all other necessary furnitures of warre. The day following they reposed at old Loda, where the Captaines taking counsell for the disposing of their marching, determined that hereafter the armies should keep along the high way, the better to auoid the incommodities of the countrey, which out of the high way is ful of ditches & risings, & other impedimēt to marching: one reason also of following that way, was the facilitie to giue succours to the castle by the opportunity of the way

Way that leadeth towards the gate of Coma, rather then by the way of Landriano which turneth to the gate of Verceil, by the which was greater difficulty to leade the army in regard of the quality & disposition of the countrey: and lastly, by the benefit of that way, there was a more safe recourse & traffike for victuals to follow the armies, & more easy for the discending & receiuing the Swissers who were alwayes to second the & backe the: with this resolution the army being gathered into one main strength, arriued the last day of Iune at Marignan: where being drawn into counsel touching the further directiō & disposing of the war, the Duke of Vrbino perswaded vehemently to abide the coming of the Swissers, of whose descending he had haply some more assured information the before: he considered that without such a strength & firme back, it could not but be dangerous to draw neare Millan with regiments of souldiers vntrained & leuiued in haste, not withstanding there was within the towne of enemies but a very slender strength of horlmen, 3000 Laice-knights, & but 5 or 6 thousand Spaniards footmen, to whose small numbers of bodies were adioyned many discommodities and wants, as lacke of money which maketh the souldiers vnwilling, and very litle prouision of victuals which weakeneth him for the fight, with other impediments much hindring the action expected in souldiers. But the other Captaines were not of his opinion, for that they iudged that marching in order, and alwayes vsing good scouts to discouer their camping places for the day before, there could be no danger to approach Millan, the rather for that the parts of the countrey were euery way so strong & defensible, that without difficulties the army might alwayes incampe in places of surety. They reasoned that it was not likely, that the Imperials would issue out into the field to inuade the, for that leauing necessarily the castell besieged, & by that occasion, being not to leade their whole forces out of the towne for suspitiō of the commons of Millan, their numbers wold be too few to set vpō so great an army, which albeit was dressed & composed of bodies new and raw, yet was gouerned by the best experienced Captaines in Italy, hauing withall dispersed in seuerall bands of the army; many troupes of footemen well disciplined and of good traineur in war. Besides, albeit they could not make their approches to Millan without danger, yet to draw neare it, was not without hope to cary the victory, for that the suburbs of Millan being not fortified, but by negligence left open in many parts, it seemed not credible that the Imperials would stand to defend so great a circuit of place. Of this were discerned many manifest tokens, for that the Imperials vsing small care to reenforce the suburbs, had turned all their industry to the fortificatiō of the towne: Insomuch that if they once abandoned the suburbs & gaue place to the army to lodge there, it could not be reasonable that the towne could long hold out: not so much for the want of victuals & mony which afflicted their whole army, as for that Prosper Colonne with the other Captaines of knowledge and iudgement, had bin alwaies of this opiniō, that with great difficulty could the towne of Millan be kept against an army that was Lord of the suburbs, both for that the city is very weake in wals (the houses of certaine particulars seruing for want of wall in many places) as for that the suburbs haue a great aduantage & comandement ouer the City. To these reasons lastly was added, that they had the castel at deuotion: but not only the estate of this direction or deliberatiō, but also the absolute resolution of the whole body of the war depended chiefly vpō the Duke of Vrbino: for that albeit he was but only Captaine ouer the Venetians, yet the Ecclesiastikes to auoyd contentions, had determined to referre theselues ouer to him as to the Captaine generall of the army. Neuerthelesse though these reasons had no power to stir him to aduance and passe further, nor the vehement instances, in which (by order from their superiors) the Popes Lieutenant & the treasurer of Venice vrged, with whom did concur many other Captaines, yet in the end, he considered that if he made any long abode in that place without a better certaintie of the coming of the Swissers, it would not be but to his great infamy & challenge: therefore after the army had rested two daies at Marignan, he remoued it the third of Iune to S. Donato within fife miles of Millan, frō whence he determined to passe further, though more to satisfie the desire & iudgement of others, then of his proper inclination or counsels: & he reserued to himselfe this order & intention, to put alwayes one day betweene the remouing of the campe, to the end to giue time to the coming of the Swissers, of whom a thousand discending by Bergama, were arriued at the armie, and for the others (according to their custome) they sent euery day messengers to entertaine the expectation of their coming, and to signifie that their absence should not be long.

In this sort the fift of Iuly, the army passing from S. Martin which is out of the high way on the right hand, marched on to intampe within iij. miles of Millan, in a place of good strength & security: where the same day was executed some light action of warre against certaine harquebuziers of the Spaniards who were fortified within a house, & the day following, the campe being at the same place, executed some other small exploit of war, & immediatly after arriued at the campe of a hundred Swissers led by Cesar Gaulois: here the Captaines fell againe to counsell of the army of passing further, & albeit the first intentiō was to march directly to succor the castel of Millā, whose trenches that were cut round about without, were not so strong but that there was great hope to win them: yet, by the authority of the Duke of Vrbis whose aduice was at last approued of all the others, not altogether for the sufficiency & soundnesse, but partly for the priuiledge & prerogative of his place, which caried him to expresse his opinion in counsell, & either not to attend the answers of others, or at least in their answers the Captaines durst not impugne his reasons. The army tooke the way that leadeth directly to the suburbs of Millan, and he alleaged, that for the making plaine of the wayes, which of necessity must be done by reason of the naturall impediments of the countrey, it would be a labor long & not without danger of some disorder, to leade the army out of the high way to the rescue of the castell, both for that they were to shew themselves too neare in flanke to the enemies, & also it was to giue the enemy meane to make a greater resistance, because they wold range all their forces on that side towards the castel: where otherwise they shold be constrained to remaine deuided for the better resistance of the enemies: & not to abandon the gard of the Castell, & drawing to the gate of Rome, it would be alwayes in the power of the Captaines of the league, to turne easily on what side they wold according as occasiōs called the. According to this counsell it was resolued, that the sequenth day the campe shold lodge at Vnsaletto & Pillastrello, which are crookings or turnings alōg the high way within shot of cannon, & there to take that course which occasiō & proceeding of the enemies shold minister. Many were of opiniō that the enemies whē they shold see the campe so neare the, would not (specially in the night) embrace the hazard to defend the suburbs, both for that the ditches were filled vp in many places, & the ramparts cast downe & made plaine, & in some places so open & discovered, that very hardly could they preferue their bodies which they brought to defend the place. But the night before the day wherein the army was to aduance, the Duke of Burbon, being arriued a few dayes before at Genes with six gallies, and bringing bills of exchange for an hundred thousand duckats, entred into Millan accompanied with 800 Spanish footmen, whom he had brought with him: his coming in such a time of perill, & after so long expectatiō for succor, gaue a new corage to the soldiers that so desperatly lay exposed to the danger of their liues. By his cōming, being vehemently solicited by the Marquis of Guaft & Anth. de Lena, may be easily cōprehended the affected negligence or rather cold dispositiō which the French king had to the war: for, where the Pope in the beginning whē he entertayned into his pay Andrea Dore, had cōsulted with him, with what forces & preparations the enterprise of Genes should be executed, he told him it wold be an action very easie so far forth as it were put to execution at the time that the war should be begun in the Duchy of Mil-lan, & that to his eight gallies should be ioyned the kings gallies riding in the port of Marfeille, or at least that they might be employed to stop the coming of the gallies of the Duke of Burbon: wherein his reason was, that remaining in that sort Lord of the sea with his eight gallies, the City of Genes, hauing the sea shut vp, could not maintaine it selfe lōg, both for the restraint of marchā-dize, for the impedimēt of exercises, & for the cutting off access of victuals. And notwithstanding the French king protested to stop the cōming of the Duke of Burbon, yet it was a promise vaine & ill assured, both for that his vessels were not in order, which hindred the expedition, and also the Captaines of his gallies, partly for want of mony, & partly through negligence, and haply of purpose, were very slowly furnished to accomplish the seruice. The same fault or negligence was also vsed in aduancing the men at armes appointed to his portion.

the league before Millan.

But the arriual of the Duke of Burbon being vnknowne to the army of the league that was without, the resolution that had bin set downe to aduance forward, was peruerted by the Duke of Vrbis, & that either by some aduertisements which he had receiued from Millan, or by the report of some spy: for, leauing the distrust which he had retayned til that day, he assured the Popes Lieutenant in the presence of the Venetian treasurer, that he made an assured reckening that the day following would be a day of prosperity & happy successe: seeing saith he, if the enemies issue out to fight (which he could not belecue) they could not but be ouerthrowne & broken: & in case they did not issue out, he was certaine that either they would abandon Millan the same day & retire into Pavia, or at least abandoning the defence of the suburbs, they would gather themselves into the City, which they had no meane to defend after the suburbs were lost: insomuch as he warranted that any of these three accidents was sufficient to make them remaine victors & maisters of the war. I therefore ioyning diligence to the oportunity that offered, the day following being the sequenth of Iuly, they left the lodging appointed for the day before, hoping to win the suburbs without resistance: wherein rising in a glorie to surprize them by assault in marching, certaine troupes of souldiers ran in their insolency, to giue a charge vpon the gates of Rome & Tosa: where, notwithstanding the aduertisements they had the day before & redoubled the same day, that the Spaniards would breake vp & go away, yet they found vaine those relations, for that the Spaniards affronted them & made head orderly against their disordered charge, not that they meant to make a continuall resistance, but like men of war shewing their faces to the enemies, to retire in order to Millan, rather then to leaue to the enemy that aduantage, to say that they found the suburbs cowardly abandoned. Moreouer by making that resistance, they did not only preserue the reputation of their army, retayning still in their power to make their retrait alwayes into the city without disorder, but also in the action might happen some occasion to take hart & perseuere in the defence of the suburbs; a matter of right importance: for that, to make their retire into the towne, was an election to be followed rather by necessity then of will, seeing that besides many other reasons if they should restraine themselves into a circuit of place so strait & litle, it would be so much the more easie to the armies of the league to stop the entry of victuals into Millan, without which kind of reliefe they could not long hold out, for that the prouisiōs of new corne were not yet come in. Thus certaine bands of harquebuziers being presented to the defence of the two gates, where also the other Spaniards ceased not to labor & fortify continually, the Duke whose opinion was beguiled in that resistance, caused three cannons of battery to be drawne within a crosbow shot of Rome gate, and hauing planted them brauely, he began to execute vpon the gates: in which battery he labored to leuie or dismount a Falconet, and so made descend certaine bands of souldiers to giue the assault, and gaue direction to bring on the scaling ladders: but altering immediatly his purpose to giue the assault, the matter was turned into light skirmishes of shot betweene those that were without and the defendantes that were vpon the ramparts, who fighting at great aduantage, shue about fortie of the confederates, and hurt many. In this meane while the gate had felt many blowes of the cannon, though with very small damage, for that the cannons being planted farre off, the bullet lost much of his force by the farre distance of the place, insomuch as no benefit rising by the executions of the cannons, and no aduantage gotten by the skirmish of the shot, the Duke considering it would be very late to lodge the campe, would not suffer the assault to be performed, but gaue order to bestow and forrie the campe in that place, which was not done without confusion, for the shortnesse of the time. There was left a reasonable gard for the three Caunons, and the residue of the campe were bestowed almost full vpon the right hand of the way, euerie one hauing great hope of the victory, both for that by many aduertisements and by the relation of prisoners taken, they had certaine information that the Imperials trusted baggage, and prepared rather to depart, then to defend the place. To this hope was ioyned also this good hap, that in good time the same euening, there came to the campe fixe cannons of the Venetians, a reliefe much helping on the comfort and hope of the victory: But as in worldly things there is no assurance till the end be knowne, and all mortall men and their actions are put vnder an estate of incertainty and error, according to their constitution, be full of frailty and imperfection: so, not long after, that hope and the glorious imagination of the victory, did not onely change, but also the whole estate of the affaires varied and altered, for that certaine bands of Spanish footemen issuing out almost vpon the beginning of the night to set vpon the artillerie, were repulsed and beaten in by the footemen that had the gard of the same notwithstanding the Duke of Urbino sayd that they were driuen in in disorder: insomuch as after two or three houres of the night were past, he determined without counsell to dislodge and retire the army, taking his reason for so sudden alteration vpon the matter of his hope which he saw abused, for that he found resistance at the gates, and defendants vpon the ramparts of the suburbs: and also the feare he had conceiued before of the infantry of the enemies, was in this rashnesse of some consideration with him. And proceeding in his sudden passion to execute the matter he had resolved without counsell or consent of others, he gaue order to the artilleries & munitions to march away, & commanded the regiments of the Venetians, to prepare to depart. Lastly he sent to the treasurer and Lieutenant, & other Captaines of the Church, to signifie more in speede then with reason, the resolution he had set downe, perswading the to do the like without tract or deferring; a matter of such astonishment & confusion to either of them, both for the suddennesse being against all order & course of war, and for the newnesse seeming to containe some mystery, for that it was contrary to the expectation of all men, they went to him to vnderstand more particularly his inductions and reasons of this alteration, & to labor with words and arguments to bring him backe againe to his former resolution: but he insisted still vpon the removing of the campe, wherein with speeches cleare & resolute, he complained manifestly that contrary to his aduise & onely to satisfie the humors of others, he was compelled to approach so neare Millan: which since it was an offence, he told the, it belonged to wisdom & good counsell rather to correct the fault in time, then by suffering, to let it run out of all cure & remedy: he knew that both for that the army the day before for the shortnesse of the time, had bin lodged confusedly, & for the cowardise of the Italian footmē in the same euening that the artilleries were assailed, if the campe lay there till the day following, it would not only be the destruction of the enterprise, but the ruine of all the state of the league: for, he stood so assured that they would be defeated and broken, that he held it not reasonable to stand to dispute with any man, seeing that the Imperials the same euening had planted a Sacre betweene Rome gate and the gate of Fofo, which executed in flanke vpon that quarter, where lay the Venetian footemen: That the same night they would go on in that oportunitie to plant other peeces of artilleries, and the day following would sound the alarme, for which cause the army being constrained to fall into order, should be so annoyed in the flanke by the artilleries, that they would be driuen into disorder, and so vpon the sally of the Imperials out of the towne, the whole campe full of passions of feare and disorder would be easily ouerthrowne: That he was fory that both by the shortnesse of the time, & the impediments of the munitions and artilleries which were farre greater in his army then in the army Ecclesiastike, he was compelled to leauy and breake vp afore he had communicated with them: but he told them that in elections done by necessity, it was a labor superfluous to alleage excuses: That he had aduentured a greater matter, then euer had done any Captaine, offering as it were in marching to giue an assault to Millan, and that now he would take vp and vse discretion, and dispaire nothing of the victory of the enterprise for the retraite. That Prosper Colomno, haply with lesse iust causes, leuied his siege from before Parma when it was halfe taken, and yet not long after he gloriously conquered the whole Duchie of Millan: he aduised them for end to beleue his counsell and follow it, and not in other weenings to deferre their departings, since he eftsfoones assured them with a new vehemency of words, that if they stayed there till the rising of the Sunne, their destruction was more certaine then the remedie, and therefore to the end to fly from the storme before the cloude brake, he willed them alwayes with one constancy to returne to their lodgings at Saint Martin. These speeches borne vp more by the authority of the man the by any reason they brought, were not a litle grievous to the residue of the Captaines that haply bare another courage to the war, and reasonably saw further into the facility of the victory, and therefore were of a contrary opinion: amongst whom the Popes Lieutenant assaying by words and reasons to make him constant whom feare caried into so many variations, made him aunswere, that albeit there was none amongst them who thought northat his resolutions were made with great forecast and wisdom, yet the Captaines in their experience and traditions of warre, saw no manifest cause to constrain him to breake vp so suddenly: he reduced to his memorie the dispayre of the Duke of Millan, beholding in his calamity the going away of such as he hoped would haue succoured him, and dispayring to be rescued, what could stay him from doing the thing from the which the hope to be succored by them, had holden him: how much it would discourage the Pope and Venetians, and what impressions are wont to stirre and moue in the mindes of Princes when enterprises begin to succede ill, especially in their beginnings. Lastly that if the place of their campe, and the ill disposing of it, was the cause of so great a daunger as he pretended, it was easie without depriuing the armie of so great a reputation, to remedie it both in bestowing it in some other place with better order, and also in removing it with such aduantage, that the sackers planted by the enemies should haue no meane to annoy them. But the Duke confirmed of new his first conclusion, and added with vehement vehement termes that according to the reason of warre, they could not take any other deliberation: and lastly he knit vp that he would take vpon himselfe all the fault, & to lay himselfe downe to all opinions and imputations that the world would heape against him for being the Author of the action. And so aduising them not to consume vainely, in words and reasons, the time which they should employ for their safety, he told them that if they were not dislodged before the end of the night, it would be too late to apply the medicine when the ill was past cure. With this conclusion he dismissed euery one, who returning to their seuerall quarters, euery one prepared to dislodge and make to depart their charge & companies; amongst whom such bands as lay before, brake vp with such astonishment, that many going almost with demonstrations to be broken and defeated, many bands of footmen and horsemien of the Venetians disbanded themselves; some of them not looking behind them till they came to Loda; & the artilleries of the Venetians passed beyond Marignan, but being reuoked, they were stayed there: the residue of the bands, but principally the reare marched away in order: and Iohn de Medicis, who with the footmen of the Church was in the last part of the army, would not stirre till it was high day, esteeming it not agreeable to his honour, in place of the victorie so much hoped for, to cary away infamie and imputation of flying away by night; a matter which his experience induced him that he had no neede to do, because he saw none of the Imperials issue out of their ramparts to charge vpon the tayle of the armie: onely when they within the towne saw by the benefite of the Sunne and clearenesse of the day, how the campe was dislodged in maner of a tumult, they stood wondering at the going away of those, whom if they had taried they could not but haue stood in feare of: and yet in the interpretation of souldiers and martiall doings, they could not imagine the cause of so sudden alteration. The infamie of this retraite was also augmented by this, that notwithstanding the Duke had giuen order that the campe should stay at Saint Martin, yet he sent out a new direction without communicating it, that the campe-masters of the Venetians should leade their men to Marignan, wherein he feared that either the enemies would issue out to assaile him in his lodging at Saint Martin, or at least that the Castell of Millan, seeing to retire the forces that were come, to rescue it (a matter more then all other that terrifieth those that are besieged), would sue for composition, and resigne by that vile compulsion the hold they had kept so long with their valour. In which case because he durst not abide at S. Martin, he iudged it lesse dishonorable to retire once for all, then to make two retraites in so litle time. And in that humour, he caused the artilleries, the baggage, and the foremost regiment of the Venetian army to hold onto Marignan without staying at S. Martin: of which alteration when the Popes Lieutenant demanded the cause, the Duke answered that touching their suretie he put no difference betweene the one and the other place, esteeming S. Martin as tenable and defensible against the enemies as Marignan, but the cause why he marched further, was, for that the bands of souldiers being made weary with the actions of the dayes before, might with good commodity repose and refresh themselves without receiuing any impediments or vexations of the enemies. And as the Lieutenant replied touching the equall surety of the one and other place, that if the campe retired as farre as Marignan, the hope of succors would be more desperate to those that were besieged in the Castell of Millan, then if the armies stayed at S. Martin: so the Duke returned vpon him with words vehement, that so long as he carried in his hands the staffe of commaundement ouer the Venetians, he would not suffer any other to entermedle with his authority. In which obstinacy both the one and other army with the great dishonor and clamor of all the souldiers, went to incampe at Marignan, exclaiming contrary to the saying of Cesar, veni, vidi, fugi, we are come, we haue seene, & we are run away. The Duke determined to remayne at Marignan, vntil not only the campe were possessed of the number of fise thousand Swissers, whereunto were restrayned the promises of Captaine Mus and the Bishop of Loda, who at the same time that the campe brake vp came thither with fise hundred, but also till he were furnished of so many other of that nation as would make vp the full number of twelue thousand strong of those regions: and that for an opinion he had, that because there could be made no more foundation of the Castell of Millan, it would be impossible to force the towne, or to reduce it to a necessitie to yeeld for want of victuals and other reliefes necessarie, without the action of two armies, and either of them so mightie, that of it selfe it might suffice to defend it selfe against all the forces of the enemies vnited together.

the league broke up from before Milan.

Thus the eight day of Iulie, did retire from the wals of Milán, the two armies, of the league, a matter of no small astonishment to many men, and no lesse concurring the infelicity of the prediction, for that the same day, with the common consent of the whole confederates, the league was published at Rome, at Venice, and in Fraunce with ceremonies and solemnities accustomed. In the iudgement of all men of obseruation or skill, it seemed to hold so little of necessity to take a course so infamous, that many doubted least the Duke of Vrbín were not caried into that deliberation by some secret order and direction from the Senate of Venice, who for some end vnkowne to others might desire to haue the warre protracted. And others were of opinion that the Duke, by the memory of iniuries receiued of Leo, together with the wrongs which the Pope raising had done to him when he was Cardinall, and fearing withall least the greatnesse of the Pope would put his estate in danger, could not brooke so sudden a victory of the warre, being inherently caried both with the passion of hatred which is much, and the humor of ieaousie, which is more. Wherein one thing that gaue him so iust a cause to doubt and feare the Pope, was that the Florentins held Saint Leo with all the countrey of Montefelso, and that the only daughter of Lawrence de Medicis being as yet very yong, retayned alwaies the name of Duchesse of Vrbín. And the thelesse the Popes Lieutenant was aduertised by very special messengers that the Venetians were not a litle discontented with that maner of retiring, & that they had alwaies solicited that the army might approach to Milán in hope that the towne might be easily caried. And withall, seeing it was not likely that the Duke, if he had hoped to take Milán, would haue depriued himselfe of a glory, by so much more great about the merit of any other Generall in times past, by how much was greater the reputation and renowne of the Imperiall army about all others which had bin in Italy many years before, of which glory followed almost by necessity the surety of his estate, seeing the Pope, either to auoyd so great an infamy, or not to offend so much the Venetians, would not dare to inuade him: and considering also with diligence the action of all those dayes there, the Lieutenant iudged it more likely (wherein many others were concurrant with him in that opinio) that the Duke fallen from the hope which two dayes before had nourished him, that the Imperials at least wold abandon the suburbs, was returned in that vehemency to his first opinion, wherein he shewed himselfe to haue a greater feare of the Spaniards & distrust of the Italian footemen, then any of the other Captaines had: and by that meane entring into impressions of deeper feare, he embraced rashly and confusedly that deliberation.

The Pope in

This retreat astonished not a litle the Pope and Venetians, and made them so much the more altered and confused, by how much they were entred into hope and expectation to heare newes euery day of the taking of Milán. But principally the perplexity of this accident touched the Pope, who neither with money which was farre from him, nor with constancy of mind which was suppressed by his frailty, was not prepared to endure the traite and longnesse of the warre. Besides that aswell at Rome, as in other quarters of his estate, many emotions and difficulties were disclosed: for, a regiment of three hundred footemen and certaine cornets of horsemen lying in garrison within Carpy, began to make incursions and very hurtfull actions vpon all the confines that appertained to the Church, obiecing by that meane many impediments to the passage of curiers and money sent to the army from Rome and Florence: an aduersity which could not be met withall but by bestowing strong garrisons within the townes. And the Pope, who was entred into the warre with very litle store of money, and deeply imbarcked into great expences, could hardly, both with the money of his owne store, and with the contributions brought to him continually from Florence to furnish the charges of the warre, make sufficient prouisions to stoppe them, being withall troubled with a new enterprize in Tuscane, and constrained to stand vpon his guard about Rome: for, after Don Hugo and the Duke of Sessa had taken leaue of the Pope & had deposed themselues from the action of their embassage, Askanius & Vespasian Colorno being then reduced within the small boroughs of the Colonnais, which are neare to Rome, made many demonstrations to stirre vp some emotion on that side, many of their factioners and adherents being drawne to a strength within Alagno. And the Pope was driuen to keepe a diligent eye vpon their doings and stirres, aswell for the regard of the Gebelin faction in Rome, as for that not many dayes before, were discovered against him many signes of the ill disposition of the Commons: the reason was, for that when he tooke into his pay Andrew Dore, and for the better furnishing of that charge, had raysed and improued certaine impostes vnder colour to assure the seas of Rome against the foystes of

of the Moors by whom the traffike and wealth of the City was greatly hindred, the butchers refused to pay their part of the taxation, assembling in manner of a tumult afore the lodging of the Duke of Sessa nor as yet departed from Rome, and by their example all the Spaniards that were within the towne, ran thither in armes: neuerthelesse this tumult was easily appeased. About this time, the Pope stood in doubt if he should enforce the enterprise to alter the state of Sienna, for that the counsels of such as were about him differed and were of diuerse humors: for, some reposing confidence no lesse in the great number of the exiles, then in the confusion of the great gouernment popular, perswaded by many reasons that the innouation and change of the state would be an action of great facility, wherein they led him on in this property of well liking, that in that time it would be a matter of great importance to assure himselfe of that state: for that in all accidents that might happen, the entry which the enemies might make that way, might be very daungerous for the affaires of Rome and Florence: but others induced him, that it were farre better for him to adresse all his forces into one place onely, then to intangle himselfe with so many enterprises with a very little or none at all alteration or diuersion of principall effects: for that in the ende such as remayned maisters in Lumbar dy, would become Commanders in euery place. Lastly they told him he was not to lay such a foundation of confidence vpon the forces and trayne of the exiles, whose hopes in the end would be found vayne, as to set vpon the mutation of that state without making of mighty and strong prouisions, such as was very hard for him to accomplish, as well for the greatnesse of the expences which in enterprises draweth the deepest care, as for the want of principal Captaines, whom he had already sent to the warre of Lumbar dy. It may be these last perswasions had peruailed more with him, if those that gouerned within Sienna had proceeded with that moderation which in affaires of small importance the inferiors ought to vse towards their superiors, hauing more regard to necessity then to a iust discontentment: for, thus it hapned: There was one Iohn Baptista Palmier Captaine within Sienna of an hundred footmen for the City, who hauing of long time before giuen hope to the Pope, that in sending his bands of souldiers to the towne, he would put them within by a sluice or gutter that passed vnderneath the wall neare to a bastillion: and by his direction the Pope hauing sent to him two footmen men of assurance and credit, to one of the which Iohn Baptista gaue his Ensigne to beare, the Magistrates of the city with whose priuie he entertayned this practise and abused the Pope, caused these two footmen to be apprehended, against whom after they had proceeded by way of accusation, and iudicially condemned them with publication of the conspiracy, they passed them to the execution of manifest death, to the end to slander the Pope as much as they could. Moreouer they sent certaine bands of their souldiers to besiege Iohn Martinozze one of the exiles dwelling in the countrey about Sienna: all which things done as it were in despite of the Pope, incensed him with the fury of a mind iniured, to aduenture to restore all the exiles within Sienna with his owne forces and the strength of the Florentins. But as the generall prouisions were more weake then appertayned to the action of such an enterprise, & especially the numbers of footmen: so also the valor and authority of the Captaines recompenced nothing the weakenesse of the army, ouer the which he instituted as chiefe commanders Virginio Vrsin Count of Languillaro, Lodowik Count of Petillane & Iohn Fran. his son, Gentill Baillon & Iohn Sassatello: who making their muster at Centina and drawing along the riuer of Arbira, so much renowned for the worthy victory of the Gebelins against the Guelfes of Florence, approched the wals of Sienna about the xvij. of Iuly with nine peeces of artilleries, twelue hundred horse, and more then eight thousand footmen, almost all leuied in the state of the Church & Florentins, or at least all sent without mony to the exiles by their friends, from Perouza & other places. And at the same time Andrea Dore with his gallies & a thousand footme sent to him in supply, made inuasion vpon the haven of the Siemois. But in this, their hope was deceiued, that when the forces approched neare the wals of Sienna, they within made no signe of tumult, by which disappointment they were constrained to settle in campe & besiege the towne, in which was a strength of sixe hundred horsemen and three hundred footmen forreyners. And as the enemies made their approches to the gate of Camollia, & began on that side to batter the wall with their artilleries: so, the city being strong by situation, and well fortified with ramparts, and for the circuit so great, that the army enuironed but the lesse part of it, they found the inhabitants disposed with firme resolution to defend the gouernement that then ran, wherein their hatred against the Pope and Florentins caried them more vehemently, then the affection they bare to the exiles: and of the contrary in the army that besieged them, the souldiers hauing no pay made to them, were litle profitable to the seruice, & the Capitaines hauing no reputation in armes, were also in ciuill diuision amongst themselves, together with the exiles, who varied not only vpon the prouisions & dayly counsels, but also considered for the forme of the future gouernment, seeking to impart and deuide being without the thing which could not be established but by such as were within: for which conditions after they had made a vaine batty vpon the wall, and had no harts to go to the assault, they began vnder those signes of dissolute dealing, to haue a very slender hope of the victory.

In these times the difficulties of the confederates increased in Lumbardy: for, notwithstanding the regiments of fise thousand Swissers leuied by Capitaine Mus and the Bishop of Loda, were last come to the army, yet for that the Duke of Vrbino held them not a number sufficient to execute the enterprise of Millan, there was expectation of another proportion of that nation, which they had sent to require of the Cantons in the name of the French king. They hoped the Cantons would not be hard to accord those leuies, though not for other hope, at least to deface the ignominy of the battell of Pavia, and that for the same reasons the bands of souldiers wold agree to go to the war with a ready corage, specially in so great a hope of the victory. But as in that nation who not many yeres before for their valor & for the authority they had won, had no small opportunities to get a very large dominion or iurisdiction, there was now no more neither the same desire of glory, nor any care of the interests of the comon-weale: so, of the contrary, hauing their minds ouercaried with incredible couetousnesse and appetites of gaine, they gaue themselves ouer as to the chiefeft end & honor of the exercise of war, to returne to their houses loden with mony & booty. In which humors, the generall Cantons hearkning to the solicitations of war, as marchants do in bargaines & marting, either publickly seruing their turnes of the necessity of others for their owne profit, or else hauing amongst them men whose minds were vendible & corrupted, they did either accord or refuse to depart with souldiers according to the working of those ends: and by their example the chiefe and speciall Capitaines, being labored to be entertayned into pay, did rise so much the higher, and made their demaunds so much the more intollerable, by how much they saw that Princes and comon-weales had neede of their seruice. In regard of these reasons, the French king summoning the Cantons according to the articles of the contract, to ayde him with men, who by common consent were to be paid with the forty thousand duckats which the king deliuered out of his treasure, the generall Cantons after many counsels and deliberations, made him aunswere according to their custome, that they would not agree to any leuies or muster of souldiers, vnlesse the king made them first contented of all the arrerages of their pensions which he was bound to pay by yearely reuenuue: which summes being great, and hard to be satisfied in a litle time, the kings agents were constrained to entertaine Capitaines particular and yet not without leaue and authority of the Cantons, who granted such power not without great difficulty; a course which besides the long tract and consuming of time which could not be but dangerous for the present estate of affaires, did neuerthelessse not succeed neither with that effect nor that reputation, which it would haue done if the consent and authority of the Lords of the Cantons had concurred. Vnder this occasion no lesse slanderous to the Duke of Vrbino, then hurtfull to the generall proceeding of the warre, the Imperials who in this meane while were dispensed with from all vexation of the enemies lying idly at Marignan, turned all their diligence to fortify Millan, not the body of the city as they did in the beginning of the war, but the ramparts & bastillions of the suburbs, which they did no more distrust to be able to defend, for that by how much the reputation of the enemies was diminished, by so much was their hope reconfirmed & their corage redoubled. And because they had take from all the inhabitants of Millan their armes & weapons, & had thrust out of the towne all persons suspected, much lesse that the Capitaines had now so great a feare or ieaousie as before, seeing they established their owne assurance by reducing the towne to so cruell a seruitude, that they stood carelesse to make payes to the soldiers: and lodging the bards by their tyranny in the houses of the inhabitants, they did not only compel the maisters & owners of houses to minister dayly food to the soldiers both plentifully & delicatly, but also to furnish them with mony for all other things which in their vanities & fancies they would desire, not forgetting to impose vpon them as much as the rigor of tyranny could deuise: which dealings were so intollerable to the Citizens, that they had no other remedy then, by stealth & secret wayes to fly from the

the place where were layd vp the monuments of their natiuities, the effect of their delights, and the rewards of all the pleasures and solace of their life: neither durst they seeke this miserable safety openly or manifestly, for that the eyes of those that oppressed them kept a seuerer espiall upon them. And the better to assure the souldiers of those rates and taxations imposed vpon euerie houtholder but especially the Spaniards, for in the Launceknights was a great modestie and fauour, the Captaines kept bound and in chaynes in their owne houses certaine principall houtholders with their wiues and little children, not omitting to expose euerie sexe and age to their abominable lust. By reason of this tyranny all the shops of Millan were shut in, and euery man sought to hide as secretly as he could, his goods and Jewels of most value, making also the same conueiance and bestowing of their riches and ornaments of Churches, which for all that were not altogether in surety: for that the souldiers vnder colour to search for armour and weapons, tooke liberty to ransacke all the corners of the towne, and in that insolent authoritie forced the seruants to disclose the goods of their maisters, which when they found, they imparted to the owners portions not according to equitie or conscience, but such as in their licentiousnesse they thought good. The face and vniuersall apparence of that Citie was made miserable, to behold the auncient inhabitants and glorie of the same reduced to an estate of extreame oppression; a matter worthie of great commiseration, and an incredible example of the mutation of fortune to such as had seene it few yeares before, most populous and rich in Citizens; plentiful in Marchants and Artificers, proud in pompes, and very sumptuous in ornaments for men and women, naturally addicted to feastings and pleasures, and not only full of reioycing and solace, but also most happy in all other nature of comfort and contentment for the life of man: where now it stood lamentably depriued of inhabitants, what by the stroke of the plague that raged there, & for the continuall euasions of such as fled from the violation of tyrants. Miserable was the apparence of men and women being most wretched in pouerty and nakednesse: no entercourse of Marchants or trade, which before was wont to enrich the Citie: and the chearfulnesse and spirits of men were wholly conuerted into a state of languishing dolor and feare. No, no other thing remayned of the glorious apparence of that City, then the foundations of houses and Churches, and yet euen in them was discerned a lamentable spectacle, in regard of the former memory of them. Neuerthelesse as there is no sorrow without his comfort, nor no mischiefe without his remedy, so their afflictions & heauinesse tooke some consolation for the coming of the Duke of Burbon, for that the bruit went he brought some reliefe to the army: and also in their misery they made this last perswasion, that for the retrait of the campe of the confederates, their necessities and dangers would somewhat diminish: and they hoped that the Duke to whom it was sayd the Emperour had giuen the Duchy of Millan, would for his owne interests, and the better to preserue the reuenues and estate of the City, take order against so licentious oppressions of the Spaniards. This was a naked hope without any stay or foundation, for that they knew by relation of their Embassadors whom they had sent to the Emperour, that there was no further expectation of remedy from him, either for that by his farre distance he could not apply necessary prouisions for their safety, or else (which they iudged by many experiences) the compassion of the oppressions and miseries of the people was far colder in him, then his desire for the interests of his estate to minister to the army & maintaine it: to the which because payments were not made in times due, neither his authority which was far off, nor the lawes of his Captaines ioyned to their presence, could not contayne the souldiers from insolencies and iniuries: neither did the Captaines, to insinuate and win the harts of the soldiers, & sharing also in the profit of so vniuersal a spoyle, labor much to restrain this licence of war, the rather for that vnder their complaints and excuses of want of payes, they cloked what so euer was done in insolency and oppression. In so much as the chiefeest within Millan about the residue, assembling in one great number, and expressing in their face, their attire, and whole apparence, the miserable estate of their countrey including also their owne wretched condition, went with many teares and complaints to seeke the Duke of Burbon, afore whose feete that spectacle of Citizens fell prostrate, and one of them deliuered the complaints of their grieve in this sorte.

Were it not that the heauy oppressions of this Citie, for their nature more bitter, and for their time more intollerable then euer raged ouer any city or countrey within the age or memory of me, did not hinder the due offices & humilities which in so generall inclination of the whole countrey to haue a Prince proper and peculiar, our affections would offer & prefer, your coming (oh gracious Duke) had bene embraced with ceremonies and apparances agreeable to the glad-we receiue in the aspect of your gracious and honourable presence . For as to men liuing vnder a cloud of obscurity & darknesse, nothing is so sweet as the desire of light, & nothing more rerable thē the vse & benefit of the same: so to the city of Millan so long restrained vnder the yoke of seruitude & oppression, no worldly thing could be offered of more felicity or comfort, thē to behold in your face the effect of our long expectatiō, & to receiue of the hand of the Emperour, a Prince of right noble discending, and in whom, in many actions and at sundry times, we haue experierced your wisdom, your iustice, your valor, your clemency, and your liberality: but our seuerer fortune, vnder whose lawes we are without all moderation subdued, constraineth vs (expecting our remedy of none other thē of you) to powre out afore you our miseries, being greater without comparison then those that any townes taken by assault did euer endure, by the fury, by the ambition, or lust of any tyrants that conquered them . Which things of themselues intollerable, yet made more grievous to vs by the cōtinual reproches heaped against vs, that they are made vs for punishmēt of our infidelity to the Emperour: as though the late tumults proceeded by publike consent, and not by the incitation of certaine yongmen sedicious, who in their rashnesse drew to their faction the commons, who by their pouerty were assured to loose nothing, and by their nature liue alwayes desirous of innouation: and therefore are a kind of people that with so much the more facility are allured to commotion, by how much they are compounded of humours replenished with errors & vaine perswasions, stirring at the appetite of euery thing that moueth thē, euen as the waues of the sea are caried with euery light wind that bloweth. And touching the accusations that are heaped against vs, we seeke not either for our excuse, or to make lesse the quality of the crime, to reduce into reckening the merits of the people of Millan (from the highest to the lowest) in the seruice of the Emperour in the yeares before: first when the whole city for the auncient deuotion to the name of the Emperour, rose against the gouernors and against the French king; an experience reasonably inducing with what property of affection we sought to introduce the stability and supremacy of the Empire: Secondly when with so great constancy we bare out two most strait and hard besiegings, submitting willingly our victuals, houses and our mony to the commodity of the souldiers, & with thē chearefully exposed our persons to euery watch and ward, to all dangers, and to all actions of warre; an example of sufficient credit to iustify our faith & loyalty to the sacred name of the Emperour: And thirdly when at the battell of Bicocque the inhabitants of our towne defended with so braue resolution, the bridge, the onely passage by the which the French were to pierce euen into the bowels of the Imperiall army; a confirmation without resistance, that we preferred the defence of the Emperours cause before the safety of our owne liues.

 Then was our faith recommended, then was our valor reputed to vs for good, & then was our constancy lifted vp to the third heauen, both by Prosper Colonne, the Marquis of Pesquiere, and the other Captaines. And in these actiōs we may truly call vpo the testimony of your Excellency, since being present in the war which the Admirall Bonniuet made, your eyes saw, your tongue comen-ded, & your hart did oftē maruell at so great fidelity, and so assured disposition: but it agreeth not with our condition to insist vpon the memory of these things, nor to counterpeise merits with offences, since our misery present offreth to stand against all operatiōs of merits or seruices past. And if now there can be found in the people of Millan, any humor, any vaine, or any inclination of ill affection against the Emperour, we lay our selues downe to what penalties shall be determined vpon vs, yea much lesse that we wil speake in our iustification, seeing we will more willingly submit our neckes to the blocke, then hold for vniust the sentence that condemneth vs: only we loued not a litle Francis Sforce, as a Prince giuen vnto vs by the Emperour, and as one in whose father, grandfather, & brother had bin inuested a cōmandement and gouernment ouer vs: and we could do no lesse then honor him for the peculiar expectatiō that euery one had of his vertue. For which causes it brought no litle grieue vnto vs to see him so suddenly deuested & dispoyled without informatiō of the cause, yea we were not certified that he had cōspired any thing against the Emperor, but of the cōtrary, both he & others assured vs, that it proceeded rather of the ambitiō of him that gouerned the army, then of any cōmission from the Emperour: and yet the whole city passed an oath of fidelity to the Emperour, & submitted thēselues to the obedience of his Captaines. Such was the resolutiō of the city, such was the vniuersal cōsel of the Magistrates, such was the publike

content of the inhabitants, and such was the forwardnesse & fidelity of the nobility, whom to persecute thus for faults particular, there is neither law of reason, iustice, nor example. But euen in the very dayes of the tumults our faith was shewed according to the quality of the places that we held, for both in the beginning of the stir, & in the heat & fury thereof, we sayled not to labor with our authority & positions to make them leaue armes: and in the last day of the tumult there were none others then we that induced the chieffaines & seditious yongmen to go out of the city, and perswaded the commons to submit to the obedience of the Emperours Captaines. But both the commemoration of our actions and merits, and our iustifications against the infamies heaped against vs, might haply be necessary or conuenient, if there were any correspondency betweene the punishments we endure, and the faults we haue committed, or at least if our afflictions did not farre exceede our offences: but there is great difference betweene the one and the other, for we may boldly say (and we say it in our owne trueth) that if all the calamities, all the cruelties, all the inhumanities (without speaking for our honour of filthy lust or violation) which at any time within the memory of men haue bene endured by any City, any people, or any congregation of inhabitants, were gathered together and reduced into one presence, they would make but a little part of those miseries which we wretchedly do suffer, not for a moment, not for an houre, not a day, but continually and without intermission: seeing that in one instant we are dispoyled of all our substance, free men liue tormented with bondage, our wiues are imprisoned in their houses, and kept chayned by the souldiers, who with a perpetuall rage runne vpon vs for vituals, for money, for armour, for all their wants; and in their licentiousnesse will not be vsed as belongeth to men of war, but as best liketh their insolent fancies. If we be not able to furnish them daily with fresh supplies of money, they driue vs to seeke to do that which is impossible to our estate, and in their cruelty they constraine vs with threatens, with iniuries, with beatings, and with all sorts of outrages: so that there is not one of vs which interpreteth not to a singular grace and felicity to abandon to pray and spoyle all our goods, and for the sauing of our wretched liues, to fly barefoote out of Millan, and for euer to loose the solace of our countrey, which for euer hath preserved vs still this accursed day. In the time of our auncestors Federike Barberosso made desolate this City, and executed no small cruelties against the inhabitants, against the buildings, and against the wals: but alas the miseries of that time hold no comparision with the calamities of vs wretches, not only for that the tyrannie of the enemy is more easie to be endured, as being more iust, then the cruelty vniust of a friend, but also for that one day, two dayes, three dayes, sufficed to glut the wrath and inhumanitie of the victor, and the punishments of the vanquished tooke end: but with vs it is more then a moneth that we haue bene exercised vnder these miseries, wherein our torments haue increased by so many degrees of cruelty, by how many haue bene the dayes and houres since our persecution: yea we endure those crosses which before we would haue thought had bene impossible to the state of humane condition, and as men reprobate and damned to eternall perdition, we suffer without hope to see an end of our woes. Onely the confidence we haue resteth in your vertue and clemencie, vpon which we make our implorations, that you would not suffer this Citie lawfully made yours, and committed to your protection, to be wholly deuoured with the iawes of Lions and Tigers: wherein reclaiming vs with that propertie of pietie, besides the perpetuall honour of your name to be the onelie patron and restorer of this Citie, yet you shall settle and establish more in one day your principalitie with the goodwill and deuotion of subiects, then other new Princes do in manie yeares with armes and forces. For end, all our petitions, all our humilities, all our oblations, and all our desires tend to this, that if for anie cause whatsoeuer, your will be estranged to deliuer vs from this infinite oppression, or if you stand curious or restrayned by anie inducement to remoue from our neckes the yoke of this intollerable seruitude, at least we beseech you with the dearest teares of our inward hearts and affections, that you will turne against vs, and discharge vpon this people, vpon vs all, vpon euery one, vpon euery sexe, and vpon euery age, the furie, the forces, the fire, and the artilleries of your armie. In which action, we will conster to a speciall felicitie, to die by the stroke of your hand rather at one blow, then by languishing in our present miseries, to die by degrees more grievous, then the life and breath that is left vs can suffer. And if you haue no other remedie to comfort vs, your pietie shall be so much the more commended, to adde the last ende to our calamities, by how much more their inhumanitie will be detested, who seeke to leade vs in a lingring death, and yet will not adde the blow that should dispatch vs : neither shall it be lesse easie for vs to end in this sort our most wretched life, then such as loue vs will be glad with this kind of our death, euen as fathers and parentes are wont to reioyce at the birth of their children.

These words were followed with the teares and weepings of the whole assistant, to whom the Duke answered with a chearfull affability, that he was no lesse agrieved with their infelicities, then touched with remorse and desire to relecue them: which compassion he told them he would extend as much as in him lay, not only vpon the City, but also ouer the whole Duchy: he excused the insolencies done, that they were not only against the will of the Emperour, but also contrary to the intencion of all the Captaines, whom for that there was no meane to pay the soldiers, necessity had induced to consent rather to such outrages, then to abandon Millan, and leaue the city in danger, and put all the estate which the Emperour had in Italy in manifest pray to the enemies. He told them he had brought with him some quantity of money, but not sufficient to content the souldiers to whom many payes were due: neuerthelesse if the City of Millan would furnish him with thirty thousand duckats for the pay of one moneth, that he would cause the army to issue out of Millan and bestow them elsewhere, assuring them that though at other times they had bin abused in the like promises, the custome of other men should breed no law in him, for that he would alwayes obserue his faith and word, vpon the which they might assuredly repose themselves, which he confirmed with this last addition, that if he fayled them, he wished his head might be taken from his shoulders by the first shot of Cannon from the enemies. But albeit such a summe, (both for the quantity which was great to men already consumed, & for the suddenesse, wherein was matter of more astonishment to those who were already amazed) was hard to be found in the City so much wasted, yet the miseries they endured in lodging the soldiers being greater then all other degrees of calamities, they accepted the condition of the Duke, and began to make provision with as great diligence as they could. But their calamities were rather suspended then ended, for that albeit one part of the souldiers amongst whom was imparted ratably the money that was leuied, were sent to lodge in the suburbs of Rome gate and the gate of Tosa, and there both to gard the ramparts, and worke at the fortifications, & also to labour at the trench towards the garden where Prosper Colonne had made one before: yet they retayned still no lesse then the others that abode in the towne, the same lodgings they had, and continued to handle their hostes with the same rudenesse: wherein it seemed the Duke of Burbon held no reckening of his promise, or at least (as was beleued) he was not able to resist the rage and insolency of the souldiers, being entertayned and pushed on in that humour by certaine Captaines, who either by will, or through ambition, or for hatred, gaue impediments to his counsels. But the miserable people of Millan being thus depriued of their last hope, and hauing not where to make their further recourse, fell into such an estate of dispayre, that some of them, to put end by dying to so many miseries and cruelties, which they could not ouercome by liuing, threw themselves headlong from the top of their houses into the streetes, and some did wretchedly hang themselves: and yet notwithstanding all those grieuous spectacles, neither the rauine, nor rage, nor inhumanitie of the souldiers could be any way appeased. In that time also the plaine countrey was in poore condition, being no lesse ransackt by the souldiers of the Confederates, who as they were received at first with a great ioy and desire, so not long after, their inhumanities and extortions had conuerted the first affections of the people into iust hatreds; a corruption which generally ranne amongst the men of warre of that time, who taking example by the Spaniards, wasted their friends as well as they destroyed their enemies: for, notwithstanding in many chaunges of times, the liberty of souldiers had bene great in Italy, yet it had taken infinite augmentation of the footemen of the Spaniards, though not vpon iust cause, yet for reasons necessary, for that in all the warres of Italy they were alwayes ill payd: so that vnder the colour of examples, notwithstanding they had a beginning excusable, yet they proceeded and continued alwayes from ill to worse. By whose rule, the Italians albeit they had not the same necessity, for that their payes were orderly performed, yet making the custome of the Spaniards a law to them, they beganne not to be inferiour to them in any course of enormities. In which corruption, to the great contempt of the discipline of war of that time, the soldiers waighed in one ballance both their friends and their enemies, and to both peoples and countries were no lesse desolated by such as were paid to defend them, then those that receiued their payes to inuade and spoyle them.

About this time the besieged within the Castle of Millan were reduced to such straights for want of victuals, that they were at point to render the Castle: but because for their longer holding out, certaine of the chiefe confederates entertained them with hopes to be succoured, they thrust out in the night at the Castle gate which hath his prospect vpon the trenches that enuironed it without, more then three hundred footmen, women, children, & mouthes vnprofitable: who albeit the enemies that warded at that place, hearing the noise of their going, gaue the alarme to the residue, yet they passed away all in safety without any impediment, finding fauour in the straightnesse of the trenches and ayde of their pikes. There were two trenches about two stons cast from the Castle, and betweene them both a rampart of fortie fadomes high, which rampart as it serued as a guard against the Castle, so also it couered such as without would assaile the trenches. This miserable troupe excluded out of the Castle, went to Marignan, where the armie was, and giuing good testimonie of the extremity wherein the Castle was, and no lesse experience of the weakenesse of the trenches, for that both women and litle children found passage through them, the Captaines by their relation turned easies to deuise for the succour of the Castle, with who did readily concurre the Duke of Vrbis, to the end he would not take vpon himselfe alone the burthen of the excuse, which he supposed would not be now so easie as before, for that his army being now possessed of a strength of fiew thousand Swissers, there was cut off the principall cause of daunger alleaged to make their approaches to Millan without other footment then the Italians: so that it was set downe with a full consent of counsell, that the armie should directly addresse their approaches to the castle, and commaunding the Churches of S. Gregorie and S. Angelo, neighbours to the counter-scarps, they should encampe below Millan. With which resolution the armie brake vp from Marignan, and for the impediments of the wayes, being cloyed with hilles and ditches, they marched foure dayes by wayes troublesome, and the xxij. of Iulie they came to incampe betweenthe Abbey of Casaret and the tiuer of Ambro, in a place commonly called Ambro: in which place the Duke chaunging the first direction set downe in the counsell, gaue order to dispose the lodgings of the armie in such sort, that the front of the campe might haue his prospect vpon the Abbey of Casaret, which is within a mile of Millan, and keeping the riuer of Ambra vpon his backe, it might stretch out on the right hand vntill the harbour, and on the left hand vntill the bridge: so that the lodgings of the armie bare directly betweene the gate of Renze and the gate of Tosa, and holding litle of the new gate, it bare a strong situation and disposition, as well for those regards, as for the nature of the countrey. The Duke alleaged that he had exchanged the lodging of the Monasteries for that place, both for that it was more neare the Castle, and also not so farre vnderneath the walles, as to be put into daunger by any compulsion, and withall, for that threatning the enemies in manie places, they should be constrained to bestow guards in seuerall quarters; a matter which for their small number increased not a litle their difficulties. And now the armie being incamped in those lodgings, some regiments were sent out the same day to besiege the towne of Monce, which they tooke by composition, and the day following with artilleries they subdued the Castle, wherein was a garrison of an hundred footmen Neapolitans: there the Captaines began to deuise straightly how to put victuals within the Castle of Millan, which they were informed was reduced to such a state of necessity, that there was intention to send out Francois Sforce: and albeit there were amongst them many Captaines, who either for that simply such was their opinion, or else to shew themselves forward and valiant in those things which were to be determined with a greater daunger of honour and reputation to others then to themselves, gaue counsell to giue a charge vpon the trenches: yet the Duke seeing into the perill and desperate hazard of the exploit, would not be against it openly, but objecting difficulties, and temporizing with delayes, he hindred that there was made no conclusion: in so much as the deliberation being referred ouer till the next day, the Captaines of the Swissers demaunded to be introduced into the counsell, which neuer till then was permitted to them: and, Captaine Mus, who for that he had leauied the greatest part of them, and retained amongst them the title of Captaine Generall, alleaged in the behalfe of all his nation: that they maruelled not a litle that the war being begun for the rescue of the castle of Millan, whose necessities redoubled by so much time as it was deferred, they stood to dispute vainly whether they should succour it or not, at a time when was more necessitie of courage and execution: That he did not doubt but in such a counsell would be set downe a resolution agreeable to the vniuersall safetie of the state of Millan, to the honour of so many braue Captaines, & to the reputation of so flourishing an armie: in which case he let them to vnderstand, that the Captaines and souldiers of his nation would interpret it to their great iniurie and shame, if in the approaching and action of the castle, they were not referred both to that place, and to that part of the perill, which the fidelity and honour of their nation did deserue. Lastly, he protested that in taking that counsell he would not faile to reduce them not to keepe so great a memorie of such a with infamie had lost the enterprises begun before, as therby they should passe into forgetfulnesse the glorie and fortune of those that had vanquished.

As they stood vpon consuming of time about these counsels and deliberations, wherein was manifestly discerned, that the Duke of Vrbino was of opinion that the Castle could not be succoured, newes came to the campe (though not very certaine) that the Castle had compounded with the Imperials, or at least was vpon the point to capitulate. These aduertisements were easily beleecued of the Duke, who alleaged in the presence of the whole Counsell, that though the accord could not be but preiudiciall to the Duke of Millan, yet it was agreeable and profitable to the affaires of the League, seeing it tooke them out of the daunger, which either desire or necessitie to relecue the Castle might haplie bring vpon the armie, being caried with rash and soudaine minds to aduenture to do the thing which in reason and experience of warre held almost of impossibility: insomuch as that danger being now taken away, they were to begin of new to consult and deliberate vpon the proceedings of the warre, in the same sort, as if it were the first day of the beginning of the same: so litle a thing hapning accidentally doth alter the whole estate and resolution of great affaires. But not manie dayes after the Campe was credibly aduertised that the composition was past: for the Duke of Millan, who saw the Castle reduced to such an extremity for victuals, that it could scarcely hold out one day, and being altogether out of hope to be rescued, for that he saw no aduancing of the campe of the League, who had lyen so neare two dayes, was driuen by the consideration of his owne perill, & not to be found vnready to entertaine the parley which had bene begun many dayes before with the Duke of Burbon, who after the retiring of the armie, was sent to visite him in the Castle, and there the .xxiiij. of Iuly they fell to accord in this sort: That without preiudice to his rights and interests he should deliuer vp the Castle of Millan to the Captaines appointed to receiue it in the Emperours name, who promised him to depart in safetie, together with those companies that were with him: That it should be lawfull for him to remaine at Coma, which was deliuered to him, with the gouernment and reuenues of the same towne, vntill they had receiued further direction from the Emperour touching his affaires: and that there should be added so much of other nature of reuenues, as should in the whole amount to thirty thousand duckets yearly: That they should giue him safe conduct to go in person to the Emperour, with obligation to content the souldiers that were within the Castle for all their payes due and past, which were supposed to amount vnto twentie thousand duckets: That the Duke of Millan should put into the hands of the Pronotarie Caraccioli, Iohn Angelo Riccio, and Politiano, to the end he might examine them, neuerthelesse Caraccioli to giue his faith to suffer them to go away afterwards, and to giue them safe conduct to some place of suretie: That the Duke should deliuer the Bishop of Alexandria, who was prisoner within the Castle of Cremona, and that new Castle in Tortono should be deliuered to Sforzino. In this conuention there was no speech made of the Castle of Cremona, which being no longer able to resist the rage of hunger, the Duke had giuen charge to Iames Philip Sacco, whom he had sent to the Duke of Burbon to promise it to the Imperials, if composition could not be obtained otherwise: but he discerning by their words and maner of dealing what desire they had to accord, and declaring vnto them that the Duke could neuer passe such a matter, obtained so much that there should be nothing spoken of it: for albeit the Captaines Imperials had great coniectures that the Castle had no great store of victuals, and that the necessitie of the defendants would ere it were long make them satisfied of the end and expectation of their intention: yet being desirous to be assured of it, they were determined to accept it vnder any conditions, for that they stood doubtfull whether the armie of the League that lay neare, would aduenture to succour it. In which case hauing no confidence to be able to defend the trenches, they had resolved to issue on into the field and fight: which doubtfull euent of fortune they were willing to auoyd in accepting what conditions they could obtaine of the Duke, who the day following issued out of the castle, and being accompanied with manie of the Imperiall Captaines euen as farre as the barriers and limits of the army, he taried there one day, and afterwards he tooke the way to Coma, the Imperials standing vpon this, that they had promised to giue him safe retraite and lodging within Coma, but not to make depart out of the towne their companies of soldiers that were there in garrison. In regard of which dealing, he saw no cause to repose further confidence in them, & albeit he had determined before to do nothing that might incense or stir vp the mind of the Emperour, yet for his safety he tooke the way to Loda, which City the Confederates restored wholly into his hands: and there, for that there was no one article of the capitulations obserued to him, sauing that he & his companies came away in safety, he ratified by publike instrument, the league made in name by the Pope and Venetians.

But in this time albeit the Pope, who for the commotion of the Colonnos, had published a Bull against the Cardinall and all others of the family of Colonna: yet seeing his hope to chaunge the gouernment of Sienna much diminished, and no lesse grieuous and troublesome to him to be vexed and trauelled in the territories of Rome, he began with better inclination to open his eares to Don Hugo de Moncado, who not with intention to contract with him, but to make him more negligent in aduancing his prouisions, made a motion that vnder certaine conditions, the offences should cease against the Siennos, and all quarrels betweene him & the Colonnos: and to deale in this negociation, Vespasian Colonna, whom the Pope trusted much, came to Rome, by which occasion the Pope hauing lost all hope of successe about Sienna, and treating to leaue the armie from before the walles, delayed the execution of that good counsell, expecting to runne into a lesse slaunder, to make it breake vp as soone as the accord now in negociation should be concluded: and yet for the disorders and confusions of the armie, which went increasing, it was determined at Florence that it should retire: but sodaine and straunge be the accidents of warre: the day before the armie was appointed to depart, a regiment of foure hundred footemen issuing out of the towne, marched towards the artilleries which were guarded by James Corso, who seeing the faces of the souldiers comming, ranne away in feare from the place that he had promised to defend: by whose example, together with the noise and brute of the accident comming to the armie, the whole armie hauing neither order nor obedience, tooke to flying, being neither charged nor followed. In which confusion of running away, there was struiuing who could make best speed, and for the desire they had to escape the daunger which their timorous imaginations stirred vp, the desire to flie was all one in the Captaines and in the souldiers, and in the horsemen and the footemen, nothing being able to assure them, in whose eares the noise of feare did continually ring: they left to the enemies their victuals, their baggage, and artilleries, of which ten peeces great and small belonging to the Florentines, and seuen appertaining to Perouza, were caried into Sienna with so litle gladnes, tending almost to a triumph. By the example of this accident, the people began with gerat shouting and cries to renew the infamies deserued by the Florentines in the like case loosing long time before (euen afore the walles of Sienna) their artilleries, which were guarded vpon the publike place of the same citie. This chafe was giuen the day after the rendring of the Castle of Millan to the Imperials. At which time also the publike calamities of all Christendome being added to afflictions particular, the Pope had aduertisement out of Hungary, that Solyman Ottoman, who was come from Constantinople with a mighty armie to inuade the kingdom of Hungarie, hauing passed the riuier of Sauo without impediment, by the commodity of gare, Belgrade, which he had subdued few yeares before, had taken the Castle of Peter Varadin, and passed the riuier of Drauo: in so much as hauing no impediment of mountaines or riuers, the rage of the Turke was like to reduce the whole kingdom of Hungarie into manifest daunger.

Now for as much as the Castle of Millan was fallen into the hands of the Emperour, it seemed that in Italy the state of the warre was wonderfully chaanged: wherein the Duke of Vrbino tooke his reason vpon necessity to take new counsels, such as they should haue set downe and taken, if from the beginning of the warre the Castle of Millan had not bene in the hands of Frauncis Sforce and in that regard the same day the Castle was rendred, amplifying a discourse which he made to the Popes Lieutenant and Treasurer of Venice, touching the estate of affaires, he added that it was necessarie to create a Captaine generall ouer the whole League, to take charge and commaund all the armies: wherein he said he ioyned with himselfe the interests and respects of others, being determined for his owne particular, without that authoritie, not to intangle himselfe with care of anie other thing then to commaund ouer the Venetian armie; a resolution which he prayed them to signifie to the Pope and Venetians. Whereupon the Senate agreed, the rather to remoue him from that demaund, which was made in a tyme so inconuenient, and so greatly discontenting to the Pope, to send to the campe Louis Pisan a Gentleman of great authority, by whose working his vehement inclination was rather moderated, then his determination altered. But touching the maner of proceeding in the warre hereafter, it was determined that the armie should not remoue from the place where it was, till the Swissers were come, who were waged vnder the name, & with the money of the French king. The Duke of Vrbino thought it necessarie after they were come, to lie about Millan in two seuerall quarters, not to assaile it, or proue to force it, but to hold it languishing, till for want of victuals it were driuen to yeeld, which he hoped wold come to passe within three moneths. He was with great vehemency against the opinion of those, who counselled, that after the campe was settled, they should aduenture to take the towne, wherein he inferred that the League, being mightie in men and money, and the Imperials in necessitie of both, all reasons and inducements of warre promised the victorie of the enterprise: he said there was not one argument for the which the contrarie ought to be feared, but the desire to aduance the victorie, for that the enemies consuming themselves with time and patience, there was nothing to stop the good course and successe of things. He was answered, that the discourse he made was strong and credible, if he stood assured that there would not come out of Germany a new succour of footmen, which if it were such as to enable the Imperials to take the field, there was no doubt that the euent of the whole warre would not be exposed to the arbitrement of fortune. But he replied, that euen in that case he made no lesse account of the victorie, for that knowing the Duke of Vrbino to be of nature burning and actiue, he made this iudgement of him, that whensoever he esteemed himselfe to be equall in forces with the armie of the confederates, he would aduance so fast, as by his rashnesse would rise occasion of some good accident to hasten the victorie: but because for the difficulties which they vnderstood fell out in leauying them, they feared they would draw a long tract of time in conning, which might bring danger: it was determined by the counsell of the Duke of Vrbino and solicitation of the Duke of Millan, to send out Malatesta Baillon with an armie of three hundred men at armes, three hundred light horsemen, and fiue thousand footmen to take the towne of Cremona, which they supposed might be easily forced, for that it contained not but an hundred men at armes, two hundred light horsemen, a thousand Launceknights of choice, and three hundred Spaniards, verie small store of artilleries, lesse quantity of munitions, and a slender prouision of victuals: the inhabitants notwithstanding they were appalled in courage, yet they were enemies to the Imperials: and the Castle no lesse hatefull to the name of the Emperour: and albeit the Castle was separate from the Citie by a trench, yet by the report of Hanniball Piccianard, who was Captaine, it was easie to surmount the flanks, and by that meane to carie it without danger. With these directions and counsels Malatesta went to Cremona, for whose departure the armie being diminished, the Duke of Vrbino fell into no small feare, least the regiments that were within Millan should giue them in the night a Canuifado in their lodgings, so farre were things remoued from all hope of the victorie: neuerthelesse Iohn de Medicis prouoked many skirmishes, and perfourmed them, wherein notwithstanding he made manie good impressions of his valour, with no lesse declaration of the vertue of the Italian footmen, which had not bene seene but sithence he had the charge of them; yet those skirmishes did rather hurt then helpe the substance of the warre, for that ordinarily they consumed some of the most braue and best experienced soldiers.

Here is to be noted, that for these aduersities and contrary euents of affaires, the Pope was growne into a maruellous discouragement and appalement of mind, both for that he was not prouided of money to furnish the long traine of the warre, which he now discerned, and also not disposed to make leauies of treasures by such meanes as the importance of the affaires required, and such as other Popes afore him had wont to vse to releue those wants: but the thing that troubled him most, was, that he saw not that the effects of the French king were correspondent to the obligations of the league, and to the assurance and promise which euery one made of him: for, besides he was long before he wold make payment of the fortie thousand duckets for the first moneths pay, and giue order for the leauing of the Swissers: yet there was not discerned in him any preparatiō to begin the warre beyond the Mounts: no rather he found reasons to alleage, that it was first necessary to signifie to the Emperour what had bene contracted in the articles of the confederation, for that otherwise the king of England, who had a particular league with the Emperour for their common defence, might haply minister aide vnto him, where, if signification were made, regard and coniecture would cease; and that then he would immediatly begin the warre, hoping that the king of England wold do the like, who promised as soone as signification were made, to protest against the Emperour, and then to enter into the confederation made at Coignac. Moreover, the French king proceeded coldly to prepare his army by sea: and the thing that discovered more his intention was, that the five hundred Launces which he was bound to send into Italy, were long in passing the Mounts: against which albeit was alleaged, that such a tract & lingering proceeded either of the negligence of the Frenchmen, which is naturall to that nation, or of the disability to recover mony which hapned by the losse of credite the last yeares with the Marchants of Lyon, or for that the companies of men at armes were in verie ill point, for their losses receiued in the battell of Pavia, and had not bene repaired with any money since: so that they could not reorder and refurnish themselves, but with the fauor of a good time: yet such as made a more neare obseruation of things, began to doubt by the proceedings of the French, least to the king was more agreeable the lingering of the warre, then the expedition of the victorie: they supposed he feared (according to the small fidelity and confidence amongst Princes in those times) that the Italians recouering once the Duchy of Millan, and by that meane making small account of his interests, wold either grow to accord without him with the Emperour, or at least wold be negligent so to vex and trauell him, as not to induce or cōpell him to restore his children. But the matter that most kept the Pope in suspence, was, that the king of England being required to enter the confederation that was made by his perswasions & setting on, & expressing now no correspondencie of reasons, & promises which he had made before: made a demaund, more to protract and defer, then for other occasion, that the Confederates wold be bound to satisfie him of the money which the Emperour ought him, & that the estate & reuenues promised to him in the kingdome of Naples might by assignation be paid out of the Duchy of Millan. Moreover, the Pope feared least the family of the Colonnas, who with many cōmotions held him in continuall suspicion, wold not in the end rise to inuade him with the forces of the realme of Naples: so that making a collection & consideration of all these difficulties & dangers together, he made vehement instance to the Confederates, that notwithstanding euery one in particular should sollicite & aduance such prouisions both by sea & land as they were bound vnto by the articles of the League, yet he perswaded the in generall, to make a common inuasion vpon the kingdome of Naples with an armie of a thousand light horsemen, twelue thousand footmen, & a conuenient number of men at armes. He took his reason of this deuise vpon the experience of things done til that day, & iudged that afterwards there wold succeed no better issue, if they vexed not the Emperour with war in other places then in the Duchy of Millan: and for the better aduancing of this expedition, he dispatched to the French king Iohn Baptista Sanga, a Romane, and one of his Secretaries, both to pull him on with a better inclination to the war, and to impart with him the estate of his wants and pouertie of mony, together with the small meanes he had to go on with so heauy a burthen of expences, if he were not eased with some quantity of money from him: that he was determined to hearken presently to the war of Naples, notwithstanding the articles of the confederation bare not to do any action vpon that kingdome, so long as the warre should endure in Lombardy: that the Venetians notwithstanding to auoid so great expences, had made difficulty in the beginning, yet being caried with his importunities, they had consented to be concurrant in the action, and that without the French king, but with so much lesse numbers of men as imported his part and contribution: that the French king for that cause ouer and besides the 500 Launces, to whō he was minded to giue for Generall and Commander the Marquis of Salussa, more for the fortune and felicitie, then for valour and vertue of the man, as he said, wold also send another proportion of three hundred Launces into Lombardy, to the end to administer one part of them to the warres of Naples: that he wold sollicite the comming on of the armie by sea, and that either to hold Genes short and restrained with it, or else to conuert it against the kingdome of Naples: which armie, albeit the

Frenchmen led on with as slow aduancements as they vsed in the other prouisions, yett went on still in forwardnesse. The kings nauie contained foure gallions and sixteene light Gallies, the Venetians contained thirteen Gallies, & the Popes eleuen: ouer all which Nauy, reduced into one Admiralty, Peter Namarre was appointed Captaine generall at the kings instance, notwithstanding the Pope could haue wished that dignity to haue bene transferred to Andrew Dore. Besides all these instructions & commissions, the Pope gaue a secret charge to Sanga, to perswade the French king to vndertake the enterprise of Millan for himself, to the end to entangle him with that occasion, and to imbarke him into the war with all his forces. Moreover, Sanga was enioyned to go out of Fraunce to the king of England, to demand succors of mony, seeing the king of that realme (desiring greatly in the beginning the warre against the Emperour, so farre forth as the League were negotiated in England, according to his desire and the Cardinals of York) would enter the League, as was beleueed: but the nature of the time, and necessity of the Cattle of Millan not suffering a long treaty or conference, when he saw the League was made by others, he thought he might hold the ballance, and stand as a looker on and a Iudge. The Pope also solicited both at the perswasions of the Venetians, and at the request of the French king, who had sent to that end the Bishop of Bayeux to Ferrara, to haue composed the controuersies that were betwene him and that Duke: but he handled that action more in apparence then in effect, making vnto him many offers, and amongst others, to giue him Rauenna in counterchaunge of Modena and Reggio; a couerture or colour which the Duke made no reckening of, not onely for that by taking a new heart for the retiring of the armie from before the walles of Millan, he was more hardly then before drawne to like of the offers that were made, and chiefly that of Rauenna, but also for the great difference and inequalitye of the reuepues, and that he tooke it to be a meane to driue him with time into contention with the Venetians.

Prouisions of
the Emperour
against the Confederates.

These were the practises, preparations & operations of the confederats, deferred, broken off, & changed, according to the ends, and according to the counsels of the Princes that managed them. But the Emperour, whose deliberations depended wholly of himselfe, was neither negligent nor irresolute, so far forth as his power & forces stretched: for, after the French king, at the instance of the Confederates, had denied to the Viceroy leaue to passe into Italy, which he demanded with great affection, the Viceroy refusing to take the kings present, which was supposed to be in value twenty thousand Crownes, departed and tooke his way into Spaine, bearing with him a writing written with the kings hand, wherein he protested a readinesse to obserue the accord of Madrill, so farre forth as he would conuert the restitution of Burgundy into an exchange and paiment of two millions of Crownes: by whose relation, the Emperour seeing now no further hope of obseruation in the king, determined to send by sea into Italy the Viceroy with the Launceknights that were in Parpignan, being almost three thousand, with the like number of Spanish footmen, containing in all a number of sixe thousand: he gaue order also to send a new supply of an hundred thousand duckets to Millan, and albeit he solicited the expedition of the army by sea, yet it could not be ready with speed according to his expectation, for that besides the time to muster and assemble the Spanish souldiers, there was necessity to pay the Launceknights an hundred thousand duckets, due vpon their wages past: furthermore he addressed continuall directions into Germany to send to Millan new succours of footmen, but both for that he gaue no order for their payes, and also for the disability of his brother to leaue money, that expedition proceeded slowly: and yet by the delays and ill successe and issue of the confederates, no sort of temporising or slownesse could be hurtfull: for Malatesta Baillon, being come before Cremona, planted his artilleries by night on the seuenth of August before the gate of la Mussa, iudging that place to be weake, for that it was ill flanked, and worse rampared: and for that he thought at the same time to giue the assault on the castle side, he supposed it best to make his batterie in a place farre off, to the end to constrain the defendants to deuide their strength into sundrie places: neuerthelesse after his artilleries had executed, he found the place strong, and fortified with ramparts, and the wall which he battered so high of earth, that the discent into the towne would be too troublesome: the same being the cause that he would not giue the assault, but with a counsell quite contrarie he determined to beginne a new batterie neare the Castle, in a place called Santa Monaca, which afore time had bene battered by Federike Bossolo: and at the same time he caused to cut two trenches vpon the Castle greene, of the which one of them drew on the right hand towards the riuer of

Pau, where the defendants of the Castle had made two trenches: he hoped by the commodity of his trench, to take from them a Bastillion neare to the which there was souldiers already arrived, and which Bastillion was in their first trench neare the wall of the towne: if he won it, he said his plot to serue his turne by the benefite of it, and to make it a Cavalier or Mount to batter along the walle, which the Frenchmen at other times had battered. For which cause the Imperials made another bastillion behind their hindermost trench: the other trench which Malatesta cast, was on the left hand towards the wall, and so neare to theirs, that they ioyned within the casting of stones; he determined to begin his batterie as soone as the trenches were made, according to his deuse, to the which the artilleries of the enemies gaue no great impediment, for that within Cremona were but foure Falconets, which they applyed but seldome by reason of their necessitie of munitions and powder: yet the souldiers that were footmen within, ceased not to make sallies out, and vexed those that laboured at the trenches, whom they oftentimes put to great distresse, notwithstanding they had a great guard. By reason of which impediments increasing with other difficulties and daungers, Malatesta who was vncertaine what to do, confounded with little praise to himselfe by diuerse iudgements and letters, all the Captaines of the armie, who finding the action of Cremona to multiply in difficulties, sent to his campe a regiment of twelue hundred Launceknights newly leauied by the Venetians at a ioynt charge and expences with the Pope: and not many dayes after, to the end to reconcile the discord and ielousie growne betweene Malatesta and Iulius Manfron the Treasurer Pezaro, who after a great reconciliation, was now become more agreeable to the Duke of Vrbino, went also to his campe with a strength of three thousand footemen: but Malatesta continued his batteries, and the night before the thirteenth of August, he planted foure peeces of artilleries betweene Saint Lukes gate and the Castle, to take a Bastillion, where, after he had executed almost all the day, he made an opening or breach into the trench, hoping to carie the Bastillion the same night: but about foure houres within night there issued out of the towne a small crue of Launceknights, who gaue a charge vpon those that guarded the trenches, containing both within and without more then a thousand footemen: and after they had put them in disorder, they forced the guard to abandon the charge: neuerthelesse they were compelled the day after to go away, so that the trench that had bene made with so great paine and industrie, remained abandoned, as well on the one part as on the other. But amid these actions it seemed fortune would play a part, offering to be fauourable to those without, if they could haue knowne how to discern: or to take the occasion: for, as in the night of the fourteenth day, about forty sadome of wall fell of it selfe; betweene Saint Lukes gate and the Castle, whereto was deuoured and lost one peece of their artilleries in the ruines: so if they had taken the aduantage of this accident, and followed on with the assault as soone as the day had appeared, the defendants, whose feare was redoubled with the astonishment of a chaunce so sodaine and vnlooked for, would haue had no hope at all to resist or repulse them, for that the place which they should haue occupied with defence, lay open and discovered to the artilleries of the Castle: But as there is nothing more suttle then occasion, which being taken & applyed, draweth with it good issue, but being neglected or fore-slowed, slideth away as a vapour, leauing men abused with their proper error. So whilst Malatesta stood long before he could resolue, and then lost time ere he could raunge his souldiers to go to the assault, the benefite of this occasion was taken away by the industrie of the defendants, who laboured with extreme diligence within, they first sought to couer themselves with risings and hilles cast vp with the labour of their hands, against the artillerie of the Castle, and afterwards they rampard themselves in the front of the enemies: so that when the assault came to be presented, being then well of the day, albeit the most part of the campe were conuerted to that side, yet for that they went all discovered and open, they made their approaches with their great harmes: and being approched, besides the other defences wherein they found perill, they were wonderfully vexed with stones which the defendants within cast downe vpon them: by which maner of execution Iulius Manfron and Capitaine Maron were slaine vpon the place, together with manie other souldiers of condition. At the same time there was another assault giuen by the Castle, but that was repulsed with a verie small damage: it was appointed also that at the batterie made at Santa Monaca, should be performed another assault with foure score men at armes, an hundred light horsmen, and a thousand footmen: but by the impediment of the ditch which was full of water, & the disadvantage of the place being well fortified, the souldiers retired without doing any thing. After this arrived at the campe, the Treasurer Pesero with three thousand footmen Italians, and more then a thousand Swissers, together with a new cōplement of artilleries: by which supply the campe being now about eight thousand footmen, the Capewins thought to make two batteries following on with the assault to either of them with three thousand footmen, and with the other two thousand to assaile the part towards the Castle and Pesero bringing with him to the Campe a great quantity of Pyoners, they laboured with great industrie all the trenches, of the which one being finished the xxij. of August, they wonne after long fight to couer by their valour a flanke of the enemies. Afterwards the night of the five and twentieth day, they made two batteries, the one (of the which Malatesta had charge) beyond that place which Federike had executed aforetime: the other at Musse gate, managed by Camilla Vrsin; but the successe both of the one & the other was verie slender, for that the place where Malatesta braked his artilleries by reason it was marish, gaue no firme ground to the artilleries, for that in sinking at the breach by the softnesse of the place, they mounded at the metall or mouth of the peece, and shot ouer. And touching the batterie of Camilla, both it was low, which hindered the execution, and in the action of the assaule the souldiers found impediment in a ditch which was full of water, together with so many small shot beating in flanke, that their valour could not make them a way to passe further: so that albeit for all these difficulties they gaue the assault, and receiued in that place the greatest harmes: and albeit on Malatestas side the footmen went vp to the wall, passing a ditch, wherein the water was deeper then was looked for, yet by the vertue of the defendants, applyed to the aduantages of places, they were easily and readily repulsed. Moreouer on the Castle side one part of the Cavalier being reuerfed and put downe, the footmen mounted vpon it: but for that the descent withinwards was too high, the souldiers that were come to the assault from all parts in no good order, were put backe, some running on in their rashnesse till they were slaine, and some with a more fauourable infelicitie bare away the rewards of their enterprise in wounds and maimes of their bodies, and with very litle hurt of their enemies. These disorders together with the priuation of hope to take Cremona, ioyned to the want of gouernement and obedience of the Campe, called the Duke of Vrbino to go thither in person, who drew out of the army that lay before Millan, almost all the Venetian footmen, and left there one part of the men at armes with all the regiments of the Church, together with the Swissers, who now might containe a number of thirteene thousand: and now that there remained in the army a lesse number of men, which being disurnished of a Generall or Commander of such authoritie, he despised the same daunger, which he seemed alwaies before to feare when there were greater forces: and lastly, assuring that it was not the custome of men of warre, but chiefly of the Spaniards, to inuade other men of warre in their strength or campe: he went from the armie to Cremona, laying this plot, not to carie it with the only force of batteries and assaults, for that the ramparts of the enemies were too strong, but by seeking with the industrie of so many Pyoners to approach their trenches and Bastillions, and to make themselves maisters of them more by the benefite of vndermining, then through the vertue of armes. There were many of the Captaines that reprehended him in many things touching the gouernment of that enterprise against the state of Millan, but chiefly they reproched the retraite and breaking vp from before the walles of Millan, but most of all did they challenge him of indiscretion, for that from the beginning he had attempted to carie Cremona with verie small forces, trusting more in his vanity and fancie, then by the rule of experience or reason to accomplish the action with great facility: wherein also the difficulties of the enterprise still redoubling & discovering, he had embarked such a part of the army, as far greater occasiōs falling out whilest he consumed the time there, were hindred and lost by following that seruice: for, seeing now the full numbers of Swissers were come to the campe; both so manie as was necessarie, and no fewer then was looked for, he might by enuironing Millan with two armies; according to the first resolution, cut off that great resort and traffike of victuals which continually had passage thither by the way of Pania, which the single armie that lay at Amber could not refraine for the great circuit of place and wayes to be made. But the matter of greatest importance, was, to loose the occasion that haply was offered to force Millan: the rather for that the bands of souldiers that were within, were so weakened by sickness & diseases, that the bodies most sound & free being scarcely able to entertaine the ordinary war and ward with other necessary factions of warre, the Imperials themselves gaue this iudgement of their owne estate, that if they had bene inuaded in that aduersity and weakenesse, their danger had bene greater then their valour could haue defended it. But amid these good offers to the Confederates no lesse certain, and great was the occasion giuen to take Genes, for that as the Venetian Nauie was ioynd with the Popes at Ciuita Vecchia, & afterwards stayed in the port of Liurne to tarie for the French, which with sixteene gallies, foure gallions, & foure other vessels was fallen into the riuer of Ponent, had gotten by the consent of the inhabitants, Sauona & all the riuer of Ponent: so that armie by sea, after they had taken many ships loden with graine going to Genes, passed away to Liurne to knit and ioyne with the residue: besides, it was also determined, that at the comon expences of the Confederates, there should be armed in the port of Marseilles twelue great ships, to the end that with the French Gallies, and by the direction of Peter of Nauarre, to meete with the Nauie that was prepared in the port of Carthage, or at least to encounter them at sea: where the three fleets making saile together, the Nauie Ecclesiastike and Venetian stayed at Porro fino, and the French fleet returned to Sauona: and from those places scouring all the seas without resistance, they restrained Genes so straight where was want of victuals, that if they had sent vp a certaine strength of souldiers by land to cut from them that only refuge, there was no doubt but the towne of Genes would haue come to composition. The Captaines of the said Nauies desired no other thing both by letters and Messengers expresse, demanding at least that there might be set foure thousand men on land: but there could be no souldiers drawne frō the campe that lay before Cremona: and the Duke of Vrbino with others, holding it too great a daunger to diminish the armie that lay before Milano, they entertained the demands of the sea Captaines with hope, that as soone as the enterprise of Cremona were ended, there should be sent to them a sufficient strength of souldiers, according to their desire.

But the enterprise of Cremona, as well for the vertue of the defendants, as for that the great workings of Pyoners draw a long time, proceeded euery day with greater delays & temporizing: then was looked for: for, the Duke who would needs haue at the campe two thousand pyoners, a great quantity of munitions, and no lesse store of all sorts of instruments, made a continuall working at the trenches of the Castle, and at the Bastillion towards Pav, both to win that, & to serue his turne of the Cavalier, notwithstanding that the enemies doubting of his intention, were retired many dayes before, hauing made a strong rampart behind it: he drew a worke also at the two heads of the trenches which went ouerthwart the Castle Greene, the better to beat the Cavaliers which the enemies had made there: and betweene the two trenches of the campe, he cast another trench of sixe fadome broad, prouiding, that during the labour of the pyoners, they should be couered with earth and other matter for their defence both on front and in flanke: the reason of this worke was, to make a Cavalier at such time as they should be come to the ditch of the enemies trench: Moreouer, he caused to cast a ditch without the castle, towards the towne wall, the better to haue way to the Bastillion towards the wall that was ruinate: he made another trench at Saint Lukes gate, drawing euen vp to the wall: and by the commodity of these labours and workings, he ceased not with the artilleries planted within the Castle, to execute vpon the ramparts of the enemies: which for the alteration of the earth much vsed and loosened, did easily dampe and moderate the shot of the artilleries. On the other side the defendants within lost no time: for, distrusting to be long able to keepe trenches and cavaliers, they made a ditch towards the houses of the towne, and yet made many braue issues & sallies, and with great courage charged vpon the works of the enemies: insomuch as the night before the seuenth day, they set vpon in three places those trenches which the enemies cast vpon the side of the Castle: where finding sleeping in their securitie the bands of footmen that were set to guard them, they slue more then an hundred together with certaine Captaines, and followed the charge euen vp to the rauelin before the Castle: neuertheless notwithstanding their valour, which in those extremities lay not idle, and notwithstanding their industrie and perpetuall working at ramparts and trenches, yet they were more and more reduced into straight termes, and their affaires declining by swift degrees to diminution: for, the Duke hauing made way with his trenches euen to their ramparts, which separated the Castle from the towne, went on vexing them with certaine troupes of shot & other souldiers couered with their targets, by whom they receiued great harmes, as also by the artilleries frō the towers of the Castle. By reason of these harmes the Imperials, not to giue fauor to the enemies by any of their labours, burned their rampart which they made at the Cavalier, to the end it should not serue for a parapet to those that were without: and about the nineteenth day, two trenches, of theirs within their ditches, being beaten open & flat, they retired within the other trenches, of which the Duke of Vrbis made small accompt, both for that for the shortnesse of time they could not be well fortified, and also by their retiring more at large and abroad, there must be necessarily a greater guard to defend them. But notwithstanding all these workes were managed to a good end and issue, yet the proceedings of the campe were but slow, for the necessitie to recrease and renew the regiment of the Venetian footmen, who had bene long time without pay, for which cause they were greatly diminished in numbers, as alwayes in the affaires of the Confederates one disorder happened vpon another. And as the Imperials, partly to apply to their aduantage the disorders of the campe, and partly to follow the fauor of other occasions, did make many sallies by night to proue and prouoke the trenches, so all their valour and labour was in vaine, for that their enemies were now made wise by the experience of the harmes they had receiued there before: insomuch as at last the Duke of Vrbis hauing now got a sufficient strength of footmen, began the xxij. day to make a violent batterie vpon a tower, which afore times had bene battered by Federike, where after he had executed certaine shot of cannon, he found the enemies reduced to such termes of weaknesse, as they could not refuse to compound: in which opinion he sent out a Trumpet to summon them to render the towne, with whom came forth a Captaine Launceknicht, and a Spanish Captaine, together with Guido Vaino. The day following the capitulation went betweene the Duke & the Duke, that if they were not succoured by the end of the moneth, they should depart out of Cremona: That it should be permitted to the Launceknights to go into Germany and the Spaniards to the realme of Naples: That in foure moneths they should not beare armes for the defence of the state of Millan: That they should leaue all their artilleries and munitions, and go out with their Ensignes folded vp, and without sound of drumme or trumpet other then at such time as they leauied and brake vp.

Cremona rendered to the Confederates.

A litle after this time there was sent to remaine in the French Court as Legate, Cardinall Saluatiatio, who was departed out of Spaine, with the leaue of the Emperour: and in this meane while the French king had answered to the requests that were made to him by the Pope: wherein he excused himselfe by his great want and necessity of money, that his doings and actions were not correspondent to his will and affection: but if he might haue a permission to leaue throughout all his realme a tenth of the reuenues of benefices, he would releue him with twenty thousand duckets monethly of that collection, and would be also concurrant with him in the warres of Naples: he refused to hearken to the conquest of the Duchy of Millan for himselfe, from the which his mother and Monseigneur Lawnech did chiefly draw him, notwithstanding he had declared from the beginning a good inclination that way: he gaue him hope that he would go on with the war beyond the Mounts, but he alleaged that it was necessary the intimatio proceeded, which being done, he offered to begin the war vpon Flanders side & Parpignan: & yet it was discerned that he had no disposition to it, his intention therein being nothing different from the will of the king of England, with whom the expedition sent by the Pope serued to no purpose, for that the Cardinall of Torke, whose humour was to entertaine euery one, and be sued vnto of all men, would giue no resolution: only the King and the Cardinall made oftentimes this answer: The affaires of Italy appertaine nothing to vs.

At this time the Confederates fearing least the Grisons, who during the siege of the Castle of Millan, had reconquered & rased Chianana, would enter into the pay of the Duke of Burbon, or at least would suffer the Launceknights whom he expected for succours, to passe through their countrey: the Pope and Venetians bound themselves to take into their pay two thousand footmen of the Grisons, and to pay to Captaine Mus five thousand five hundred duckets, which they had promised to him more by force then by friendship. This Captaine Mus was fled from the campe, fearing the Duke of Millan, who was then come to the armie, & afterwards pretending that there was money owing to him for the payes of the Swissers, he detained prisoners two Embassadors of the Venetians, who had bene sent into France: the obligations of the Pope & Venetians stretched also to deliuer them of the new taxes imposed vpon such as trafficked in nauigation vpon the lake of Coma. And touching the Grisons, they bound themselves to stop the passage of the Launceknights, and wrought so as Tegane their Captaine, who had compounded with the Duke of Burbon to serue him with two thousand footmen, aduanced not. In the meane while the affaires of Italy proceeded coldly: for the army that was before Millan, wherein was greatly diminished the numbers of such Swissers as were not payd, lay with an idle campe, without doing any other action then interchange of light skirmishes, according to custome. But another humor raigned in the Spaniards that lay within Carpy, who forbore not to do the worst they could, and being secretly aduerted by their espials (taking withal the commodity to withdraw themselves vpon the lands of the Duke of Ferrara) they gaue many impediments to the curriers & other persons going to the army. In which liberty, running ouer all the country therabouts, euen vpon the confines of the Bolognois & *Mantuan*s, they committed very many insolencies and harmes, but not to any others then the subiects of the Church. At last the Marquis of Salussa passed the Mounts with five hundred French Launces, by reason of whose coming, Fabricio Maramo, who battered the towne of Valence, and lay encamped before it, (Iohn Biraguo lying there in garrison) retired himselfe to Bassignan: but the Marquis refused to passe further, vnlesse a regiment of foure thousand footmen, whom he had led out of Fraunce for that intention, were payd by the Confederats by equall portion: which in the end by necessity was consented vnto, the rather for the instance and importunity of the king, who solicited it vehemently for the suretie of his men at armes, and to raise into greater degrees the reputation of the Marquis.

In this time Synibald Fiesque made himselfe Lord of the towne of Pontriemoli, which Sforzino held, but it was eftsoues recovered with the same facility, by the meane of the Castle. Within Millan was great want of money, since both there was none receiued from the Emperour, and the inhabitants within were so impouerished by their intollerable defraymets, that scarcely could they furnish the thirty thousand duckets promised to the Duke of Burbon, who had receiued into his pay Galeaz Birague & Lodowyke Belioyense, who till that day had alwayes followed the Frēch part: the reason was, for that the Cōfederates could not accept them for the intollerable burthens of charges which they sustained. About this time Iohn Biraguo got Nouy.

During these stirres the state of the Marquis of Mantua stood almost indifferent and common to all sides, wherein he excused himselfe, for that he was in the pay of the Pope, and a freeholder of the Emperour: and to hold still his estate of indifferency, when the end of the terme of his pay drew neare, he put himselfe of new into the pay of the Pope and the Florentines for foure yeares more, with this expresse condition, that neither in his person nor with his estate he shold be bound to any thing against the Emperour: and yet in the beginning of the warre he desired to go in person to the army, which being not agreeable to the Pope, as hauing no confidence in his gouernement, he was answered, that in regard he was a freeholder of the Emperour, he would not bring him so farre in daunger. This was the estate of affaires, in Lombardy at that time.

In Tuscane, albeit the Florentines had neither armies nor armes vpon their lands and confines, yet were they not without their part of the burthens of the warre, for the contributions that were imposed vpon them: for the Pope, who had no money by meanes ordinarie, and would not make any leaues or collections extraordinarie, laid vpon their shoulders with a great impiety, almost the whole waight and charge of the expences of Lombardy. The Siennes also were not without their vexation on the sea side, for that Andrew Dore commanding Talamone and Portherculo, made them stand continually vpon their guard: notwithstanding not long after Talamone was restored to the Siennes, by the infidelity of a Captaine that was appointed to keepe it. Their aduersity also was increased by the vexation of the exiles of Sienna, who hauing suppotation by the Pope, molested them in the parts of Maremma: where Iohn Paule the sonne of Raise de Cere, who was entertained by the Pope, made himself Lord of Orbatella, by a surprize that was made by certaine horsemen of the gate of the towne, which he followed forthwith with his companies.

But at Rome the alteration was great, and drew after it effects of right great consequence, such as tooke not their beginning of armes and open warre, but were bred in the bosome of conspiracies and ambush: they brought no lesse infamie and slaunder to the Pope, then confusion and disorder to the affaires of Lombardy: where, by reason of the conquest of Cremona, was hoped a good issue of the enterprise of Genes, & also to be able to dispose the campe in two parts before Millan, according to the plots set downe at the first: for, like as since the chase giuen to the Ecclesiastikes before Sienna, the Pope hauing no hope to do any great action vpon the family of the Colony, continued his inclination altogether to inuade the realme of Naples with greater forces: so, on the other side, the Colonnos and the Emperours Agents, finding by the disposition of their owne affaires that they were able to do no notable matter against him, and desiring to keepe him still amused, and to take time from him vntill the Viceroy were come out of Spaine with the Navy they sent to Rome Vespasian Colomo, in whose fidelity the Pope reposed much, by whose meanes they fell to capitulate together the two and twentieth of August: That the Colony should reuerter Agnano with other places which they had taken: That they should withdraw all power to the kingdome of Naples, and entertayne no more bands of souldiers in the townes which they possessed in the dominion of the Church: That they might freely serue the Emperour against all men for the defence of the kingdome of Naples: and on the Popes side it was agreed, that it should pardon all offences past, and reuoke and abolish the bull published against the Cardinall Colomo: That he should not inuade their estates, nor suffer them to be endamaged by the Vrsins. By reason of this reconciliation, the Pope, who very vndiscretely reposed too much in the fidelity of Vespasian, dismissed almost all his horsemen and footmen which he had waged, and those bands that remained, he dispersed them in seuerall townes about Rome, and from thenceforth seemed to grow cold in all things that concerned the plot of inuading the kingdome of Naples: for, as by the complaints and protestations which ordinarily came from Millan and Genes, to the Emperours officers resident in the realme of Naples, it was discerned that those cities would hold out no longer vlesse the Confederates were turned from the pursute of their enterprise with a mighty diuersion: so the Emperours Captaines and officers there, hauing no meane to make openly a strong warre, such as was able to admiſter a speedy remedy, tooke another course, and disposed immediatly all their thoughts and spirits to oppresse the Pope with ambushes & deuises: Such is the operation of minds malicious & ambitious, that the thing which the law of equity & order denieth them to do, & their forces too weake to further the impiety of their hart, they will not faile to follow infected with conspiracy and infidelity.

Lewis king of Hungarie ouerthrow-nen in battell by Solymann.

Whilest these practises were in preparation, the almighty God bringing to passe that to the affliction which the Pope suffered for his affaires particular, should be adioyned other visitations more publike and generall: aduertisements came that Solyman Ottoman Prince of the Turkes had ouerthrowne in a battell ranged and accomplished, Lewis king of Hungary; a victory which it was supposed the Turke won no lesse through the temerity of his enemies, then by his owne valour & forces: for the Hungarians notwithstanding their numbers were but small in comparison of so huge an army of their enemies, & in their rashnesse reposing more for themselves in their victories past against the Turkes, then in the estate and condition of things present: yet they perswaded their king who being yong in age & yeares, was also more yong in counsell & iudgement, that not to obscure the ancient reputation and glory of war gotten by his peoples, and lesse attending to the succors that were to come to him from Transilvania, he would aduance his forces & go seeke the enemy, & not refuse to fight with them in open field, a maner of action wherein the Turkes are almost inuincible by reason of their infinite numbers of horsemen: so that the euent & effect falling out all one with their rashnesse and indiscretion, his armie being compounded of all the nobility and valiant men of his realme, was ouerthrowne with a great slaughter of the generall multitude of souldiers, and the death of the kings person, with manie of the principall Barons & Prelates of the realme. This victorie both bloudie for the slaughter, and dangerous for the consequence, brought an vniuersall terrour and astonishment ouer all the regions and lands of Christendome, euerie one seeing in his owne iudgement, that nothing could hold backe the Turke from appropriating to himselfe the whole realme of Hungaria, which for so many yeares had bene the only bulwarke and defence of Christendome: And as in the minds of men already troubled and afflicted, new displeasures and accidents make a deeper impression, then they do in such spirits as are free and void of passion: so this ouerthrow was to the Pope about all other Princes most bitter and grieuous, in so much as expressing in his actions, in his words, and in his countenance great tokens of inward dolor and heauinesse, he complained in that griefe afore the Cardinals sitting in Consistorie, of so great a damage & ignominie done to the common weale of Christendome: which for his part he had not failed both to foresee and prouide for, as well by exhorting and perswading the Princes of Christendome to peace, as also in comforting in their most necessities the kingdome of Hungary with great contribution of money: he said that from the beginning he had foreseene and foretold that that warre would be full of incommodities, and a warre warre very dangerous for the defence of that kingdome : onely he alleaged that seeing there was no reckning made of those reasonable conditions which he proponed for the tranquility of the Apostolike and Italy, he was driuen by necessity to haue recourse to armes and forces, contrary to his perpetuall intention : wherein he referred himselfe to be iustified, both by the neutrality which he had vsed before that necessitie, and also the conditions of the league which he had made respecting all the common benefite : all which he sayd answered sufficientlie for him, that he had not bene pushed on by any consideration of his proper interestes, or particular respects of those of his familie : but since it is Gods good pleasure haply for some good ende, that the head and principall part of Christendome should be hurt, specially in a time when all the other members of the same body were deuided into other thoughts then such as tended to the safetie of the whole, he thought that the holy will of God was, that they should seeke to cure so greata malady by some other meane : and therefore seeing that care appertayned more to him then to any other in respect of his office of Pastour, he was determined contrary to all considerations of the incommodities, of the dangers, and of his dignity, and soliciting withall assoone as he could vnder some good conditions, a lurrence of armes in Italy, to mount vpon his gallies and in person to go seeke the Princes of Christendome, and to sollicite a holy and vniuersall peace with perswasions, with petitions, and with teares. He exhorted the Cardinals to put themselves in preparation for his expedition, and with one franke readinesse to dispose their minds and bodies to ayd their common father in so holy an enterprife, which he besought God to blesse and fauor: and that if for the common sins of the world it could not be guided to his perfection, he besought the goodnesse of God, that at least in the negociation he would rather depriue him of life then of hope to accomplish it : for that (sayth he) no infelicity, no aduersity, no misery can happen to me so great, as in so dangerous and mortall astonishments, to lose both hope and meane to put to my hand for the remedy and redresse of so generall an euill.

This proclamation of the Pope was heard with great attention, and with no lesse compassion and deuotion was it holden for recommended and esteemed. But it had imprinted a farre greater operation, if his words as touching the person had caried so much fidelity & credit, as in themselves they seemed to beare authority and dignity : for, the most part of the Cardinals were of this opinion, that he was more touched with the consideration of the difficulties wherein the present warre was reduced, then with any conscience of the daunger of that kingdome; a matter which they proued by this obseruation, that he had taken armes against the Emperour in a time, when, for the open preparations of the Turkes, the daunger of the Realme of Hungarie was manifest and vndoubted. But of this there could not be made a true experience : for, the faction of the Colonnais beginning to execute the treason they had pretended, sent Caesar Fielettin their confederate, with a strength of two thousand footemen, to Agnano, where was a garrison for the Pope, of two hundred footemen payed : and in the manner of their doings, the better to keepe couered and hid their thoughts and intentions, they made shew as though they would take the towne : but for that in true meaning their purpose drew to another effect, they occupied all the passages, and with an extreame diligence cut off from comming to Rome all meane of aduertisement of their enterprife. And in the meane while after they assembled their forces which they had sent to keepe about Agnano, and together with those bands that were with themselves, were reduced all into one strength, which haply might containe in all about eight hundred horsemen and thre thousand footemen, all trayned and disciplined, they marched in great celerity towards Rome, where was holden no suspicion nor doubt of their comming. They arriued there the night before the twentieth day of September, where in their first action, they tooke by surprise three gates of Rome, making their entrie by the gate of Saint Iohn de Latran. There met them in person, not onely Askanio Colomno and Dou Hugo de Moncado (for the Duke of Seffo was dead before at Marino) but also Vespassian, who had solicited the accord and giuen his faith as well for him as for all the residue. There was also in person Cardinall Pompey Colonna, a man so farre ouercaried with ambition and furie, that he had not onely conspired the death of the Pope in cruell manner, but also, by bloody hands and meanes full of impietie and sacriledge, he had aspired to the seate Pontificall, contrayning with force and armes, the Cardinals to make election of the person, whom he knew they would not call for his vertue or merites. About the breaking of the day, the Pope had information of their arrivall, being by that time all assembled about Saint Cosmo and Saint Damiano; and what by the suddenesse of the accident tending to a manifest surpris, & by the operation of his owne frailty, which by so much was redoubled, by how much his perill was present and desperate, he sought in this astonishment and confusion to appease the tumult with his authority: for neither had he ready any forces particular to defend the danger that his destiny pulled on, neither did the people of Rome make any signe to stirre, partly for that it grieved not them to see him fall into inconvenience whom they loved not, and partly according to the humour of the populars, they made as though a vexation publike and generall did nothing touch nor concerne them. By reason of which weakenesse of the Pope, and want of inclination in the people, the enemies with these oportunities advanced forward, and with all their bands, stayed at Santa Apostolo, from whence they sent beyond Tyber by the bridge Sista, a strength of five hundred footemen with certaine horsemen: who, after a small resistance, repulled from the portall of Santo Spirito, Stephen Colonna being in the Popes pay, and appointed for that place with two hundred footemen. Then, taking the way of the old suburbs, they drew to Saint Peters and to the Bishops pallace where the Pope was, no lesse doubtfull of his safety then depriued of all assurance and vertue in so great a distresse: he called in vaine vpon the succours of God and men, and yet hauing a glorious desire to die in the seate of his dignity, he prepared himselfe with the habite and ornaments of his calling to take his seate in the chaire pontificall, according to the example of Pope Boniface the eight when he was surprisid and restrayned by the Colonnais. In his feare and astonishment he could not discern the way of his safety, and in that desperate accompt of himselfe and his estate, he was without all consideration, that sudden actions pushed on with that property of furie and rage, haue their ordinary dissolution before they come to worke the worst that the timorous man in his fraile conceits dorth imagine: onely he found comfort and care in the Cardinals that were about him, who with a resolution aboue the greatnesse of their perill, conuincid him to change his timorous deuise to die in his chaire, and willed him to go out, though not for his owne respect, at least for the reputation of the holy sea, least the honour of God were wickedly, and wretchedly offended in the person of his Vicar. By their perswasions he retired together with such of them as he trusted most, into the Castell about ten of the clocke: if in his feare he had lingred there longer, he had seene with his eyes that spectacle of calamitie which in his timorous condition he alwayes doubted: for, by that time he was remoued, all the horsemen & footmen together with the whole army were assembled before the pallace, & in their fury not sparing the place which at other times in their modesty they reuerenced, they entred, & sackt the pallace, making violation and pillage of all the holy ornaments of S. Peter. Their insolency tooke from them all regard to the maiesty of religion, & whose harts had reiectid all deuotion & piety, their hands tooke liberty to prophane all things that their fury could find out, yea they made a small ceremony to ransacke the holy things of Rome, as the Turkes did in the Churches of the Realme of Hungarie. And being made weary with running thorough the spoyle of things rich and precious, they left in their fulnesse to make further pillage of the holy relikes, and in their rage they retired to the new suburbs, of which they sacked about the third part, and passed no further for feare of the artilleries of the Castell. This was the last act & passage of their fury, which they seemed there to restraine & cut off, not that their rage was fully satisfied, but because their hands were weary with robbing; a tumult which they executed with so much the lesse impediments, by how much more they forbare in their liberty to do any damage to the people of Rome: And after they had continued three houres in the licentious execution, Don Hugo vnder the Popes faith, & receiuing as hostages for his surety the Cardinals Cibo and Rodolfo the Popes cosins, went vp to the Castell to speake with the Pope, to whom vsing the termes and phrases that appertayned to a victor, he set downe to him conditions of truce: whereupon answer being deferred till the day following, the composition was concluded in this sort: That there should be betweene the Pope aswell in his owne name as in the name of the confederats, & betweene the Emperour a truce for iiii. moneths, with liberty to the cofederats to enter within ij. moneths: That in the same truce should be comprehended not only the estate Ecclesiastike, & the realme of Naples: but also the Duchy of Millan, the Florentins, the Genouaies, the Siennois & the Duke of Ferrara, & all the subiects of the Church, mediate & immediate: That the Pope should be bound to retire immediatly on this side the riuer of Pan, his men of war that lay before Millan, & to call home fro his army by sea, And. Dore with his gallies: That

the Pope and
the Emperour.

That he should be bound to pardon all the Colonna's, and any other whosoever was party to this commotion: That he should be bound to deliuer for ostages of obseruancy, Philip Strozzi & one of the sons of Iames Saluati, and to send the to Naples within two moneths, vpon paine to loofe fifty thousand duckats: That the Imperials and the Colonna's should depart out of Rome & all the Ecclesiastike, and retire their forces to the kingdome of Naples.

This truce was willingly accepted both by the one and other party: it was acceptable to the Pope for that he had not in the Castell sufficient prouision of victuals: and Don Hugo (though contrary to the instance of the Colonna's) thought it now time to take vp, both for that he had done enough for the Emperour, and also he saw most of those souldiers that had entred Rome with him, dispersed here & there, being more laden with pray & booty, then bearing aptnesse to any further seruice: But this truce brake all the deuises and plots of Lumbardy, and tooke away all the fruite of the victorie of Cremona: for, notwithstanding almost at the same time the Marquis of Saluzzo was come to the army with the French launces, yet the Popes regiments beginning to fayle, who for the most part by reason of the truce retired to Plaisance, the seuenth of October: yet the deuise to send souldiers to Genes was no lesse dissolued and disordered, then the resolution, to enuiron Millan with two armies. Wherein the matter that helped also to this alteration and trouble, was the Duke of Vrbino, who after he had made a composition with those in Cremona, went to visite his wife at Mantua, without tarying for the consignation, notwithstanding he was credibly aduertised of the truce made at Rome: and hauing accorded to the companies that were within Cremona, a prolongation of time to depart, there was so long tarying about Cremona before they dislodged, that he came not to the army with those companies that were before Cremona before the middest of October; a matter that brought great preiudice to all the affaires, both that there was solicitation made to send men to Genes, which Peter Nauarre and the Venetian treasurer of the army by sea demanded with greater instance then euer, for that (all the Venetian regiments being reassembled) there were in the army so many forces as might suffice for that effect, without that it was needefull for that matter to remoue the campe: and also for that the Marquis of Saluzzo had brought with him five hundred launces and foure thousand footmen, besides a dayly expectation of two thousand Grisons, who were waged according to the accord made with them. And lastly the Pope, albeit he made open demonstrations to obserue the truce, yet his intention being otherwise, he had left in the army foure thousand footmen with Iohn de Medicis, vnder pretence that the French king should pay them; an excuse not without apparant colours, for that Iohn de Medicis was alwayes in the kings pay, and in his name retayned continually a company of men at armes. At last the Imperials that were within Cremona went out of that City, the possession whereof was consigned ouer to Francis Sforce. The Launceknights with their Capitaine Conradin tooke their way to Trent: but the horsmen and footmen of the Spaniards hauing passed ouer Paw to returne to the realme of Naples, and the Popes Lieutenant making difficulty to giue them sufficient passeports and safe conducts, for that it was contrary to the Pope to suffer them to go to the realme of Naples: they suddenly turned their way, and went vp by the mountaine of Parma and Plaisance: and after with great diligence they repassed the riuer of Paw at Chiarella, from whence they went in safety to Lomellino, & so to Millan. And the Popes Lieutenant Guicciardin for the obseruancy of the truce, did not only go from before the wals of Millan with the Popes regiments, but also Andrew Dore remoued himselfe from Genes with his gallies: out of which towne not many dayes before, were issued fixe thousand footmen, as well bodies payed and waged, as men voluntary and followers, with direction to set vpon the fixe hundred footmen who were vpon the land with Philip Fiesquo: who with the fauour of the top of the mountaines neare to Portofino, had so fortified himselfe with ramparts and bastillions, that he constrained them to retire with their great losse. And yet not many dayes after Andrew Dore returned to Portofino with fixe gallies, to continue together with the residue, the siege of Genes by sea.

At the same time that these matters succeeded in Italy with diuerse euentcs, the Embassadors of the Pope, the French king, and the Venetians, signified to the Emperour the fourth day of September, the League that was made, together with the liberty that was left to him to enter according to the conditions set downe in the Capitulations. At which an Embassadour of England being present, he deliuered to the Emperour from his king a letter, modestly perswading him to enter into the League. The Emperour heard with great affabilitie the reasons and relations of the Embassadors, but he answered the, that it agreed not with his dignity to enter into a confederation made principally against his estate and his honor: only he had bene alwayes most deuoute and disposed to haue an vniuersall peace, according to which inclination still continuing, he offered to accomplish it presently, if they had sufficient warrant and commissions for the same. Neuerthelesse it was beleued that his intension was farre otherwise, and that he did but insinuate that offer for his greater iustification, and to giue occasion to the king of England to desert to enter into the league, and also to make cold with that hope, the preparations of the confederates, and so vnder the treaty of peace, to leade them into some iealousie & distrust: and yet notwithstanding this practise, he solicited on the other side the prouisions for the army by sea, which was supposed to be forty ships and six thousand men payd: and the rather to make that army aduance being assembled at the notable port of Carthage, the Viceroy departed from the Court the foure and twentieth day of September. By which expedition and celerity, it seemed that the Emperour was more ready and carefull of his affaires then the French king, who notwithstanding he was pressed with so great interests and considerations, yet he forbore not to follow the humor of his negligence, and passed forth the most part of his time in the pleasures of hunting, dancing, and making court to Ladies: and then were his captiue children caried vp to Valdolu, when it was manifestly discerned that there was no more hope that the accord would be obserued. The coming of this army by sea compelled the Pope to take armes, who with the iealousie of those apparances, could not but doubt of the fidelity of the Viceroy and the Spaniards: in which danger he did not only call to Rome Vitelly with his regiments and the bands of his Nephewes, but also he called in for his safety an hundred men at armes of the Marquis of Mantua, and an hundred light horsemen of Peter Maria Rosso: and there was sent to him from the army two thousand Swissers at his charges, and three thousand footmen Italians: neuerthelesse he continued still and assured from one time to another, that he would go into Spaine to conferre with the Emperour, from the which most of the Cardinals dissuaded him, the rather for that he followed an action vncertaine, aduising him first to send thither his Legates.

Deliberation
Vrbino

But now to returne to the army which the confederates kept incamped before Millan. After the Duke of Vrbino was returned thither, who saw there was no hope to cary the towne either by force or by famine, and being with great importunity solicited by the Captaines of the sea army to send out souldiers to vex by land the people of Genes, he determined for the better aduancement of that expedition, to draw the army farre from the wals of Millan, & yet he made such disposition & direction of things, that all resort of victuals that was to come to that city, was cut off & stopped: for which occasion and to haue the better oportunity to that action, he began to fortify Monce, to leaue there with more surety some crew of souldiers, both to impeach the traffike of victuals from the mount Brianso and other places confining, and also by the commodity of that fortification to transport the army into such a place as might restraine the markets of victuals coming continually to Millan from Baigresso and Pauia. And afterwards that place being reduced to good strength & fortification, the direction extended that the Marquis of Salussa should march to Genes with his footmen accompanied for his better strength with another regiment of Swissers, a proportion which the sea armies did much desire, for that the towne of Genes labored in such extreame wants of victuals, that it could scarcely hold out any longer. But as these deliberations and directions were such as they could not be put to execution but with a farre greater tract and longnesse of time, then either was agreeable to the estate of affaires, or the necessities of Genes could endure: so for that the only meane to cary that city, rested in no other property of action, then in the stopping of the resort of victuals which passed thither by land, those counsels tooke no resolution, nor were not referred to effect, notwithstanding there were in the army foure thousand Swissers, two thousand Grisons, the regiment of foure thousand footmen of the Marquis of Salussa, and foure thousand others vnder Iohn de Medicis payed by the Pope, together with the bands of footmen of the Venetians, which according to the obligation of the league, & testimony and report of themselves, were assured to contayne a strength of ten thousand men: but in truth vpon the iust mustring and view of the bands, they contayned a far lesse number. At last, being the last of October, the army dislodged from the place where it had so long incamped, and drew to Pioltello fife miles from the first lodging, but in discamping they had a great skirmish with the souldiers of Millan, in which Burbo was in person. The intention of the Duke of Vrbino was to stay

stay at Pioſtello vntill the fortifications were ended at Monce, where he deuised to leaue in garrison two thousand footmen with certaine helpes of horsemen, and so to go to Marignan where he was determined to lodge the army: and from thence hauing first taken and fortified that place & Biagressa as he supposed, he thought to send bands of men to Genes; expeditions which drew with them so long an executiō, that there was reason to accuse him, notwithstanding that he alleaged for one part of his excuse, the ill prouisions of the Venetians, who not paying their footmen in time conueniēt, neither had they their numbers complete which were promised, & many of those which they had diminished alwayes the vncertainty of their payes, the Duke was constrained when the pay dayes came, to furnish their places with others, in such sort as he seemed to haue euery day new cōpanies & a new army. But this deferring or protraction which hitherto seemed voluntary, began to haue a cause and colour of necessity: for after many negociations and practises holden in Germany to send a new strength of footmen into Italy, the same seruing to no effect, as well for the disability of the Archduke, as for the pouerty of the Emperour, who sent no money thither: George Frongſpergh for the affection he bare to the affaires of the Emperour, ioyned to a desire to aduance the glory of his nation, and who with great merite had at two seuerall times commanded in Italy two great armies for the Emperour against the Frenchmen, determined to supply with his goods and faculties priuate, the charge which Princes for their weakenesse were not able to vndertake: he stirred vp with his authority many bands of footmen, whom he allured with the sweete insinuation of pray and booty, concurring withall the good oportunitie and occasion that offered to make them rich with the spoyle of Italy. And after he had contracted with them, that in receiuing for euery man a crowne in prest, they would follow him to the succours of the Emperour, and obtayned of the Archduke certaine aydes of horsemen and artilleries, he prepared to march, making the generall muster and leaue of all his men betweene Bolzano and Maran. The rumour of this preparation for the suddennesse not expected, and for the authority of the man much redoubted, piercing easily into the bowels of Italy, was the cause that the Duke of Vrbino went not on with his resolution to molest Genes, which was now reduced almost to the last extremity. And yet Andrew Dote for that he wold haue the expedition aduanced, abated some part of his demands, and required now but fiftene hundred footmen, making his reckning to furnish the residue by his owne meanes. But the Duke refusing also that demand, alleaged for his excuse, that it was necessarie to send from the army vpon the countrey of Vincenza, a strength of fiftene hundred footmen of the Venetians, for a feare which that Senate had least the army of the Launceknights wold take that way; an opiniō which the Duke cōfuted, perswading himselfe that they would rather take the way of Lecqua, and for that reason he stirred not from Pioſtello, for that he would be more neare the riuer of Adda, and he published that he would march to meete them, and fight with them beyond Adda at their comming out of the vale of Sarcina.

By these variations as the affaires of Lumbardy began to draw to new & farre greater difficulties, so also there burst out in the towne of Rome a fresh fire of trouble and new vexation: for the Pope, who for the accident of the Colonnais was pulled downe in courage, and in an inclination to peace, was bent to go by sea to Barcelona to contract some accord with the Emperour: as soone as his enemies were gone out of Rome, had sent Paule d'Arezzo his Chāberlaine to the French king, and from him to passe to the Emperour with his priuity, to negotiate the peace: his commissions extended also to signify to the king his necessities & his dangers, and to demand an hundred thousand crownes for his better defence. In which matters he seemed so discordant and disagreeable to himselfe, that in demanding money of the king, and vrging him to a greater readinesse in the war, he would not only not consent to the tenthes without condition of a moiety of himselfe, which the king refused vnder this reason, that it was contrary to the tradition and vsage of Fraunce: but also in his contradiction, he could not be resolved, to create Cardinall the Chancellor Pras, who both for the authority and sway he bare in the kings counsels, and for that all expeditions of money passed through his hands, might haue bene a necessarie instrument to helpe forward all his purposes. Such was his confusion, that his counsels were no lesse dilatory and slow, then the execution vncertaine and irresolute: which passion as it tooke beginning of his astonishment for the tumult of the Colonnais, so it went on increasing by new terrours, whose operations led him into manifest contradiction in matters concerning his owne safety. But the French king forgot not to be sorowfull with Paule d'Arezzo and the other Nuncios, for the accident of Rome, and in that compassion he offered to the Pope all things for his defence, and wishing he would repose no more confidence in the Emperour, he aduised him to perseuer no longer in the truce: vpon which condition and not otherwise, he promised still to satisfie the twentie thousand duckats which he was bound vnto for euery moneth. To this the Pope was also aduised by the king of England, who dissuaded him from his voyage to Barcelona, and to comfort his present distresse, he sent him fife and twenty thousand duckats. The French king discourcelled the Pope from his purpose to go visite the Princes of Christendome, as being a matter which for the importance required a deeper consultation: and at the first he refused to consent that Paule d'Arezzo should go to the Emperour, either for suspition that the Pope would begin to enterrayne with him some practise seperate, or else that he held it a matter more honourable to worke the peace by the meane of the king of England, then to seeme vnder those wayes to begge it of the Emperour. Neuerthelesse by a new instance made by the Pope, he gaue his consent to let him go, either for that he desired the peace in deed, or else because he began not well to brooke to haue it wrought by the king of England, who bare such a hand and gouernement in these actions, that the French king could not but doubt, least for his interests particular, he would draw him to conditions hard and inconuenient: wherein he tooke the reason of his doubt vpon the disposition of the king of England, or rather the Cardinall of Yorke vnder his name, who caried with ambition and a glorious desire to be iudge of all, set downe conditions very strange and farre off, and hauing also ends different from the purposes of others, he feared by reason of those ends least he would suffer him to be abused by the Emperour, & would not be grieved that the Duchy of Mil-lan should fall vpon the person of the Duke of Burbon by the benefit of the peace, so far forth as he married the Emperours sister, to the end it remained in his power to giue his daughter in marriage to the French king. So that what by these perswasions tendred to the Pope by the one and other king, and what through his feare not to loose the amity of the Confederates, and so by the priuation of their aides, to remaine in pray to the Emperour and his officers: and what by the importunities & vehement inducements of his owne counsellors: & what for the hatred & disdayne conceined against the Colomnois, together with the burning desire to recouer by way of reuenge the honor he had lost, he was induced to conuert against the townes & lands of the Colomnois, all those forces which he had called into Rome only for the surety of his person. And in this variatio & ballancing of reasons and caules, he iudged there was no law of equity nor order, to compell him to obserue the accord which he had not made by will & free consent, but vnder the abuse of their fraudes, and forced by their armes, contrary to the law of faith, he sent out immediatly Viselly with his companies to vex the lands of the Colomnois, making his account to burne and raze all their townes, for that for the ancient affection of the inhabitants, it could not be a matter very prejudicial to them to take the townes only without doing other violence: and in the humor of his anger he published a Bull against the Cardinall and others of that family, by vertue wherof he proceeded afterwards to depriue the Cardinall of the purple hat, who seeking before to defend himself with the bul of simony, had made publike appellations at Naples, & had appealed to the generall Courtell to come: only the Pope deferred to pronounce sentence against the residue of the house of the Colomnois, who were not negligent to wage both horsmen & footmen in the realme of Naples. But the Popes bands being entred into their townes, they burned Marina & Montfortin, whose Carol held good as yet for the Colomnois. And in this rage of the victory & aduantage, they rased Galiciana & Tafarola, the Colomnois being carelesse of al other townes, then to defend their places of strength, & chiefly the towne of Puliano, which is a peece strong by situatio & of very hard accesse for great artilleries: besides, hath no accesse but by three wayes, wherof one cannot succor another: and hauing about it, wals of good fortification & thickness, the inhabitants were determined with great resolution to defend it. Neuerthelesse it was belceued, that if he had marched with diligence to assaile it notwithstanding many of the inhabitants of those townes that had bene taken were retired thither, he had easily caried it, for that there was not a soldier within it: but whilst he stood reporsing & deferring to go thither, folowing the inclinatio & working of his nature, which was ful of irresolutio & feare what things were to be put in executio, there entred into the towne by night a strength of 500 footmen as well Launceknights as Italians, being sent from the realme of Naples: a reliefe which as it made the taking of the towne so hard and desperate, that Viselly who who at the same time kept his companies about Grotta Ferrata, not daring to attempt further enterprise vpon Paliano, and much lesse to execute any action against the peece called the Popes rocke: so after he had sent to batter with his artilleries the rocke of Montfortin garded by the Colonnais, he determined to gather together all his forces at Valmonton, more to looke to the defence of the country if anie stirre or emotion were made on Naples side, then with hope to be able to do any thing of importance: for the which he was blamed much of the Pope, who at a time when his device was to inuade the kingdome of Naples, and afterwarde when he called into Rome the regiments for his defence, wished to be sent thither Vitelli & Iohn de Medicis, two Captains, who as they were conioyned together by amitie & alliance, so by a naturall correspondencie of complexion, the slownesse and coldnesse of the one seemed sufficient both to ballance and temper and also to be ballanced and tempered of the valor and forwardnes of the other. But destinie drawing to a sodaine death in Lumbarde Iohn de Medicis, and the Pope by the counsell of his Lieutenant seruing his turne in the meane while of Vitelli in lesser things, had deferred to call Iohn de Medicis vntill either there were a greater necessity of him, or else he taried for an offer & occasion of some more worthie enterprise: wherein his reason to forbear so long to call Iohn de Medicis, was, that he would not depriue the armie that was in Lumbarde of a personage of so many merites & good parts, who by his resolution and forwardnesse gaue no litle terrour to his enemies, and by his vertue and prouidence did much assure his friends. And one inducement helping to his stay and abiding, was the rumor which by relation of espials redoubled daily, of the descending of the Lances knights for the Emperour, whose comming ioyned to the aduertisements that ran of the Spanish Nauie to be vpon the point to depart out of the port of Carthage, constrained the Pope (being withall vrged by many of the Confederates, and by his owne counsellors) to deuise, contrarie to his meaning alwayes before, to make some composition with the Duke of Ferrara: not so much to stand assured of his conspiracies & emotions, as to draw from him some great quantitie of money, & to induce him to go to the armie as Captaine general of all the League. Wherein after he had many times dealt with Mathew Casella the Dukes Embassadour resident with him, who assured him that in the Duke was no want of inclination that way: he sent to his Lieutenant Guicciardin, who was then at Parma, to go to Ferrara, furnishing him with a commission very large in apparence, but indeed full of restraints and limitations, for that he would haue him consent to render to the Duke of Ferrara the townes of Modena and Reggia, and he to pay in recompence and counterchange, in a verie short time, two hundred thousand duckets: To binde the Duke to declare and protest openly, and to go to the armie as Captaine generall of the League: That his eldest sonne should take in marriage Catherine the daughter of Lawrence de Medicis: That there should labor be made to giue one of the Dukes daughters in marriage to Hippolito de Medicis sonne of Iulian, with a conuenient dowrie. Manie other conditions were annexed to this commission, which for that by their owne varietie and for the shortnesse of the time, were almost impossible to be decided, yet the Pope notwithstanding he condescended not to them but by a last necessitie, yet he charged him not to passe the accord, nor to grow to absolute conclusion, till he had from him new directions and other instructions. But not long after he enlarged his commission, as well for regard of the conditions, as for authoritie and power to conclude. The reason of this amplification was, that he had receiued credible aduertisement, how the Viceroy of Naples was arriued with two and thirtie ships in the gulfes of Saint Florent in Corfika, and had brought with him three hundred horse, two thousand Launceknights, and three or foure thousand Spaniards footemen. But now the Popes will and working was to litle purpose, for that a gentleman of the Duke of Ferraraes being with the Viceroy, who with great diligence was dispatched from the place abouesaid, did not onely signifie to the Duke the comming of the armie by sea, but also he caried vnto him from the Emperour, the inuestiture of Modena and Reggia, with words of promise of the next marriage of Ladie Margarite d'Austrich bastard daughter to the Emperour, with Hercules eldest sonne to the Duke. By reason of which aduertisements, the Duke, who before expected with great desire the comming of the Lieutenant, began now vnder the accident of this occasion to chaunge counsell: and discerning both by the approach of the Launceknights and descending of the armie by sea, some good fortune to begin to follow the Emperours affaires, he failed not to embrace the oportunitie to follow the streame, & in that variation of mind sent a Counsellor of his called Iames Aluato to signifie to the Popes Lieutenant, who being gone from Parma was then at Centa, the expedition he had receiued out of Spaine: by the which altho he was not bound to declare himselfe neither against the Pope, nor against the League, yett that he had receiued so great a benefite by the Emperbur, it was not reasonable he should entretaine any further practise against him. In which regard, the negociation for the which he went to Ferrara, being dissolued, he thought good to giue him signification of it, to the end not to giue the Pope by his silence any iust cause of discontentment against him. Neuertheless, he would not forbid him to come to Ferrara, but left it referred to his good discretion. The Lieutenant discerned manifestly by this relation that it would be in vaine for him to go on to Ferrara: in which respect, ioyning withall the interest of the Popes reputation, to follow a voyage wherein was so small hope of frute, and being also called backe by the necessitie of the affaires of Lumbardey, he gaue place to the operation of the time, and returned immediatly to Modena, after he had (notwithstanding) preferred in other forme new solicitations of accord, the rather for that the state of the Church on that side grew daily reduced into farre greater daungers: for that George Fronspergh with his armie of Launcelights containing thirteene or fourteene thousand, taking their way by the vale of Sabio, and so passing by the rocke of Anso towards Salo, were now come to Chastillon vpon the confines of Mantua. The Duke of Vrbini not many dayes before to be the more readie to encounter the Launcelights, had led the armie of the League to Vawry vpon the riuer of Adda, betweene Trezza and Cassan, and there had erected a bridge and fortified his campe: and leauing at Vawry the Marquis of Salussa with the French bands, the Swissers, the Grisons, and his owne footemen, he departed himselfe from Vawry the nineteenth of Nouember, leading with him Iohn de Medicis, sixe hundred men at armes, many cornets of light horsemen, and eight or nine thousand footmen. His intention was not to set vpon them directly in the plaine field, but to vex them with incommodities, and cut off their releefes and victuals, alleaging that the onely way to vanquish men of that humour, was to driue them to fall into some disorder, which being wel obserued and applied, would do them greater damage then a manifest inuasion. In which mind the one and twentieth day he arriued at Sonzin, from whence he caused to aduaunce forward Mercurio with all the light horsemen and a band of men at armes, & they to intangle the enemy with skirmish whilest the whole armie might haue time to ouertake them. The reason of that aduauncing of the light horsemen and hastie marching of the armie after, was, for that he feared he should come verie late, being lodged the same day at Cauriano: by which occasion excusing himselfe of his long tarying at Vawry, he layed the fault vpon the negligence and couetousnesse of the treasurer Pisani, through whose fault the campe was constrained to remaine there a day or two more, tarying for the oxen that should draw the artilleries: of which fault he alleaged afterwards did proceed a verie great disorder, extending almost to the ruine of the whole enterprise. Vntill that time there was great doubt what way the Launcelights would take, for that at first it was beleueed they would draw towards Adda by Bressia and Bergama, with purpose to be met by the bands Imperiall, and so to go with them to Millan: and afterwards it was supposed that they would passe the riuer of Paw at Casalmajor, & from thence would take their orderly march to Millan: but being come the two and twentieth day to Rinolto within eight miles of Mantua betweene the riuers of Minceo & Oglia, the Duke of Vrbini lodging the same day at Prato Albino, it was knowne (for that they passed not Minceo at Goito) that they would go on to passe Paw rather at Bourqfort or Viadana then at Ostia or in the places more lower: but passing at Ostia, it was a manifest signe that they would take the way of Modena and Bologna, in both which places there was made leaues of footemen and other prouisions. Afterwards the Launcelights tooke the way of Bourqfort the xxiiij. day, whither, because they had no artilleries, the Duke of Ferrara sent them foure falconets by the riuer of Paw, which though of it selfe was but a very slender succour, yet it was verie profitable to the seruice by the benefite of fortune: for, as the Duke of Vrbini in following them was entred within the straite of Mantua, within the which they were as yet: so in their approaching to Bourqfort, Iohn de Medicis made after the with his light horsemen to charge them vpon the taile, though with no reason or hope to doe any great matter: and as he accosted them verie neare, not knowing that they had anie artilleries, his destinie led him on in that secure resolution to the daunger of his life, for that with the second shot of one of those Falconets, his legge was broken a little aboue the knee, from whence being caried wounded to Mantua, he ended his life there within few dayes after, to the great preiudice of the enterprise, since the enemies

neuer stood in feare of any mans armes or valour, then of his: for notwithstanding he had but xxij. yeares of age, and by that disposition of youth was full of heate and forwardnesse, yet his experience and vertue subdued to moderation and temperance the rage of nature and youth, and daily ranged to good order and discretion, those violent humors which through the intemperancie of his youth took libertie to stirre in him: and by the tokens of industrie and wisdom appearing more and more in him, he caried an assured expectation to become in time a Captaine most sufficient and accomplished in all things concerning the science of warre. After this the Launceknights without any impediment drewe along the riuer of Paw to Ostia, the Duke of Vrbm being at Bourgsfort: and hauing passed ouer Paw at Ostia the eight and twentieth day, they encamped at Rouero, where the Duke of Ferrara sent them a certaine releefe of money, and furnished them with some field peeces. But the inhabitants of Bologna and all Tuscane began to be verie fearful, for that the Duke of Vrbm, notwithstanding he had assured before, that if the enemies passed the riuer of Paw he would do the like, was gone to Mantua, saying he would tarie in that place for a commission from the Senate of Venice, to direct him whether he should passe Paw or not. But the Launceknights after they had passed the riuer of Secchia, turned to the way of Lumbardy to ioine with the companies that were within Millan.

At which time the Viceroy, who was departed from Corsica with five and twentie vessels (for two of his ships were perished in a storme before he came to S. Florent, and five others were separate from the Nauie abiding their fortune) encountred about Sestria in the Leuant, the Nauy of the League, which contained sixe gallies of the French, five of the Popes & five of the Venetians: and being grappled together about Codemont, they fought from two of the clocke till night: in which conflict it is written by Andrew Dore that he sunke one of their ships wherein were more then three hundred men, and did many other great damages to the whole fleete with his artilleries. He wrote also, that for the storme season the gallies were constrained to retire vnder the hill of Portosino, expecting the same night the other gallies that were at Portouenere. But whether they came or not, he wrote that vpon the appearing of the day they would go seeke the enemies: neuertheless albeit they followed the fleete to Lyuorno, yet they could neuer ouertake it, for the way they had wonne afore them, by which occasion beleeuing that the fleete had run vp either into Corso or into Sardignia, they were so much the lesse readie in diligence to follow it. Afterwards the Viceroy followed his way, but so shaken with stormes and tempests, that his ships were disperfed, whereof one of them commaunded by Don Ferrand de Gonsaguo, was driuen into Sicile, which afterwards came to Caietta, where were set on land certaine Launceknights. But touching himselfe, he arriued with the residue of the nauie at the port of Saint Stephen, from whence for that he was vncertaine in what condition or termes stood the affaires, he sent to the Pope at Rome the Commaunder Pignatolo, with commissions expressing the good intentions of the Emperour: and after the rage of the sea was abated, he sailed with his Nauie to Caietta.

In this meane while the Lanceknights after they had passed the riuer of Secchia & were drawne towards Razzolo and Gonsaguo, lodged the third day of December at Guaftallo, and the fourth day at Newcastel and Powy which is ten miles from Parma. There the Prince of Orenge came to them, passing from Mantua with two companions in the habite of a simple harquebuzier. The fifth day after they had passed the riuer of Lenze about the bridge and the high way, they lodged at Montchiarucolo, the Duke of Vrbm remaining yet at Mantua with his wife, and was not touched with the present daunger of the affaires. The seuenth day after they had passed the riuer beyond Parma, they bestowed themselues in the villages of Felina. At that time the raines fel great and thicke, whereby the riuers swelled high and brode, and Captaine George by the relation of his letters written to the Duke of Burbon and surprised by espiall, shewed himselfe verie irresolute what course to take. The eleuenth day they passed the riuer of Taro, and the day following they lodged at the borough Saint Donin, where they exercised their malice against holy reliks and images of Saints. The xiiij. day they encamped at Frenzolo, from whence as was discerned by surprising of letters, they solicited the bands of Millan to come and ioine with the, who albeit were agreeing with them in the same desire, yet they were retained by want of money: for the penurie of the Spaniards carying them into mindes insolent and disobedient, made them bold to say that they would not depart out of Millan; vnlesse they were satisfied of their old payes, and in that disorder they began to sacke and spoile. But at last to stoppe the course of so dangerous a mutinie, the industrie of the Captaines reappeased the angrie minds of the souldiers, who were contented to receiue onely fixe payes, which to furnish and accomplish, they were driuen to dispoile the Churches of their plate, and to imprison many Citizens: wherein the better to containe the whole in safetie, such of the souldiers as were payd the Captaines sent to Pavia, though with very great difficultie, for that they were loth to leaue the place where they had liued with so great libertie. And because the action of these things would require some time, the Captaines in the meane while sent beyond Paw certaine bands of horsemen and footemen Italians to ioyne with the Launceknights. And albeit the Popes Lieutenant had made instance, that the Duke of Urbino for the better suretie of the estate of the Church, would passe the riuer of Paw on that side with the Venetian regiments: yet the Duke had not onely deferred to passe, alleaging sometimes that he expected the will and resolution of the Venetians, and sometimes temporising vpon other causes and reasons, but also he gaue signification to the Senate, that if he should leade the armie ouer the riuer of Paw, there would be daunger least the Imperials would inuade their estates: for which allegation holding more vpon feare then good reason of warre, he receiued strait charge from them, not to passe the riuer. And he had also in that regard retained manie dayes the bands of footemen that were vnder the commaundement of Iohn de Medicts, whom the Lieutenant had vehemently solicited to passe Paw for the defence of the affaires of the Church. And whereas the Marquis of Salussa had passed the riuer of Adda, of whom the Lieutenant had required succours, as well to assure the things of the Church, as for that by the great diminution of the Swissers and Grisons, he saw himselfe not strong enough at Vawry. Now the Venetians who before had consented that the Marquis should passe Paw to the succours of the Pope with tenne thousand footemen, both Swissers and of his owne people, who were payed with the fortie thousand duckets allotted to the French king, besought the Duke of Urbino that they might not be led ouer the riuer, being thereunto moued and induced by the perswasions of the said Duke. By reason whereof the Duke sending him word that he would conferre with him at Sonzin, deferred his comming so long, that the Marquis went his way. Wherein such was either his negligence of the affaires, or his timorous condition, that he did not onely all he could to make him to stay, to the ende to behold with better eye what the Launceknights would do, but also he made manifest perswasions to him not to passe at all; an occasion that somewhat stayed him in the expedition, as also that the payes of the Swissers were not readie, who were payed after the rate of fixe thousand, and were in trueth but foure thousand. And albeit for that impediment he deferred to passe vntill the seuen and twentieth of December, yet he sent abroad into diuerse places of the countrey, the French horsemen with certaine bandes of footemen, to stop the passage of victuals to the Launceknights, who had now remained manie dayes at Firenzola: for that seruice also was sent Guido Vaine to the borough of Saint Domin with an hundred light horsemen: and Paule Lusajquo came out of Plaisance with a good troupe of horsemen, and drew neare to Firenzola, from which place one part of the Launceknights went to lodge at the borough of Arquo for the more commoditie of victuals. For feare of the said Launceknights Plaisance had bene refurnished before, but not with so sufficient forces as were thought conuenient for the defence of the place, for that the Popes Lieutenant, who had alwayes feared since the comming of the Launceknights, least the difficulties to aduance their expeditions in Lumbardy, would not force the Imperials to passe into Tuscane, wished that they would desire to go encampe before Plaisance: for which reason vnkowne to all men, yea euen to the Pope himselfe, he so deferred to furnishe Plaisance, that they might dispaire to be able to take it: and yet he manned it and fortified it in such sort as they could not easily carie it, leauing this hope, that if they went thither he could not lacke meane to rescue it. But by the long abode which the Launceknights made in the places thereabout, & the vniuersall exclamations of all men touching the daunger, least that Citie should be taken, he was driuen to suffer Guido Rangon to go thither with a great companie of souldiers, like as also according to the direction of the Venetians, who had promised to send thither for garrison a thousand footmen to succour the Popes necessitie, Nabbon de Naldo one of their Captaines, was dispatched thither with a regiment of a thousand footmen: but because they were ill payed, they were immediatly diminished to foure hundred. At last the Marquis of Salussa passed the riuer, who in true muster and computation had not in his armie aboue foure thousand Swissers and Grisons, and three thousand footemen of his owne:

and being come to Pulefma, notwithstanding he was desired not to depart from thence, the better to vex the Launceknights who were at Firenzola, whither Lusaquo made incursions many times euen vp to their lodgings, yet for his better luerie he went vp to Torriscella and Stiffa. But amid these marchings and remouings of souldiers and regiments, the Launceknights within two dayes after brake vp from Firenzola, and went to Carpinetta and the places thereabouts. Neither was it knowne what course the Duke of Burbon would take, whether he would plant his campe before Plaisance being come out of Millan, or whether he would passe further in the expedition of Tuscane. Afterwards the Launceknights passed the river of Nuro the last day of the yeare, to the end to passe afterwards the river of Trebia, and to tarie for the Duke of Burbon in that place, which was least subiect to the incursions of the enemy.

Thus the affaires of Lombardy proceeded in a slow course, not so much for the season of the yeare which was sharpe and full of incommodities, as for the difficulties which the Duke of Burbon had to pay his souldiers, wherein rested not the least impediments to the good fortune and felicitie of the warre. The wretched people of Millan were wonderfully trauelled for prouision of money: in which necessitie or rather tyrannie, Ierome Moron being condemned to death, compounded the night before he should suffer, to pay twentie thousand duckets, for the which it seemed they had passed him to sentence of death. But after the relêse of his purse had auoyded the danger of his life, and vnder the same good meane his person was deliuered out of prison, such was the course of his destinie working instrumentally by the dexteritie of his spirite and wit, that of a prisoner to the Duke of Burbon, he became his counsellor, and within short time he went on by the operation of his wit, till he became almost his onely gouernour and director.

out of prison.*

Neuerthelesse amid all these variations and vexations the treatises of truce or peace were great betweene the Pope and the Viceroy, though in good meaning the plots and purposes of the Viceroy tended rather to make warre, wherein he was set on by the incitation of the Colommois, who had breathed into him a new life since he came to Caietta, and also because he vnderstood that the Pope no lesse abated in courage then naked in money, found nothing so sweete as the desire of peace: wherein both publishing to all the world his pouertie and his feare, and in his confusion refusing to create Cardinals for money according to the counsell that was giuen him, the demonstrations he made of his owne weakenesse, gaue courage and hope to whom so euer would offend him. For, as the Pope not entring into the warre with that constancie of mind that appertained, had sent to the Emperour a letter the xxvj. of Iune, containing matter bitter and full of complaints, that he droue him by necessitie to intend to the warre: so also fearing afterwarde least by the sharpe phrases of that letter he might further incense the Emperour whom he so much feared, he sent after another expedition, compounded of an humour more temperate and reformed, charging his Nuncio to retaine the first, which neuerthelesse was deliuered for that it came first to his hands: the other was presented afterwards, but the Emperour vnder one expedition answered them both seuerally, according to the argument and nature of matter they contained. Moreouer the Pope had readily hearkened to the Generall of Grayfears, who going into Spaine at such time as the warre began, was charged by him to deliuer to the Emperour embassages mild and full of amitie: and being elssoones returned to Rome by commission of the Emperour, he brought many reports and informations touching his good intention, and how he would be content to come into Italy with a traine of fife thousand men, and from thence after he had taken the Crowne of the Empire, he would passe into Germany to set downe some forme to the matters of Luther, without speaking anie thing of the Councell: That he was also well inclined to accord with the Venetians vnder reasonable conditions: That he would referre the cause of Frauncis Sforce to the arbitration of two Iudges assigned by the Pope and him, and in case he were condemned, he would bestow that estate vpon the Duke of Burbon: That he would reuoke his armie out of Italy, so farre forth as the Pope and Venetians would pay three hundred thousand crownes to satisfie the wages of the army, which notwithstanding he would labour to make contented with a summe more moderate: That he would restore to the French king his children, receiuing in counterchange two millions of gold at two or more termes: He shewed also that it would be easie to accord with the king of England, both for that the summe that was in question was not great, and also the king had made offer of it. And the better to debate & work these matters, the Generall of Grayfears offered a truce for viij. or x. moneths, protesting that he had warrants and commissions from the Emperour very large and absolute, wherein all power of negotiation and conclusion was giuen to him, to the Viceroy, and to Don Hugo. In regard of which authority, and good inclination of the Emperour, the Pope, after he had giuen audience to Pignatolo, and had receiued aduertisement that the Viceroy was gone out of the port of S. Stephen, sent the generall to Caietta to treat vpon these matters with him: whereunto he was the rather induced, for that both the Venetians would not refuse the truce if the French king would consent, who for his part was not far estranged from it, and his mother had sent to Rome Laurence Tuskane declaring an inclination to peace, wherein should be a generall comprehension of all men. And also for that he thought no practise to be sure without the will and concurrency of the Duke of Burbon, he sent to him in that behalfe one of his owne Amners that was at Rome, whom the Duke returned eistfoones to the Pope to sollicite the same matter; and yet neither to loose the oportunity of the time, nor to abandon the prouisions for the warre, he sent Cardinal Augustine Triunco as Legate to the armie, which was then in the field, and continuing also his preparations to inuade the Realme of Naples Peter Nauarre ariued the third of Decmber at Ciuitauecchia with a Nauie of xxviij gallies of the Popes, the French, and the Venetians: at which time also Ranſe de Cere being sent for the french king for the expedition intended vpon Naples, was ariued at Sanomma with a fleete of sailes quartered. On the other side Askanio Colommo with a strength of two thousand footemen and three hundred horsemen, came to Valbon fiteene miles from Tiboli, where are the lands of the Abbot of Farfa and Iohn Iordan: with these forces the twelfth of December he tooke Cepperano, finding no resistance for that it was not garded. Vitelly with the Popes companies reduced himselfe betweene Tiboly, Palestine, and Volletre. Afterwardes the Colommois tooke Ponsecorue which was not garded, and in vaine gaue assault to Scarpa, which is a litle and weake place depending vpon the Abbey of Farfa. Cesar Filettin approached by night to Alagnia with fiteene hundred footmen, of which fiae hundred making their entrie secretly, by the fauour of a house ioyning to the walles, and by the practise of certaine of the townesmen that receiued them, were repulſed and driuen out againe by Lion de Fano commander of the footmen that were there. In this meane while the generall of Grayfrears returned from the Viceroy to the Pope, to whom he related the Viceroyes inclination to consent to the truce for certaine moneths, to the end that in the meane while the peace might take course: onely he stood vpon demaunds of money, and for suretie he required the Castells of Ostia and Ciuitauecchia. But of the contrary to him, the archbishop of Capua ariuing at Caietta after he was departed, and who happily had bene sent thither with an ill counsell of the Pope, wrote to him that the Viceroy reiecting all motions to truce, was contented to make peace with the Pope onely, or with the Pope and Venetians ioyntly, so far forth as they would make payment of money to the end to maintaine the army for assurance of the peace, and afterwards to debate in the matter of the truce with the others; an alteration mouing either by the variation or chaunge of the Viceroy, or haply by the perswasions of the Archbishop as many suspected. At which time Paul d'Arezze being come to the Emperours Court with authoritie from the Pope, the Venetians and Francis Sforce, whither also went by the motion of the king of England for the negociation of peace the Auditor of the Chamber, the rather for that before were come thither full commissions from the french king: he found the Emperour wholly changed both in mind and will, taking the reason of his alteration vpon an aduerisement he had receiued of the army of the Launceknights, and of his Nauie in Italy. In so much as enforcing the fauor of that good aduantage, he fled from all the conditions that were set downe before, and wrged vehemently that the French king should obserue absolutely the accord of Madrill, & to haue the cause of Francis Sforce heard by law before Iudges assigned by himselfe. Thus did both the will and intention of the Emperour vary according to the successe of affaires, like as also his commissions which he sent to his Agents in Italy, bare alwaies by reason of the distance of the place, either an expresse or silent condition to gouerne themselves according to the variation of times and occasions. Therefore the Viceroy after he had many daies abused the Pope with vaine practises, and would not so much as consent to a surceance of armes for a few daies till the negociation might sort to some issue, brake vp from Naples the xx. of December to go into the states of the Church, in which wilfulnesse he offred many new and very strange conditions of accord.

But to returne to the last day of the yeare, wherein the Launceknights (as we haue said) passed the

the ruer of Nure: the same day also the Duke of Ferrara, by the meane of his Embassadour, capitulated with the Viceroy and Don Hugo who had commission from the Emperour. Neuerthelesse the capitulation was made with a verie small liking of that Embassadour; for that he was almost constrained to consent by the threats and rude words of the Viceroy. The articles of the capitulation were these: That the Duke of Ferrara should be bound as well in his person as in his estates, to serue the Emperour against all his enemies: That he should be Captaine generall for the Emperour in Italy, with a companie of an hundred men at armes and two hundred light horsemen, only he should assemble and leaue them at his owne charges, and receiue againe allowance in his accounts: That he should presently receiue the towne of Carpy and the Castell of Nony which had appertained to Albert Pio, for the dowrie of the Emperours bastard daughter promised to his sonne, onely the reuenues should be answered in account of the souldiers, a compensation to be made vntill the consummation of the mariage: And that Vespasian Colonno and the Marquis of Guaft should disclaime and renounce the rights which they pretended to them: That he should pay the summe of two hundred thousand duckets when he had recouered Modena: but out of that should be deducted that which he had giuen to the Viceroy since the battell of Pauia: That if he did not recouer Modena, all the summes of money which he had before disbursed, should be eftsouones repayed to him: That the Emperour should be bound to his protection, and not to make peace without comprehending him, and not without obtaining for him of the Pope, absolution of the paines and censures which he had incurred euer since he was declared confederate to the Emperour: And lastly that he should vse all his meanes and authoritie to the Pope to absolue him of all those penalties and transgressions which he had run into before. Thus in the end of the yeare 1526. all things prepared and tended to a manifest and open warre.

THE ARGVMENT.

The Duke of Burbon issueth out of Millan. The Viceroy and Colonnois make war against the Pope in the estate of the Church. The Marquis of Salussa entreteth within Bologna. The Pope maketh warre in the kingdome of Naples. The Duke of Burbon leadeth his army to Rome; taketh the towne and sacketh it, and is slaine in the action. The Pope being abandoned of all hope, accordeth with the Imperials. A mutinie in Florence. The king of England is declared against the Emperer. The Confederates do many enterprises.

Now ensueth the yeare of our Lord 1527. a yeare prepared to many hard euents and accidents, such as for their crueltie were full of feare and danger, and for their straungenesse, had no example or experience with the worlds and ages before. For in the predictions of this yeare was expressed an vniuersall face of troubles and confusion, of mutation of estates, of captiuitie of Princes, of desolation of Cities, of dearth of victuals, and of a generall visitation of the plague, yea through all the regions & climates of Italy, there was no apparance nor contemplation of other thing then of blood, death, famine and flying; a condition lamentable euen to forreiners and straungers that did but heare of it, but most intollerable to those miserable wretches vpon whose neckes the law of destinie had drawne so grieuous a yoke. To these calamities there was no other thing that stayed the action of beginning, but the difficulties which the Duke of Burbon found to make the regiments of Spanish footmen to depart out of Milán: for where he had determined that Anthony de Lena should abide there for the defence of the whole Duchie, and retaine with him all those bands of Launceknights which were there before, for whose entertainments and payes were consumed both all the monies exacted at times vpon the Milannois, & also such other summes as were leauied by the billes of exchange which the Duke of Burbon brought from Spaine. And where he had also appointed to remaine with the said Lena for the seruice of the Duchie, a strength of twelue hundred footmen Spaniards, together with some bandes of Italian footmen vnder the leading of Lodowike Belliense and other commanders: so likewise by their example all the other bands and regiments of souldiers, for that they had in pray the houses, the wiues, and daughters of the inhabitants of Milán, were not discontented to liue still in that estate of licentious liberty: but for that both for the necessitie of the present seruice, & regard of their proper honor, and lastly for the awe and authoritie of the Duke of Burbon, they could not directly refuse the appointment, they demanded at least to be satisfied before they departed of their payes due to them before that day. Neuerthelesse what by the force of reasons and perswasions, and what by the example of some particulars inducing the residue by their good inclination, they promised at last to follow the Duke, so farre forth as he would pay them due payes; a condition very hard to accomplish and furnish, for that there was no possibilitie to make any more leauies of money of the inhabitants of Milán, neither by way of rigor or threatnings, nor by sacking their houses, nor by imprisoning their persons. Besides, in that estate of extreme violence and oppression, such as were absent and had abandoned the towne, were adiorned and taxed at rates to nourish the armie, and those that vpon summons refused to appeare, their goods by sentence were giuen to the souldiers.

At last both by the industrie of the Duke and the extremitie of the time, all these difficulties were overcome, and the Imperiales, called on both by the necessitie of the seruice, and hazard of the whole warre, passed ouer the riuer of Paw the last daie saue one of Ianuarie. The day after one parte of the Launceknights who before had passed ouer the riuer of Trebia, repassed it againe and went to lodge at Pontenono, and the residue of the armie staid beyond Plaisance. On the other side, the Marquis of Salussa, who had all his regiments and bands of souldiers dispersed in the countrie, was at Parma; and the Duke of Urbino being now come to Casalmajor, and to whose opinion and election the Venetians had referred to passe or not passe the riuer of Paw, began to passe his companies, assuring the armie that if the Imperiales tooke the way of Tuskane according to the aduertisements he had receiued from Milán, that both he would passe in person with 600. men at armes, 9000. footmen, and 500. light horsemen, and through his celeritie would be before them at Bologna: and also the Marquis of Salussa should do the like with his regiments and the bands of the Church. The armie Imperiall staid about twenty dayes the one halfe on this side, and the other halfe beyond Plaisance; a matter happening partly through the difficultie of monie, the Launceknights not hauing receiued till that daie one penie of the Duke of Burbon: and partly by a desire he had to plant his campe before Plaisance, though haply more for the difficulties he found to passe further then for anie other matter. Wherein the better to aduance his intention for the besieging of Plaisance, he solicited the Duke of Ferrara to furnish him with powder and artilleries, and to come & ioyne his person with the armie, offering to send out to meete him sixe hundred men at armes, and Captaine George with sixe thousand footmen. To this demand the Duke of Ferrara made answer, that he could not with anie safetie send powder through the countrie of the enemye, for that it could not be without manifest danger of interception: and that he could not without apparant hazard of his person, ioyne him selfe with him, for that all the companies of the league lay in the wayes of his passage: but be it there were safety and facilitie in both those wayes, yet he wished the Duke of Burbon to consider that he could not do a thing more commodious for the enemye, nor more agreeable to their desires, then to stand temporising and lose time about the action of those townes one after another: that if he tooke not Plaisance, wherein the doubt was greater then the hope, or if he did take it, the action whereof would deuour a great deale of time, he was to looke how farre it would concerne his reputation, and with what meanes he were able to pursue the warre hauing so great wantes of monie and other prouisions: Lastlie he told him that the way to aduance the benefite of the Emperour and to establish the victorie, was to draw and addresse him selfe to the head, and calling behind him all other enterprizes, to march with celerity to Bologna, and there to determine either to force that towne (in which enterprize he could not want succors) or at least to passe on either to Florence or to Rome.

But during the counsell and expedition of these matters, together with the deuises the Duke of Burbon vsed to get monie, both to make vp the full pay of the Spanish souldiers and to giue some reliefe to the Launceknights, amongst whom at their departing from Plaisance he distributed two crownes to euery man. The warre went on, and was strongly kindled in the estate of the Church: for Ranſe de Cere at his returne from France was newly gone to the campe Ecclesiastike, which campe lay very neare to the Viceroy who was then vpon the confines of Ceppe-rana, where certaine bands of Italian footmen gaue an ouerthrow to three hundred men of the Spanish footmen. But the counsellors and opinions of men were diuerſe touching the maner how to defend the state Ecclesiastike: for as Vitelly before the coming of Ranſe, had counselled the Pope to abandon the prouince of Campagna, and to bestow two thousand footmen within Ty-nolly, and two thousand within Pillistrina, and the residue of the armie to remaine at Villetta to stop the Viceroy for going to Rome: so Ranſe ariuing euen vpon the point of this resolution, re-prooued the counsell to remaine and be inclosed within Villetta, both for the great and large circuit of the towne, the many impediments and incommodities to fortifie it, and lastly for the vnaptneſſe & many inconueniences it bare to stop the passage of the enemies: but his opinion was to haue the armie holden within Ferentin, where by reason they should not be tied to the garding off so many places, it should be more strong and full, besides also that the place gaue good opportunity to hinder the enemies for passing further. This counsell was approued and holden for good, and according to the reasons and directions of it, they bestowed within Fruſolone a principall towne of Campagna and within fūe miles of Ferentin, a garrison of eightene hundred footmen of the regiments of Iohn de Medicis, who for the most part were called by the name of the blacke bandes: and thither were also sent Alexander Vitelly, Iohn Baptista Saueſſa, and Peter Biragno, commanders ouer light horsemen.

Continuation of the Warre begunne in the state Ecclesia-stike.

But in this meane while the familie of the *Colonna*s had secretly conspired with Napoleon Vrsin Abbot of Farfa, and had induced him to take armes in the towne of Rome as souldier to the Emperour. But the Pope hauing aduertisement of the whole practise, which he did dissemble with the same subtlety which he found it out withall, found meane to send the Abbot, who had receiued monie of him before, to meete Monsieur Vandemont the Duke of Lorraines brother, whom the French king sent to him to fauor the enterprize of Naples: and by the Popes direction the Abbot was apprehended neare to Pracciano, and sent prisoner to the castle S. Angelo. The Pope was all this while in no small thought to make prouision of monie, wherein imploring the aide of other princes, he receiued of new from the king of England a supply of thirtie thousand duckets which the Lord Russell his Chamberlaine brought vnto him: and with him came Monsieur de Rabandanges with ten thousand crowns sent to him by the French king vpon the benefite of the tenthes which the Pope had accorded to him by necessitie and compulsion, vnder this promise notwithstanding, that besides the payments of the fortie thousand crowns which he gaue to the league, and twenty thousand which he contributed to the Pope for euery moneth, he should presently minister to him thirtie thousand duckets; and within a moneth thirtie thousand more. The king of England gaue commission also to the Lord Russell to signifie to the Viceroy and the Duke of Burbon, a surſeance of armes, to the end to giue sufferance and time to treat a peace, the practise and negociation wherof according to the Emperors will, was holden in England: and if the Viceroy would not condescend to it, then to denounce against him warre. It seemed by this readines and many other apparances, that the king of England vnder a desire to marry his daughter with the French king, was well inclined to the confederates and fauoured their cause, and in that good inclinatio he promised that as soone as the marriage were established, to enter into the league and beginne the warre in Flaunders. It seemed also he was particularly disposed to do pleasure to the Pope: but there could be no great expectation of ready remedies from a Prince who both measured not well the present conditions of Italy, nor stood firme and resolute in his purposes, beeing still labored and retired by the hope which the Emperour gaue him to commit to him the working and arbitration of the peace, notwithstanding the effects were in nothing correspondent to the semblances and shewes he made: for when the Auditor of the Chamber was with him for that matter, albeit the Emperour did what he could to perswade him in many sortes that such was his intention: yet for that he expected some euent from Italy since the descending of the Launceknights, and the sailing of his Nauie at sea, whereof he had receiued some aduertisement, he forbore to giue him an answer assured and certaine, taking his excuse vpon the warrants and commissiours of the Cōfederates, as though they were not sufficient.

But the accord which the Pope solicited continually with the Viceroy, hurt him not a little with the Confederats, both for that they stood alwaies in eare least he would resolve and compound with him: and also the French king and the Venetians made this iudgement, that all the expences and defraiments which they should make to support him, would be almost vnprofitable. This iudgment and suspition tooke increasing by certaine degrees of vehement feares which were discerned in him, together with the lamentable protestations he made daily that he was no more able to sustaine the warre. Wherein against his ordinary meane and remedie in that case, he opposed wilfully his naturall obstinacy, and would not make Cardinales for monie, nor releue himselfe in so great necessities and amid so manie dangers of the Church, with those means which other Popes had wont to vse, yea euen in the atchieuing of their vniust and ambitious enterprises. In which regard, the French king and the Venetians, to be the better prepared and readie in all accidents, were eithers particularly bound to make no accord with the Emperour, the one without the other: and the French king for that cause, and for the great hope which the king of England gaue to raise together with him (in case the mariage went forward) great emotions in the spring following, became more negligent and lesse carefull of the dangers of Italy.

In this time the Viceroy who solicited an inuasion vpon the Church states, dispatched a regiment of two thousand Spanish footmen, to assault a small Castle of Stephen Colonno, where the valour of the defendants made that enterprise in vaine. And because the Viceroy came on and aduanced, the Ecclesiastikes referred to another time to execute the resolution taken to batter the Popes rocke, the garrisons of which place had surpris'd the Castle Gandolfo but weakly manned, and at that time holden by the Cardinall de Monie. At last the Viceroy, after he had assembled into one strength twelve thousand footmen, all bodies commanded and trained sauing the Spaniards and Launceknights that were come with him by sea, encamped with his whole armie the xxix. of Ianuarie before Frusolone, a towne weake and without walles, sauing that the houses of some particulars serue as a wall, and within the which the Captaines of the Church had bestowed garrison, because they would leaue him no footing nor entrie into Campagna. To the weaknes of this place was ioined a great necessitie and want of victuals: and yet the situation of the towne standing vpon a hill, giueth alwaies to the inhabitants good meane and oportunitie to saue themselves on one side, for that it beareth a certaine benefite of rescue and backing; a matter which gaue a great resolution to the garrison within to defend it, besides that they were of the best choise of Italians which at that time tooke pay. Moreouer the height of the mountaine was no little impediment to the enemies to do any action vpon their artilleries, of which they had planted three demy Cannons and foure Culuerines: only the greatest care of the enemies was to stoppe as much as they could the entrie of victualles into the towne. On the other side the Pope, who albeit was much impouerished for monie, and was more apt to suffer indignity to desire others to releue him, then to furnish himselfe by meanes extraordinarie, increased his campe as much as he could with bands of footmen payed and trained: and in that incertainty of mind and dealing, he had newly taken into his pay Horacio Baillon, without keeping memorie or obseruation of the iniuries which he had done before to his father, and afterwards to him, whom he had of long holden prisoner within the Castle of S. Angelo as a troubler of the quiet of Perouza. With these supplies of souldiers his armie went on alwaies drawing neare to Ferentin to make there his generall musters, and to giue hope of succours to those that were besieged. The batterie of Frusolone was reduced to perfection the xxiiij. day, but because it was not such as to giue hope to carie the place, there was no assault performed: onely Captaine Alarcon traueilling about the walles was hurt with the blow of a harquebuse, and likewise Maria Vrsin was wounded. One of the principall grounds and hopes of the Viceroy was, that he was not ignorant that the souldiers within suffered great scarcitie of victualles, as also the armie that mustered at Ferentin was in the same extremity: for the souldiers of the Colonnos which lay within Palicina, Montfortin, and the Popes Rocke, the onely places which they held, robbed and spoiled all that they found vpon the waies, and Ranse going to the armie, hauing for his eskort and sarge the bands offootmen of Cuio, they cut them in peeces and made pillage of what they found. Neuerthelesse as euery accident of warre is tied to his seuerall euent, and where be made many aduentures there be sundrie issues and fortunes: so it hapned that three hundred footmen issuing out of Frusolone seconded and backed by one part of the horsemen which were led by Alexander Vitelly, Iohn Baptista Sauello, and Peter Biraguo, approched within halfe a mile of Larnato, where were lodged fife ensignes of Spanish footmen of which they drew two ensignes into an ambush and ouerthrew them, and in the conflict was slaine Captaine Perault with fourscore footmen, many were made prisoners, and two ensignes wonne and borne away. All this while the Viceroy was busie in casting of mines at Frusolone, which for the most part were reuersed by countermine made by the defendants, who standing fully assured in their owne valour, and fearing litle the forces of the enemies, refused the aide of foure hundred footmen whom the Captaines of the armie would haue sent thither for their succours. And yet amid all these actions and accidents of warre, the solicitations of accord kept on their course with the same vehemencie they did before: for at this time the Generall and the Archbishop of Capua were returned to Rome, and with them was come Cesar Fieromosquo a Neapolitan, whom the Emperour had dispatched to the Pope after the Viceroy was departed from Spaine: to him was giuen full commission to assure the Pope by especiall protestation, both how much he was discontented with the action of Don Hugo and the Colonnais vpon Rome, together with the accidents that followed, and also to make impression of the Emperours desire and inclination, to compound with him friendly all the controuersies and differences that were betweene them. Their expedition bare also, that they should debate vpon the peace in his name; a matter which he seemed also inclined to accomplish with the other confederates, saying according to the relation of his Nuncio, that if the Pope executed his enterprize to go to Bologna, he would giue him full and free power to pronounce it as he thought best. These deputies propounded for the Viceroy a surceance of armes for two or three yeares with the Pope and Venetians; euery one retaining still the possessions they enioyed at the present, and the Pope to pay an hundred and fifty thousand duckets, and the Venetians fifty thousand; a taxation albeit not a litle grieuous to the Pope for the difficulties to leaue it, yet such was his inclination to be deliuered of the trauels of the warre, that the rather to induce the Venetians, he offered to impose vpon himselfe the fiftie thousand duckets rated vpon them: wherein the better to allure their consents, & to expect their answer, he made truce for eight daies with the Viceroy the last of January, in which it was agreed, that the regiments of the Church should not passe Ferentin, nor the bands of the Viceroy Frusolone, and that as there should be no action executed against the towne, so likewise the towne was forbidden all maner of fortifications and prouisions of victuals, but from one day to an other. Amid which interposing of the truce, Fieromosquo thinking he had well founded the intention of the Pope, and could also discouer the meaning of the Emperour without doing wrong to his dignitie, he presented him a long letter written with the Emperours hand, full of his good intention, offers, and deuotion towards the Pope. But after he was departed from the Popes presence, and prepared to go signifie to the Viceroy & the Legate the surceance agreed vpon, and to giue addresse for the execution of it, the same day he found the armie departed from Ferentin and marching towards Frusolone: he communicated with the Legate all that had passed betweene the Pope and him, who not willing to breake the great hopes which he and his souldiers had of the victorie, entertained his doings with praise and commendation, and leading him in the abuse of faire words, he sent secret direction to his Captaines not to forbear to march on. The armie could not come in time to Frusolone, if they wonne not a passage or way in forme of a bridge lying at the foot of the first hill of Frusolone, and garded by foure ensignes of Launceknights. But as soone as the vauward came which was commanded by Stephen Colonne, and that they came to hand strokes with them, they disordred & put them to flight, after they had made slaughter of 200, and taken 400 prisoners together with their ensignes. And thus the first hill being wonne, the others by that example retired into places more strong, leauing a free and safe enrie into Frusolone to the Ecclesiastikes, who omitting nothing which either the fauour of their fortune or the oportunitie of the time gaue them, being now very neare night, pitched their tents and lodgings euen at their beards. By the benefit of which action Ranse and Vitelly with whome the Pope was discontented for this enterprize, had great hope to giue them the defeat either if they staid there, or in case they brake vp and retired; a matter which was beleued would assuredly haue succeeded if they had encamped vpon the hill which was taken, or had bene diligent or carefull to obserue the moving of the enemies: for the Viceroy nor the day following but the third day, making no signe nor token that he would dislodge, went away with the armie two or three houres before day, setting on fire certaine munitions that remained, and left behind him manie bullets and great shot. And albeit the Ecclesiastikes when they knew he was gone, sent out after him their light horsemen, who fell vpon his baggage and tooke a few prisoners of small importance, yet they were not there in sufficient time to do him anie notable hurt: and yet he left behind him one part of his victuals, and retired himselfe to Cesena, and from thence to Cepperano. By reason of this retrait the Pope tooke such courage, concurring also the incitation of the Embassadours of the confederates, whom he could not otherwise satisfie, that he resolved to execute the enterprise of Naples: for Rabandanges who had brought the ten thousand duckets collected of the tenths, and ten thousand more for the portion of Ranse, had commission not to disburse them without the consent of Albert Pio, Ranse, and Monsieur de Lange, and that in case they were assured that the Pope would not accord. And touching the Venetians (to whom was gone the Lord Russell to induce them to accept the truce offered by the Viceroy and approved by the Pope, but by the accident of his legge breaking by the way he sent another to them) they made answer that they would not accept the truce before they were well informed of the French kings will, in which deniall they stood so much the more resolute, by how much they vnderstood that Genes was reduced to great extremities and wants of victuals: so that it was determined to invade the kingdome of Naples as well by sea as by land: and that Monsieur de Vandemont should be Admirall of the armie by sea, for whose better strength there was addresse giuen to leaue 2000 footmen. But Ranse by whose direction was distributed and expended the monie of the French king, determined contrary to the Popes will (who was of opinion to conuert into one place all the forces of that expedition) to dispose 6000 men to enter Abruzzza: he hoped that by the working of the sonnes of the Count Monteiro who had bene sent thither with 2000 footmen, they should make an easie action vpon Aquila, which accordingly hapned through the feare of Ascanio Colonna, who as soone as he heard of their approach, fled from the danger which his timorous condition would not suffer him to abide. The beginnings and first actions of this enterprise were full of hope and felicitie: for albeit the Viceroy who had bestowed garrisons within the places neare him, was busie to redresse and returnish his armie as much as he could, yet both for that one part of his regiments was disbanded, and an other part by necessity bestowed in garrisons, it was thought he would stand dangerously imbarcked, and with great difficultie be able to make resistance only to the sea armie. It was beleued also by the same reason that Ranse in Abruzzza, and the Nauies of the Church and Venetians containing xxij. gallies, should find no head made against the, both for that they were resupplied with a strength of three thousand men, and also for the ioining of Oratio with two thousand footmen, together with the person of Monsieur de Vandemont, who vnder the auncient rights and claimes of king Rene, pretended to the succession of that kingdome, and at that time managed the place of Lieutenant generall vnder the Pope. But these matters proceeded very slowly to execution, both for the temporising of the armie Ecclesiastike not as yet departed from Frasolone, where they taried for the great artilleries that were to come from Rome, & also for the expedition of Abruzzza, & the arriual of the sea armie. These impediments and losse of time were also increased by the mutinie of the footmen within Frasolone, who demanded double pay, as a matter wonne and due for the vic-torie. Neuertheles the eighteenth day of February the soldiers of the Viceroy abandoned Cesena and other places confining, and withdrew themselues to Cepperana: by the oportunitie of whose retrait, the armie Ecclesiastike beginning alreadie to feeble the want of victuals, passed Saint Germain, and the Viceroy fearing to put things to hazard, retired to Caietta, and Don Hugo to Naples. All which notwithstanding the Pope pressed still with his wants and necessities of monie, & fearing no lesse the aduancing of the Duke of Burbon, against whose armie he saw the Confederates disposed to make no great resistance, continued still his inclination to compound with the Emperour, & in that humor had effsoones prosecuted the Lord Russell to go vp to the Viceroy in the name of his king. Vpon which it followed, that Fieromo returned to Rome the xxj. of February, from whence also the day following he departed, hauing published his commissions, and left the Popes mind full of confusion and irresolution. In regard of which perill and the Popes alteration, the Venetians least he should rashly intangle himselfe with the accord, made offer to him in the beginning of March, to send him in ready monie within fiteene daies fiteene thousand duckets, and fiteene thousand more within other fiteene daies, so farforth as he would graunt them a Iubiley for all their gouernement. But amid these delays and temporisings the Popes Nauy and the Venetians, which had with great losse taried to expect the French fleete, and being by rage of weather driuen into the Ile of Ponso the three and twentieth of February, fell with the Mole of Caietta and sacked it: and the fourth day of March hauing set on land the footemen at Pozzolo, returned elswoones to the sea, for that they found it in good condition of defence: and so passing further, they disceded againe neare to Naples by the riuer of the borough of Stabbia, where was Diomed Carafa with fife hundred footmen: they caried this borough by assault the third day on that side of the Mountaine, by whose example the Castell rendred the day after. The tenth day they forced the Greeke tower and Surrenta: and in that violence of victory & fortune, many places on that side yeilded afterwards vpon composition. This fleete also had taken before certaine ships laden with graine for the prouision of Naples which had great neede of them, and for want of them suffered no small vexation, the rather for that the enemy found no impediment vpon the sea, neither was there such order taken as was necessary. In which disorder and want of good direction, the fleete drew so neare the Mole the second day in Lent, that the Castell and the gallies shot at it: yea the footmen came on so fast by land, that with great difficultie the Neapolitanes could retire themselues by the Market gate and it. After this they took Salerne, when Vaudemont made after certaine ships, and leauing foure gallies at Salerne where Oracio was, the Prince of Salerne at the same time entred within the towne by the way of the Castell with many souldiers, but he was ouerthrowne by Oracio; in which encounter were slaine more then two hundred footemen and many made prisoners. In Abruzz after the Viceroy had deliuered out of prison the olde Count of Montoire to the ende he might recouer Aquila, the sayd Count was no sooner set at liberty by the Viceroy, then was he made prisoner by his owne sons. And Ranse who tooke the sixt of March Sicilianna and Tiallecoussa, went vp towards Sora: neuertheless, notwithstanding the fauour of so faire occasions, and the benefite of so many felicities concurring, the souldiers began the first day of March to abandon the army on land by troupes, and that either for want of victuals, or through negligence in the officers, or at least for the ill prouisions of the Pope.

Nauy of the Confederates.

The negotiations and counsels of the peace continued and kept on their course, and in that action were come to Rome the second of March Fieromesqno and Serenon Secretary to the Viceroy: there they found arriued the day before, Monsieur de Lange, instructed with words and promises sufficient for the credit of his expedition, but he brought no money, notwithstanding they had aduertisement out of France, that he was departed both with twenty thousand duckats for the payes of the footemen appointed to serue in the great ships which were expected at Cinitavucchia, and also that he brought twenty thousand more for the Pope, to helpe to aduance the enterprife of the realme of Naples for one of the sonnes of the French king, to whom should be giuen in mariage Catherine de Medicis daughter to Lawrence and neece to the Pope: for the French king reposing much for himselfe in the negotiation of England, and being periwaded that the Viceroy for the disorder of Frusolone could execute nothing, and also that the army Imperiall both for their slownesse to moue and march, & for their wants and necessities of mony, would not go at all into Tuscane, would heare no further of the motion of the truce, no though it should be generall and extended to comprehend all, and that he should be acquitted from all payments of mony. Wherein albeir his principall intention was, not to giue time to the Emperour to reorder and readresse his forces, yet in regard of his owne nakednesse and pouerty of money, he sent to the Pope no other thing of the xx. thousand duckats which he had promised monthly, nor of the mony collected of the tenth, then ten thousand duckats: neither had he sent as yet the wages of those bands of footmen appointed to the maine army at sea running in the common accompts and expences of the Venetians and him. And lastly for that he had desire that there should be no action or enterprife till some conclusion were made with the king of England, he thought it but reasonable that the Pope should temporise and expect till that time. So that the enterprife of Naples begun with so great felicity and hope, went euery day diminishing and of lesse expectation, for as the army by sea which was neither made greater by vessels and shipping, nor stronger with supplies of souldiers, was not to execute any great action, the rather for that they were to draw out of their maine forces, garrisons of men to defend such places as they tooke: so the army by land, which for the ill disposition of the time, was not as yet possessed of the victuals that were sent from Rome by sea, did not onely not aduance, but also diminishing dayly by new degrees, of disorder and penury of victuals, it retired at last to Piperna. Besides, those regiments of footemen which Ranſe led and gouerned, were so diminished for want of money, that Ranſe seeing he could not inclose the Viceroy according to the plot he had layd, returned backe to Rome: yealastly the strait negotiation and labor of the accord which the Pope entertained, augmented greatly those disorders: for as it abated the preparations of the Confederates, which of themselves came but slowly on, so on the other side it pushed on the Popes inclination to the accord, wherein he was induced to repose a greater hope in the intention of the Emperour, for the intelligence he had by one of his letters surprised, by which he charged the Viceroy to entertaine and embrace the accord with the Pope, if the estate and condition of his affaires induced him not to take other counsell. But the matter that most stirred and moued him, was, that he saw the Duke of Burbon march and aduance continually with the army Imperiall: neither did he discern the resolutions of the Duke of Urbino to be so constant, nor the provisions of the Venetians so full and forward, as he could be assured of the matters of Tuscane, the feare of which brought no small affliction to him: for as the Imperials lay some of them on this side, and some of them beyond Plaisance, the Duke of Urbino had chaunged his first opinion, which was to get before them into Bologna with the Venetian army: and had resolved in his counsell, that as soone as he should be aduertised that the enemies would remoue, the army Ecclesiastike leauing good garrison within Parma and Modena, should go to Bologna: and for himselfe, he would march with the Venetian army in the rayle of the enemies, though twenty or thirtie miles from them, for the more suretie of his people. According to which order, when afterwards the enemies would take the way to Romagnia or Tuscane, the whole campe should aduance continually, the army Ecclesiastike marching alwayes before with the Marquis of Salussa, leading the French launces, the Swissers footemen, and his owne, and leauing alwayes garrisons in such places as the enemies should passe by after them, and they afterwards to be reassembled and reuoked from hand to hand according as the enemy should aduance and passe: this counsell the Duke iustified and followed with many reasons, such as the other Captaines could neither comprehend nor approue. First he alleaged that there was a surety to assemble and ioine all together in the field to stop the passage of the Imperials: for that it would be a matter either dangerous or vnprofitable. Touching the danger, he referred it to rest in the fight or battell, for that if the Imperials were not superior in numbers and multitudes, at least they were about them in force and valour; an aduantage which would make the victory easie to them. And he proued it vnprofitable by this, that if the Imperials would not fight, at least it would be alwayes in their power to leaue behind them the army of the Confederates, and so keeping alwayes before them, they should be apt to accomplish great exploits. Lastly he alleaged, that as in the experience and reason of things, he held this counsell better then all others, so also he was constrained by necessity to embrace and follow it, for that the Imperiall army being as was beleued halfe shaken, he could not put his people into such speedie readinesse as to be assured to march in time and to get before: Besides, seeing the Venetians had wholly reposed themselves vpon him touching that deliberation, he was to consider not to leaue their estate in daunger, which if the enemies discerned to be vnfurnished, they might, taking new counsell vpon new occasions, turne their courle to passe ouer Paw, and so intrude vpon their lands to their harmes. This reason might suffice to content the Senate of Venice, for that naturally they haue for obiect to proceede aduisedlie and surelie in all their affaires. But it did not satisfie the Pope, for that vnder that counsell he sawe opened a waie to the Imperiall armie to take their courle euen vp to Rome or to Tuscane, or to make their passage into what place they list, seeing there was no possibilitie of resistance by the armie that was to go before, both for that they were to distribute in places as they passed garrisons of souldiers, and also their maine strength was to suffer diminution by other meanes. Neither was it a matter certaine, that in the Venetians tarying once behind, would be as great readinesse to follow with effectes, as the Duke was liberal to promise in words, considering his custome and maner of proceeding in all the course of the warre before : Lastly he iudged that if the armies were reduced into one strength, wherein the numbers of souldiers farre exceeded the Imperials, they might with more facility stop the enemy from passing further, cut off the trafficke of their vituals, obserue all occasions that offered, and neuer be so farre remoued from them, that in good season and oportunitie they might not succour the townes of the Venetians if the enemy offered to make any violent action vpon them. But this resolution displeased him so much the more, by how much he vnderstood the Duke of Vrbis being come to Parma the third of Ianuary, was retired the fourth day to Casalmajor ; by the accident of a small malady that hapned vpon him, and fīue dayes after he went from thence to Cassola vnder colour to cure his sicknesse : to which place he sent for his wife, being somewhat eased of his seauer, but tormented as he sayd with the pangs of the goutte. Such as were fauorers and good interpreters of this maner of dealing very suspicious to the Pope, referred the cause of all to his negotiations and practises of peace : but his Lieutenant Guicciardin comprehending partly by tokens of likelihood and probability, and partly by information of the Dukes owne words and speeches, that his desire to recouer Montefeltro and Saint Leo possessed by the Florentins, was the matter that induced him to that deliberation: and iudging that if in that he were not contented, he would leaue both the Pope and Florentins abandoned in their greatest necessities : and lastly supposing that he iudged not these places to be a reward worthy enough for exposing himselfe to so great a danger : and knowing withall, that they had the same desire at Florence. In all these respects he gaue to the Duke an assured hope of the restitution of those places, as though he had commission so to doe from the Pope : which neuerthelesse was not approued by the Pope, who in that case suffered himselfe to be caried more by olde and newe hatreds, then by equitie or reason.

In all this meane while the Imperials, who had made distribution of a very small summe of money amongst the Launceknights, kept themselues incamped vpon the confines of Plaisance, where was the Count Guido Rangon with sixe thousand footmen : at which place Paule Lazasquo with certaine other light horsemen of the Ecclesiastikes making sometimes incursions to discouer the countrey : and being in that action one day accompanied with certaine bands of footmen and some men at armes, they encountred a troupe of enemies of the same faculty and profession, whom they ouerthrew and tooke foure score horse and an hundred footmen, ouer and besides Captaines Scalengo, Succar, and Grugny Burgonions, who remained prisoners. After this Monsieur Bourbon sent out ten Ensignes of Spaniards to reuictuell Pesquison, and ioynly with that action, the Count Cuiazze with the light horsemen and with his regiments of footmen, came to lodge in the borough of S. Domin which the Ecclesiastikes had abandoned: The sayd Count the day after according to an intelligence which was entertained with him before, and also pretending for want of his pay, to be acquitted and made free from his oath which he had giuen to the Imperials, passed to the campe Ecclesiastike, where he was entertained by the Lieutenant (though more to content others then of his owne inclination) and with him were taken into wages twelue hundred footmen, and an hundred and thirty light horsemen which he had with him. This condition was tied to the contract, that if the Emperour tooke from him by way of warre or other violence his Earldome of Caiatze, the Pope within eight moneths should indue him with so much in yearly value as the Earldome was worth, and to remaine possessed of it vntill he had recouered his owne.

Duke of Ferrara refusing alwayes to come to the army, pushed on by perswasions the Duke of Burbons desire, to take his course rather to Bologna and Florence, then to stay and intangle his army with the action of those townes. And as an army of souldiers compounded vpon sundry natures, nations, and languages, draweth after it for the most part so many sorts of accidents and aduersities, as it containeth seuerall complexions and humors : so, his regiments of Spanish footmen, either for want of money in deede, or making that their colour, drew into mutinie the seuenteenth day demanding their pay : and albeit in that rage of insolencie, they slue the Sergeant Maior whom the Duke had sent to appease them, yet vsing mildnesse and gouernement where his Sergeant Maior sought to manage them by authority and rigour, he raunged them by discretion whom his officer could not reduce by seueritie, and so with minds well reconciled the twentieth day he passed ouer Trebia with his whole army, and incamped about three three miles from Plaisance having with him five hundred men at armes, and many light horsemen *Italian*s who were not payed. Touching the old hands of Launceknights, one part of them were appointed to remaine at Millan, and the other were addrested to Sanona to ayde those of Genes who were reduced to great necessitie. Sure the resolution of the Duke of Burbon and the armie, which he led, was strange and wonderfull, for that being without money and pay which onely leadeth the souldier to fight, and having no munitions, without the which standeth mained all enterprises of warre, and standing destitute of the service of pyoners, a matter most important in the action of townes and peeces, and lastly being followed with no addresse nor order for victuals which alwayes is accompted one of the strongest veines or sinewes of an army, they fought to aduance and passe further amid so many priuations and wants, through so many townes and peeces of the enemies, and against foes of farre greater numbers then they. But more commendable was the constancy of the Launceknights; who being drawne out of Germanie with one onely duckat a peece, and suffering a long time with a wonderfull temperance in Italie, and neuer were beleueed since they first set their foote to march with more then two or three duckats at the most, offered to march on with the same resolution and cheerefulness of minde, with the which they betooke themselves first to the service, and in that good example to all souldiers of other nations, they passed on, contrarie to the ordinarie custome of men of warre, and especially against the humor of their owne climate and region, depending vpon no other pay or assignation then vpon the hope of the victory, notwithstanding it was manifestly discerned that they could not continue without money, both for the inuicibility of the enemies whose importunity pressed them, and for the necessities of victuals which more and more grew into extreame penurie: onely amid these sufferings and afflictions they were much stayed and supported by the authoritie & operation of Captaine George, who the better to containe them, set before their eyes the sacke of Rome, and the booty of most part of Italy; a matter which he thought most agreeable to minds replenished with impressions of ambition, glory, and profit. And in that good conformation of mind, the army marched the two and twentieth day to the borough of Saint Donin: out of the which the day following issued the Marquis of Salusse and the Ecclesiastike regiments, leauing certaine bands of Venetian footemen for the gard of Parma, and so they followed the way of Bologna with eleuen or twelue thousand footemen: but it was ordained that the Count Guido should come from Plaisance to Modena, and the footemen of the blacke bands to Bologna, leauing a sufficient garrison within Plaisance. In this sort in foure remoues they marched by the countrey of Reggia betweene Anzola and the bridge of Rene. At that time the Duke of Burbon was vpon the confines of Reggia: and the Duke of Vrbis who being perswaded at Casalmair by Guicciardin to augement his number of Swissers, had refused it as a matter vnprofitable, stood now vpon vehement instance to send to Rome and Venice to make a new leauie of foure thousand Swissers and two thousand Launceknights: in which variation and change of his mind, he excused the contradiction that was made then, both for that the season did not then require to take the field, and also he beleueed by many reasonable coniectures that the enemies would haue dissolued and broken, whom now he promised to accoast with that strength and new supply: but that was a counsell ill disgisted of them all, and not holden indifferent of any, both for that there was no possibility to releue the dangers that were present with remedies so slow and farre off, and also that for the difficulties of money, & the disagreement of the Confederats, the effect of that counsell could not be put in execution.

In this time the Duke of Millan, with the valour of three thousand footemen whom he had assembled, did not only defend Loda, Cremona, and all that countrey beyond Adda, and made incursions vpon the territories of Millan, but also ioyning order to celerity, he surprised with the same felicity the towne of Monce: Neuerthelesse his souldiers left it eftsfoones abandoned, hauing aduertisement that Anthony de Leua (who after he had giuen conduct to the Duke of Burbon was returned to Millan) marched thither with two thousand of the old Launceknights and fiftene hundred of a new leauy, a thousand Spanissh footmen, and five thousand *Italian*s, commanded by diuerse Captaines.

But after the Duke of Burbon had passed the riuer of Secchia, he tooke his way on the left hand and arriued the fift day of March at Bonport: there he left his people, and went himselfe to Finalo to communicate with the Duke of Ferrara, who perswaded him with many arguments and and reasons to draw towards Florence or Rome, and to reduce thither all his thoughts: yea it was thought that the scope of his counsell tended chiefly to take his course to Rome, and in regard of that to let passe all other enterprises. In this deliberation there occurred many accidents and difficulties which troubled the mind of the Duke of Burbon, but chiefly he feared least the army being come to Rome, they would passe on to the Realme of Naples, and that either for necessity which is mighty in the minds of soldiers, or for desire to be refreshed, which their long wearinesse and sufferance did iustly challenge, or for some other difficulty that might happen, whereof he did not doubt, neither had his doubt bin fallible or vaine, if at his comming to Rome he had not found the Pope disarmed. The same day did the regiments of the Venetians passe the riuer of Paw without the person of the Duke of Vrbino, who notwithstanding he was almost recouered and whole, yet he remained at Gazzolo, though with intention to put himselfe on the way forthwith. The seuenth day the Duke of Burbon lodged at Saint Iohn vpon the confines of Bologna, from which place he sent a trumpet to Bologna, whither were retired the army Ecclesiastike: the summons of the trumpet was to demaund victuals, and to assure them that the Duke of Burbon would go to the succours of the realme of Naples. And the same day the bands of Spaniards that were within Carpy after they had deliuered vp the towne to the Duke of Ferrara, ioyned themselues with the Duke of Burbon. The army of the Venetians lay incamped along the riuer of Secchia, not resolved to passe further, vnles they first vnderstood that the Duke of Burbon were discamped from Saint Iohn, into whose army had passage and resort a traffike of victuals from aboute the territories of Ferrara: but for that the victuallers demanded money of the souldiers, who had almost none to pay, they dispersed themselues to lodge at large and abroad, to eate & deuoure the countrey, & in that wretched insolency they ran into all places robbing both man and beast, the better to furnish them of meanes to pay for their victuals: the same bringing such a disorder ouer the whole army, that it was holden for certaine, that if in that confusion they had met with any strong encounter, or if the Ecclesiastikes who were within Bologna and the confines thereof, would haue incamped neare them, their owne disorder would haue drawne vpon them no small difficulties and dangers: both for that so long as they continued so dispersed at large and at random, their perils could not but be more apparant then their safetie, and reducing themselues into a strait and one campe, they stood depriued of all meane and prouidence for victuals. The bands also that were within Bologna were not without their disorders, as well through the condition of the Marquis, who was more apt to breake a lance in a faire shew at tilt, then to manage the office of a Captaine in the field: as also for that the Swissers and his companies of footemen were not payed in times due by the Venetians, the same being the cause that made them loofe a faire occasion. In the meane while the Duke of Burbon to the ende to passe further, was at the point to draw from Ferrara a prouision of victuals for many dayes, together with a proportion of powder, pyoners and oxen to draw foure cannons: wherein notwithstanding he made many demonstrations that such was his intention, yet it was holden for certaine that he was determined to passe into Tuscane by the way paued or caused: the like was confirmed by Ierome Moron, who many dayes before had holden a secrete intelligence with the Marquis of Salussa, though in the iudgement of many, but fraudulently and dissemblingly: But such is the operation of a disorder begunne, that if it be not as well cured at the roote as reconciled at the top, it goeth on working to daungerous effects, euen as a fire couered and raked vp with ashes is not fully quenched but smothered and preserued to a greater burning: for, as the army was appointed to depart and breake vp the fourteenth day of March, and to that end had sent backe againe to Bodin the foure cannons: so the day before, the bands of Launceknights hauing bin longed in abuse by many promises made to pay them, ioyned their exclamations to the complaints of the Spanish footmen, and beganne with insolent voyces to call for their payes, wherein giuing scope to their discontentments to passe from one passion of rage to another, they mutined and drew into manifest tumult, and that to the great danger of the life of the duke of Burbon, if he had not with present diligence escaped from his lodging, which in their fury they inuaded and sacked, killing one of his Gentlemen who stood to defend the goods of his maister. By reason of this accident the Marquis of Guaft went forthwith to Ferrara, from whence he returned with some little summe of money, with the which the army was reappeased. The seuenteenth day there fell from the regions about such abundance of snow and raine, that for certaine dayes it tooke away all liberty of marching, as well for the impediment of the wayes made worse by the ill weather, as for the swelling of the riuers which the snowes and land-floods had made equall with the tops of their bankes or shores. By which intemperance of the weather, instrumentally working in the destiny assigned, Captaine George fell sicke of an apoplexie, which so vexed him to the great perill of his life, that at least the enemies hoped that he would become vnprofitable to follow the campe, and vnder that occasion the Launcelights would no more beare their incommodities and want of money: but the effect was otherwise then the apparence declared. By this time the Venetian army was at S. Faustin neare to Rubiero, to whom the eighteenth of March came the person of the Duke of Arbin, who according to his custome promised to the Senate of Venice almost a certainty of the victory, not so much through the valor and puissance of the confederates, as for the difficulties and straites whereunto were reduced the enemies.

The Pope lost his courage,
and why.

But now the affaires of the Pope being reduced on all parts to these hard termes, he ran a carelesse course, accompanied with faintnesse of courage, both for that he was pinched with the want and necessity of money, wherein his care was so much the greater by how much did redouble his extremities, and also for the enterprise of Naples which tooke not successe according to his first deuises, and lastly for that his companies were retired to Piperna, being no longer able to endure the want of victuals. But the matter that most tooke away his resolution and spirit, was the temporising of the French, in whom was found no correspondency betweene their promises and their effects; a custome which they had duly obserued euen from the first day of the warre till the last end of the same: for, besides that the king was long in sending the forty thousand duckats for the first moneth of the war, and to dispatch the five hundred launces for the sea army: and besides that he would not according as he was bound, make warre beyond the mounts; which was one of the principall foundations and meanes set downe to aspire to the victory: yet also he failed to obserue his promises with the Pope from day to day, that besides the ordinary contribution, he would minitter to him monthly twentie thousand duckats to make warre in the realme of Naples. Also the truce being made by reason of the conspiring of Don Hugo and the Colonna, he counselled him not to keepe the articles of the truce, and confirmed vnto him the same promise not onely to ayde him in the warres against Naples, but also in all actions for his proper defence. And lastly he promised to send to him Ranse de Cere whom he fauoured much, for that he had expressed great valour in the defence of Marseilles. All which things, albeit they had bene promised from the moneth of October, yet it was so long ere they were executed, that it was the fourth day of Ianuarie before Ranse came to Rome, and yet he brought no money, and also it was ten dayes after before the twenty thousand duckats were sent: of which summe foure thousand were retained by Ranse, as well for his expences and defrayments, as for his pension, and ten thousand were conuerted to furnish the enterprise of Abruzzo, so that to the Popes hands who vnder that promise had broken the truce almost three moneths before, there neuer came of that summe more then six thousand. Moreouer the king had promised the Pope in regard of his consenting to a tenth, to pay vnto him xxv. thousand crownes within eight dayes, and five and thirty thousand more within two moneths: but he neuer receiued about nine thousand, which were brought him by Monsieur Rabandanges: The king also extended his promise further, for that after Paule Areze had taken his leaue of him the twelch of February, he promised him a coplement of twenty thousand duckats to the end to giue to the Pope a better stomacke to make war: but the sayd twenty thousand duckats which were sent after Monsieur de Lange, neuer passed further then Sauona. The king was bound by the capitulations of the confederation to send twelue gallies, of which sort of vessels he sayd he had sent sixteene, but the most part of them so ill prepared, and so slenderly furnished of men to set on land, that they stirred not from Sauona: where, if at the first when ouerture was made of the warre against the kingdome of Naples, they had immediatly ioyned with the gallies of the Pope and Venetians, they would not but haue executed right great exploits. And touching the army by sea very mighty in great vessels, notwithstanding the king had made many promises to send them out against Naples, yet they neuer went farre from Provence, or Sauona. Furthermore, after he had condescended to giue two payes to the soldiers of the Marquis of Salussa, he agreed with the Venetians who had a lesse number of souldiers then he, to whom they were bound, that their pay should be taken vpon the contribution of the forty thousand duckats. He saw the comforts and succours of the king of England were verie farre off and vncertaine uncertaine. The Venetians made but slow payments to their companies, & for that cause the bands of the Marquis of Salussa and the Swissers who were within Bologna, served almost for nothing. The variations and uncertainties of the Duke of Burbon astonished him not a little, since thereby he discerned that no impediment would be given to the Imperials to passe into Tuscane: by which meane, weighing together with the ill disposition of the people of Florence the intelligence which the citie of Sienna had with the Imperials, he saw that not only the state of Florence would fall into manifest danger, but also the circuit and iurisdiction of the Church. All which reasons albeit they moued him greatly, & wrought no small impressions in him, yet after many drifts & doubts, notwithstanding he discerned well enough how infamous and dangerous it would be to separate himselfe from the Confederates, and to referre him to the discretion of the enemies, yet both for that he was not sufficiently succoured by the residue, and much lesse would applie such aide of himselfe as he might, and also being ouer-ruled by passions of present feare, and not able to resist with resolution and courage the difficulties and dangers occurring, he determined to accord with Fieromosquo and Serenon, whom the Viceroy had sent to Rome for that matter: the articles of the accord were these: That there should be a surceance of armes for eight moneths, the Pope paying to the Imperiall army threescore thousand duckers: That whatsoeuer had bene taken vpon the Church, vpon the realme of Naples, and vpon the family of the Colonna, should be rendered: That Pompey Colomo should be restored to the dignity of Cardinall, with absolution of all paines & censures: this was a condition most grievous to the Pope, and whereunto he consented with a verie ill will: That the French king and Venetians might enter this accord within a certaine time: That in case they did enter, the Launceknights should go out of Italy, and if they did not enter, then they should depart from the Church estate, and likewise from the territories of Florence: That the Pope should pay in forty thousand duckats within two and twentie dayes accompting from the present day, and to satisfie the residue within one moneth after: That the Viceroy should come to Rome, which the Pope supposed to be the best meane to assure him that the Duke of Burbon should obserue the accord; a hope wherein he was eestwoones confirmed by the relation of a letter surprised by Guicciardin, by which the Duke of Burbon aduertised the Viceroy of the difficulties of the army, for remedy whereof he counselled him to grow to accord with the Pope so farre forth as it might be done with the Emperours honour. Immediately vpon the concluding of the accord, either party retired their bands of souldiers, reuoked their army by sea, and the places that were taken were rendred, the Pope vsing good faith and meaning in the execution of the contentes of the capitulation, notwithstanding at that time he had the better in all the realme of Naples, sauing that in the part of Aquila, the sonnes of the Count Montoro doubting to remaine there in safety, deliuered vp their father, who soorthwith with the fauour of the faction Imperial chased them out of that prouince, together with all those that were against him. After this the Viceroy came to Rome, by reason of whose presence there, the Pope iudging he stood euery way in good surety for the obseruation of the accord, dismissed with a verie ill counsell all those bands of souldiers that were in his pay in the quarters of Rome, retayning onely two hundred light horsemen, and two thousand footemen of the blacke bands: he was induced to this dismissal of his regiments by an opinion he had that the Duke of Burbon was inclined to the accord, both for the difficulties that increased vpon him daily, and also for the testimonie he had alwayes giuen of his desire and disposition to peace.

But the affaires tooke another course about the confines of Bologna, for assoone as the truce was established, the Pope dispatched Cesar Fieromosquo to the Duke of Burbon to approue and confirme the accord, and to see him depart from off the Church lands so soone as he should receiue money: but contrary to their expectation & the testimonies he had giuen before, the Duke of Burbon shewed a hard disposition to the peace, & in his soldiers appeared a far more forward inclination, who seemed to stand resolute to follow the war, either for that they stood fixed vpon the hope of a great profit, or because the monies promised by the Pope were not sufficient to satisfie two payes; a matter which induced many to beleue, that if the Pope had aduanced to the summe of an hundred thousand duckats, the souldiers had easily accepted the truce: But whatsoeuer was the ground or cause of their obstinacy, it is certaine that after the comming of Fieromosquo, they ceased not to rake and harrie the parts of Bologna as before, and expresse vpon the people all demonstrations and acts of enemies. Neuertheless the Duke of Burbon who caused to cast platformes, and Filromejano gaue continuall hope to the Popes Lieutenant that notwithstanding al these difficulties and insolencies the army should accept the truce: together with which promise, Burbon assured him that he was constrained to cast platformes and expresse other apparances of enterprise, only to entertaine the army in hope to passe further, vntill he had reduced them to his desire which was to keepe amity with the Pope. Notwithstanding at the same time were brought to the campe many prouisions of meale, pyoners, cartes, powder, and other like necessaries sent by the Duke of Ferrara, who afterwards iustified himselfe, that neither the money he had sent them, nor all other relieves of what nature so euer, passed not the value of three score thousand duckats. But on the other side the Duke of Urbino, vnder a semblance of feare, that if the armie did accept the truce, it would returne towards Polisena de Rouigno, retired the Venetian regiments beyond Paw, and encamped at Casalmajor. In this estate of suspence and temporising continued the affaires of the warre for eight dayes: but at last the Duke of Burbon, either for that such had bene alwaies his intention, or because the armie was fallen into an insolencie about his power to restraine, wrote letters to the Lieutenant Guicciardin, that since he was not able to range the souldiers to his will, necessity constrained him to passe further: and putting it accordingly in execution, he remoued the day following, being the last of March, and went to encampe at the bridge of Rene, where the furie of the footmen of the campe had killed a Gentleman sent by the Viceroy to sollicite the Duke of Burbon to imbrace the truce, had he not both with good celeritie and fortune auoyded the daunger of his life by flying away: but in that humour of rage & mutiny they expresse far more insolent demonstrations against the Marquisse of Guaft, who being gone from the armie to draw to the realme of Naples by reason of his indisposition, or not to be cōcurrent with others to impugn the Emperors will, or induced haply by some other cause, was published and proclaimed rebell by the souldiers of the army.

The comming of the Duke of Burbon to the bridge of Rene, assured the Marquis of Salussa & the Popes Lieutenant, that the armie would draw directly towards Romagnia: by reason wherof, after they had left one part of the Italian footmen for the guard of Bologna, and with great difficulty brought thither the Swissers, for whose payes the Popes Lieutenant was driven to lend ten thousand duckets to Iohn Vetturio, they went the same night with the residue of the army to Furly, whereinto they entred the third day of Aprill, leauing within Imola a sufficient garrison to defend it. Somewhat beneath the same city the Duke of Burbon passed the fift day, and encamped more lower vnder the high way: but the aduertisemēt being come to Rome that the Duke of Burbon had not accepted the truce, the Viceroy made many semblances to be discontented, wherein perswading himselfe, that according to the former aduertisements he had receiued, it was needfull to aduaunce a greater summe of money, he dispatched a Gentleman of his to make an offer of xx. thousand duckets more, which he would leauy of the reuenues of Naples: but vnderstanding that the Gentleman had hardly escaped with the hazard of his life, he departed from Rome in person the third of Aprill, to meete and conferre with the Duke of Burbon, promising the Pope to compell him to embrace the truce by separating from him the men at armes and most part of the Spanish footmen, if by other meanes he could not induce him: but arriuing the sixt day at Florence, he stayed there, as in a place most conuenient, to debate with the Deputies whom the Duke of Burbon sent to him: by whom he was fully assured that there was no possibility to stay or containe the armie, but by aduauncing a greater defrayment of mony, and that to be leauied vpon the Florentines, vpon whom the Pope had layed all the charge of that prouision.

These variations increased greatly the difficulties and daungers of the Pope, which for manie dayes before were augmented euen into degrees of extremities: for both amid such an vncertainty of counsels and dealings of the Duke of Burbon, and by the successe and issue drawne from the labor of the Viceroy, he stood in need of the succors of the Confederates, the actions of whom went on dayly diminishing and abating, notwithstanding the perswasions and instance of the Lieutenant Guicciardin: the reason grew vpon the Popes owne dealing, for that in all his speeches and demonstrations, he gaue knowledge of his desire to the accord, together with the great hope he had of the successe of the same by the working of the Viceroy: and on the other side, the Lieutenant, who comprehended by manie signes that the Popes hope was vaine, and by the same reason saw, that if the prouisions of the Confederates grew cold, the matters of Florence and Rome stood in apparant danger, fell to perswade with many strong reasons and similitudes the Marquis of Salussa and the Venetians, that the accord would not sort to effect; wherein he forgate not to encourage them, that if not for the regards of others, at least for their owne interests, they would not abandon the affaires of the Pope and Tuscane: and in that action the better to insinuate credite and authority, he did not dissemble that the Pope did vehemently desire and demaund truce, and did vndiscreetly labour and expect the same, not looking into the manifest abuses and doubtlesse of the Imperials: he forgat not also to induce them, that though by aiding him they obtained no other thing then to make easie for him the conditions of the accord, yet in that action they should drue a drift of great good and profite to themselves, for that the Pope by their helpe, would accord for him & for the Florentines vnder conditions which should litle hurt the League, where if they left him abandoned, the necessity of his affaires would compell him to pay to the Imperials a great summe of money presently, with continuation of some huge contribution monthly, for the entertaining of those armes and souldiers with the which the warre was to be brought against them afterwards. In which regards, vnlesse they would wilfully preiudice and harme themselves, they ought to stirre & come on with all their forces, to defend Tuscane whensoever the Duke of Burbon would aduance to inuade it. The matter of this deliberation reduced the Marquis of Salussa into no small doubts and perplexities, but much more it heaped astonishment vpon the Venetians: for the pusillanimitie of the Pope being not vnknowne to the both, they held for certaine, that though they should seeke to succour him of new, yet he would not sticke to imbrace the accord (without respect to the Confederates) as often as he had meane to obtaine it: in so much as it seemed that they were pressed in a matter verie new and strange, to administer aide to him, to the end he might more easily accord with their common enemies: they considered that to leaue him abandoned, would be more prejudiciall to their common affaires: & yet they saw they shold leaue their men in manifest danger between the Appenine & the enemies: & in a country become already against them, if, whilst they were in Tuscane, the Pope did either confirm the accord, or made a new. Moreouer the Senate of Venice feared least the Pope made instance to haue their men passe into Tuscane, to the end to constrain the to consent to a surceance of armes, by meane of the danger wherein they should be to lose their men. The Lieutenant had easily retired the Marquis of Salussa from those doubts and perplexities, notwithstanding he was encouraged to the contrary by many of his counsell, to the end not to commit his souldiers to danger: so that euen as he had not bene ready to come to Furly, so he refused not to passe into Tuscane, if need so required. But the Venetians, who sought to hold the Pope and Florentines vnder hope, and on the other side, were apt to stand ready prepared from day to day, to take such course as the occurrences of things did require, gaue out directions to the Duke of Urbino to issue out of Casalmajor the fourth day of Aprill, and to send the horsemen on that side beyond by the way that leadeth to Paw, and the footemen along the riuer: and the Duke of Urbino having regard to his owne particular, was fearefull by the course that the Imperials tooke into Romagnia, in which humour he dispatched a regiment of two thousand footmen Venetians, for the gard of his owne estates, notwithstanding many were of opinion, and particularly the Pope, that he had passed a secret promise to the Duke of Burbon, not to stop his passage into Tuscane.

But in this meane while the Duke of Burbon calling to recouer victuals from all parts, of which he had great want, sent one part of the army afore Cotignola, a towne which after it had endured certaine summons of the cannon, rendred vnder composition, notwithstanding it was very strong by fortification and walles: for they of the towne fearing the hauocke and insolencies of souldiers, had refused those bands that were sent to defend them. After the action of Cotignola, the Duke of Burbon sent to Lugo foure cannons: and aswell to make prouision of victuals, as for impediment of waters, he abode three or foure dayes vpon the riuer of Lamono: and so he passed the riuer of Montono the thirteenth day of Aprill, and lodged at Villa Franche, five miles from Furly: the same day did the Marquis of Salussa strip and rob 500 footmen Spanish disbanded, who were gone out towards Monto Poggio to make pillage for victuals, according to the example of the whole armie, being constrained by the great penurie & necessitie of reliefe. The xiiij. day the Duke of Burbon encamped about the way that leadeth towards Meldolo; a way to passe into Tuscane by Galearo & Valdibagnio: he was solicited to take that way by them of Sienna, who offered to him great quantities of victuals & pyoners: & in the way, insolencies following disorders) the Launce-knights, who burned al as they passed, assaulted the towne of Meldolo, which redred vpon composition, but was consumed with fire notwithstanding. That day the Duke of Burbon was aduertised that the Viceroy by the consent of the Lord la Motte, sent by him for that effect, had capitulated the day before at Florence in this sort: That without going fro other matters, but confirming of the capitulation made at Rome, the Duke of Burbon should begin within five dayes next to retire himselfe with the armie: That at the first place whereunto he should be retired, there should be payd to him threescore thousand duckets, to which the Viceroy did adde twentie thousand: That he should receiue threescore thousand more by the end of the next moneth of May, of which the Viceroy by a scedule subsigned with his owne hand, bound the Emperour to restore and repay fiftie thousand: only these last threescore thousand duckets should not be paid, vnlesse Philip Strossy were deliuered, and James Saluatio absolved of the penaltie of thirtie thousand duckets, as the Viceroy had promised to the Pope, though not in the capitulations of the truce, yet vnder simple and secret words. But neither the knowledge of this detained the Duke of Burbon for passing further, nor the aduertisement he had that the Viceroy was departed from Florence to come to the army to him, and to establish with him all things that should be necessarie: for the Viceroy did earnestly desire the accord, as well for many other generall causes, as especially (which I haue heard by credible relation) for that he sought to conuert the army presently against the Venetians: and albeit the Viceroy had promised at Rome to deuide from the Duke of Burbon, his cauallerie or horsemen, together with the most part of the Spanish footmen, yet he refused to make such separation so long as he was vpon the treatie within Florence, alleaging that it belonged not to him to be the cause of the ruine of the Emperours armie. The xvj. day the Duke of Burbon marched to lodge at Saint Sophia, a towne of the valley of Galearo, subiect to the Florentines: and struing with diligence and with deceit to preuent the enemies, to the end no impediment should be giuen to him, in passing the Alpes; a place; where for want of victuals; euery contrarie accident had bene sufficient to disorder him: The xvij. day he receiued at Saint Peter at the Baines, letters from the Viceroy and the Popes Lieutenant, signifying to him the comming of the Viceroy: to whom he made answer, as also to the Lieutenant, that where the aduertisemēt came to him in a lodging so vnapt, as he could not without incommoditie attend him there, he would expect him the day following at Saint Mary of the Baines below the Alpes: In the seuerall letter which he wrote apart to the Viceroy, he recommended particularly the ready desire he had to come to accord, wherein he desired him to impart with the Pope his good inclination and deuotion, notwithstanding his intention was otherwise. At the day assigned the Viceroy went to meete the Duke of Burbon, together with the Lieutenant Guicciardin, who being not without suspition of his marching and comming on with his power: and to the end he should not enter with his armie into Tuscane before the succors prepared to defend it, perswaded the Marquis of Salussa with many reasons to aduance and go before: and after he had with great efficacy of words and spirit disputed the matter against Iohn Vetturio the Venetian Treasurer, alwayes assistant with the Marquis, and against others who for feare least their regiments of souldiers were committed to danger, made their demands that before they passed into Tuscane, there should be deliuered vnto the assurance for two hundred thousand duckets, or at least some strong places in pawne, he brought him with all his companies to go to Bressiquello: from thence he wrote to the Pope, that he found the Marquis so well disposed and ready to march, that he made no doubt to procure him to passe with his armie into Tuscane, assuting himselfe that the Venetian regiments would do the like: but he signified that by how much the matters of Florence stood assured by their passage, by so much were endangered the affaires of Rome, because the Duke of Burbon hauing no other hope remaining, wold be constrained to conuert his forces to that enterprise: & that his army hauing the aduantage to be so neare Rome, it would be hard with the succours that should be sent, to match his diligence and celeritie, seeing he might well passe the Appenin in two remoues of incamping: That for feare of this, the Florentines sought afore hand to fortifie themselves with the forces of the Venetians and the Duke of Vrbino, to whom they had giuen hope, and afterwards assured it with promise to enter the League, in case their bands of men of warre did passe into Tuscane: whereunto they added obligations for payment of a certaine number of footmen, and not to accord with the Emperour, though the Pope would: That they had also offered to the Duke of Vrbino (who being passed Paua & Ficqueroles was arriued the thirteenth of Aprill at Finalo, and afterwards at Cortusello) to render vp to him the Castles of Saint Leo and Manolo, which offer was solicited with him by by Pallas Rucellai whom they sent to him to follow that negotiation. Inſomuch as it was leſſe hard for them to haue a ready ſuccour, yea though there was aduertisement that the Viceroy did not only not find in the place appointed the Duke of Burbon, who the ſame day diſſembling the appointment ſought to paſſe the Alpes: but alſo had bene in great daunger to be ſlaine by the payſants of thoſe quarters riſing in armes for the oppreſſions and harmes they receiued by the army: for, the Marquis was ready to paſſe the Alpes, notwithstanding the Duke of Vrbino ſoliciting him to come and ſpeak with him in the borough of Saint Peter, ſought by all meane to foreſlow and hinder him. But the two and twentieth of Aprill he incamped at the borough of S. Lawrence in Megeſſo: the ſame being the cauſe that by his example, the Duke of Vrbino, who with no honor nor good order could go farre from him, paſſed in like ſort, and incamped at Barberina the xxv. day of Aprill: wherein he rooke one principall reaſon vpon the obiection that might be made againſt him, that in caſe any ill accident or harmes fell vpon them, they ſhould not lay it vpon him, both ſeeing the readineſſe of the Frenchmen, and knowing that the Venetians had referred themſelues to his will, though with this relation and commiſſion, that if immediatly after he were arriued in Tuſcane, the Florentins went not through with his confederation, he ſhould preſently repaſſe and retire his army.

At laſt the Duke of Burbon being the ſame day paſſed the Alpes, lodged at Saint Stephens, which towne defended brauely the aſſault of his ſouldiers. And the more to blind the Pope with excuſes and reaſons artificiall, and to haue a greater occaſion to offend him, he ſent one of his Gentlemen to keepe him ſtill confirmed in his good deuotion and deſire to haue accord with him: onely he alleaged, that as in regard of the obſtinacy of his army which he could not reſiſt, he was driuen to accompany his ſouldiers to auoid a greater harme: ſo he beſought him to belecue well of his fidelity, with this counſell not to leaue off the ſolicitations of accord and not to ſticke for any ſumme of mony. But it was a matter ſuperfluous to vſe thoſe diligences with the Pope, who beleeuing too much the thing which he deſired, and deſiring too much to eaſe himſelfe of expences, aſſoone as he was aduertised of the concluſion made at Florence in the preſence & priuity of the Procurer of the Duke of Burbon, did vndiſcretly diſmiſſe almoſt all his footemen of the blacke bands; and in that ſecuritie Monſieur Vandemont was gone to Marſeilles, as if the peace had bene as firme as the Pope was ſecure. But all the armies being thus drawne into the body of Tuſcane, and the Confederates hauing vnderſtanding that the Duke of Burbon was gone in one day, which was the three and twentieth day from Saint Stephens to incampe at Chiaſſa neare to Aretzo containyng a diſtance of eighteene miles, the Captaines who were aſſembled at Barberina, drew into counſell what was to be done: amongſt whom many of them together with the agents of the Pope and Florentins, made inſtance that the armies knit in one ſtrength ſhould march and be beſtowed in ſome place beyond Florence, to take from the Duke of Burbon all meanes to approach that City: which inſtance being ſomewhat qualified, it was reſolued to ſuffer the regiments to repoſe in the lodgings where they were, and that the Captaines the day following ſhould go to Anciſa thirteene miles from Florence, to the end afterwards to calthither all their companies if they found that place to be aſſured, which Federik Boſſolo the author of that counſell did promiſe. But as they were the day after vpon the way, and very neare Florence, there hapned an accident which might haue brought forth verie dangerous effects, if it had not bene remedied, the ſame hindering greatly the execution of that counſell, and many other good complots which might haue deriued of it: this was the diſcourſe of the accident: At Florence the minds of men were much ſtirred, of whom, as the moſt part of the populars were diſcontented with the preſent gouernment, ſo the youth of the towne concurring in that inſolency, made a proud inſtance to the Magiſtrates to giue them libertie of publike armes to defend them (as they ſaid) againſt the oppreſſions of the ſouldiers: but before the Magiſtrates could eſtabliſh any reſolution, the diſcontentment which before was but in opinion, burſt out into a manifeſt and open tumult in the publike place, where the moſt part of the Commons, & almoſt all the cōcourſe of the youth proclaiming armes, began in their furie to run to the pallace. One matter that inflamed & puſhed on this tumult, was the indiſcretion and timorousneſſe of Siluius Cardinall of Corſona, who being determined to iſſue out of the towne to go meete the Duke of Vrbino to do him honour, forbore not to abandon the towne, notwithstanding he was not ignorant before his going that the tumult was in action: ſo that the towne being poſſeſſed with a rumor of his flying away, euery one was the more ready to run to the pallace, which being in the power of theym that were conspirators, and the court & greene all of the commons armed, the high Magistrate was constrained to proclaime rebels by a solemne decree, Hipolito and Alexander the Paphlagonians, with intention to introduce againe the popular gouernment. But in the meane while as the Magistrate held the people appeased with this proclamation, the Duke & the Marquis entred Florence with manie Captaines, and were accompanied with the Cardinall of Corono and Hipolito de Medicis: they managing at first certaine bands of fiftene hundred footmen, who had bene kept armed in the citie manie dayes for feare of the Duke of Burbon, reduced them all into one resolute and firme strength, and drew in warlike order towards the greene or maine place, which the Commons immediatly abandoned, and in their feare left to their power the thing which they had no valour to defend: neuerthelesse what by the violence of stones cast from within the pallace, and furie of the small shot that played vpon the, there was no safetie for them to abide there, but somewhat to auoyd the importunity of the daunger, and not altogether to be farre from the place they had gotten, they retired themselues into the streets and quarters therabouts. The Duke of Urbino was of opinion (a reason which albeit seemed to beare but small consequence, yet it was the principall cause that Florence that day was deliuered of so great a danger) that the bands that were within Florence were not sufficient to win the pallace: and doubting according to the experience of a souldier, that if it were recovered by night, least the Commons would eftsoones haue recourse to armes, he determined with the priuie of Cardinalls Cibo, Corono and Radolpho, together with the consent of the Marquis of Salussa and the Venetian Legates, being all assembled in the street of Garba, ioyning to the pallace greene, to send for one part of the Venetian bands incamped vpon the plaine of Florence neare the citie. By meane of this deuise there was towards a dangerous encounter, for that neither the pallace could be subdued without the slaughter of most of the Nobility that were within, & also the drummes striking vp to armes, there was daunger least the souldiers in that libertie would put to sacke the residue of the Citie: yea that day had bene verie vnhappy for the Florentines, if the ready wit & counsell of Lieutenant Guicciardine had not cut in sunder the knot that of it selfe was verie hard to be vndone: he seeing to come towards them Federike Bossolo, and comprehending in his imagination the cause of his comming, left the others with whom he was deuising, and ran to meet him, to the end to be the first to speake to him. In the beginning of the mutiny Federike went vp to the pallace, hoping to reappeale the ryot, as well through his authority, as for the familiaritie he had with the most part of the youth: but much lesse that he profited by that labour, seeing of the contrarie he receiued from some of them words iniurious and reprochfull, such as the humour of men drawne into rebellion could afford, yea being kept retained certaine houres, he found great difficultie to be set at libertie: but being got from them more full of disdain then of compassion, and bringing away a true discouery and information how easie it were to take the place, both for the litle forces they had, and for the lesse order they kept, he perswaded the residue to assault it presently: but the Lieutenant cutting off that deuise, stepped in, and with verie short speeches told him what grieve the Pope would conceiue by those disorders, together with the damage that consequently would follow vpon all the affaires of the Confederates: in which regards, as it were better to labor rather to appease & settle then to kindle and incense the hearts of men, so also it was a matter not a litle preiudiciall to make knowne to the Duke of Urbino and others so great a facilitie to carie it. In so much as raunging him to his opinion, he procured him so to temper with the residue, and to reconcile the mutiny without the helpe of armes, that they all approoued his deuise, and made choise of them two to go vp to the pallace to deale with the Conspiratours, and assure them in generall and particular, that whatsoeuer they had committed against the lawes of the state that day, should not in any sort be imputed against them: and being gone vp to the pallace vnder safeconduct of those that were within, they induced them at last after many difficulties, to condescend to abandon the pallace which they could no longer keepe. Thus was the tumult appeased more by industrie then by armes, and the Citie that earst was full of insolencie and furie, was thus by counsell deliuered from daunger, and all things returned to the same estate wherein they were before the mutinie: But oftentimes as ingratitude and reproch are farre more readie then the remuneration and praise of good workes, so albeit for the present the operation and wit of the Lieutenant Guicciardin was highly esteemed and commended, yet not long after the Cardinall of Cortona burst out into murmure and complaints against him, that holding more deare the safety of the Citizens, and particularly Lewis Guicciardin his brother, being at that time chiefe Magistrate, then carefull ouer the greatnesse of the house of Medicis; his artificiall dealing had bene the cause why the estate had not bene that day established for euer in the house of Medicis, with the armes and bloud of the Citizens: and on the other side, the commons and populars followed him with accusations and complaints, for that bringing backe from the palls reports that the dangers were farre greater then they were, he had betrayed the valour of the Nobility, by inducing them for the benefite of the family of the Medicis, to render without anie necessitie: So hard it is to do the thing that beareth a cleare sight in the eyes of all men, for that no good action what dignitie soeuer it hath, if it bring not with it the fauour of the time wherein it is done, and the opinion and iudgement of those into whose hearts it seeketh to insinuate and winne place, it is but a candle that burneth dimme, and whose shadow seemeth more then the light. Albeit you see the tumult of Florence appeased the same day without murther and blood, yet from that originall ground did ensue successiuelly many great disorders: yea it may be inferred, that had it not bene for that accident, the ruine that hapned immediatly after, had bene accompanied with his euasion: for both the Duke of Urbino and Marquis of Salussa abiding still at Florence for the occasion of the mutinie, went not on according to the first resolution to view the lodging of Ancisa: and also the day after the appeasment, Louis Pisan and Marke Foscaro Embassadour for the Venetians with the Florentines, taking occasion vpon the inconstancie of the Citie, protested that they would not suffer the armie to passe Florence, vnlesse there were made a conclusion of the confederation which had bene negociated: in which they demaunded contribution for ten thousand footemen, seeking through the oportunitie of the time to serue their turnes of the necessities of the Florentines: but in the end the conclusion was accomplished the eight and twentieth day, referring the matter of the contribution to the sentence of the Pope, who was beleecued to be already reunited with the Confederates. Besides, the time being accomplished for the payes of the Swissers, and Louis Pisan hauing no money to furnish them, for the ill ordinance and adresse which the Venetians had giuen, there passed certaine dayes before he could make prouision of money: in so much as through these variations and other impediments subsisting, the good counsell to draw with the armies to Ancisa, was made vaine. But in this estate and condition of affaires, the Pope looking with better eye into the wiles wherewith the Duke of Burbon had abused the Viceroy, and also seeing him to aduaunce forward into the heart of Tuscane, turned by necessitie all his cogitations to the warre, and in that humour discerning on all sides nothing but visions of daunger and feare, after the xxv. day, he made a new confederation with the French king and the Venetians, by the which as they were bound to minister to him a great summe of money, so he would not restraints himself nor the Florentines to any further obligation then their faculties were able to beare, alleaging that vpon them both had bene laid already heauie burthens of expences and trauels: but albeit these conditions verie grievous of themselves, were approued by the Embassadours of the Confederates, to separate entirely the Pope from the accords made with the Viceroy, yet they had not their perfection and confirmation by their maisters and heads principall, in whom either their authoritie or their will did much to dissolve the conditions of the action: for the Venetians charged Dominicke Venerio with a great error, for that without commission of the Senate he had concluded a confederation of great expences and litle fruite, since they gathered by the Popes inconstancie, that in all occasions he would estoones turne to his first desire to accord with the Viceroy: and touching the French king, both drayned of money, and driuen more to wearie the Emperour with the longnesse of the warre; then with the victorie, he iudged it would suffice now to entertaine the warre with a small expence: and which more is, albeit in the beginning when he vnderstood the Pope had made truce with the Viceroy, both the matter and maner of the truce were grievous to him, yet looking better afterwards into the estate of affaires, he wished that the Pope would dispose the Venetians (without whom he could make no conuention) to imbrace the truce. But at this time the Pope was not a litle discontented to see the body of the warre transferred into Tuscane, and yet lesse griued then if it had embraced the towne of Rome: and in that regard he leauied bands of souldiers, and made prouisions for money, but not with that propertie of diligence which the estate of his daungers required: he had also a purpose to send Ransede Cere against them of Sienna, and also to invade them by sea, to the end that the Duke of Burbon being entangled in Tuscane, might be stopped for taking his way to Rome: of which expedition none the lesse he had euery day so much the lesse feare and doubt, by how much more he hoped, the both for the difficulties of the Duke of Burbon to leade his army to Rome without victuals and money, and for the commoditie of the estate of Sienna, where at the least his souldiers would be refreshed, he would be driuen to stay himselfe vpon the enterprise against the Florentines. But the Duke of Burbon, either for that his first counsell was otherwise, which he had secretly determined at Finale by the authority of the Duke of Ferrara and aduise of Ierome Moron, or distrusting to driue to any good issue the enterprise of Florence, for that the maine forces of the League were assembled neare there for the defence of the citie: and lastly being no longer able to entertaine the armie without money, which he had till that day caried through so many difficulties with promises and hopes, and now seeing time had reduced him to this straite, either to perish amid the murmures of his souldiers, which could not but be miserable to a man of his heart, or else to hazard the fortune of battell in so great a weakenesse & disorder, wherein if there were any certainty, it was in the losse of the victorie: he determined to march with all diligence to surprise the towne of Rome, where the rewards of the victorie would be equall with the danger of the aduenture, and to the Emperour it would bring no lesse renowme and honour, then to the souldiers a full satisfaction of their long and weary trauels. He was pushed on to this enterprise by a hope which he felt to carie the towne, seeing the Pope with an euill counsell had first decassed the Swissers, & afterwards dismissed the blacke bands, and begunne so slowly to refurbish himselfe at such time as the accord was desperate, that it was thought he could not in good time assemble forces sufficient to defend his dangers: and so the Duke of Burbon with whom nothing was more familiar then the enterprise of Rome, departed the xxvj. of Aprill from the countrey of Aretze, with his armie no lesse speedy in marching then swift in hope: his celeritie to march and win time, tooke from him all care to carie artilleries, or any traine or baggage of campe, so well was he disposed to see executed the thing which in his hart he had determined, or rather so violent was his destiny, to call him to the end of his life, which he could now no longer prolong. In so much as marching with this incredible diligence, neither being hindred by the raines, which in those dayes fell in great abundance, nor with the want of victuals, which is no small impediment to all great actions, he drew neare to Rome at a time when the Pope was scarcely aduertised of his comming: all the wayes where he passed were as free from resistance, as his desire was farre from alteration and change, seeing he found no impediment neither at Viterba, whither the Pope had not sent strength in time, nor in any other place apt to stay the resolution of the armie so well prepared to endamage him. Now began the Pope to haue recourse to those remedies, which if he had vsed in their due time & place, might haue bene to speciall purpose to turne away so great a storme: & now found he too late the effect and truth of the counsels of some wise men about him, prophesying that he would defer the ministracion of those helps vntill either his necessities were greater then his remedies, or at least they would profite litle, being applied out of due season. Now did he create three Cardinals for money, which either could not be leauied for the speedie importunity of the affaires, or else if he should receiue it, the vse would be vnprofitable, by reason of his dangers that hastened on so fast: he called together the people of Rome, whom in great compassion he besought, that in so great a hazard of their countrey, they would readily run to armes to defend it, wherein he disposed the bodies of the popular sort to protect their libertie, and imposed vpon the richer loanes of money to wage souldiers; a taxation which ran amongst the people with no authoritie, seeing vpon the leauying of the imposts one Dominicke Maximo of the greatest wealth amongst the Romanes, offered to lend but an hundred duckets: for which couetousnesse he bare a sharpe punishment, for that his sonnes were made a pray to the souldiers, and himselfe falling into the calamitie of a prisoner, was rated at a huge rancome to redeeme his liberty. But after they vnderstood at Florence the newes of the discamping of the Duke of Burbon, which being writtē by Viselli, lying then within Aretze, lingred a day in comming more then ordinarie: the Captains determined that the Count Guido Rangon with his horsemen, and with the troupes of the Count Caiazzo, together with a thousand footemen of Florence and the Church, should march speedily without baggage towards the towne of Rome, and that the other part of the armie should follow after: they hoped that if the Duke of Burbon drew with him his artilleries, that proportion of succours would be at Rome before before him, and if he marched with expedition, it would arrive so soon after him, that having no artilleries, and the Citie of Rome being furnished with sixe thousand footemen by the Popes report, the towne would be able to maintaine defence vntill the first succours were come, which being arrived, there could be no daunger of the loosing of Rome. But the celeritie of the Duke of Burbon and the slow provisions made at Rome, prevented the effect of all those deuises: for as Ranse de Cere to whom the Pope had recommended the principall charge of the defence of Rome, had according to his short time leauied verie few footmen of seruice, but gathered a great crew of men ignorant and vntained in warre, whom he had drawne by force out of the stables of Cardinals and Prelates, and shops of artificers, besides Innes and other domesticall places of the towne: so he laboured to cast ramparts in the suburbs, such as in his iudgement were sufficient for defence, though in the account of others they were farre too weake to hold out the danger that was toward: his confidence was such to defend them, that he would not suffer (for the safetie of the towne) to breake vp the bridge of Tyber in case the suburbs and quarter beyond Tyber could not be defended: and in that humour of securitie holding for superfluous all other sorts of succours, when he was aduertised of the comming of Count Guido, he wrote letters to him in the Popes name by the Bishop of Verona, that seeing the Citie of Rome was furnished and fortified sufficiently, he should onely send a proportion of fixe or eight hundred harquebuziers, and for him selfe with the residue of his people, he aduised him to go ioyne him selfe to the armie of the League, where he should do more profit, then if he were inclosed within the towne of Rome. Which letter though it did little harme, for that the Count was not so farre aduanced as he might arrive in time, yet it made good declaration what slender sense or feeling he had of the present dangers. But if it may be referred to a wonder that mortall men neither cannot nor know not how to resist destinie, it was a matter no lesse maruellous that the Pope, who before was wont to despise Ranse de Cere aboue all other Captaines, threw himselfe now into his armes, and reposed his life and estate wholly vpon his confidence and iudgement: and yet this was a matter more strange and contrarie, that he who in farre lesser dangers was wont to be vexed with feare and terror, being euen vpon the point to abandon the Citie at such time as the Viceroy drew with his campe to Frusolone, now in so great a tempest of perill and hazard, contrary to his custome, his nature, and all expectation, did not onely constantly remaine in Rome, but had so great a hope to defend it, that being as it were the aduocate and somner to sollicite for the enemies, he did not only forbid men to go away, but also in the same obstinacie he gaue out ordenance, that there should not be transportation nor outcarying of goods, such as Marchants with other natures of artificers would haue sent for safetie downe the riuer.

The fift day of May the Duke of Burbon encamped within the medow neare to Rome, from whence with the insolencie of a soldier he sent a trumpet to demand passage of the Pope through the Citie of Rome, to go with his armie to the Realme of Naples. The morning following vpon the point of the day, by the consideration of his case and the aduersities thereof, he found there remained no other hope for his affaires, then to be resolute to relecue the afflictions of his armie, and according to the oportunitie that was offered by the Citie of Rome, either to die or vanquish. In which resolution, pushed on more and more by the murmures and exclamations of his souldiers, in whom he could not discerne which was greater either their insolencies or their necessities, he drew neare the suburbs by the way of the Mountaine and Santo Spirito, where he began to giue a furious assault: wherein he seemed to haue the fauor of fortune, who made him present the armie in more suretie by the benefite of a thicke mist, which being risen before day, and increased with degrees of fogge and thicknesse, became such a couer to his whole campe, that his souldiers were not discerned till they were neare the place where they began to giue the assault. The Duke of Burbon through a last despaire of his estate, aduanced before all his companies, either for that he had no other expectation of refuge in case he returned not victorious, or else by his own example, he thought to call on with a greater courage the Launceknights, who it seemed went not resolutely to the seruice. But such was his destinie, to determine his life and glorie together, or rather such the reward of his wilfull forwardnesse, which for the most part heapeth wretched effects vpon such as seeke not to accompanie their valour with counsell and discretion. In the beginning of the assault hee was stricken with a bullet of an harquebuze, of which wound he fell downe dead to the earth, receiuing iustly vpon his bodie and life, the price of the action which contrary to all iustice and piety he went about to execute. But much lesse that his death did abate or diminish, seeing it did inflame and redouble the courage of his souldiers, who fighting with a wonderfull constancie the space of two houres, made way at last by their hands and weapons to enter the suburbs, wherein they were not onely holpen by the weaknesse of the rampiers which were great and generall, but also they found helpe in the slender resistance which the defendants made: An experience of right good doctrine to such as haue not as yet gotten by the benefit of examples past, the knowledge of things present, who in that action may discern what propertie of difference is betweene the vertue of souldiers exercised and trained in warre, and armies newly and hastily leauied and compounded of the multitude of a people more wilfull then skilfull, and by so much lesse apt to be drawne vnder discipline, by how much more by their nature and custome they are seldome conformable to any good order. For there was at the defence of the suburbs one part of the youth of Rome vnder the ensignes of the people, notwithstanding that manie of the Gebelins and faction of Colonne desired or at least did not feare the victory of the Imperials: they hoped in regard of their faction, to receiue no harme or offence by the victors, the same being the cause why they proceeded so coldly in the defence. Neuertheles for that according to the rules of warre, it is a hard matter to take townes without artilleries, there died of the assailants, partly by that want, & partly through their wilfull forwardnesse, about a thousand footmen: who hauing once by their valour made the way open to entet in, all the defendants fled before them, as men whose feare was farre aboue any other sense or passion in them. In which disorder some tooke the way which his fortune and not his wit laid out for him: some in the astonishment seeking to flie who durst no more fight, was slaine by the enimie afore he could resolue vpon the way of his safety: some either better prepared or more happily preserued, found that safety in running away which they could not but doubt if they had longer endured the fight: and some with that resolution which their present calamitie would suffer, ranne by heapes towards the Castle, where in place of rescue they found a feare conformable to their own. In so much as all things being reduced to confusio & manifest flight, the suburbs were entirely abandoned and left a pray to the victors: and the person of the Pope, who expected with great deuotion in the pallace of Vatican what would be the issue of the assault, hearing that the enemies were entred, had also (with the others) his passions of feare and fraitie, and in that timorous contemplation of his owne perill, he fled with certaine Cardinals to the Castle. His feare kept him from being resolute in perill that was so desperate, neither did he thinke that with the presence and maiestie of his person, though it was couered with the vaile of the highest dignity vpon earth, he was able to put by the danger, which the valour and fidelitie of his souldiers could not defend with their weapons: there he consulted with the Cardinals, whether it were more for his safetie to remaine there, or during the furie of the astonishment to retire with the light horsemen of his gard into some place of more suretie by the way of Rome. But he who was appointed by destinie to be an example of the calamities that may thunder vpon Popes, and how fraile is the authoritie and maiesty of that sea, being certified by the relation of Bernard de Padoa who was fled from the armie Imperiall, that the Duke of Burbon was dead, and that the whole armie standing abated in courage for the death of their Captaine, desired to come to accord with him: in which matter they sent out men to parley with the principals there, he wretchedly left there all his counsels to go away, both he and his Captains remaining no lesse irresolute in the prouisions for defence, then they had bene slow in the expeditions: so that the day following, the Spaniards neither seeing order nor counsell to defend the quarter beyond Tyber, entred the place without any resistance: and from thence, not finding anie impediments to stop their victorie, the same euening they entred the Citie of Rome by the bridge Xisto, where except such as reposed in the confidence of their faction, and certaine Cardinals, who for that they bare a name to embrace the Emperours quarell, beleeued to find more surety then the others: all the residue of the Court and Citie (as hapneth in accidents so furious) was conuerted into flying and confusion. But the souldiers being within the Citie, which they knew wanted nothing to make them right glorious, and well satisfied of all things appertaining to their desires, they began to omit no time to execute the thing they had so dearely bought: euerie one ranne to pillage with the same vnbridled libertie which in such cases maketh souldiers both insolent and impious: there was small care or regard borne either to the name of friends, factions, or fauourers,

fauorers, and much lesse was respected the authority of Cardinals and Prelates, or dignitie of temples and monasteries, and lastly not reserved from violation the holy relickes brought thither from all parts of the world, yea euen things sacred and specially dedicated, were prophaned from their shrines and holy places, and made subiect to the furious willes and discretion of the souldiers: it is not onely impossible to recount, but also to imagine the calamities of that Citie raised to a wonderfull greatnesse, and appointed by Gods ordinance to suffer many fortunes and directions, hauing bene sacked by the Gorbes within nine hundred and fourescore yeares. It is hard to particulate the greatnesse of the pray, both for the generall wealth and riches which the greedie hands of the souldiers had made vp in heapes, and for other things more rare and precious drawne out of the storehouses of Merchants and Courtiers. But the matter which made the spoile infinite in value, was the qualitie and great number of prisoners, redeemed with most rich and huge ranfomes. And to make vp a full tragedie of miserie and infamie, the Launceknights being so much the more insolent and cruell, by how much they bare hatred to the name of the Church of Rome, tooke prisoners certaine Prelates, whom with great contempt and indignitie they set vpon Asles and leane Moyles, and with their faces reuerfed to the crowpe of the beastes, they ledde them through the Citie of Rome apparelled with the habites and markes of their dignitie: yea they passed many of them to cruell torments, who either died in the furie of the action, or at least with the painefulnesse thereof they liued not long after, first yeelding a raunfome, and afterwarde rendring their liues. The generall slaughter, as well at the assault as in the rage of sacking, was about foure thousand bodies. All the pallaces of the Cardinals were sacked, except some particulars, who to saue the Marchants that were retired thither with their goods, together with the persons and goods of many others reserved of the generall calamitie, made promise of great summes of money: to whom notwithstanding was vied this iniquitie, that some of them that had compounded with the Spaniards, were afterwards sacked by the Launceknights, or at least constrained to a second raunfome. The Ladie Marquisse of Nantua compounded for her pallace for the summe of fiftie thousand duckets, which were payed by the Marchants and others retired thither: of which summe the rumour ran that Ferrand her sonne had tenne thousand for his share. The Cardinall of Sienna dedicated in a perpetuall deuotion to the name of the Emperour, after he had agreed with the Spaniards, as well for himselfe as for his pallace, was afterwards made prisoner by the Launceknights, who made bootie and pray of his pallace, and afterwards leading him all naked with buffets and bastonadoes into the borough, he was driuen to redeeme his life out of their hands with a promise of fise thousand duckets. The Cardinales Minerva and Ponfero passed vnder almost the like calamitie: who being prisoners to the Launceknights, were rated at a raunfome which they payed, after they had bene in a vile spectacle caried in procession through the towne of Rome. This furie of souldiers executed in a place of so great riches and greatite, could endure no dispensation of anie sort or qualitie of men, seeing the Prelates and Cardinales Spanish and Germanes, who made themselves assured that the souldiers of their Nation would spare them from oppression and taxation, were taken and passed by the same measure of miserie and calamitie as others did. Right pitifull were the cryings and lamentations of the women of Rome, and no lesse worthe of compassion the calamitie of Nunnes and Virgines professed, whom the souldiers rauished by troupes out of their houses, to satisfie their lust, no age, no sexe, no dignitie or calling was free from the violation of souldiers, in whom it was doubtfull whether bare more rule the humour of crueltie to kill, or the appetite of lust to defloure, or lastly the rage of couetousnesse to rob and spoile: yea in the violation of these women might be discerned a confirmation of the iudgements of God hidden from mortall men, for that he suffered to be deliuered vp to the vilenesse of men barbarous and bloudie, the renowned chastite of women professed and virgins. To this compassion was ioyned the infinite clamours of men forced against all law of humanitie, partly to wrest from them vnreasonable raunfomes, and partly to disclose their goods which they had hidden from the rauine of the souldiers. All holy things, Sacraments and relickes of Saints whereof the Churches were full, being dispoiled of their ornaments, were pulled downe and layed vpon the earth, suffering no small prophana-tions by the vile hands of the Launceknights: and what so euer remained vpon the prayes and spoylings of the Imperials, which were things but base and vile, were raked and caried away by the paifants and tenants of the lands of the Colonnos, whose insolencie caried them into Rome

during the generall furie: onely the Cardinall of Colonna arriuing the day after, preserued in his compassion the honour of many women, that haply were fled for rescue into his house. The rumour went that the valuation and prise of this sacke, in gold, siluer and iewels, amounted to more then a million of duckets, but the matter of ransomes contained a greater quantitie.

The same day that the Imperials tooke Rome, Count Guido arriued with his light horsemen and eight hundred harquebuziers, thinking to enter the same night by the bridge of Salarno; but hearing of the accident and dolorous estate of the towne, he retired to Otricoli, where the residue of his forces came to him: for notwithstanding the letters he had receiued from Rome, by which he vnderstood that there was no reckening made of his succours, yet he forbore not to keepe on his way, retaining this speciall deuotion, to be reputed the man that should giue rescue to Rome in greater afflictions, & yet like as it is the nature of men to be gracious and easie interpreters of their owne actions, but hard and seuer censurers of the actions of others, so there wanted not some who in that humour reprehended the Count Guido for not knowing how to vse a faire occasion: for that as the Imperials being wholly disposed to follow so rich a pray, to rob houses, to search out treasure that was hid, to take prisoners, and to reduce to places of suretie such as they had taken, were dispersed into all the parts of the citie, without order for their lodging, without knowing their Ensignes, and without obeying the commaundements of their Captaines: their confusion was such, as if Count Guido with his rescues had made a sudden entrie into Rome, and shewed their faces to the Castell which was neither besieged nor garded, it was beleued that they had not onely obtained the deliuerance of the Pope, but also in that oportunitie had done some braue exploit: wherein they should haue had so much the more facilitie, by how much they might haue commaunded ouer the disorders of the souldiers, who were so vniuersally drowned in the action of pillage, that for anie accident that might happen, there could be scarcely reordered or drawne together anie notable number, the same being verified by the experience of certaine dayes after, when vpon sounding the alarme, not a souldier was in readinesse to resort to his Ensigne: But such are the errors and imperfections of men, that being caried with selfe opinion, without the ground of reason or example, they oftentimes beleue that if things had taken another course, the issue had bene otherwise, whereof if the experience might be scene, their iudgements would oftentimes be found fallible and false. But now there remained onely to those that were inclosed within the Castle, a hope to be rescued by the armie of the League, who being departed from Florence no sooner then the third of May, for the long time the Venetians tooke to pay the Swissers, disposed their marching in such sort as the Marquis of Salussa went a dayes iourney before the Venetian regiments, but vnder this ordenaunce and agreement betweene him and the Duke, that he should follow him the same way: neuerthelesse the Duke contrarie to that resolution, tooke the seuenth day the way from the lodging of Cortona to Peronsa, to arriue at Lodi, and afterwards at Otrio, and there passing Tyber to ioine with the residue: who as they marched along the way appointed; forced and sacked the borough of Pienza, refusing in their obstinacie to lodge the Swissers, in which conflict were passed to the sword fixe or eight hundred of those that were within. By reason of this disorder which drew the souldiers to consume time in pillage and spoile, the armie arriued no sooner then the tenth day at the bridge of Graniola, where they had aduertisement of the taking of Rome, and the eleuenth day they came to Oruieto, where by the counsell of Federike de Bossolo; he and the Marquis, and Hugo Peppoly with a great troupe of horse drew towards the Castell, with this intention, that he and Hugo should go vp euen to the Castell, and the Marquis to remaine behinde to backe them. In which deuice they had this hope, that finding the Imperials disordred, the suddenesse of their arriuing, both not looked for, & in their greatest heate of spoile and pillage, would haply fauour them with occasion to draw out of the Castell the Pope and his Cardinals, wherein they seemed chiefly to take the aduantage of the disorders of the souldiers, in whom was more care to rob and spoile, then to foresee daungers. But that deuise drew to no effect, both for that being not farre from Rome, Federikes horse falling vnder him, he receiued such a hurt, as he was not able without greater hazard to go from the place, and also Hugo shewing himselfe before the Castell at high day, where by his direction he should haue arriued in the night, retired his companies, alleaging that that enterprize was discovered, but as Federike sayd, he forsooke the action committed to him, because his feare was greater then his valour.

In this meane while the Duke of Vrbm vnderstanding the accidēt of Rome, albeit he assured that he would succour the Pope with all his forces, yet taking the fauour of the time and occasion to deprive the estate of Peroufa out of the hands of Gentill Baillon, who was supported and confirmed in it by the Popes authoritie, and to restore it to the arbitration and disposing of the sonnes of Iohn Paule, made his approches to Peroufa with the Venetian regiments, &c. what with threats which were sharpe and rigorous, and with the terrour of his armie standing prepared in their presence, he compelled Gentill to depart from the thing which he kept by vsurpation. He consumed three daies in that action, and leauing there certaine commanders, such as depended vpon Mala-testa and Horatio, of whom the one was inclosed in the Castle S. Angelo, and the other managed the warre in Lombardy with the Venetian regiments, he departed from thence the sixteenth day to Ornietta, the waie which he tooke at comming out of Cortona to go to Rome beyond Tiber, being the cause that he had lingred long. At Ornietta all the Captains and commanders of the armie tooke counsell together, to set downe a resolution of their proceedings hereafter: amongst whom the duke of Vrbm, after many protestations of his deare and right great affection, propounded many difficulties, recommending them chiefly to think vpon the suretie of their retraite in case the succours of the Castle sort to no good successe. In which reason he vrged of them of Ornietta to giue him ostages for assurance not to releue the army with victuals at their returning: and interposing in all the affaires of that enterprise a temporising and tract of time, he resolved at last to be at Nepes the xix day, and that the same day the Marquis with his people and the Count Guido with his Italian footmen, should likewise be at Braciano, to the end to go the next day in one strength to the Ile, which is a place nine miles from Rome. The Pope vnderstanding of the approaching of these succours by the relation of Guicciardin writing to him from Viterbo, tooke occasion, that hauing almost concluded the accord with the Imperials, he refused to subsigne the articles: not somuch for the hope he receiued by the letters, which (albeit they were aduisedly written) made some discouerie to him of things which by discoursing of matters past he was to looke and hope for of the time to come, as to auoid the imputation and note of ignominie, to lay vpon his fearfulness and rashnes the fault that he had not bene rescued. There was in the French an vniuersall readines to succour the Castle, in whom the Venetians with letters and relations of great affection, augmented the same disposition, the Prince soliciting the matter with great vehemencie in the counsell of the Pregati: so that all excuses being taken away from the Duke, he consented that the day following a muster should be made of all the armies and men of warre, hoping perhaps that finding such diminution of numbers amongst the regiments and particular bands, that he might make it a iust cause to refuse the fight; a deuise which he could not reasonably be to serue his turne, since vpon presenting the armies to the musters, there were found fifteene thousand footmē strong, with an vniuersall resolution to fight and do the office of souldiers. Immediately after the muster and suruey of the armies a generall counsell was taken for the manner of their proceeding further, which drew to this determinatiō to leade the army to incampe at the crosse of Montmary, according to the great instance and sollicitation of those of the Castle: they alleaged that in respect of the strength of the place and the small distance thereof from Rome containing but three miles, together that there was no feare of the Imperials to issue out of Rome to incampe, they might not only remaine therein safetie, but also retire without danger: and lastly that by the oportunitie of that place they might better take a view, and better execute the occasion to succour the Castle. But this resolution nothing pleasing the Duke of Vrbm, he embraced an other deuise propounded by Guido Rangon, who offered to approach the Castle the same night with all the horsemen and footmen of the Church, and in that action to aduenture to rescue the Pope out of the Castle, so farforth as the Duke of Vrbm with the residue of the maine armie would march vp to the three Cauarnes to backe him. But that deuise was not executed that night, because the Duke went vp to suruey the lodging of Montmary being effectly pressed by the importunities of the Pope: and albeit he offered to make his approches that night, yet either for his want of valour, or his too much ielousie of his owne safetie, he passed not the three Cauarnes; in so much as many hours being vainly spent in that temporising, they were driuen to deferre the execution of the enterprise till the night following. But the same day they were aduertised by their espials (whether true or suborned) that as the trenches which the Imperials had made in the medowes were more strong and braue then they were indeed: so also that they had broken vp in manie places (which also was false) the gallery was that leadeth from the Vatican to the Castle Sant Angelo, to the end to minister succours of many sides, in case any inuasion were offered. Vpon which report the Duke tooke occasiō to alleage many difficulties, which were all consented vnto by Guido and approued almost by all the other Captains: wherupon ensued the conclusion that it was a matter impossible to giue succours to the Castle for the present, wherein some other of the Captaints that rose vp to dispute and defend the contrarie opinion, were bitterly reprehended of the Duke, who wanted patience to be drawne to that by reasons and arguments, whereunto he had no inclination of will and valour. In this sort the person and presence of the Pope remained in pray, not one Launce being broken to rescue and recouer out of prison, him who to succour others had leauied so many bands of souldiers, expended such huge masses of monie and treasure, and stirred vp to warre almost all the Nations of the world. Neuertheless they disputed if the helpes that were not to be giuen presently, might be ministred at another time with more forces, a deuise which being proponed by the Duke, was also answered by himselfe, that vndoubtedly the Castle might be succoured when so euer the armie were possessed of a strength of sixteene thousand Swissers leauied by ordinance of the Cantons, not comprehending in the reckning such as were there already, as being become vnprofitable for the seruice by their long abiding in Italy: and besides this complement of Swissers, he required a new proportion of ten thousand harquebuziers Italians, three thousand Pioners, and fortie peeces of artilleries: with which resolution he required the Lieutenant to comfort the Pope, whome they knew to be furnished with victuals for a weeke, that amid his aduersities he would temporise & deferre to make anie accord till his forces might be assembled together. The Lieutenant answered, that as he liked of his deuise so farforth as in the meane while the estate of affaires did not change: so being verie likely that those within Rome would make the rescue more hard with new trenches and fortifications & also that from Naples would come to Rome the bands which the Viceroy had led thither by sea, he desired to know what propertie of hope he could giue to the Pope in case matters drew that successe according to the sensible apparances and coniectures that were discerned. But the Duke replied, that in such case should be omitted no indeuour or action tending to so good an office, adding withall, that if the bands that were at Naples were ioined with those of Rome, their strength would be in all more then twelue thousand Launceknights, and eight or ten thousand Spanish footmen, and that if the Castle were lost, there could be made no reckning to remaine maisters of the warre, if there were not at least xxij or xxiiij thousand Swissers strong. Which demandes being contented of all the Captains as vnreasonable and impossible, the armie being diminished in footmen, retired the first day of Iune to Monterga, notwithstanding the great instance which the Pope made, not to depart so soone, to the end to make his aduantage of the armie in the practise and negociation of the accord: the same night Peter Mariarossa and Alexander Vitelly with two hundred light horsemen passed vp to Rome towards the enemies. But now the Pope hauing small expectation of succours, and no lesse feare and ielousie of his life by the rage of the Colonnas and furie of the Launceknights, sent for the Viceroy who was at Sienna to come to Rome, and as the Pope hoped that by the interposing of the Viceroy, his composition would be both more easie and reasonable, so the Viceroy went with great will and readines to find the armie, with intention and hope to be created Captaine general: but being arr'ued at Rome whither he passed vnder safeconduct of the Captaines of the army, he found no good inclination in the Launceknights and Spaniards, who after the death of the Duke of Burbon had elected to that place the Prince of Orange. By reason of which preuention together with the euill disposition of the armie continuing, he had no reason to abide at Rome: and yet as he went towards Naples, he was encountred in the way by the Marquis of Gust, Don Hugo, and Captaine Alarcon, by whose counsels he returned estoones to Rome: neuertheless for that he was not agreeable to the armie, he bare no more authoritie neither in the affaires of the warre, nor in the negociation of accord with the Pope, who being by his aduersitie made naked of all helpe present, and lesse expectation to be rescued where was so great want of valour and order, was driuen to runne the race of his fortune, compounding the sixt day of Iune with the Imperials almost vnder the same condicions with the which he might haue accorded before: That the Pope should pay to the armie foure hundred thousand duckets in this order: one hundred thousand presently to be defraied of the gold, monie, and treasure referued in the Castle:

fiftie thousand within twentie daies, and two hundred and fiftie thousand within two moneths, assigning to him for these desraiments, an impost of monie to be charged vpon the whole Church state; That he should deliuer into the power of the Emperour to retaine them so long as he thought good, the Castle Saint Angelo, the Rockes of Ostia, of Cinita vecchia, and of Cinita Castellano, together with the Cities of Parma, Plaisance, and Modena: That the Pope together with all those Cardinals that were with him, which were thirteene in nūber, should remain prisoners within the Castle vntill the first payment of an hundred and fiftie thousand duckets were satisfied: That afterwards they should go to Naples or to Caietta to expect what the Emperour would determine of them: That for assurance of the paiments whereof the third part appertained to the Spaniards, he should deliuer in for ostages, the Archbishops of Siponto and Pisa, the Bishops of Pistoia and Verona, together with Iames Saluatio, Simon de Ricafola, and Lawrence brother to Cardinall Rodolfo: That Ranfe de Cere, Albert Pio, Oratio Bailon, the knight Casalo, the Embassadour of England, with all others that were saued within the Castle, except the Pope and the Cardinals, should depart in suretie: That the Pope should giue absolution to the Colomnois of the censures they had incurred: And that when he should be led out of Rome, a Legate should remaine there for him with authoritie to dispose and administer iustice. As soone as this accord was passed, Captaine Alarcon entred within the Castle with three bands of Spanish footmen, and three companies of Launceknights, who because there was put vpon him the confidence and deputation to gard the Castle and the Pope, he performed it with a very strait and seuer watch, such as shut vp from the prisoners almost all libertie. But touching the other castles and townes promised, they were not so easily consigned, for that as the Castle of Cinita vecchia was kept and defended in the name of the Cōfederates, so Andrew Dore notwithstanding he had receiued warrant and commandement from the Pope, refused to deliuer vp the Castle of Cinita Castellano, vnles he were first satisfied of fourtene thousand duckets which he said were due to him for his paie. Iulian Leno a Romaine was sent to Parma and Plaisance in the Popes name, and Lodowike Count of Lodron accompanied in the name of the Captaines, with commandement to those cities to obey the will of the Emperour, notwithstanding the Pope had giuen them secret aduertisement to the contrarie: and accordingly, those Cities abhorring the iurisdiction of the Spaniards, refused to receiue them. Touching them of Modena, they stood not in their owne power, for that the Duke of Ferrara letting not passe any occasion which the calamities of the Pope offred him, threatned them to ouerrunne and waste all their corne which was now ripe, by which cōpulsion he constrained the to reder vp to him the town the sixt day of Iune, not without the infamy of Count Lodowike Rangon, who notwithstanding the Duke had but a small strength with him, left the towne abandoned without making any signe of resistance. In this action the Duke respected not the authoritie of the Venetians, who perswaded him to attempt or innouate nothing against the Church in such troubled times. And yet they themselves entertaining intelligence with the Guelfes of Ravenna, after they had sent certaine bands of footmen vnder colour to defend the towne for feare of those of Cosignola, conuerted to themselves the iurisdiction and possession of that Citie, and vnder the same cloke tookethe Castle, after they had made secret slaughter of the Captaine, publishing that they would hold it in the name of the whole league. Not many daies after they possessed themselves of Cervia and the salts that were there, appertaining to the Pope, whose estates being neither garded nor defended further then the people & inhabitantes for their owne interests stood in defence of their places and libertie, Sigismond Malatesta with the same facilitie seized vpon the towne and Castle of Rimini.

The affaires of the Pope proceeded with no better courie in the Citie of Florence, where when the accident and losse of Rome was related to them, the Cardinall Cortono, whose feare was farre greater then his assurance, resolved to giue place to necessitie and fortune: he saw he was abandoned of those partakers and Citizens who made profession to be friends to the house of Medicis: he saw there remained no meane for him to leauy monie without vsing meanes violent & extraordinary: and lastly lacking deuotion to employ his owne purse, at least till he saw a further euent and issue of the armies who were marched to succour the Pope, he stood possessed with passions of feare and cowardise, and gaue scope to the aduersities of the towne without laying to his hand to restraine or moderate the vniuersall perill. In which disposition, after he had made an assemblie of the Citizens together, he deposed vnto them the free administration of the common weale, hauing before obtained certaine priuiledges and exemptions, together with facultie to the Popes Nephewes, to remaine at Florence as Citizens priuate, being clearly absolved and pardoned of all things past, which they had committed ioyntly or seuerally against the estate. Vpon the conclusion of which grants, the sixt day of May he went to Lucqua with the Popes Nephewes, where reprehending and repenting his departure in so great timorousnes, he practised to retain to himself the Castles of Pisa & Linorna, being already in the hands of Captains of the Popes confidence, who neuerthelesse, hauing no hope of succours by reason of the Popes captiuitie, and being corrupted with some secret summe of monie, within verie few daies after deliuered vp those Castles to the Florentyns. In the meane while the people of Florence had reduced their Citie to a popular gouernment, and in that humor had created Gonsalonier and chiefe Magistrate of the pollicie for one yeare, with facultie of confirmation for three yeares, one Nicholas Cappony, a Citizen of great authoritie and a louer of the publike libertie: this man desiring wholly the concord and vnitie of the Citizens, and no lesse zealous to reduce the gouernment to the most perfect forme of a common weale that was possible, debated the action with reasons graue and resolued, in a conuocation of the great counsell, in whom rested absolute power to establish lawes & create all Magistrates, and sure if the Citizens had giuen faith to the persuasions of this man, their new libertie had haply endured longer: But as for the most part the passion of spite and disdain is stronger in him that recouereth libertie, then in another that defendeth it, so the hatreds being great against the house of Medicis for many causes, but especially for that they had bene driuen to beare out for the most part with their owne monie, all the enterprises that they had begunne: the people began to persecute immoderately all those Citizens that were friends to the Medicis, together with such as bare affection to the name of the Pope: they called into remembrance how the Citie had expended not onely in the occupation but also in the defence of the Duchie of Vrbis, more then fise hundred thousand duckets, and as much in the warre which Pope Leo managed against the French king, and in matters hapning after his death depending vpon the same warre: neither did they forget the three hundred thousand duckets which were paid to the Captains Imperials and to the Viceroy, before the creation of Clement. And lastly they reduced into reckning the sixe hundred thousand duckets disbursed aswell since that time, as employed in this last warre against the Emperour. These reckonings being ioyned to the humor of their vniuersall hatreds, so aggrauated their rage and furie, that they defaced and reuerfed through all the partes of the Citie, the armes and ensignes of the house of Medicis, not forbearing in that course of insolencie to pull downe euen thole scutchions which were affixed and embossed to the publike pallaces builded by themselves. They brake the images or portraites of Leo and Clement, set vp in so great glorie in the temple of Annuciado, so much celebrated through all the world: yea the most part of them omitted nothing appertaining to moue the Popes disdain, and to nourish the diuisions and discordes of the Citie, which they had risen into greater degrees of disorder, if the authoritie and discretion of the Gonsalonier had not bene interposed, which yet was not sufficient to remedie manie insolencies.

But by this time were come to Rome with the Marquis of Guast and Don Hugo, all those footbands of Launceknights and Spaniards which were in the Realme of Naples: so that it was said they had strong within the towne of Rome eight thousand Spanish footmen, twelue thousand Launceknights, and foure thousand Italians; an armie sufficient to do in Italy what they would, aswell for the reputation they had gotten, as for the vniuersall astonishment of those regions, together with the weake prouisions that were made to oppose against them: onely the armie tooke such libertie in their insolencies and disorders, the Prince of Orenge being Captaine generall in title and name, but not in authoritie and effect, that they tooke litle care of the interestes of the Emperour, being wholly caried with the humor of pray and spoile, and to ransome prisoners and racke the purse of the Pope; matters whose sweetnesse detained them still in Rome, where running a race of tumult and mutinie, the Viceroy and the Marquis of Guast feared least they would extend their furie vpon their persons to the danger of their liues: in which feare they fled, leauing the souldiers to the hazard and stroke of the plague, which being already begun, kindled amongst them greater brands of infection to their vniuersall damage. For these reasons the Imperials lost the occasion of many enterprises, but especially they omitted the oportunitie to conquer Bologna; a citie which albeit the Count Hugo de Tepoly went thither after the losse of Rome with an army of a thousand footemen payed by the Venetians, yet it stood and persevered in the obedience of the sea Apostolike, though not without difficulty, by reason of the tumult which Lawrence Malvezzo made by the secret consent of Ramassotto and the fauour of the faction of the Bentinoleis, yea (which was of no lesse importance then the residue) their disorder and carelesnesse gaue time to the French king to dispatch into Italie a most mighty army, with great danger to the Emperour to loose the Realme of Naples after he had triumphed gloriously in so great a victory: for, matters going on long time before in Fraunce to a preparation of a new warre, there was established the foure and twentieth of Aprill, a conclusion of the confederation solicited many moneths betweene the French king and the king of England: wherein one condition was, that the daughter of the king of England should be married to the French king, or to the Duke of Orleans his second sonne, the election of which should be resolved at the time of the enteruiew of the two kings, which was to be performed at Whitfontide betweene Callice and Bollegne. Another article was, that the king of England should renounce the title of king of France, receiuing in recompence a yearly pension of fifty thousand duckats. The third article bare that the king of England should enter league made at Rome, and to be bound by the next moneth of Iuly, to moue warre beyond the Mounts against the Emperour with nine thousand footemen, and the French king with eighteene thousand, and a convenient number of iauces and artileries: That in the meane while both the one and the other of them, should send Embassadors to the Emperour, both to signifie the confederation made by them, to summon him to restore the kings children, and to enter into the peace with comely conditions: which in case he would not accept within one moneth, their Embassadors should denounce warre to him, and begin it. As soone as this accord was passed, the King of England entred the League, who together with the French king dispatched two Gentlemen in post to present to the Emperour conuenient summons; matters which were done by the Embassadors of the French and English with a farre greater readinesse then they were performed by the Popes commission: for that his Nuncio Baltasar Castillon, sparing to sharpen the minde of the Emperour, would not consent to denounce warre against him. But afterwards the Court of Fraunce being possessed with the newes of the losse of Rome, and the displeasure of the accident of the Pope being ballanced with the gladnesse of the death of the Duke of Burbon, and lastly the French king not holding it good pollicie to suffer the things of Italy so to decline, he contracted the fifteenth day of May with the Venetians, that they should wage in common ten thousand Swissers, he to furnish the first pay, and the Venetians the second, and so forward according to that rule: That he should send into Italie tenne thousand Frenchmen, vnder Peter Nauarre: That in like sort the Venetians ioyntly with the Duke of Millan should wage tenne thousand footemen Italians: That he should send thither a new supplie of fise hundred Launces and eighteene peeces of artilerie: And because the king of England notwithstanding the articles of the contract, shewed no great readinesse to make warre beyond the Mounts; a dealing which was not very agreeable to the French king, they dispenced with that obligation, and in place of that, they covenanted: That the king of England to furnish the war of Italy should defray the pay of ten thousand footemen for fixe monethes full: And at the speciall instance of the sayd king of England Monsieur de Lawtrech almost against his will, was declared Captaine generall of the whole army, during whose preparation to march and passe with conuenient prouisions of money and other things necessarie, there was nothing done in Italie that was of any consequence: for, both the Emperours army stirred not out of Rome notwithstanding that many perished daily by the rage of the plague, which at that time ranne also with great mortalitie in Florence, and through many parts of Italie: and also the army of the League, into which at the instance of the Marquis of Salussa and the Venetians, the Florentins were entred of new with obligation to defray fise thousand footemen, wherewith the Emperour felt himselfe grieuouly offended, for that hauing at their instance giuen to the Duke of Ferrara authority to compound in his name, was almost as soone aduertised of their contrary deliberation. This army being greatly diminished in numbers, for that the regiments of the Venetians, of the Marquis, and the Swissers, were ill payed; was retired towards Viterba, and looking altogether to temporise and entertayne, they laboured to hold in the deuotion of the League, Perousa, Oruietta, Spoleto with other places thereabouts. And afterwards hauing vnderstanding in that place, that one part of the Emperours army was issued out of:

the king of England.

Rome somewhat to take breath with the largenesse and scope of ayre, fearing least the residue should do the like, after the first payments were made, they retired to Orvieto, and afterwards neare to the borough of Pienza: and in that inclination they had retired vpon the lands of the Florentins, if they would haue giuen consent. In this rage of the plague the Castell of S. Angelo was visited, to the great daunger of the life of the Pope, about whom died certaine speciall men that did seruice to his person: who amid so many afflictions and aduersities, and no other hope remaining to him then in the clemency of the Emperour, appointed for Legat with the consent of the Captaines, Cardinall Alexander of Farnese, who notwithstanding being issued out of the Castell and Rome, refused vnder that occasion to go in the said legation. The Captaines desired to cary the person of the Pope with the thirteene Cardinals that were with him, to Caietta, but he labored against that resolution with great diligence, petitions, and art.

Monsieur
Lawtrech
Captaine generall of the league.

At last Monsieur de Lawtrech, after he had giuen order to things necessary, departed from the Court the last of Iune with eight hundred launces, and honoured with the title of Captaine generall of the whole league. And the king of England in place to present ten thousand footemen, was taxed to pay in money for euery moneth, beginning the first of Iune, the summe of thirthe thousand duckats, which money should be conuerted to the payment of then thousand Launce-knights vnder Monsieur Vaudemont, which was a regiment of very good exercise and practise, for that they had many times broken the bands of the Lutherans. The French king tooke also to his pay Andrew Dore with eight gallies and fixe and thirthe crownes for euery yeare. But before Monsieur Lawtrech was past the Mounts, the regiments of the Venetians and the Duke of Millan ioyned together, marched to Marignan, whom Anthony de Lema issuing out of Millan with eight hundred Spaniards and the like number of Italians together with a very few horsemen, contrayned to retire. About which time Iohn Iames de Medcis Captaine of Mus, who was in pay with the French king, and expected vpon the lake the comming of the Swissers, made himselfe Lord by suttile meanes of the Castell of Monguzzo seated betweene Lecqua and Coma, wherein dwelt Alexander Bemisolo as in his owne house; for the recovering of it, Anthony de Lema sent thither Lodowike de Belioyense; who hauing assaulted it in vaine, turned to Monceo: but afterwards Anthony de Lema hauing espiall that the sayd Captaine Mus with two thousand & fife hundred footmen, was come to the village Carato fourteene miles from Millan, returned to Millan: where leauing onely two hundred men (notwithstanding the Venetians were almost ten thousand) and issuing out by night with the rest of the armie, he charged suddenly vpon the rising of the Sunne) the bands of Captaine Mus, who at the alarme leauing their houses wherein they were lodged, they retired into a plaine place enuironed with hedges not farre from the village, not thinking that all the bands were there: and albeit they cast themselues into order, yet by the disadvantage of the place being low and strycted as a prison, they fell all without anie resistance into the calamitie of the sword or prisoners, except many who in the beginning sought their safetie by flying, taking their example of the Captaine.

In this meane while, the Emperour had aduertisement of the Popes captiuitie, by letters which his high Chauncellor wrote to him from Monaco, as he went into Italie, whither he was sent by his authoritie: and albeit by his speeches and outward forme of behauior he expressed how grievous that accident was to him, yet it was discerned by his secret motions and affections, that he was not much discontented with it, which he well declared in publike demonstrations, not forbearing to follow the feastes and torneyes begun before for the birth of his sonne. But as the deliery of the Pope was vehemently desired by the king of England and Cardinall of Yorkes, and for their authority no lesse displeasing to the French king, who in case he could otherwayes haue recovered his children, would haue taken litle care and grieve for the calamities of the Pope and vniuersall domages of all Italy: so in a cause so generally inducing to compassion, both the one and other the king sent Embassadors to the Emperour, to demaund the deliuerance of the Pope as a matter appertayning in common to all the Princes Christian, and particularly due by the Emperour, vnder whose faith he had bene reduced to that estate of miserie, by his Captaines and by his army. About this time the Cardinals that were in Italy made a motion, that as well they as the other Cardinals beyond the Mounts might assemble together at Avignon, to take counsell in so troublesome a time, what course to hold for the stability of the Church. But because they

they would not all at one time range themselves vnder the power of so mightie Princes, they refused to go thither though with diuerse excuses: by whose example also the Cardinall Saluatio Legate in the French court, being required by the Pope to go to the Emperour to helpe his affaires in the comming of Don Hugo, who according to the capitulation, was to go vp to the Emperour, refused to accomplish that legation, as though it had bene a matter hurtfull to deliuer vp to the power of the Emperour at one time so manie Cardinals: only he sent by one of his seruants of credite the instructions he had receiued from Rome, to the Auditor of the Chamber resident with the Emperour, to the end he might negotiate with him, who brought from him verie gracious words, but such as promised a diuerse and vncertaine resolution. And albeit the Emperour could haue desired that the Pope had bene led into Spaine, yet for that it was a matter full of infamie, and greatly tending to incense the king of England: and withall for that all the Potentates and prouinces of Spaine, and principally the Prelates & Lords, detested not a litle that an Emperour of Rome, Protector and Aduocate of the Church should with so great indignitie to all Christendome, hold in prison the man in whom was represented the person of Iesus Christ in earth. In those regards he made gracious answers to all the Embassadors which occupied his presence thereat whose instance also to go through with a peace, he said he was content to referre the action of it to the king of England, which was accepted by them: and seeming to confirme this good inclination with correspondencie of effects, he dispatched into Italy the third day of August the Generall of the gray Frears, and foure dayes after him Veri de Mighan, enabling both the one and other with commissions sufficient to the Viceroy for the deliuerie of the Pope, and restitution of all such townes and Castles as had bene taken from him: he consented also for the better releuing of the Pope, that his Nuncio should send him a certaine summe of money exacted vpon the collection of his realmes, who in their Courts and Parliaments had refused to contribute money to the Emperour.

In this time about the end of Iuly, the Cardinall of Yorke passed the sea to Calice with twelue hundred horse: the French king who had great desire to receiue him with all shewes of honour, sent to meete him at his landing the Cardinall of Lorraine, and went afterwards in person to Amiens, where the Cardinall of Yorke made his entrie the day after with very great pompe: wherein one thing that much augmented his glorie and reputation, was the treasure he had brought with him amounting to three hundred thousand crownes, both to furnish the expences occurring, and to impart it with the French king by way of loane if need were. They debated betweene them aswell of matters appertaining to the peace, as of occasions tending to nourish the warre: wherein albeit the ends and intentions of the French king were different from the purposes of the king of England, for that to haue his children restored, he cared not to leaue abandoned to manifest pray both the Pope and all the estate of Italy: yet what by the authority of the king of England, and necessitie of his owne affaires, he was driuen to promise to make no accord with the Emperour without the deliuerie of the Pope: and therefore the Emperour hauing sent to the king of England the articles of the peace, answer was made to him by both the kings, that they would accept the peace vnder conditions of restitution of the children of France, receiuing for rancome of them two millions of duckets within a certaine time, and deliuerie of the Popes person with the state Ecclesiastike, together with the conseruation of all the governments & estates of Italy, as they were at that present, & lastly, vnder condition of an vniuersall and generall peace. And because the marriage of the French king with the Emperours sister should still continue, there was set downe a speciall couenant that the Emperour accepting these articles, the Daughter of the king of England should be married to the Duke of Orleans: but in case the peace succeeded not, the king himselfe should take her to wife. After these articles were sent, they refused to giue safe conduct to a man whom the Emperour required to send into France, answering that they had done enough to send him the articles of their resolution: which being not accepted by the Emperour, the peace and confederation betweene the two kings was sworne & published solemnly the eighth day of August. They determined to employ all their forces in the warre of Italy, hauing for their principall object the deliuerie of the Pope: and touching the maner to proceed in that warre, they reposed themselves vpon M. Lamiréch, to whom according to the confidence they had in him, they gaue absolute power, and before he tooke his leaue to depart with his expedition, they suffered him to obtaine of the French king all his demands, for that the king meant in that warre to set vp his last rest. The Cardipall of Torke would also that the knight Casalo should go to the campe on the behalfe of his king, and that the thirtie thousand duckets which were his monethly contribution should bee deliuered to him, to the end to be assured if the number of Almaines were complete. Thus after the resolutions and directions of the warre were established, the Cardinal of Torke returned, and at his departure he dispatched the Pronotarie Gambaro to the Pope, to induce him to make him his Vicar generall in England, in Fraunce, and in Germany so long as he was in prison: whereunto though the French king seemed by demonstrations to consent, yet secretly and in effect he did impugne so great an ambition.

In this meane while there passed but verie few actions and exploits of warre in Italy, the expectation of the comming of Lawirech being verie great: the reason was, that as the Imperiall army full of disorder and disobedience to their Captaines, and no lesse chargeable to their friendes and townes that were rendred, made no great mouing, and gaue no feare at all to their enemies: so the footebands of Spaniards and Italians flying from the infection of the plague, lay disperfed and wandring about the confines of Rome: and the Prince of Orenge with an hundred and fiftie horsemen was gone vp to Sienna, aswell to eschue the daunger of the plague, as to keepe that citie in the deuotion of the Emperour: and for the better containing the Citie in fidelitie and order, he had sent thither before certaine bands of footemen, the rather for that the people being drawne into commotion at the incensing of certaine seditious Citizens, had in that tumult sacked the houses of such as were of the family of Montenono, and had slaine in their rage Peter Bourgeo a Citizen of authoritie, together with one of his sonnes, and seuentene or eightene others. There remained only within Rome the Launceknights, as full of infection and plague, as ripe in disorder & insolvency, who being satisfied by the Pope with verie great difficulty of the first hundred thousand duckets, which were partly paid in money, and part to be answered vpon bills of Marchants of Genes, being to be repayed vpon the tenths of the realme of Naples, and vpon the sale of Benenent, required for the residue of their paies due other sureties, and other assignation then the imposition of the state Ecclesiastike; a matter impossible to the Pope being a prisoner: by reason whereof, after many threatnings made to the ostages and sureties whom in great cruelty they kept in chains, they led them in a manifest ignominie to the field of Flora, where they set vp a gibbet, as though they would haue made present execution of them: afterwards they issued all out of Rome without anie Captaines of authoritie, rather to lodge abroad and refresh themselves, then to execute anie exploit of importance. In which inhumanitie and insolencie, after they had sacked the Cities of Ferno and Narno, Spoletto agreed to giue them passage and victuals: by which occasion the armie of the Confederates, to assure Peroufa, went to lodge at Pontenono beyond Peroufa, they were encamped before vpon the lake of Peroufa, but they were much diminished in numbers, in regard of the obligation of the Confederates: for the Marquis had with him three hundred Launces, and three hundred French archers, three thousand Swissers, and a thousand footmen Italians: the Duke of Vrbino had with him five hundred men at armes, three hundred light horsemen, a thousand footmen Almaines, and two thousand Italians: the Venetians alleaged for their excuses, that they supplied their promise and obligation with the bands of soldiers whom they held in the Duchie of Millan: the Florentines had fourescore men at armes, an hundred and fiftie light horsemen, and foure thousand footmen: and as they were constrained to maintaine a better prouision then all the others, for a continuall feare they had, least the Emperours armie would assaile Tuscane: so in that respect they fayled not to make payes to their soldiers in times due, wherein they did contrarie to all the residue: but the Duke of Vrbino ouer and besides his auncient difficulties, was not without his passions of griefe and disquietnesse, tending almost to dispaire, for that he knew that both the French king and Monsieur Lawirech spake not of him to his honour, and also the Venetians were drawne into a verie ill opinion of him: who, suspecting either his fidelitie or his inconstancie, had set a diligent and carefull guard vpon his wife and children that were at Venice, least they should depart without their leaue: and in that humor of ieaiousie and suspition they reprobued openly his counsell, which was that Lawirech should draw directly to Rome, without attempting any thing in Lombardie.

So that all matters of action or enterprise lay asleepe in that armie, who interpreted it to a speciall grace that the Imperials passed not further. And the Imperials hauing a litle afterwards received two crownes a peece of the Marquis of Gualf, who went to the armie, returned, the Launceknights

(who agreed not well with the Spaniards) to Rome, and the Spaniards were severally dispersed to Aluiano, Tegliano, Chastillon, and Bolseno: only the generall number were so much diminished, especially the Launceknights, by the stroke of the plague, that it was thought the whole army of the Emperour contained not above ten thousand footmen: here is not to be omitted the report of an act worthy of perpetuall infamie, committed by the Imperiall Captaines before their departure, the discourse of it was this: Gentill Baillon being returned to Perousa with the will & consent of Horacio, who perswading that the disorders betweene them were hurtfull to euerie one, had made shew that he would reconcile himselfe to him: thither went Federike Bossolo with the priuie and authority of all the Captaines, to signifie vnto him, that forasmuch as they had found out that he practised secretly with the enemies, they thought good to be assured of his person, notwithstanding he iustified himselfe, and promised that he would go to Chastillon: he was left in the guard of Gigant Corse Coronell of the Venetians, supposing though his liberty was restrained, yet there was no daunger to his life: but the malice of his enemies pulling on by violent hands, the last degree of his destinie, he was the same night slaine with two of his Nephewes by certaine murderers of Horacio, suborned by his commission; which bloody accident he caused to be also accompanied at the same time with the slaughter of Galeotto, brother to Braccio, & one of the nephewes of Gemill. After this the Confederates sent souldiers to enter within Camerino, by reason they had aduertisemēt that the Duke was dead, but they were preuented by Sforce Baillo in the name of the Imperials: inso much as Sera Colomo made his entrie on the behalfe of Rodolph his son in law, bastard son to the late Duke. Afterwards the Marquis of Salussa & Federike with many horsemen and a thousand footmen assaulted by night the Abbey of S. Peter, which is neare Ferno, wherein were Peter Maria Rossa and Alexander Vitelli with a strength of two hundred horsemen and foure hundred footmen: this enterprise verie rash of it selfe, since for the garrison that was there the place was not pregnable but by artilleries, succeeded well to them, either by fortune, which is vainly supposed to beare some sway in actions, or by indiscretion, which leades all things in error and confusion, or else through the couetousnesse of the Captaines, who hauing sent out the same day an hundred and fiftie harquebuziers to make pillage of a towne fast by, had depriued themselves of a strength necessarie to defend it: inso much as after they had maintained resistance for certaine houres, they yeelded to discretion, reseruing only the persons and goods of Peter Maria Rossa and Alexander Vitelli, who in defending the place which they could not keep had receiued wounds with the bullet, the one in the leg, and the other in the hand. About this time the riuer of Tyber rising in two or three places about the bankes, ouerflowed with great hurt the cāpe of the League, which went to lodge at Ascesa, the Imperials being as yet betweene Farno and Narno: and then passing further, the Duke of Urbino lodged at Narno, the Frenchmen at Benigno, and the blacke bands commaunded by Horacio Baillon Captaine generall of the infanterie of the Florentines, seeing there was no lodging prepared for the, entred into the towne of Montefalcon and sacked it: in which course of insolencie certaine bands of his footmen inuaded afterwards Pressia, whither were retired Rodolfo de Varano and Beatrice his wife, who in so great an aduersity hauing no meane to defend themselves, yeelded to discretion: neuertheless not long after they recovered their liberty, for that Sera being not able to remaine longer within Camerino for the displeasures he receiued of that armie, compounded to abandon it vnder condition to recouer his son in law and his daughter. And in this enterchange of actions & affaires, the Marquis of Salussa and Federike made a practise with the French horsemen and two thousand footmē to surprise and strip the Spanish horsemen, who were lodged at Monte Rozondo without gard & watch, as Maria Vrsini reported: they had three dayes marching to the place where the exploit should be done, wherein they proceeded with so litle order, that they were disclosed and returned without doing anything, notwithstanding they had determined, the better to take from the Spaniards all meanes to flie away, to breake downe at the same time the bridge of Fenerono.

During the whole time of this sommer the actions of the souldiers that were in Lombardie, were of the like propertie: for as the bands of the Venetians and the Duke being drawne into one strength neare to Millan, with intention to leaue and take away the corne of that countrey, had overthrowne the eskart or gard of victuals, and slaine an 100 footmen, taken thirty men at armes and three hundred horse of seruice & others: so they forbore to proceed any further against their corne, for that the bands of the Venetians according to their custome, did immediatly disperse and diminished. Andrew Dore was retired with his fleet towards Sanona, and the Genowayes under that occasion had reconquered Spesia: but afterwards the affaires of Lombardy began to take a new life for the descending of Monsieur Lawirech into Piemont with one part of the armie: who having no mind to remaine idle whilest he expected the residue of his forces, went to encamp in the beginning of August afore the towne of Bosco in the countrey of Alexandria, wherein were left for garrison a thousand footmen; the most part of them were Launceknights, who defended their liues with so much the more obstinacie and resolution, by how much Lawirech made angrie for that they had slaine certaine Swissers, would not receiue them to rendring, vnlesse they referred themselues wholly to his discretion, wherein the more to confirme them in hart & courage, Lodowike Count of Lodron to whom was committed in charge Alexandria, sent to them oftentimes and comforted them by all the meanes they could: in which good office he had speciall interest, for that his wife and children were besieged also within Bosco: neuerthelesse their aduersitie being farre aboue their power, at last after they had day and night for the space of ten dayes endured the importunate furie of the artilleries, the minds that through their valour were no longer able to make resistance, were compelled through the malice of their calamities to submit wholly their liues and goods to the arbitration of Monsieur Lawirech: who tempering his seueritie and iustice with compassion and clemencie, retained the Capitaines prisoners, and saued the life of the souldiers, but with this condition, that the Spaniards should returne into Spaine through Fraunce, and the Launceknights to take their way into Germany by the countrey of Switzerland, and euerie particular of euerie nation of them, according to the brauerie of warre, to go out of Bosco without armes, euerie one bearing a white rod in his hand: only in this his magnanimitie exceeded his iustice, that he liberally rendred to the Count Lodron his wife and his children. This conquest was accompanied with a happie successe of the affaires of Genes: for five ships, whereof foure were laden with corne, and the fift with marchandise, which went to Genes, being arriued at Portofino, and to the end they might passe in safety, nine Galleys being sent out of Genes to accompanie them, it hapued that by reason of an aduertisement that Cesar Fregosa approached to Genes by land with two thousand footmen, almost all those that were at Portofino went to Genes, leauing the fleet abandoned, the same giuing occasion to Andrew Dore to enclose it with his Galleys in the same port: at which place the Genowayes knowing that they were not able to resist, disarmed their Galleys, and set their souldiers on land: by which meane, of the nine Galleys (one being burned) the others fell into the power of the enemies, together with the ships laden with corne, and the Caracke Iustinian, which being come out of Leuant, was supposed to haue a lading in value worth an hundred thousand ducques: at this exploit were also the other French Galleys, who hauing taken before five ships laden with corne which were bound for Genes, were afterwarde drawne behind Codomont, betweene Portofino and Genes. Moreouer, at that instant certaine bands of footmen which the Adornes had leauied to bestow within Genes, were ouerthrowne at Priacroce, a place situated in the same mountaines. This calamitie ioyned to many other losses of money and sundrie vessels, tooke from the Genowayes being now reduced to extremitie, all hope to make good any further resistance, notwithstanding that at the same time Cesar Fregosa being drawne neare to Saint Peter de Rene, was constrained to retire himselfe: but the stroke of famine being ioyned to the forces and vexations of the enemies, and no further necessitie remaining to make their calamitie more wretched, they sent Embassadours to M. Lawirech to capitulate: Anth. Adorney who was Duke of Genes, retired within the Castle: insomuch as the tumults being appeased principally by the industrie of Philip Dore who was prisoner there, the Citie diuolued to the obedience of the French king, who created Gouvernour there Theodor Trunilce. By the example of this felicitie, M. Lawirech drew neare to Alexandria, hauing in his armie eight thousand Swissers, who diminished dayly in number, and the tenne thousand footmen commaunded by Peter Nauarre, together with three thousand Gascons whom the Baron of Bear had newly brought into Italy, and also three thousand footmen of the Duchie of Millan. There were within Alexandria fiftene hundred footmen, who for the ouerthrow & losse of the Almaines of Bosco, were both much weakned, and no lesse terrified, but being releued afterwards with five hundred footmen entring by the fauour of the hilles next to the Citie, and guided by Alberig de Beldoyense, they resumed their spirits and made a valiant defence: neuerthelesse what by the fury of the batteries batteries redoubled in manie places, & fresh courage of the Venetian bands newly arriued in the armie (who notwithstanding did nothing answer neither by sea ~~nor~~ the numbers they were bound vnto) and also the defendants at the same time being much trauelled and weakened with the trenches and mines which Peter Nauarre cast, their aduersities compelled them to yeeld vp the place with safetie of goods and life. This conquest of Alexandria bred amongst the Confederates a beginning of some contention: for as Monsieur Lawtrech laid his plot to leaue there in garrison five hundred footmen, to the end that in all euent, his bands and regiments might haue a sure retreat there, and also such companies as should come out of Fraunce might orderly reassemble and refresh themselves in that Citie: so the Embassadour of the Duke of Millan, who began to suspect least that beginning extended to vsurpe and occupie that estate for his king, opposed against it with manie protestations and words full of efficacy wherein the Embassadour of Venice, concurring with him in that mind, and the English interposing in the action, Monsieur Lawtrech at last agreed, albeit with great indignation; to leaue it freely to the Duke of Millan; a matter which haply was of great prejudice for that enterprize, for that according to the opinion of many he vsed a greater negligence in the conquest of Millan, either through disdain, or else to reserue himselfe to do it in a time when without regard of others, he might make his profit of it. But after the losse of Alexandria, it was not doubted but Monsieur Lawtrech would conuert his forces eitherto Millan or to Pauia, and therefore that Antbo. de Lema, who had there with him an hundred and fiftie men at armes and five thousand footmen Spanish and Launceknights, distrust-ing to be able to defend Millan with so small forces, and amid so manie difficulties, should retire his companies to Pauia. Neuerthelesse, considering that Pauia gaue small reliefe or store of victuals, and lesse expectation to maintaine the armie there with robberies and extortions, as had bene done rudely and iniuriouly at Millan, he changed purpose and stayed at Millan, sending to the guard of Pauia Lodowike Belioyense, and to the Millanois, who with mony would buy liberty to depart, he sold for corruption and gaine the thing that he could not lawfully giue. But Monsieur Lawtrech notwithstanding he was much weakened in numbers of Swissers, marched on and tooke Viguenena, and afterwards making a bridge vpon the riuer of Tesin, and by the aide of the same past his army ouer, he drew towards Benerolo, which is a Village within foure miles of Millan. In this order of proceeding he made shew as though he would incampe before that Citie, wherunto he was also counsell'd by the Venetians, but indeed he was resolu'd to take that course which seemed most easie: and because he vnderstood when he was within eight miles of Millan, that Lodowike Belioyense had sent thither the night before foure hundred footmen, by which meane there remained no more then eight hundred within Pauia: he turned way, and went the day following, being the xxviij. of September, to the Monasterie of Charterhouse, and fro thence with great celerity he went to incampe before Pauia: to the succours or rescue of which Citie Anthony de Lema, taking occasion vpon the alteration of M. Lawtrech, and chaunging his way, dispatched thither three Ensignes of footmen, who could not enter: by which impediment, together with the small numbers of men of warre that were there, it seemed the towne could make no great resistance: and in that weaknesse and feare, notwithstanding they of the towne besought Belioyense to make some composition to auoide the sacke and destruction of the Citie, yet he refused to graunt them that compassion: but when he saw with what importunitie Lawtrech continued his batterie by the space of foure dayes, hauing reuerfed so much of the wall, that the small number of men that were within sufficed not to reenforce it, the necessity of the place ioyned to the complaints of the townesmen, compelled at last Belioyense to send a Trumpet to Lawtrech, who hauing no speedy access to him, by reason that he was by chaunce gone to the Venetian campe: the souldiers drawing neare the towne, entred into it by the ruines of the wall: which being a spectacle grievous to Belioyense, and no meane to remedy or resist it, he set open the gates of the towne, and issued out in his misfortune to yeeld himselfe to the Frenchmen, who sent him prisoner to Genes. The Citie was sacked, in which action the Frenchmen spent eight dayes in pillage and crueltie, putting fire into diuerse houses, which in their furie they consumed, in reuenge of the battell which they lost within the parke: then they drew to counsell, whether they should execute the enterprize of Millan, or addresse their forces to Rome: the Florentines made instance to passe further, for feare least Lawtrech staying in Lombardy, the Imperiall armie issued out of Rome to distress them: the Venetians and Duke of Millan, who was expressly come from

Millan, impugned it, alleaging what great oportunitie there was to take Millan, and the profit that would rise by it for the enterprise of Naples: for that as Millan being taken, there remained no hope to the Imperials to haue succours out of Germanj, so that gate being laid open, it was to be alwaies feared that a great army comming from that part, would either put Lamirach in danger, or at least diuert him from the enterprise of Naples: but he answered that he must necessarily passe further by the comhandements of his king and the king of England, who had sent him into Italy chiefly to deliuer the Pope. To which resolution it was beleueed he might be induced by suspicion, that if the Duchie of Millan were got, the Venetians thinking themselves assured from all daunger of the greatnesse of the Emperour, would be negligent to aide the king in the enterprise of the realme of Naples: and haply he was no lesse induced by this, that the king supposed it wold be for the benefite of his affaires not to suffer Frauncis Sforce to recouer wholly that state, to the end that retaining the power to offer to the Emperour to leaue it, he might the easier obtaine the deliuerance of his children by way of the accord, which continually was negotiated with the Emperour by the Embassadours of Fraunce, England and Venice: but in the negotiation of the same appeared many difficulties, for that the Emperour made instance that the cause of Frauncis Sforce should be referred to the sentence of the law, and that during the trial, the estate of Millan to be holden by him, promising in all accidents not to appropriate it to himselfe: he required that the Venetians should pay to the Archduke the residue of the two hundred thousand duckets which were due to him by the capitulations of Wormes, which the Venetian Embassadour refused not, so farre forth as the Archduke would accomplish the said capitulations, and render such places as he was bound by the obligations of the same: he demaunded of the said Venetians to giue to their exiles according to couenant an hundred thousand duckets, or at least assignation for fife thousand duckets of reuenuue: that they should pay that which they ought him for the confederation made with him, which he wished might be renued: that they should render Rauenna to the Church, and wholly to giue ouer all that he held in the Duchie of Millan: he required thirtie thousand duckets of the Florentines, in recompence of the defrayments and expences made, and for damages receiued by reason of their inobseruancy: he consented that the French king should pay for him to the king of England a debt of foure hundred and fifty thousand duckets, and for the residue, amounting to two millions, he required ostages: he required to be provided for him the twelue Gallies of the French king for the conuey of his person into Italy, onely he cut off all proportions of horsemen and foote men: lastly he demaunded that as soon as the accord were resolued, all the French regiments should issue out of Italy: an article which the French king refused, vnlesse his children were first restored to him: yea when it was hoped that he would mitigate these demaunds for the losse of Alexandria and Pania, it was then he shewed himselfe more firme and resolute, following his custome, which was not to yeelde to difficulties. In so much as when the Auditor of the Chamber came to him out of England the fifteenth of October to solícite the Popes deliuerie in the name of the king of England, he answered, that he had taken order for that by the Generall: and that touching the accord, he would not either for loue or by force alter the conditions he had established before. But it was discerned manifestly that the Emperour bare no great inclination to the peace, for that many things gaue him courage against the puissance of his enemies: for, he called into consideration that in Italy he might make resistance through the vertue of his armie, and for the facility to defend townes: that he could alwayes with small difficulty make passe new supplies of Launceknights: that the long tract of expences had drayned of money and treasure the French king and the Venetians: that according to the custome of Leagues, their prouisions were defectiue and diminished: he had confidence to draw out of Spaine sufficient store of money, seeing he bare out the warre with farre lesse expences then did the Confederates, being much impouerished by the pillage and robbery of souldiers, and also for that he hoped by separating the Confederates to make them more weake or negligent: lastly, he promised much to himselfe of his great felicitie, both approved by the experience of so manie yeares, and had bene assured from his infancie by manie predictions.

But in this time Monsieur Lamirech solicited that the armies by sea prepared to inuade either Cicilia or the realme of Naples, should aduance and come on: of which, the fleete of the Venetians (whose prouisions either by sea or land answered nothing the obligations) was at Corfou, and

sixteene gallies were to ioyne with Andrew Dore, who expected in the riuer of Genes Ranse de Cere, appointed to the footmen of that enterprife. After Lawtrech sent backe againe into France 400 Launces, and three thousand footmen, and contracted with the Venetians whom he counselled to render Rauenna to the Colledge of Cardinals, and with the Duke of Millan, that to defend that which had bene conquered, they should retaine their bands with whom were Ianus Fre-gosa and Count Caazze, in a place well fortified at Landriano, which is a village within two miles of Millan. By reason of whose neighbourhood for that the companies that were within Millan could not go abroad, it was supposed an easier gard would be made of Pania, Moncia, Biagrassa, Marignan, Binasquo, Vigenena and Alexandria. After he had established these things, the xvij. of October he marched with fifteene hundred Swissers, the like number of Launceknights, and fixe thousand as well French as Gascoins, and with this strength he passed the riuer of Paw right ouer against the borough of Saint Iohn, with intention to abide there the comming of the Launceknights, of whom till then was arriued but a very slender number, and also another regiment of footmen of the same nation, which the French king had sent to leuie of new in place of the Swissers, who were almost gone away: but from this place he was driuen to send backe againe beyond Paw, Peter Nauarre, with the bands of footmen Gascons and Italians, to the succors of Biagrassa, before which towne garded by the Duke of Millan, Anthony de Lena was gone to incampe the eight and twentieth of October with foure thousand footmen, and seuen peeces of artilleries, taking his reason of that enterprife vpon the wants and ill prouisions of the towne: which being yeilded to him the second day by accord, he prepared to passe into Lomelino, to the ende to reconquer Vigenena and Nouaro: but being aduertised by good espiall, that Peter Nauarre was come with a greater supplie of forces, he returned backe againe to Millan. By which retiring he made easie to Peter Nauarre, to get againe Biagrassa, in which Francis Sforce bestowed better prouisions. It was now discerned that Monsieur Lawtrech deferred with great industrie and art, to depart: wherein albeit he alleaged that the thing that retayned him, was the tarying of the Launceknights, of whom one band being at last arriued vnder the charge of M. Vaudemont, he abode the comming of the others, and albeit he cunningly accompanied that excuse with a complaint of the slender prouisions of the Venetians, yet it was supposed that the onely cause that held him in deferring and lingring, was the money which he expected out of Fraunce: but the true and most strong reason was, that the French king hoping much in the peace, the negociation whereof was still continued with the Emperour, he gaue direction to Lawtrech to dissemble vnder slow proceedings, his aduancing on: whereupon also it came to passe that the king was not readie to satisfie his part of the pay of those Almains which were leuied in place of the Swissers, and much lesse the other bands that were before referred to go with M. Vaudemont. With these necessities or rather excuses M. Lawtrech sojourning at Plaisance, and his companies being bestowed betweene Plaisance & Parma, the difficultie which before was had of the Duke of Ferrara was now taken away. This Duke, like as M. Lawtrech as soone as he was entred into Italy, had solicited to enter into the League, which was a matter desired by the one side of the Duke in respect of the alliance that was offered to him with the French king, and on the other side the same retayning him, both for a distrust he had of the valour of the French, and for a suspicion he had least the king for the recouerie of his children, would at last accord with the Emperour: so neuerthelesse fearing the threats of Lawtrech, he was reduced conformable to the will of the French, demanding onely that the negociation of those affaires might be performed at Ferrara, for that he would in his owne person manage a cause that imported him so much. So that the Embassadors of the whole confederates went vp to Ferrara, together with Cardinall Cibo in the name of those Cardinals that were assembled at Parma: and the Duke being not a little moued to see Lawtrech aduance, after he had laboured to insinuate his reasons, and make them seeme good to Captaine George and Andrew de Burgo (these were within Ferrara and greatly honoured and entertayned by him) he left them satisfied of the necessitie that compelled him to compound, and at last he accorded, but with conditions well shewing either his industrie and knowledge how to negotiate, and that it was not in vaine that he sought to draw the The Duke of Ferrara entred into the league. action into his presence, or else by the conditions were well declared the great desire the other party had to draw him into confederation: wherein he entred with obligation to paie monethlie for the space of sixe monethes, sixe or ten thousand crownes according to the arbitration.

of the French king, who resolved afterwards vpon sixe thousand, with bond to deliuer to Monsieur Lawirech a company of hundred men at armes payed. On the other side, the confederates bound themselves to the protection of him & his estate: To deliuer to him Cosignolo (which a little before the Venetians had taken from the Spaniards) in exchange of the auncient and almost desolate Citie of Adria, which he demaunded with great importunity: To render vnto him the Pallaces which before time he had possessed in Venice and in Florence: To giue them sufferance to win vpon Albert Pio the Castell de Nouy standing vpon the confines of Manua, which he held besieged at the same time: That they would pay the frutes of the Archbishoprike of Milan to his sonne, who was Archbishop there, if the Imperials gaue no impediment to him to receiue them: The Cardinal Cibo in the name of those Cardinals who promised the ratification of the Colledge, bound the Pope to renew the inuestiture of Ferrara: To renounce the rights of Modena in regard of the purchase he had made of it with Maximilian: To cancell the obligations for the saltes: To consent to the protection which the confederates tooke of him and his: To promise by Bulls Apostolike to suffer as well him as his successours to possesse all that they now enjoyed: and that the Pope should create his sonne Cardinall, and bestow vpon him the Bishoprike of Modena vacant by the death of the Cardinall Rangon. To this confederation was added that Renée the daughter of king Lewis should be giuen in mariage to Hercules his eldest sonne, and to indue the mariage with the Duchy of Chartres and other honorable conditions. By the example of the Duke of Ferrara, concurring also the instance and solicitation of Monsieur Lawirech, the Marquis of Manua entred into the league, notwithstanding he had put himselfe before into the pay of the Emperour.

But at this time the confederate army was very weake, and lay many dayes without doing any thing, betwene Fuglinò, Montsalcon, and Benagno: and the Duke of Vrbino who had aduertisement of the restraining of his wife and children at Venice, being departed from the army against the commission of the Senate to iustifie his cause, was told by the way that they were deliuered, and that the Senate being well satisfied of his gouernement desired him to passe further: by reason of which aduertisement he returned to the army, in which the Swissers and the footebands of the Marquis were not payed: neither did the Venetians either there or in Lombardy, where they were bound to maintaine nine thousand footemen, aduance the third part: by which negligence accompanied with an vniuersall sparing of expences, the army was declined to great debility: in which weakenesse they retired afterwards to the territory of Lody and the confines thereof. And the Spaniards vpon the end of Nouember were gone vp towards Corneto and Toscanello, and the Launceknights remained at Rome, to whom the Prince of Orenge was rendered from Sienna, where he had made but small abode, for that he saw he could not be apt to render that gouernement as he thought he could haue done. Assuredly it was not to be doubted that if the Emperours army had aduanced, the Duke of Vrbino and the Marquis of Salussa had not retired with their forces to the wals of Florence, notwithstanding they had made many vaunts that to stop them from entring into Tuscane, they would plant a campe either within Ornatto or Viterba, or else vpon the territorie of Sienna towards Chiusa and Sartiano. But Monsieur Lawirech notwithstanding the bands of Launceknights were arriued, proceeding, for the expectation of the issue of the peace, so slowly as he was wont, made his abode within Parma: where albeit he had reduced into his power the Castles of that City, and had leuied vpon that towne and Plaisance and their territories about fiftie thousand duckats, yet it was beleued that he had an intention not onely to subdue to his deuotion and power Parma and Plaisance, but also to the end to draw Bologna to depend vpon the authority of his king, he had impression to conuert the iurisdiction of that City into the family of the Pepolies: but those deuises sorted to no effect by reason of the Popes deliuey. To the which albeit it seemed at the first that the Emperour was not to condescend readily (for since the newes of his calamitie he had temporised one whole moneth before he would resolve) yet both vnderstanding that Lawirech was passed into Italy, and also not ignorant of the king of Englands readinesse to the warre, he had dispatched into Italy the Generall of the gray-freers and Verio de Migliato, with commission to the Viceroy to debate that action. But the Generall finding the Viceroy dead before he arriued at Caietto, he was then to transfer the negociation of those affaires to Don Hugo de Moncado, to whom as the Emperours commission did also extend, so the Viceroy had orderly substituted him in his place vntill the Emperour Emperour should send some new addresse for the gouernement of the realme : and after the Generall had communicated with Don Hugo, he went to Rome, accompanied with Migliaro who was come out of Spaine with the like commissions. This businesse and negociation contained two principal articles, the one that the Pope should satisfie the army, to whom was owing a very great summe of money, and the other that the Pope being deliuered should not be adherent to his enemies. To which two articles were tyed hard conditions of ostages and townes for assurance : which difficultie as they drew a long tract and delay in the generall matter, so to make the issue easie, the Pope failed not by secret meanes to sollicite continually Monsieur Lawtrech to aduance, assuring him that as his intention was to promise nothing to the Imperials but by force, so also in that case, being once out of prison, he would obserue nothing so soone as his person were once transferred into a place of surety, which he forgot not to bring to passe in giuing to them the least oportunities he could : but in case he did accord, he besought him that the compassion of his aduersities and necessities might serue him for excuse. But during the solicitation of these matters, the ostages stole away secretly from Rome in the end of Nouember, not without the great indignation of the Lauceknights.

Long was the disputation vpon this matter, euen those being not of one opinion and aduise, in whom was most power to determine : for albeit Don Hugo had sent to Rome Serenon his Secretary together with the others, yet what for his ill nature and the little loue he bare to the Pope, he had no great inclination to his deliuey. The Generall bare a contrary affection, either in true regard of office and compassion, or for that he aspired to be Cardinall : and Migliaro impugned it as a matter most dangerous for the Emperour, and being not able to resist it, he went from them to Naples, of which impiety he bare a right punishment, for that at the first besieging of Naples leading the skirmish, he was slain with the shot of an harquebuz. The Pope omitted nothing that by industry might be made for his purpose, for he allured to his opinion, and won on his side the wit and tongue of Ierome Moron, the counsels of whom bare great authority with the Imperials in all their deliberations. The meane with the which he did allure him, was, that the Pope transferred the Bishoprike of Modena to his sonne, and corrupted him with the promise of certaine corne which he had at Cornetta, amounting in value to aboue twelue thousand duckats : he made fauourable the Cardinall Colonne with a lesse industry, both by promising him the legation of la Marqua, and also assuring him at such time as he came to visite him in the Castell, that he would principally acknowledge so great a benefit of him : wherein he forgot not to worke vpon the humor of the man, that he could not with a greater degree of glory & felicity, then to let all the world know that it was in his power to pull downe Popes, and being once embased and reuersed, that it was in his hand to remount them and raise them to their former estate of greatnesse. With which insinuations, of themselves full of compassion, and for the party that preferred them, of no lesse piety and deuotion, ioyned to the property of the Cardinal, being by nature haughty and glorious, inclined him to a ready disposition to deliuer the Pope, beleeuing that it would be as easie for the Pope in his liberty to forget so many wrongs and iniuries, as being prisoner he was apt with prayers and teares humbly to recommend vnto him his deliuerance. But all sorts of difficulties were somewhat eased by a new commission from the Emperour, by the which he gaue order that the Pope should be deliuered to his contentment as much as was possible, wherein it seemed he held it sufficient, that being in his liberty, he would be for the Confederates no more then for him. Neuertheless the matter that more then all other wrought for his deliuey, was, necessitie they had, which made them fearefull, least Monsieur Lawtrech would leade his army to the defence of the realme of Naples : which was a matter impossible vnlesse they were first assured of the payes due to them, in recompence whereof they would not suffer so many payes and great gaynes as they had made at the sametime. This necessitie to prouide for the payes, was also the cause why there was made lesse account to be assured of the Pope in time to come. At last after long negociation and practise, and many accidents and difficulties occurring, there was concluded in Rome the last of October, a resolution of accord with the Generall and with Serenon in the name of Don Hugo, who afterwards ratified it. These were the articles of the composition : That the Pope should be no party against the Emperour, neither in the affaires of Mislan, nor in the kingdom of Naples : That he should accord vnto the Emperour the Croysade in Spaine, &c. a tenth of the reuenues Ecclesiastike through all his dominions : That to assure the obseruation of these things, Ostia should remaine in the hands of the Emperour, and Civita vecchia which Andrew Dore had left to him before: That he should assigne ouer to him Civita Castellana, a towne which had refused to receiue the Imperials, Mario Perusquo procurer of the fiske being entered within the rocke by secret commission from the Pope, notwithstanding he made semblance of the contrary: That he should also deliuer ouer to him the rocke of Furly, and to put into his hands for ottages Hipolito and Alexander his nephewes, and till they were come from Parma the Emperour to be possessed of the Cardinals Pisani, Trinulco, and Gaddi, whom they led to the realme of Naples: That he should make present payment to the Launceknights of threescore thousand duckats, and to the Spaniards thirty and five thousand: That in so doing they should let him come out at liberty with all the Cardinals, and they to go out of Rome and out of the Castell, alwayes interpreting to liberty when so euer they should be conueyed in safety to Oruieto, Spolitto, or Perousa: That within fiftene dayes after his going out of Rome he should pay the like quantity of mony to the Launceknights, and afterwards the residue within three moneths to the Spaniards & Launceknights ioyntly, according to their shares and portions: which residue together with the summes payed amounted to more then three hundred and fifty thousand duckats. The Pope to haue the better meane to obserue these payments, and withall to deliuer himselfe of the heauy yoke of his imprisonment, had recourse to those remedies, which he would not apply before to keepe him out of that calamity: and in that necessitie he created for mony certaine Cardinals, of whom the most part for their doctrine or vertue were vnworthy so great honour. The same property of extremity forced him also to consent to the Article of the tenths through the realme of Naples, with power to alienate the goods of the Church: in so much that that which was dedicated to the seruice of God (so deepe and profound are his iudgements) was conuerted to the vse and entertayning of Heretikes, and that by the premissiō and consent of the Vicare of Christ: with which meanes hauing assured the payments of the money according to the times promised, he deliuered also for ottage for the surety of the souldiers, the Cardinals Cesio & Vrsini, who were led by the Cardinall Colonna to Grattasera: and so all things hauing their orderly expedition, and the resolution set downe that the tenth of December the Spaniards should accompany him into a place of surety, he fearing some variation either for the ill minde which he knew Don Hugo bare to him, or for any other accident that might happen, the night before he stole secretly out of the Castell in the closing of the euening, disguised in the attire of a Marchant: Lewis de Gonfaguo who was in the pay of the Emperour, taried for him in the medowes with strong company of harquebuziers, and with that gard did accompany him to Montefalcon, where dismissing almost all his bands of footemen, he was led by the same Lewis euen to Oruieto, into which City he entred by night without the company of any one Cardinall; an example worthy of consideration, and perhaps neuer hapned since the Church was great, that the Pope should in that sort fall from so great a puissance and reuerence, his eyes to behold the losse and sacke of Rome, his person to be turned ouer into captiuitie, and his whole estate reduced to the disposing of another, and within few moneths after, to be restored and reestablished in his former greatnesse: so great towards Princes Christian is the authority of the Pope, and the respect which mortall men do beare to him.

About this time which was immediatly after Monsieur Lawtrech was departed from Plaisance, Anthony de Leua sent out of Millan the bands of Spanish and Italian footemen, both to feede and refresh themselues, and also to recouer such places of the countrey as were most weake, to the end to open a way and commodity to bring to trafficke of victuals to Millan. These bands exchanging the captiuitie of the towne wherein they were kept strait, for the liberty of the countrey which gaue them scope, tooke that part of the countrey which is called Spesio. He sent out also at the same time and to the same ends Philip Troniello with eleuen hundred footemen and certaine light horsemen to Nonaro, in which City was a garrison of foure hundred footemen of the Duke of Millan: Troniello made his entry by the rocke which had bene alwayes holden in the name of the Emperour, and finding a very slender defence, he made himselfe maister of the towne, where making pillage of some of the footemen, and sending the residue to their houses, he kept within Nonaro, holding it for a retraite to ouerrun all the countrey thereabout. But there were part of the Launceknights got into Arona, and another part bestowed within Moraro, to whom for that the Duke had sent a strength of other footmen for the defence of Lomelina and the countrey.

country, they became impediments to Tornuello that he had no liberty to make his incursions safe off. In so much as that winter running forth in no other exploits then in many skirmishes, both parts made pillage aswell vpon their friends as their enemies, and in that liberty of warre ran ouer the whole country with an vniuersall ruine of all sorts of people. In like sort at that time were ioyned and assembled at Liurne the gallies of Andrew Dore, and fourteene French gallies, with sixteene gallies of the Venetians: who after they had receiued in Ranse de Cere, with three thousand footmen to put on land, they weighed anker the thirteenth of Nouember, to depart out of the port of Liurne: and albeit it was determined before, that they should make an inuasion vpon the Ile of Sicile, yet that resolution being innouated, they were conuerted to the enterprise of Sardignia, at the perswasion as was supposed of Andrew Dore, who haply had in his mind other conceptions. Monsieur Lawirech contented easily to embrace this enterprise, hoping that Sardignia being taken, the conquest of Sicile, would be of lesse difficulty: but whatsoeuer the cause was, the issue and effect was straunge and diuerse, for that falling into the rage of a very violent storme, they were seperated and turned to their seuerall hazards of the sea: one of the French gallies perished neare the shores of Sardignia, and foure of the Venetians being fore beaten with the fury of tempests, returned to Liurne: the other gallies of the French were driuen into Corsa by the rage of the winds, against which the skill of the Pilots had no force, and afterwards they reassembled with the foure Venetian gallies within Portopecchio: the other eight of the Venetians were caried by violence of sea and storme into Liurne: so that after many perils by storme and weather that enterprise stood dissolued, Andrew Dore and Ranse de Cere remaining in great discord together. But Monsieur Lawirech being within Reggia, as soone as he was aduertised of the Popes deliuary, he left the Castell of Parma to the officers of the Church, and went vp to Bologna, in which City he made his abode, expecting the comming of the last bands of the Launce-knights, who within few dayes afterwards arriued vpon the countries of Bologna, not in number of sixe thousand as was appointed, but only three thousand, which was farre lesse then was looked for. And neuertheless after they were arriued Lawirech sojourned twenty dayes within Bologna, attending the kings aduertisement for the last resolution touching the negociation of the peace. He vsed in the meane while a great diligence, wherein was also interposed the authority of the king of England, to draw the Pope to make an open protestation to cleaue to the confederates. But immediatly after he was arriued at Ornetta, like as there went to congratulate with him the Duke of Vrbino, the Marquis of Salussa, Federike Boffolo who died a litle after at Lody, and Lewia PIANO Commissary for the Venetians: so he besought them with great instance to retire their companies and bands of men of warre from the estate Ecclesiastike, assuring them that the Imperials had promised him to withdraw their forces, if they might discerne the armies of the Confederates to do the like. And in that compassion he wrote also a letter to Monsieur Lawirech tending to thanke him both for that he had done to purchase his deliuerance, and also for his counsell he gaue him to procure his liberty in any sort what so euer. He debated with him that his actions and industry had bene of so great consequence to constrain the Imperials to resolute vpon the deliuary, that he did no lesse acknowledge himselfe bound to the king and to him, then if his person had bene taken out of that calamity with the force of their armies: the ayde and proceedings of which he would willingly haue taried for, had not his necessity compelled him to abandon all temporising, the rather for that the conditions that were proponed were alwayes changed from ill to worse, the same testifying vnto him in cleare apparance that his fortune had left vnto him no other meane of deliuary, then by the benefit & operation of accord: which by how much more it was deferred & put off, by so much more the authority & estate of the Church was to fall into manifest reuersement: but the chiefeest matter that induced him to determine his aduersity by accord, was a hope he had conceiued that being at liberty, he should be made an apt instrument to sollicite a comon tranquility both with his king and the other Princes of Christendome: Such were at first his phrases and manner of speeches protested in simplicity and roundnesse, as became the office of a Bishop, but especially a Pope, who had receiued at the hands of God so seuerer and sharpe admonitions: neuertheless it was not long ere he returned to his naturall custome, having not left for the calamitie of his imprisonment, neither his subtleties wherein he could deeply dissemble, nor his couetousnesse which he could not auoyde: for when the Agents which Lawirech sent together with the Embassador of the king of England were come before him to sollicite him to confederate with the residue, he began to giue them diuerse aunswers, sometimes he dismissed them with hope, that he would be reduced conformable to their desires, and sometimes he would inferre excuses, that hauing neither men, money, nor authority, as it could not helpe them much to haue him to ioyne with them, so the action could not but be prejudiciall to himselfe, for that the Imperials would take occasion to vex him in many places: and sometimes he shewed a readie inclination to satisfie their demaunds, so farre forth as Monsieur Lawtrech did aduance; a matter which he desired greatly, to the ende the Launceknights were compelled to depart out of Rome, who going on consuming the remainders of that miserable City and all the countrey confining, would not be brought to giue ouer to hunt the pray which they found so sweete, but in their insolencies neither respecting their Captaines with obedience, nor forbearing ciuill tumult and mutinies amongst themselves, they demaund new payes.

But from the end of the yeare going before, and much more in the beginning of the yeare following, the industrie and solicitations of the peace began to appeare vaine, and by that reason the minds of Princes and states began to be so much more incensed and kindled, by how much lesse they saw themselves excluded from the hope of peace. For as all the difficulties were almost resolved, seeing the Emperour refused not to render to Francis Sforce the Duchie of Millan, and to compound with the Venetians, the Florentins, and the other confederates: so this rested onely in question, which of these two things should be put first in execution, either the withdrawing of the French army out of Italy, or the restitution of the kings children: the king would not be bound to reuoke his army out of Italy, if first he recovered not his children, offering to put hostages into the hands of the king of England, to assure the obseruation of the penalties wherein he was bound, if vpon the returning of his children he retired not presently his army. But the Emperour made instance to the contrarie, offering the same cautions into the king of Englands hands: wherein the question and disputation running, in whether of them it would be more comely or honest to trust the other: the Emperour sayd it was not reasonable to repose confidence in him who had once deceiued him. To the which the French Embassadors answered, that by how much more he pretended to be deceiued by their king, by so much lesse could their king repose confidence in him: they alleaged also that the Emperours offer to consign into the hands of the king of England the same assurances which their king offered, was neither equall nor indifferent: for that both the case varied in this, that the thing which the Emperour promised to do, was of farre greater consequence then the obligation of their king, and therefore not reasonable to be assured vnder the same cautions: and also they added, that the English Embassadors who had authority to bind their king to obserue what so euer the French king should promise, had no commission to tie him to the obseruation of the Emperours promises: and that their faculties and authoritie being limited and restrained to tearme and time, they could neither exceede nor anticipate. Vpon which disputation could soart no resolution, for that the Emperour had not the same inclination to the peace, which his Councell had, the rather for that he entertained himselfe with this opinion, that though by warre he should loose the kingdome of Naples, yet he should be apt to recouer it by rendring the children of Fraunce: yea the great Chauncellour, who long time before was returned into Spaine, was touched much by imputation, to haue troubled greatly the solicitations of the peace with cauillations and interpretations sophistical. At last the Embassadors of England and Fraunce following their commissions in case they dispayred of the accord, determined to demaund leaue of the Emperour to depart, and immediately afterwards to denounce warre against him: and with that conclusion being brought to his presence the one and twentieth of Ianuary, his Court being then at Burgos, and being followed with the Embassadors of Venice, of the Duke of Millan, and Florence, the English Embassadors demanded of him the foure hundred and fiftie thousand duckats which their king had lent to him, and fixe hundred thousand for the penalty imposed vpon him in that he had refused his daughter, together with fise hundred thousand for the pensions of the French king & for other causes. Which demands being proponed for greater iustification, all the Embassadors of the confederates asked leaue to depart away: but he told them he would take aduice of his Councell before he would aunswere that demaund, being in deede necessary afore they departed, that his Embassadors were in places of suretie. The Embassadors were no sooner departed his presence, then the Heralds of England and Fraunce entred to denounce war against him, which he accepted with a great shew of gladnesse and bravery: and in that hurrie he gaue present direction that the Embassadors of Fraunce, Venice, & Florence, should be conueyed to a towne fifteene leagues from the Court, where, being garded with archers and halberdiers, they were forbidden either to communicate or to write any thing what so euer: touching the Duke of Millans Embassador, he imposed vpon him a commaundement as vpon his subiect, that he should not depart from his Court: only on the behalfe of the Embassador of England there was nothing innouated.

Thus the negotiations and hopes of peace being broken, there remained only inflamed and kindled the cogitations and thoughts of the war: which as it declared it selfe in manifest preparation through all the regions of Italy, so to reduce to action and beginning the thing that as yet was but in apparance and shew, Monsieur Lawtrech pushed on by the king, but much more by the king of England, since the hope of peace began to diminish, was departed from Bologna the ninth of Ianuary, to march to the kingdome of Naples by the way of Romagnia and la Marqua. This way after long consultation was chosen by him contrary to the instance of the Pope, who desired vnder the occasion of his marching, to restore into Sienna, Fabio Petrucci and Montenouo: that election of the way was also against the instance of the Florentins, who to the ende to haue that army more ready to succour them in case the Imperials marched to inuade Tuscane, desired them to take the way of Tuscane: but Monsieur Lawtrech chose rather to make his entry into the realme of Naples by the way of Taranto, both for the commodity of that way to leade the artilleries, & also for the fertility of the countrey yeelding plenty of victuals: & lastly because he would not giue occasion to the enemies to make head at Sienna or in any other place, hauing a speciall desire to make his entry into the kingdom of Naples before he should encounter any impediment. And as soone as he was departed from Bologna, Iohn Sassatello rendred to the Pope the rocke of Imola, of which he had made himselfe Lord in the time of his imprisonment: and drawing neare afterwards to Rimini, Sigismund Malatesta son to Pandolfe, contracted with him to giue vp that City to the Pope, vpon condition that he should be bound to suffer his mother to enioy her dowry, to giue to his sister who was not married fixe thousand duckats, and to assigne for his father and for him two thousand duckats of reuenue: That Sigismund should depart immediatly out of Rimini, & his father to remaine there vntill the Pope had sent the ratification: and that in the meane while the rocke should abide in the hands of Guido Rangon his cosin, who being in the pay of the French king followed Monsieur Lawtrech to the warre. But the Pope deferring to accomplish these promises, Sigismund repossessed and occupied againe the rocke, though not without a great complaint of the Pope against Guido Rangon, as though he had secretly suffered him, and not without suspicion that Lawtrech and the Venetians had consented; seeming they had desired to keepe him in continuall difficulties. The suspicion of the Venetians grew vpon the cause of Rauenna, which the Pope as soone as he was deliuered out of the Castell hauing sent to summon and vemaund it of the Senate by the Archbishop of Siponto, he was answered with words generall, referring the matter to the arbitration of Iasper Contarin Embassador elect resident with him: for notwithstanding they had giuen assurance before that they retained it for the sea Apostolike, yet they had no desire to restore it: wherein they were moued as well by interests publike as priuate, for the commodity of that City, to augment their iurisdiction in Romagnia, fertill of it selfe in graine, and for the plenty of the countries adioyning, of great oportunitie to draw to Venice euery yeare good quantities of corne: besides many of the city of Venice had in that territory, great & goodly possessions. And touching Monsieur Lawtrech, the Pope doubted no lesse of him, for that besides many instances which had bene made to him before, Lawtrech notwithstanding he had sent to him after he was come from Bologna M. Vandemon Captaine generall of the Launce-knights, together with Monsieur Longueuille, whom the king sent to sollicite him earnestly to declare against the Emperour, could not obtaine so much of him, the Pope not refusing expressly, but vnder delays and excuses: and in that cunning he had offered to the French king to giue his consent, but vnder this condition that the Venetians should render to him Rauenna; a condition which he knew could not take effect, both for that it behoued not the Venetians to be induced to it by the kings perswasions, neither was it agreeable to the time that the king should make them his enemies, to satisfie the Pope. Moreouer he gaue no inclination to the instance which Lawtrech made to him to ratifie the accord made with the Duke of Ferrara, alleaging that it was a matter far vnworthy of him to approue in his lifetime, conditions made in his name whilst he was dead, and yet he alleaged that he would not refuse to contract with him. By reason whereof the Duke of Ferrara taking that occasion, made difficulty (notwithstanding the king and the Venetians had receiued him into their protection) to send to Monsieur Lawtrech the hundred men at armes and the mony which he had promised: wherein he stood vpon this obseruation, that doubting the issue of affaires, he would not be so much for the French king, as not to reserue place and meane to appease in all euent the minde of the Emperour, to whom he had excused himselfe by his necessity: besides, he entertained continually at Ferrara George Fronspergh and Andrew de Ruogo. Neuerthelesse the army for all this ceased not to aduance, which vnder the leading of Monsieur Lawtrech arriued the tenth of February vpon the riuier of Tromo, which separateth the estate Ecclesiastike from the kingdome of Naples.

But in Fraunce after aduertisement was brought that the Emperour had retained the kings Embassador, by his example the king caused the Emperours Agents to be restrained within the Castell of Paris, and all Marchants subiects to him to be stayed throughout all the regions of Fraunce. The king of England did the like by the Emperours Embassadour resident with him, whom he estoones redeliuered, after he was made to vnderstand that no restraint was made vpon his. And as the war was now published in France, in England, & in Spaine, so the French king stood vpon this request, that the first action might begin ioyntly in Flanders, in which resolution he sent certaine bands of souldiers to make incursions into that countrey. Neuerthelesse the Flemings for all those prouocations, made no emotion nor rising, vnlesse to defend themselves, for that the Lady Margaret of Austria laboring to auoid all occasions to enter war with the French king, would not suffer her people to issue out of their bounds and confines. But it was a matter grieuous to the king of England to haue war with the people of Flanders, for that notwithstanding there were to be confined to him as soone as they should be conquered, certaine townes promised before by the Emperour for assurance of the mony he had lent him, yet he held it also a matter no lesse prejudiciall as wel for his particular reuenues, as for the general interest & benefit of his realme, to breake the trade and entercourse of his Marchants with those prouinces: notwithstanding according to the obligations of the contract, as he could not apparantly refuse it, so yet he temporised and deferred it as much as he could, taking the aduantage of the capitulations, by the which it was lawfull for him to linger forty dayes after sommons made, to the ende to giue time to the Marchants to retire themselves. This excuse of his and inclination being both well knowne and approued by the French king, he solicited him that in place to make warre in Flanders, he would with an army by sea, inuade the sea coastes of Spaine, where he assured him he had right good intelligence. By which alteration of counsels it hapned at last, that as the king sending to the French king a Bishop to perswade him to giue ouer the enterprize of beyond the mounrs, and to increase and make strong the warre of Italy: so by his perswasions and his authority there was an order established, that for the space of eight moneths next ensuing, there should be done no vexation nor harmes by the French and English, vpon the countries of Flanders, nor any of the estates or subiects of the Emperour confining vpon those prouinces. Wherein for the more easie induction of the French king to condescend to this order, the king of England was bound to pay thirty thousand duckats monethly for the war of Italy, in which was determined the contribution promised before for sixe monethes.

Emperour.

But by how much were augmented and enforced the preparations of the warre, by so much and by the same degrees were kindled and redoubled the hatreds of both the Princes hauing especially interest in this warre: either of them tooke occasion to multiply iniuries and enforce quarrels, in which passions they contended no lesse with courage and malice, then with force & armes: for, whereas the Emperour about two yeres before in the towne of Grenado, when in like sort the peace was solicited betweene the French king & him, spake to the Presidēt of Grenoble the French Embassadour then, certaine words inferring that he would willingly put end to all quarrels betweene the king & him by a singular combat of both their persons, to the end to auoyd so much bloud and affliction of Christians and persons innocent: and whereas also since that the time he had confirmed the same words to the Herald the last time he signified the war to him, with this addition, that the French king had dealt with him villanously and cowardly in falsifying the faith he had giuen to him. These speeches being now deliuered ouer to the king, he thought he could

Not let them lie in silence without his ignominie and dishonor: and therefore albeit the challenge might better become the persons of knights, then to be performed by Princes of their estate and greatnesse, yet being no lesse guided with the enuie of the challenge, then desirous to purge and iustifie his honour, he caused to assemble the xxvij. of March in a great hall of his pallace at Paris, all his Princes, attending his person, all the Embassadours resident from the foraine, and the whole presence of his Court: and in that aspect and stately view of nobles & Embassadours, the king in his time disceded into the hall with a great pompe and furnishment of sumptuous attife, and no lesse honorably accompanied with a traine of Barons: where after he was with all ceremonies of state and dignitie set in his seate royall, he caused to be called before him the Emperours Embassadour who sued for his dispatch, for that it was determined that being conuied to Bayon, he should be deliuered at the same time that the other confederate Embassadours were set at libertie, who for that purpose were conducted to Bayon. When the Embassadour stood in his presence, the king spake to him, excusing & alleading that the Emperour had bene principally the cause of his restraining, for that in an example new & against humanity, he had kept retained his Embassadours & the agents of his confederates: but seeing he was now to go to Bayon to the end there might be an vniuersall deliuerie at one time, he desired him to carie from him a letter to the Emperour, and to deliuer a message from him of this tenor: That whereas the Emperour had said to his Herald that he had falsified his faith, he had said falsely, & that how many times he had spoken it, so manie times had he lied, and that for answere to the end not to linger the triall of their quarrels, he would assigne him the place where they might together performe the combate. But the Embassadour refusing either to carie the letter, or to deliuer the message, the king said he would send to signifie no lesse to him by a Herald: he added also to the message, that albeit he was not ignorant that the Emperour had spoken words against the honor of his brother the king of England, yet he would make no mention of that, knowing that the said king was wel able to deale in his owne defence: & yet if through the indisposition of his body he had any lawfull impediment, he offered to present his person to hazard for him. Not many daies after the king of England gaue the same defiance, and with the same solemnities and ceremonies: the same somewhat offending the honor of the Princes of Christendome, who in their rage of malice could not forbear to defile their minds with such passions, hauing running amongst them a warre of so great importance & so much preiudiciall to all the common wealth of Christendome. But amid these great heates and furies of warre & armes, the order of our storie draweth into discou:le some report of the king of England touching the refusing of the Lady Katherine of Aragon.

The said king had to wife the said Ladie Katherine daughter to Ferdinand and Elizabeth For what occasion the king of England refuseth his wife the Lady Katherine of Aragon. kings of Spain; a Queene worthy of such parents, and for her vertues and good behauiour vniuersally beloued and reuerenced of the whole estate of the realme. In the time of the father of that king, she was married to Prince Arthure eldest sonne to the Crowne, but being almost no sooner married then she was made a widow by the hasty death of her husband, she was estoones by the consent of her father and father in law, married to Prince Henry the yonger brother, but with dispensation of Pope Iulio, in regard of the affinitie that was neare and strait: of which marriage was procreated a sonne, who died immediatly, and afterwards there succeeded no other generation of children then a daughter: the same giuing occasion to the Court to murmure, that for the vnlawfulness of the marriage, being not dispensable in the first degree, the crowne was by miracle deprived of issue male. This occasion was aptly taken and managed by the Cardinall of Torke, who knowing the kings desire to haue sons, began to perswade him, that refusing his first wife who iustly was not his wife, he might dispose himself to marrie another: wherein much lesse that he was induced by conscience, or of a simple desire to bring issue male to the king, but he was caried in that action with a secret opinion that in drawing his king to embrace a second marriage, he might haply induce him to fix his affection vpon the Lady Renea daughter to king Louis; a matter which was desired by him with no small industrie and ambition: for that knowing he was generally hated of all the Realme, he sought to prepare remedies for his owne estate against all accidents that might happē both during the life & after the death of the king: he took also one strong Inducemēt to that practise vpon the great malice he had conceiued against the Emperour, for that neither in demonstrations nor with effectes, he did not satisfie his incredible pride: neither did he doubt for the great authority the king and he had with the Pope, to dispose him to publish iudicially the diuorce. The king opened readily his eares to this counsell, not that he was caried with these ends which the Cardinall of Yorke had fashioned: but according to the opinion of many) he tooke the chiefeft reason of his inducement vpon the loue he bare to a lady of the Queenes traine whom he determined to make his wife. In which course of loue and chusing, the king was so secret and priuate, that his pretence was neither knowne to the Cardinall nor communicated with others, but when it beganne to burst out either into knowledge or into coniecture, the Cardinall of Yorke that first insinuated the motion of diuorce, had no meane to dissuade him from it, and lesse authority to leade him in another counsell then such as he had perswaded him before. But the king seeking to establishe his conscience vpon good grounds, searched out of the opinions of Diuines, Lawyers, and men religious, by whom he was answered that his first mariage was not found nor lawfull, and vpon their learning iustified it for such. Therefore as soone as the Pope was deliuered out of prison, he dispatched Embassadours to induce him to enter the league, and to labour according to the ordenaunce giuen for the restitution of Rauenna: but the chiefeft end and industrie of these Embassadours consisted, to obtaine facultie to proceede in the diuorce, which he sought not by way of dispensation, but by declaration that the mariage with Catherine was of none effect. The king beleeued that the Pope, for that his estate was weake in forces, and his person voyd of reputation, and hauing no stay nor support vpon the puissance of other Princes, and lastly in recordation of the great fauours receiued of him for his deliery, he would not be vnease to consent to the thing whereunto he was deeply bound by so many obligations.

To which the king adioyned the consideration of the Cardinals credite; whom he knew for that he had alwayes fauoured his affaires and afore him the doings of Pope Leo, he was very gracious and mighty with the Pope. And to cut off from the Pope all excuses of feare for any offence that might happen to him by the Emperour being sonne of the sister of Catherine, and the better to allure him with surety, the king offered to wage for his safety a gard of foure thousand foote-men; an offer which the Pope harkened vnto, and in that inclination though he considered the importance of the matter, and the infamy that might redound to him, yet being at Oruietta and as yet in the condition of a Newter betweene the French king and the Emperour, and of little confidence with either of them, and in that regard esteeming much to preserue the amity of the king of England, he had no stomacke to impugne the kings demand. And albe it he declared in shewes & demonstrations a ready desire to be agreeable to the king, yet holding things in suspence for the difficulty of the meanes that were proponed, he kindled so much the more the hope and importunity of the king and his Agents, which well-spring or originall of many aduersities, tooke augmentation and increasing dayly.

As soone as the Pope had giuen audiēce to Monsieur Vaudemont & Monsieur Longueville, and answered them with words generall, he dispatched to the king together with Longueville, the Bishop of Pistoia, to signifie vnto him, that being without mony, without force, without authority, and wretched by all other priuations, it could little profit the Confederates to haue him to declare: That only he might do a better office to sollicite a peace, to which end he had giuen him commission to go to the Emperour to exhort him with words sharpe and rigorous to embrace it; a matter which the king would not consent vnto, not for that he remained ill contented of the Popes neutrality, but that he doubted the negociation was extended to some further matter: neither the Emperour complained that the Pope in so great a dissention stood indifferent.

But now at such time as Monsieur Lawtrech marched and came on, and direction giuen that the armies by sea should do the like, there were found many difficulties to giue impediment to the enterprise: for, the twelue gallies of the Venetians which before were reduced to Liorno, hauing suffered many vexations in the exploit of Sardinia, both by the rage of the sea, and for want of victuals, departed the tenth of Februarie from Liorno to go to Corfu to readresse and returnish their wants: Neuerthelesse the Venetians promised in their place, to send twelue other gallies to ioine with the French army by sea, which was not without their difficulties for the perplexities they had passed, and for the controuersies happened betweene Andrew Dore and Ranſe de Cere: by reason of which accidents albe it Ranſe remayned sicke at Pisa, yet it was set downe that Andrew Dore, who with all the gallies was come to the shores of Liorno, should with his flecte of gallies set his course for the Realme of Naples: and Ranſe with

The other French gallies and the foure of Frear Bernardine, together with the foure of the Venetians, which were all assembled into one fleete, should prepare for the enterprife of Sicile. But Andrew Dore with his eight gallies accompanied with eight otler of the French kings, crossed saile and retired to Genes, taking this excuse, that it was necessarie both for him and his gailies to take some rest, either for that such was the true ground and occasion, or else the interestes of the affaires of Genes caried his mind with an inclination to new thoughts: for, where the Genowayes had demaunded of the king to suffer them to gouerne freely of themselves, and for that gift of libertie did offer him two hundred thousand duckets; the king refusing to gratifie a demaund so farre from the common weale of his affaires, it was beleeued that Andrew Dore either the author or at least the furtherer of these demaunds, held it not reasonable that the king should accomplish the conquest of Sicile, if first he did not consent to the libertie of the Genowayes. There was also brought in question another cause of controuersie which was of importance: for, the king hauing dismembred the Citie of Sauona from the Genowayes, it was doubted least most part of the enter-course and traffike of Marchants, being transferred in short time to Sauona in fauour of the king, and for the oportunitie and situation of the place, and that the king making there his staple, and building vessels for his seruice, the Citie of Genes would stand depriued of most part of her inhabitants and plentie of riches: Andrew Dore employed all the arte and industrie he could to induce the king to restore Sauona to the auncient subiection of the Genowayes.

But a farre better successe and felicitie followed the enterprife of Lamirech, then the expeditions of the sea, for that as soone as he was arriued at Ascoly, and had sent Peter Nauarre with his footebands to Aquila, Ieramo and Iulia Nona were rendered to him at the first brute of his comming. The Marquis of Salussa by the same direction followed him with his regiments by the way of Lionessa: and last of all succeeded Horatio Baillon with an hundred and fiftie light horsemen, and foure thousand footmen Florentines of the blacke bands. The Venetians had also promised to send him without the person of the Duke of Vrbis, foure hundred light horsemen & foure thousand footmen of those bands which they had in the towne of Rome: and in supply of the others which they were bound to administer and employ to the warres of Naples, they had accorded to pay three and twentie thousand duckets for euery moneth: assuring also that for the regard of the nauie at sea, they would aduaunce xxxvj. vessels to giue aide to the enterprife of Sicile.
Neuerthelesse they gaue manifest signes that they were wearie of the burthen, & proceeded verie slowly in the matter of expenses, by whose example the French king did the like: seeing at the same time complaints were come from Monsieur Lamirech that the assignation for an hundred and fifty thousand crownes monethly for the charges of the warre which the king had made to him at his departure out of Fraunce, of which was to receiue aboute two hundred thousand crownes, was reduced to threescore thousand crownes onely the moneth, and that but for three monethes to come; a matter which as it brought no small grieue and dispaire to him, so he burst out in complaints against the king and his omission and carelesnesse, as not to be moued neither with reason, nor with his faith, nor with the memory and example of his proper damage. This was one especiall point of his grieue and complaying, that where the king had conuerted to the en-terprife of Fontarabie his treasures and forces which ought to haue serued him for the defence of Millan, it was the cause to make him to loose the whole estate and Duchy of Millan. The en-terprife of Aquila succeeded happily; for that as Peter of Nauarre made his approches, so the Prince of Melfa went out of it, & for the French king, did enter the son of the Count Monteiro. In like sort the Lanceknights of the Venetians tooke by composition Ciuitella, a litle towne, but well fortified, and hath his situation seuen miles beyond Tronto. The taking of this towne was furthered by the preuentio of two hundred harquebuziers Spanish who were sent for the defence of it.
All Abruzza followed the example of Aquila, & the whole residue of the realme of Naples had done the like, had not the Imperiall army issued out of Rome. This army after passion of many difficulties & tumults, & the souldiers fully satisfied of all their payes from the time of the Popes deliuery, marched out of Rome the xvij. day of February; a day which had bin most ioyfull & of speciall respiration to the long miseries of the wretched people of Rome, if their calamities which they supposed to be ended by the departure of the Launceknights, had not estsoones recontinued in a new course by the Abbot of Farsa and others of the familie of the Vrsins, who entering the

did for many dayes many great insolencies. By reason of these calamities, gricuous for their continuance, and lamentable for their wretched succession, descending from one enimie ill, to another that was worse, the Citie of Rome was not onely made naked of a great part of her inhabitants, with the desolation of many houses and pallaces, but also it stood rent and defaced, in image of worthie and auncient presence, of pillars representing the monument and memorie of great Princes and conquerors, of many singular stones, for their value precious, and for their raritie greatly esteemed, and lastly of many ornaments of antiquitie, such as drew delight to the eyes of the beholders, and gaue great reputation to the towne that so long had preferred them. Neuertheless the Lanceknights continuing in their mutinies, & wold not depart without imprest for two payes, where the Spaniards were satisfied with more facilitie, the Pope desirous to purge the towne of such a contagion, was constrained to furnish them with twentie thousand duckets more, which he payed vnder colour to deliuer the two Cardinals hostages: and afterwards they retained twentie thousand more as from the people of Rome: and albeit it was doubted that this pay was made by the Pope, yet it passed vnder that name to the end to giue lesse occasion of complaint to Lawirech, who notwithstanding complained not a litle, that the Pope with that money was the cause that the Imperiall armie went out of Rome, by which action his victorie which was before manifest & certaine, was now reduced to doubtfull termes and vncertaine euent of warre. There issued out of Rome according to computation, fiftene hundred horse, foure thousand footmen Spanish, two or three thousand footmen Italians, and fife thousand Launceknights: so great diminution had the plague brought vpon that nation.

By the remouing of the Imperials out of Rome, Monsieur Lawirech who otherwise wold haue taken the straight way to Naples, was constrained to fetch a circuite more long by Powilla along the sea coast: he had some reason to take that march, for the difficultie to draw his artilleries if in these places he should haue found impediment of enemies to passe the mountaine: but much more to make prouision of victuals, least he fell into want if he haply were driuen to plant the course of his victorie before the wals of Naples: so that partly by compulsion, & partly vpon those reasons inducing, he tooke his way to Ciuita de Chiora the capitall towne of the furthermost Abruzz: for the water of Pescaro makes separation of the hithermost Abruzz from the furthermost. There did render vnto him Sermonio with many other townes of the countrey, and in that propertie of inclination, either for affection they bare to the French name, or for hatred to the Spaniards, there was almost no towne which sent not out at least xxv. and xxx. miles before, to yeeld themselves. And yet because he wold passe with a greater suretie and stabilitie, he forbore to aduance with that diligence which both by his felicitie he might, and by his fortune was offered. And it was beleueed, to the end to gather in safetie during the moneth of March, the reuenue of the tribute of Powilla amounting to fourescore thousand duckets, and was leauied in fife townes, that he would send thither Peter Nauarre with his regiments, for whose disagreements and controuersies which Monsieur Lawirech was compelled to endure, there was litle good order in the armie. But being departed from Gualt, and vnderstanding that one part of the enemies to whom was ioyned the Prince of Melfe with a thousand of those Lanceknights which the Viceroy Don Charls had brought out of Spaine, and two thousand Italian footmen come out of Aquila, was arriued at Nocero fortie miles from Termini drawing towards the sea: and another part of the enemies to be passed to Campo Basso which is thirtie miles from Termini vpon the common or ordinarie way to Naples: he sent out before Peter Nauarre with his regiments of footmen, and went himselfe the last day of Februarie to Sera within twelue miles of Termini, from whence the fourth day of March he arriued at Saint Senero. But Peter Nauarre according to the addresse that was giuen him, passed on, and in one day entred within Nocero, and in another he got into Foggio, making his entrie at one gate when the Spaniards who were retired to Troya, Barletta and Manfredonia, would haue entred by the other. The conquest of these places serued greatly for the reuictualling of the armie.

The contents of
armie.

The armie that was with Monsieur Lawirech contained in the whole foure hundred launces, and twelue thousand footmen, men not verie well prepared and trained for the warre: but there were to ioine to him, the Marquis of Salussa who marched before all the others, the regiments of the Venetians, and the blacke bandes of the Florentines, whom Lawirech desired not a litle to ioine with him: for that bearing a name to be a Colonie of footmen as apt & resolute for assaults as anie

As any infanterie that then was in Italy, they serued as good examples and whetters on of the residue of his armie, wherein were bodies strong and stable for the fight. But when he vnderstood by the report of Peter Nauarre whom he sent to take the view, that there were within Troya and the confines about it, fise thousand Almains, fise thousand Spaniards, and fiftene thousand Italians: and that for the bitternesse of the cold that then was, he was not able to keepe the field, Monsieur Lawtrech the eight of March went to Nocero with all the footmen and light horsemen, and the Marquis of Salusso newly arriued, put into Foggia with the men at armes and a thousand footmen: Vpon which dispersing of the armie, Monsieur Lawtrech gaue it out that he would giue battell if occasion offred, aswell for manie reasons genetally mouing, as chiefly for that the assignations which the king had giuen to him, being withdrawne and diminished, he was not able long time to sustaine the expences of the warre: he left within Saint Seueno with a slender gard all the Embassadours and other natures of people that were not apt for the warre; and so he seemed to be there in furetie, without anie necessitie or compulsion to giue battell but vpon aduantage, neither had he want of victuals, though he lacked meale. Afterwards he issued out the xij. of March, and tooke the field three miles beyond Nocero and within fise miles of Troya; for, Nocero and Barletta which are distant one from another xij. miles, are not further from Troya then eight miles. The Imperials who had now assembled together all the companies that were within Manfredonia and Barletta, and had plentie of victuals within Troya, issued out to skirmish, though all the bands of footmen except the Launceknights, were not paid: and the day following, they tooke the field without artilleries, in a strong place vpon the hill of Troya; but Lawtrech the xiiij. day enuironed that hill on the part aboue that looketh to the South drawing towards the mountaine, and turning his face to Troya, he began to ascend, where after he had wonne the hill in a hot skirmish, he encamped in a place that commanded them, from whence he compelled them with his artilleries to retire some into the towne and some backe againe: so that both the towne of Troya and the Imperiall armie remained betweene the French armie and Saint Seueno: which both made yneasie the passage of succours that might haue come to Naples, and also stopped for the most part the victuals that might haue bene brought to them: notwithstanding they consumed not much, as being discharged of all vnprofitable mouths and the generall baggage and traine of the armie: and on the other side was stopped by them the traffike of victuals that passed from Saint Seueno to the French campe, besides that they held in danger Saint Seueno, which they might assault with part of their people and the French not to perceiue it.

The armies lying incamped in this sort, that is to say, the Frenchmen beyond Troya towards the mountaine, and the Imperials on this side towards Nocero at the backe of the towne, and the most part of the places thereabouts being commanded by the French, they remained there in that order vntill the xix day, all the nights being spent in alarmes, and the daies running out in skirmishes, of one of which was taken prisoner Martio Colonne. The Imperials oftentimes cut off the victuals that went from Saint Seueno and Foggia to the French armie, which for that impediment felt some incommoditie & had need of a strong eskort or conduit to defend the victuallers. Here the Imperialists drew into counsell what was to be done, amongst whome the Marquis of Gnaft perswaded to offer the battell, seeing the French armie went on increasing daily, and theirs was more & more weakned. But the counsell of Captaine Alerfon caried most authoritie, who proued by reasons and arguments that there was more hope of the victorie in temporising and suffering the time, then by aduancing to referre things to the arbitration of fortune. The xix. day the Imperials retired within Troya, to eschue the continuall vexations of the artilleries of the enemies: but hauing afterwards rampared their place against the furie of the shot, they repaired thither againe in good season, and returned in euill time within Troya: but the xxj. day at the appearing of the morning, they brake vp and went towards the mountaine to Ariano, making a great daies march: they found within Troya a great quantitie of victuals farre surmounting that which the Frenchmen beleeued before, and hauing cut off all passages by the which victuals might be brought them, they made to them selues a vaine promise of the victorie. It was then they leauied and brake vp, either to draw the French into a place where they might find want of victuals, or for an intelligence they had, that the day following they expected in their campe the blacke bands, who as they marched being lodged in Aquila, had in their insolencie sacked that Citie, not being prouoked by iniurie, or other occasion. The xxij. day Lawtrech incamped at Lyonelle vpon the riuer of Ophanto, which the Latyns call Aufidium, six miles from Ascoly, hauing sent the black bands & Peter Nauarre with his regiment & two Cannons, to take Melfa: where after they had battred a small breach, the Gascons presented theselues to the wall, & the black bands with more furie then good direction of their Captains did the like: wherein the one nation seru- ing with an emulation of the other, and they both being well beaten in flanke by small shot, the assault was repulsed with the death of manie Gascons and threescore of the black bands: and the same furie continuing, they ran the like fortune the next day in another assault which they gaue, after the batterie had executed: but in the night there came to the campe a succour of artill- eries sent by Monsieur Lawtrech, with the which hauing made two great batteries the morning following, the paisants within Melfa began in their feare to draw into tumult: by which accident the souldiers being in number six hundred, and troubled in their ordinarie office of seruice by the mutinie of the paystants which still redoubled into worse degrees, they abandoned the de- fence of the place: in somuch as the whole campe entring where no resistance was made, they turned their felicitie into bloud, slaying in their furie all the paystants and men of the towne: onely the souldiers retired into the Castle together with the Prince, who not long after yeilded simply as was said, to discretion notwithstanding they pretended that their liues were excepted. The Prince was saued with a verie few of his followers, all the others were put to the sword, contain- ing three thousand bodies, and the towne deliuered vp to sacking. In the towne was found great store of victuals to the great commoditie and comfort of the French men, who, for their hard prouision, suffred no small wants in Pomilla. The xxiiij. day the Spaniards departed from Ariano and incamped at Tripaldo, which is xxv. miles from Naples, vpon the high way, and xl. miles from Ofanto, with whom ioyned the Viceroy, the Prince of Salerno, and Fabricio Marano with a regiment of three thousand footmen and twelue peeces of artilleries: it was thought also that Captaine Alarson issued out of Naples with two thousand footmen to succour Dogania: but Lawtrech staied vpon the territories of Ofanto to make great prouisions of monie, and had all his companies incamped betweene Ascalo and Melfa: and since the accident of Melfa, were rendred to him Barletto, Trany & all the townes thereabouts except Manfredonio, wherein was a strength of a thousand footmen. In this successe and rendring of townes, he sent out Peter Nauarre with foure thousand footmen to take the Rock of Venosa, which being garded and va- liantly defended by two hundred & fiftie Spanish footmen, he tooke it at last to discretion, and retaining the Captaines prisoners, he sent away the others without weapons: and there he had giuen order that the reuenue of the tribute of Pomilla should be receiued for him, which for the troubles and impediments which the warre brought, answered not the value and price that were wont to rise by it. In this place the commissarie Pysano with the Venetian regiments containing about two thousand footmen, came to Monsieur Lawtrech, who in this sort was busied to assure himself of victuals and prouisions; a matter which was made more easie to him, after he had got into his power Ascoly by the meane of the Venetian regiments: and at this time rising into cou- rage by the happy euent of his affaires, he vrged the Pope with haughty words to declare himself for the league: who notwithstanding they of Viterba would not before receiue him for their go- uernour (of which Ostianian Spirsto was the cause) yet being afterwards ranged and made plia- ble through feate, he had transported his Court to Viterba. And Vespasian Colonno being dead at the same time, who ordained by his testament that Isabell his onely daughter should be maried to Hipolito de Medicis, the Pope vnder that colour got possession of all those places which he held in the territories of Rome, notwithstanding Askario pretended that they appertained to him by the ceasing of the line masculine of Prosper Colonno. About this time Monopoly was ren- dred to the Venetians, for whom, and to whose vse according to the last couenants made with the French king, were gotten all those ports of the Realme of Naples which they possessed before they were ouerthrown by king Louis the xij. in Guizaradadda.

By reason of these prosperities of the French, the Duke of Ferrara was induced to send his sonne into France, to accomplish and giue perfection to the mariage; a matter which he had de- ferred before by great indoltrie, refusing with the same pollicie to be Captaine of the League. But the Emperour who sent no men out of Spaine to releue the dangers of the kingdome of Na- ples, had giuen ordenance that the Duke of Brunswick should passe out of Germany into Italy with

New supplies of Launceknights for the succour of that kingdome. These supplies were prepared with so much the more care and diligence, by how much they vnderstood the necessity to rescue it was great for the coming on of Monsieur Lawirech. But to the end the aduancing of those supplies should not trouble the hope of the victory, it was agreed by the consent of the king of England, the French king, and the Venetians, that the Lord Francis of Saint Poll, descended of the house of Burbon, should passe into Italy with foure hundred launces, fūe hundred light horsemen, fūe thousand footemen French, two thousand Swissers, and two thousand Launceknights, of Italy. This army was appointed to follow them if they passed to Naples, and otherwise, to make the warre vpon the Duchy of Millan, adioyning to them the regiments of the Venetians and the bands of Francis Sforce. For the defrayment of this army, was set downe a pay of threescore thousand duckats monethly: of which the king of England was to contribute euery moneth thirty thousand: and the Venetians had resolved in the counsell of Pregati, to wage ten thousand footemen.

Monsieur S. Poll appointed to the warres of Italy.

In this time the inhabitants of Millan were reduced to an extreame and miserable subiection for the intollerable exactions imposed by Anth. de Lena: who the better to provide for the payes of his souldiers, had drawne into his owne hands all the victuals of the City, and hauing bestowed them in publike store-houses and Garners, he sold them in his owne name at what rate or price he would, the inhabitants being driuen to buy them according to his law, or else to die for hunger: and yet the money rayfed vpon that extreame meane, being not sufficient to pay the Launceknights that were lodged in houses, they were suffered to make dayly raunfomes of the maisters and owners, of whom such as would yeeld no money, were kept in chaynes and irons: And because to auoyd so great cruelties and intollerable importes, many did fly continually out of the city notwithstanding the rigour of the commandements and diligence of the warders, there was confiscation of goods published against such as were absent, who were so many in number, that to auoyd the trouble to set them downe in writing, they caused them to be put in print. The Nobles and best sort of Citizens such as remained there, were seene in their garments poore and ragged, and in their countenances astonished and desolate, expressing by a lamentable compassion, the calamities they endured, & their pallsaces and places of best frequentation were reduced to ruines & rubbege, such as were heauy testimonies of the cruelty of the Spaniards. And yet all things succeeded happily to him that was the causer of all these miseries: for where Captaine Mus lay incamped at Lecqua with six hundred footemen as a souldier of the League, and hauing taken away the barkes to the end the Spaniards that were within Coma, could not rescue it by the way of the lake, Anth. de Lena with the bands of footmen that were within Nonaro issued out of Millan and incamped fūteene miles beyond with the Launceknights: and after he had taken the rocke of Olgina standing vpon the shores of Adda, which Captaine Mus had taken before, he sent Philip Troncello with the bands of footmen Spanish & Italians, to giue succors to Lecqua standing vpon the other shore of the lake, where Captaine Mus with the ayd of the souldiers whom he had drawne from the Venetians and Duke of Millan, and with certaine peeces of artilleries from the Venetian campe, had taken and fortified all the passages, of themselves containing many difficulties, for the steepenesse of the mountaines and other places of hard access. But the Imperials who tooke the mountaine opposite that commaundeth Lecqua, after they had made many vaine attempts to passe in many places, at last they forced that place whete the Venetian souldiers garded; companies whom the Captaine either for that he had lesse confidence in their vertue, or at least to bestow them where was least danger, had dispersed into places most steepe & inaccessible. Captaine Mus with his souldiers and artilleries, was estoones remounted vpon the barkes and saued himselfe, not without suspicion that the Venetians had made a light defence to gratify the Duke of Millan, to whom it was nothing agreeable that he tooke Lecqua. And afterwards to the end to cary by accord that which he could not win by armes, he changed both the seruice & pay wherein he was, and goeth to the Imperials, obtayning of Anth. de Lena by way of accord for reward of that infidelity, both Lecqua and many other places: and he got of Ierom Moron, who by letters & intelligence had bin the author of this practise, cession of his rights. By reason of this accord Anth. de Lena who before had bin much afflicted by hunger, was releued both with victuals & mony: for the Captaine who aspiring to high and great things, tooke afterwards vpon him the title of Marquis, payed thirty thousand duckats, and sent into Millan three thousand sackes of corne.

During all this while Monsieur Lawtrech marched towards Naples, and by the third day of Aprill was come to the Rocke Manarda, hauing left for the gard of Pouilla (where chiefly Manfredonia held for the Emperour) fiftie merrie armes, two hundred light horsemen, and xv. hundred or two thousand footmen, all bands of the Venerians. But the Imperials who had followed in abandoning all the countrey thereabout, to lay onely for the defence of Naples and Caietta, and to cut off victuals from the enemies, after they had sacked Nola, and caried to Naples all the victuals that were within Capua, they encamped vpon the hill of Saint Martin, and the day following entred within Naples with ten thousand footmen Spanish and Launceknights, hauing decassed the bands of the Italians, except sixe hundred who were vnder Fabricio Alaramo, for that Sero Colomno was gone to Abruzzza with his bands of footmen. Naples waserie naked of inhabitants, for that almost all men of qualitie, and such to whom their fortune had yet left anie meane, were retired into Ischia, Capria, and other Ilands confining. It was supposed that there was within the towne sufficient prouision of corne for more then two moneths, but for flesh and other natures of victuals, the quantities were very small. Capua, Nola, Aceras Auerfa, and all the places therabout yeilded to Monsieur Lawtrech, who remained foure daies with his armie in the Abbey of Aceron which is seuen miles from Naples. He had aduanced and did still march with a verie slow pace, to the end to tarie for the victuals which could not obserue the speed of the armie for the impediment of fowle waies and raines, such as had made all the countrie full of waters: besides, it behoued him to make great prouisions of victuals, for that the bruter an that his armie according to the corruption of the discipline of warre at this day, contained more then twenty thousand horsemen, and fourescore thousand footmen, of whom two parts were men vnprofitable for seruice. From this place he sent out to the enterprise of Calabria, Simon Roman with an hundred and fiftie light horsemen, and fwe hundred Corfikans not payed, but were come from the Campe of the Imperials: and Philip Dore who with eight galleyes of Andrew Dore and two ships was come into the waters of Naples, both tooke a ship laden with graine, and with his artilleries draue the Imperials from Magdelaine: and albeit with the same valour and fortune he tooke a litle afterwards two other ships laden with graine, and brought vpon the enemies many other discommodities, yet his gallies onely were not sufficient to hold the port of Naples wholly besieged: for the helpe whereof Lawtrech solicited that the sixteene galleyes of the Venetians might be ioyned with the flecte of Philip. These after they were with flow diligence assembled in order at Corfu, were now come vp to the port of Trany: but notwithstanding the Cities of Trany and Monopoly were already rendred to the Venetians, yet those gallies preferring their particular profits before foreine interests, though they knew that all things depended vpon the victorie of Naples, yet they were slow to aduaunce, to the end to take also Pulignano, Otronto, and Brinduso. The seuenth day of Aprill Lawtrech encamped at Chusiano within fwe miles of Naples; and the same day the light horsemen of the Imperials whose celeritie and diligence appeared farre greater then the negligence of the Frenchmen tooke from the French a great quantitie of victuals; a prouision which they were not well furnished of. They had also fortified Saint Hermon, which is in the top of the mount Saint Martin, and commaunds much the towne of Naples, to the end to take from the Frenchmen all commodities to vex it with their artilleries: and for that they were maisters of that mountaine, they gaue impediment to the French to approach neare the most partes of the Citie. The Frenchmen tooke some hope of good euent by the discords that were amongst the enemies, of whom the Marquis of Guast for some particular quarell, hurt the Count Potenza and slue his sonne. But the one and twentieth day the French armie came to Casoria within three miles of Naples vpon the way of Auerfa: and the same day was embraced of both parties a skirmish vnder the walles of Naples, wherein was slaine Atigliato, he who had impugned by all his induttrie the deliuerie of the Pope, for the which he was the bearer of the Emperours Commission to his Captaines. The two and twentieth day the armie encamped within a mile and an halfe of Naples, where Monsieur Lawtrech forbad his souldiers to skirmish, as a matter vnprofitable to the estate of the seruice: there was Pozzolo rendred to him. At last, being the last but one of Aprill, he brought his armie verie neare the Citie of Naples, and encamped betweene Poggio Royall, which is a stately house for pleasure, and builded by Alfonso of Aragon the second, when he was Duke of Calabria, and the hill of Saint Martin: the campe was extended euen within halfe a mile of Naples, & the person of Monsieur Lawtrech lay lay somewhat before Poggia Royal at the palace of the Duke de Monte Alto: in this place he had made great fortification, stretching out the face of his lodging towards the way of Capua. It was a place of verie good situation, and aptly serving to cut off from them of Naples the commoditie of the water conduits that come from Poggia Royal. He made account to plant another lodging somewhat before that, about the hill that is beneath the mount Saint Hermo, to the end to cut off more comodities from those of Naples, and to vex the towne more nearer. But to haue a more true and perfect information of these matters, it were necessarie to set downe by description the situation of the Citie of Naples, and the countrey thereabouts.

THE NINETEENTH BOOKE OF THE historic and discourse of Guicciardin.

THE ARGUMENT.

Lawtrech besiegeth Naples. In the meane while Anthony de Leua taketh Paia, and besiegeth Loda. Andrew Dore leaueth the pay of the French. Monsieur Lawtrech dieth. The French breake up from before Naples. Monsieur de Saint Pol reconquereth Paia. Andrew Dore taketh Genes. The Genowayes take Saona, and put them selues in libertie. Monsieur de Saint Pol is taken by Anthony de Leua. The Emperour falleth to accord with the Pope. Peace is made at Cambray betweene the Emperour and the French king. The Emperour passeth into Italy, where the warre is made against the Florentines, and peace is solicited with all others.

THus Monsieur Lawtrech hauing reduced his whole armie vnder the wals of Naples, the first thing he drew into consultation was, whether it were best to attempt the expugnation of the towne with the furie of artilleries and valor of men, as many of his Captaines aduised him, wishing that for the better execution of the enterprise, the regiments of footemen might be increased with new numbers: they alleaged many difficulties, in regard of which there could be no hope to entertaine the armie any long space before the towne. The first difficultie consisted in victuals, the traffike and resort whereof was alwayes in danger by the inrodes of the enemies, who hauing many companies of light horsemen, commaunded by their incursions all the wayes and passages of the fields. The second impediment rested in the hope verie vncertaine that Naples would render for famine, by reason the gallies of Philip Dore being not sufficient to hold the port besieged or restrained, and the Venetian gallies not arriuing notwithstanding they were promised daily, there came from Caietta to Naples foure gallies laden with meale, and by the weake defence of the haven, other vessels entred the towne daily with reliefe. The third doubt was referred to the cold prouisions of the Venetians, who being taxed to pay monethly to Monsieur Lawtrech two and twentie thousand duckets, were already become behind with him for threescore thousand. The successe of the enterprise stood also desperate, both by the slender releefe of money that came out of France, and also by the maladies and diseases that generally rained in the armie, such as did not proceede so much by the stinch and ordinarie corruption of that aire, which by custome beginneth to deliuer infection in the end of Sommer, as through the great quantities of raines that fell, which by so much more offended the armie, by how much most part of the soldiers lay in the open fields, hauing no other couer then the skie: yet neuerthelesse Lawtrech considering that in so great a multitude and vertue of defendants, wherein he knew to consist not the least difficultie, & for the fortification of the mount Saint Martin which lay apt to be secured, it would be an action verie hard either to take the hill, or to force the towne; and simply foreseeing not to expend his monie with small hopes, fearing to want for the furnishment of expences ordinarie, tooke this resolution, not to assault the towne, but to besiege it: hoping that in verie short time the enemies would fall into the want of victuals to feed their bodies, or monie to containe the souldiers: for that vnder those hopes, and the reasons and considerations of them, he conuerted his whole mind and all his prouisions to the besieging of Naples, cutting off all meanes of accessse or resort of victuals by land, and soliciting the coming of the Venetian gallies to reduce the towne to an absolute priuation of reliefe by sea and yet altering his resolution in some points, he set the campe at liberty to skirmish, least the souldiers liuing without action might become effeminate and abated in valour: insonmuch as there passed manie skirmishes betweene the campe and the defendants of the towne, to the great commendation of the souldiers of the black bands, who being most resolute and ready in that kind of fighting by the discipline of Iohn de Medicis, had not as yet made anie shew of their valour in the plaine field in anie battell pitched and ranged, where they were to keepe their ground, and either to be found dead or liuing in the places appointed to them. About this time came to the armie fourscore men at armes of the Marquis of Mantua, and an hundred from the Duke of Ferrara, who notwithstanding he had bene amply receiued into the protection of the French king and the Venetians, yet he deferred so long as he could to send to the armie, reseruing to him self to dresse and regulate his deliberations according to the coniecture and iudgment of the accidents and euent of the warre.

Resolution of the Imperials within Naples.

In this estate and condition of affaires the Imperials were not without their hopes to be able to breake the fleet of Philip Dore, who rode with his gallies in the gulse of Salerne: in which enterprise they reposed not their foundation and hope so much in the numbers and goodnesse of their vessels, as in the valour and dexteritie of their souldiers: for they furnished fixe Gallies, foure Foistes, and two Brigantines, with a thousand harquebuziers Spanish, and that of the most approued and best choise of the armie: and with them entred as commanders, Don Hugo Viceroy accompanied almost with all the Captaines and personages of authoritie. To this armie by sea, disposed and gouerned by the direction of Gobbo, a stout and famous Captaine for sea seruice, were adioyned manie Barkes of fishermen, to the end to astonish the enemies a farre off through the multitude and number of vessels appearing. This fleet departed from Possilipo, and by a direct course made with the Ile of Caprio, where Don Hugo to the great preiudice of that exploit, lost time to heare a Spanish Hermit, who vnder reasons and perswasions of his profession, inflamed them to fight according to the glory of that nation gotten in so many victories. From thence, leauing on the left hand the Cape of Minerna, they entred into the maine sea, and sent before two Gallies with this direction, that being come within sight of the enemies, they should make shew as though they would giue backe and flie, to the end to draw the enemies into the maine to fight. But Philip Dore being aduertised the day before by verie faithfull and assured espials of the intention and stratageme of the enemies, dispatched a messenger with diligence to Monsieur Lawtrech, to send to him forthwith three hundred harquebuziers, who being commanded by Captaine Croché, were arriued with Philip Dore a litle before the Nauie of the enemies were discovered: which when he beheld a far off resembling (for the number of vessels) a huge wood, notwithstanding he had before with great courage aduanced all necessarie preparations to execute the fight, yet the consideration and view of the vessels giuing him manie timerous impressions, he stood long suspended betweene hope & feare: but he was presently deliuered of that perplexitie, when by the drawing neare of the fleet of the enemies, he discerned them to containe not aboute fixe vessels of helme: therefore with a courage resolute, and as a Captaine well experienced in the wars by sea, he caused to enlarge and as it were he cast off as though they would run away, three other Gallies of his, to the end that with spooning afore the sea and winning the wind, they might in their time charge the enemies both in side and in powpe: and the person of himself with fixe gallies made directly with the front of the enemies, who were to discharge their artilleries to take from him by the thicknesse of the smoke, both his leuell and his view: but Philip to turne vpon themselves the danger he saw prepared for him, gaue fire to a very great Basiliske, whose force caried his charge with great violence through the gallie Admirall of the enemy, wherein was the person of Don Hugo, and at the first shoot, killed fourtie men, of whom the

The Captaine of the gallie was one, with many officers and men of place. This furie of the Basilisk he followed with all his other sorts of artilleries, by whom were executed and hurt many bodies of the enemies: who for their partes lost no time both to defend and endamage, for that the artilleries of the gallie of Don Hugo being fired at a token giuen, slue the Captaine, and hurt the Patron of the gallie of Philip. In which medly the great artilleries hauing done their execution, the gallies by the helpe of their oares, drew neare one to another, & with their small shot & other furies which men in fight do vse, began a bloudie fight: in which the Genowais who were not without training and experience in such encounters, had better meanes to auoid the perill, by fighting low, and as it were bowing downe, standing vpon their gards within the bodie of the pauilhes or couerts. As these two gallies were in fight together with a wonderfull furie and astonishment, three other gallies of the Imperials obseruing their aduantage, inuironed straightly two of the Genowais, and had already got the vpper hand: but the three first gallies of Genes that made as though they ran away, were got into the maine sea, and with the fauour of the wind came with a fierce charge vpon the enemies, and playing in flank vpon the gallie Admirall, they reuerfed with a shot the maine yard of the gallie called the Neptune, which did no small damage to her seruice: there Don Hugo hauing already a wound in his arme, whilst he was laboring to encourage his souldiers, and neuer was free from the danger of stones and wildfires which were throwne from the tops of the enemies gallies, was slaine in fighting, giuing by his death an honorable testimony of his valour and fidelitie: there the Admirall of Philip and the gallie called the More rent in peeces the Admirall of Don Hugo, and the other two, with their artilleries sunke the gallie of Gobbo wherein Fieromosquo died; and in the meane while the other gallies of Philip had rescued and recovered two gallies of their companie sore pressed by the Spaniards, & in that action had taken their Foistles: onely two Spanish gallies not without some grieuous testimony of the encounter, fell off from the fight, seeing the absolute victorie of the enemies. The Marquis of Guaft and Askario, their gallie being in perill both of water and fire, their oares broken and their souldiers bleeding in their deadly wounds, were made prisoners, the shining of their armours being gilt preserving their liues, which their valour could not do. In this battell Philip was much holpen by certaine captiues whom he deliuered, who being for the most part Turkes and Mores, shewed their crueltie in the fight, according to the custome of those nations. The dead bodie of Don Hugo was cast into the sea, without other ceremonie or regard of his greatness, and likewise Fieromosquo. The principals of the prisoners of this battell, were the Marquis of Guaft, Askario Colomo, the Prince of Salerne, Saint Crosse, Camille Colomo, Gobbo, Serenou, with many other Captaines and gentlemen of marke: the dead bodies of this battell contained more then a thousand footmen, and of the Spaniards there were verie few, who were not either slaine or grieuously wounded: the prisoners with three gallies were sent by Philip to Andrew Dore, and one of the two gallies that escaped, passed not long after to the pay and seruice of the French. By this victorie, as the Frenchmen rose into great hopes of good successe for the generall enterprise, wherein haply their presuming was not without preiudice, for that it reduced Lamirech to a more negligence or omission in the prouisions that were to be made: so on the other side it replenished the Imperials with no small feare and astonishment to fall into want of victuals, seeing both they remained depriued of all commandement by sea, and also the fauours of the land were taken from them in many partes, but especially since the losse of Pozzolo, a place which administered a great traffike of victuals to Naples: and the towne of Naples was already fallen into great wants of meale and flesh, and the store of their wine well watted: insomuch as being through their necessity driuen to follow the examples and cruelties of men of warre in that case, the day after the ouerthrow at sea, they put out of the Citie no small numbers of mouths vnprofitable, and establishing orders for the distribution of victuals, they provided in any wise that the Launceknights should haue lesse wants then the other souldiers. By these expulsions & good information of their other doings within the towne, Lamirech nourished his first hope, which was also well increased and confirmed by a surprise made of a Brigantine the seuenth day of May, wherein he found by certaine letters written to the Emperour by his Captaines, that the flower of the armie was lost: the towne was not provided of corne for a moneth and a halfe: that they were driue to grind their meale with the force of their hands; that the Launceknights began to incline to tumult: that there was no monie to furnish their pay: & that there remained no remedy.

for his affaires, vnlesse he comforted them with speedie prouision of monie and succours both by sea and land. To which extremities was not forgot to be adioyned the stroke of the plague begun in Naples, which is so much the more contagious where Iauceknights do frequent, by how much in their rudenesse they forbear not to conuerse with such as are infected, and such lesse to manage and vse in their owne persons, any thing that was theirs. On the other side the French men were not free from those afflictions and calamities which a warre traineth after it: they suffered great want of water, for that from Poggio Royall, euen vnto the front of the army, the campe was serued onely with cisternes: the maladies of the campe went on multiplying & increasing, which diminished not a litle the strength of the armie: and the enemies being far aboue them in light horsemen, made continuall sallies, especially by the way that leade into Soma, and did not onely bring to the reliefe of the towne much flesh and many sorts of wines, but also cut off oftentimes the traffike of victuals that passed to the French campe. Many of the

Captaines dealt with Lawtrech to wage more companies of light horsemen to oppose against the cauallerie of the enemy, which he did not onely refuse to do, contrarie to good foresight and order of warre, but also he gaue sufferance to the most part of the French horsemen to ly dispersed within Capua, Aversa, and Nola; a matter which made easie to the enemies all their exploits: others perswaded him for that diseases had done much to diminish the infanterie or footmen of the armie, to leaue a proportion of seuen or eight thousand footmen, as well to supply the weaknes of the armie, as to be more strong and mightie according to their desire in the beginning; a counsell which as he had begun to denie already, so he stood resolute to refuse it still, alleadging that he had no money, notwithstanding he had at that time receiued from France a conuenient prouision, and had gathered the tribute of the cattell of Powilla, together with the taxation of the townes which he had taken, and lastly the Barons of the Realme that were with him, were readie to lend him any reasonable quantitie of monie he would require. By which experience I may say, that it is a worke worth the labour, to obserue and consider what disorders are bred by the obstinacie of those that are preferred to great things, or do manage the place of high authoritie: for Monsieur Lawtrech no doubt the principall Captaine of the Realme of France, as he caried with him a long experience in matters of warre and enterprise, and commanded in the armie with great respect and authoritie: so on the other side he was by nature haughtie and imperious, and hauing a singular weening in himselfe, would reiect the counsell of all others, and stopping his eares from the reasons of other men, he interpreted it to his dishonour that the world should perceiue that he gouerned not alwaies by his owne arbitration and iudgement. In which conceit of singularitie and weening, he refused to make those prouisions which if he had accomplished, might haply haue giuen him the victorie, but being reiected, were the causes that the enterprise begun with so great a hope was passed into extreme ruine. The souldiers of the black bands who were lodged in the front of the armie, skirmished daily, wherein running on in the humor of their courage and forwardnesse, they would oftentimes presse so neare the walles of Naples, that the small shot within the towne had power of them, & in their retiring because they had not horsemen to back them, they fell into the mercy of the horsemen of the enemies: in so much as prouing to their harms the disadvantage to make skirmishes without horsemen vnder the walles of Naples, they began to giue over the often practise of the thing, which so often had brought them harme.

After this victory by sea, the town of Stabia standing vpon the sea side, yeelded to Monsieur Lawtrech, but not the Castell, by whose example also was rendred Saint Iermine: and by this successe and victorie of the fleet, the garnisons that were within Caietta hauing recovered Fondy and the countrey thereabouts, Lawtrech dispatched thither Don Ferrand of Caietta, sonne to the Duke of Tracetta, and the Prince of Alesse, he who had newly contracted with the Frenchmen, taking his reason vpon the omission of the imperials, whose Captaine he thought were carelesse to deliuer him. Moreouer, the streame of victorie running with manie courtes, Simon Romaine at the same time made a great aduancement in Calabria, much helping him in that actiō the inclination of the people crying with great affection vpon the name of the French.

But all these exploits for their quality good and happie, and for their maner honorable and full of valour, were not sufficient to carie the victorie of the warre, for that it depended wholly either vpon the conquering or vpon the defending of Naples: the same inducing Monsieur Lawtrech

Dutrech who chiefly applied the siege, and not altogether desperate to take the towne by force for the slaughter of so manie of their good souldiers of Spaniards at the battell vpon the sea, solicited earnestly the comming of the French and Venetian Nauie, to the end to depriue wholly that Citie of all victuals that might be brought to it by sea: he caused also to remoue the campe, and planted it in front vpon a hill, both more neare Naples, and more commanding the Mount Saint Martin: where the blacke bands cast a trench, not onely to draw from that hill a trench, which being stretched out to the sea side, and hauing vpon that end to the seaward a bastilion, closed vp the way of Somma: but also to the end that immediatly after the sea armies were come, they might with better oportunitie carie by force the Mount Saint Martin, hauing cut out before, another trench betweene the Citie and the Mount to stop them for succouring one another: and afterwards at one time to execute Naples by water with the said armies by sea and land, beating it within from the front of their campe, and vexing it without with one part of the armie, and conuerting the other part to inuade the Mount: so might the enemies, whose necessities to defend so manie seuerall places would driue them to deuide their forces, be more easily ouercome, in some place: and yet they held it not good to abandon Poggio Royall, though the front of the campe were farre off, to the end that if the enemies did recouer it, they should not cut from them the commoditie of fresh waters, onely they closed vp their campe behind or on the backside. These counsels and deuises albeit they were considered with gerat skill and knowledge in warre, yet manie difficulties were opposed against them: first the trenches containing more then a mile euen to the sea, could not be cast with speed, aswell for want of Pioners to lay out to the worke, as for the diseases of the souldiers being weakned from all hardnes of labour: secondly (which was verie necessarie for the besieging and inuasion of the towne) the armies by sea did not come, for that neither Andrew Dore with his gallies that were at Genes did stirre, neither was there any aduertisement of the comming of the Nauie prepared at Marseilles, and also the Venetians regarding more their profit particular then the benefit generall and common, or rather respecting lesse, interests principall, then ends more inferiour and accidentall, employed their Nauie at the expedition of Brundusa and Otranta: of which Cities Otranta had couenanted to yeeld, if within sixteene daies it were not rescued, and Brundusa notwithstanding it had receiued by accord the Venetians, yet the Castle held good for the Emperour, whereof the one hauing a strong situation vpon the sea, gaue small hope to be taken, and the other standing within the towne and of greater circuit then the other, seemed not to be able to make long resistance, for that it had lost two rocks. The xij. day of May they made a batterie with the artilleries vpon the hill, which executed a turret that vexed not a litle the field: they shot oftentimes also into the towne, but that offended litle, and many skirmishes were performed at Saint Anthonies. The sixteenth day the artilleries being planted vpon the top of the mountaine vpon certaine turrets betweene Saint Gennaraes gate and the gate of Capua, and kept them also from erecting a bastilion which the defendants had begun: within the towne most mouthes were fed with sodden corne, and for feare of extreme famine, they deliuered the towne daily of manie numbers of people, whom the calamities of the warre had reduced to a hard election, either to languish in famine within the towne in the eyes and compassion of their friends, or to run to the mercie of the enemy, in whom it was not reasonable they should hope for safetie and succour, hauing so iustly offended them: & the Launceknights notwithstanding they suffered lesse then the other nations of souldiers, yet both for want of bread and farre greater necessities of wine and flesh, they protested oftentimes to mutine: but they were eftswoones reclaimed with many good offers and meanes, and for the most part kept entertained with false letters and promises of succours. The xix. day the Pioners and souldiers were brought to worke at the new trenches, and planting two cannons vpon the bastilion when it was made, they wonne and reuerfed two miles neare to Magdaleine, garded by two ensignes of Launceknights, against which they neuer addressed any enterprife, for that they were apt to be rescued from Naples. Hitherunto the affaires of the Frenchmen haue runne in a course happie and pleasing, but they began to swarue to declination for many causes manifest & apparant: for, as Philip Dore by the secret ordinance of Andrew Dore was retired with his gallies to lie about Pozzom, so by that meane there entred daily within Naples (where were left no other sortes of people then souldiers) some quantitie of victuals in barks. And albeit the Venetian Nauie after they had conquered Otranta, gaue continuall hopes to descend and fall

begin to decline*

with Naples, yet they temporised and interposed daily new delaies and excuses, hoping to get speedily the great Castell of Brundusa. Lastly the affliction of diseases and sicknesse increased daily in the armie, and wherethe blacke bandes were wont to be in all actions three thousand strong, now what for their hurt men who were unprofitable to the seruice, and what for their sicke men in whom was more weaknes then valour, and what for the bodie dead whose places were emptie, they were reduced to a number of two thousand. The xxij. day the Spaniards made a braue sallie vpon those that defended the new trenches, where was a continuall labour and working of men in hope to perfect them within fixe or eight daies: at this sallie Horatio Neilson being appointed to a place of perill with a verie litle companie, was slaine as he was fighting in good example to his souldiers; a death more meet for a simple souldier, then worthie in a Captaine. The Imperials rising into courage and hope by the successe of this sallie, made it good with a new action and greater forces, but the whole campe being in armes and running vpon the defence of the trenches, they retired againe into the towne: Philip returned in the end to the gulf of Naples, for the great instance and solicitation that was made to him: The trenches that had bene begun to close vp the waie of Scemma, were not finished the xxvij. day: The Spaniards made roades daily through the countrey, brake downe waies, and made open passages, and brought into the towne great quantities of flesh: against whom the horsmen of the campe made litle head, for that they went rarely to the field: And Monsieur Lawreth beginning now to wish for a supplie of footmen (though he yeelded not wholly to the counsell of others) solicited that they would send him out of Fraunce by sea fixe thousand footmen of anie nation, alleading that for want of victuals, and the stroke of maladies and diseases, the campe was much diminished: and yet amongst so manie difficulties, & in so small expectation of remedie, it was he onelie that had hope of the victorie, reposing himselfe whollie vpon the famine of that Citie.

In this time things fell out well in Calabria with Simon Roman, who had with him two thousand footmen aswell Corfikans as souldiers leauied of the countrey: and albeit the Prince of Bisignan and one of the sonnes of Captaine Alerfon were opposed against him with a regiment of fiftene hundred footmen waged of the countrey, yet they found it a hard matter to stand against him, insomuch as the sonne of Alerfon retired to Tarenta leauing the Prince in the field. Not long after, Simon following the course of his fortune, got Cosenze by accord, and successfullie after that, he tooke in a towne thereby, the Prince of Stigliano, and the Marquis of Laine his sonne with two other of his children: but in Pomilla the garrison that held Manfredonia for the Emperour, vexed all the countrey with incursions and roades without anie resistance of the horsmen or footmen of the Venetians, who were gone vp to the conquest of those townes. Moreover, in the quarters about Rome, things were not well appeased, for that Serro Colonne hauing taken Paliano notwithstanding he was forbidden in the Popes name on the behalfe of the daughter of Vespasian, yet the Abbot of Farsa recouered it, making prisoners Serro, and Prospero de Gaui, though afterwards Serro made escape by the helpe of Louis Gonzaguo.

Whilest the armies were in action about Naples, and trauelled with those difficulties & with those hopes, Antho. de Leua being aduertised by good espiall, that there was negligent gard in Pauia, in which towne was Peter Lungeno with foure hundred horsmen, & a thousand footmen Venetians, and Hannibal Pissinard Captaine of Cremona with three hundred footmen, which he had led thither to maintaine in the deuotion of the Duke, all the countrey beyond Paw: he drew to him a company of souldiers of confidence & choise, whom he led thither one night when was least doubt of any action, and hauing with no lesse fortune then celeritie scaled the towne by ladders in three places, he tooke it by assault before the souldiers heard the alarme: in this exploit he made prisoners Peter Lungeno, and one of the sonnes of Ianus Fregoso: from thence he followed his victorie to Biagrassa, where the garrison and townsmen rendred vp the place to him after they had indured some execution of the Cannon, and so preparing to go to Arona, Federike Borromeo compounded with him, binding himselfe to follow the Emperours faction.

About this time the Duke of Brundswike being issued out of Trent, had passed the tenth day of May the riuer of Adice with an armie of x. thousand footmen, and vj. hundred horsmen well armed, many of them being gentlemen. This armie being repulsed from Chiusa descended vpon the territories of Verona: and albeit for that it was knowne long time before that he would come, there was a resolution set downe that Monsieur saint Pot should go before to meet him: yet yet making no greater speed in this expedition then in others, the Launceknights were in Italy before saint Pol could be in order to march. And as to omit occasions is to breed impediment & difficulties, so comming on with his march with so slow a foot, he was driuen afterwards to abide manie daies in Ast, both to reassemble and muster his companies, and to obey the difficultie of victuals, of which a great dearth and scarcitie raigned in all the parts of Italy, but chiefly in the quarters of Lombardy: and there was not to be hoped for, a more great and more readie succour for the generall affairs, then of the Senate of Venice, who albeit had assured that their army should take the field with xij. thousand footmen, yet the Duke of Vrbis being within Verona, disposed himself to no other enterprise then to defend the townes of most importance of their estate. By which omission the Launceknights who were descended vpon the lake of Garda, had Pisquero by accord, and successiuelly Riuolto and Lunaro: in so much as being vnder that propertie of fortune, made Lords almost of the whole lake, they drew contributions of monie from manie places, committing to fire and sword such as had no meane to satisfie them with ranfome. Antho. Adorno who was arriued in this armie, perswaded them to go vp towards Genes, but both for their necessitie and want of monie, and for other impediments and difficulties, and also for their desire to haue conference with Antho. de Lena issued out of Millan to that end, they marched slowly along the countrey of Bressia, whither went to meet them Andrew de Burgos & captaine George: by whose means it was feared the Duke of Ferrara, who in so great a feare of others made no preparation, entertained some secret intelligence or practise. After this the Launceknights marched vp towards Adda to ioine with Antho. de Lena: who being passed the riuer of Adda the ix. of Iune with an armie of six thousand footmen and sixteene great peeces of artilleries, and being incamped neere those companies that were within three miles of Bergama, in which Citie and also in Bressia and Verona, the Duke of Vrbis had distributed his bands of souldiers: he perswaded the for an extreme desire he had to reconquer Loda, to embrace the recouerie of the estate of Millan, before they passed to Naples: by whose perswasions they incamped the xx. of May before that Citie, out of which issued the Duke of Millan, who retiring to Bressia, left for the defence of the towne, Iohn Pawle his bastard brother, with a garrison of three thousand footmen. And after the artilleries had plaied, which being planted in two severall places, did great execution, Antho. de Lena to whom the first assault appertained, brought his bands of Spaniards neare the place where the ruine was greatest. There they fought brauely for the space of three houres, but at last the vertue of the Italians defendants being nothing inferiour to the valour of the Spaniards assailants, they were repulsed by the same vertue which led them first to the fight: so that reiecting all hope to carie it by assault, they reduced, all their confidence to the fauour and working of famine: the rather for that the haruest being not yet made, there was within Loda so great want of victuals, that the share and distribution of bread running equally betweene the souldiers and the inhabitants, the towne of necessitie was either to perish vnder the rage of famine, or the townsmen to issue out to the great perill of their liues. But the plague began now to be warme amongst the Launceknights, and the armie withall suffering no small afflictions for want of victuals, they began to breake vp, and many returned into their countries by the waies of the Swissers and Grisons; an action which bred no great care in the Duke of Brundswike their Captaine, who hauing conceived great hopes in Germany for the example of the regiment which George Fronspergh led, he found by prooffe and triall the matters of Italy to be farre more intricate and hard then he imagined: and his money falling short, much lesse that he could leade them to the kingdome of Naples, seeing it was impossible for him to containe them before Loda: neither was he releued with anie comfort by Antho. de Lena, who rather tooke away all his hope of remedie, that way filling him with continuall complaints of the pouertie and wants of Millan. For, after he had lost all hope to recouer Loda, he deuised all the waies he could to giue them occasion to break vp and go away, fearing lest they would establish their abiding in the Duchy of Millan, and by that meane would intrude themselues to be competitor with him in the gouernment, and share with him in the spoile: and he forgot not in this time of temporising, to giue order both to thresh out the corne throughall the estate of Millan, and to carie and lay vp all their haruest within the towne of Millan. At last the xiiij. of Iulie as they were going to giue a new assault to Loda, the Launceknights in their discontentments fell into mutinie: in which rage a thousand of them went their way to Coma, and the others that remained retired in great disorder the artilleries from before Loda: but fearing least they would returne into Germanie, the Marquis of Guaft whom Andrew Drey let go for twelue daies vpon his faith, came to Millan to perswade Brandsuicke not to suffer his souldiers to returne into Germanie: neuerthelesse the souldiers whose rudenesse could not be reclaimed with words and reasons, retained their resolution to go away, and passed by Cima, except two thousand who remained with Antho. de Lena, to whom in those daies Moraro was rendred. And it was not doubted, that if the Launceknights had continued before Loda a few daies more, they had honorably caried the towne, both by their vertue, and want of victuals in the towne. In which exposition manie desired a readinesse in the Duke of Vrbis, to the end that whilest they lay about Loda, he might draw neare Crema, or Pisqueton, or at least keepe maintained there some cornets of horsemen to vnder them. And albeit whilest they were vpon the confines of Bressia he did sometimes both assault them and molest them, yet neuer coming so neare them as three miles, and standing onely vpon defending of the estate of the Venetians, he passed no further then the riuer of Eglia: neither was Monsieur Saint Poll for his part more diligent to aduance and come on, who, notwithstanding all the resolutions set downe and confirmed by so manie promises made by the king to send on his behalfe bands of souldiers against the Launceknights, arriued not in Piedmont, but at such time as the Launceknights departed, and yet his armie contained farre fewer number then had bene promised and published. Neuerthelesse the Confederates forbore not for all this to sollicite of new the Pope to declare himselfe for them, wherein they required him, that proceeding against the Emperour with armes spirituall, he would also depriue him of the Empire and the realme of Naples: but he stood vpon these excuses, that if he should declare for them, he could then be no more a conuenient meane to practise and sollicite peace: That his declaration would stirre vp a greater combustion amongst the Princes of Christendome, and yet bring no profit to the Confederates, for that his pouertie and weaknes would alwaies impugne the good they expected in him: That the priuation of the Emperour for Naples and the Empire, would set all Germanie in an vprore: both for suspicion that he would appropriate to himselfe the authoritie to elect the Emperour, and for ielousie that he would establish that election in the person of the French king. Lastly he reduced to their memories the imminent danger of the Lutherans, which went on increasing by the diuision of the time. Neuerthelesse not being able in reason and comelinesse to resist the importunities that were vrged to him, he promised to enter with them so far forth as the Venetians would restore to him Rauenenna, which condition he propounded as impossible to be granted, and confirmed this offer with his promise and obligation not to molest the estate of Florence. Vpon which occasion the Embassadours of England came to Venice the xx. of Iune, to sollicite the Senate to render Rauenenna, protesting for the Pope to assure the obseruation of his promises: but being not able to induce the Senate, they went away euill contented. In this time the Pope recouered the Citie of Rimini, which John Salsatello hauing before assailed in vaine to recouer, was at last yeilded vp vpon condition of life and goods saued.

The Popes excuses to the confederates.

But now by the operation of the time and course of euents and affaires, began to be layed open and disclosed the Popes most deepe and secret thoughts, such as he had before dissembled with great art: for, where before he had firmly imprinted in his mind a desire to restore to his house the greatnes which aunciently it had had in Florence, he was driuen in publishing by singular cunning, the contrarie, to perswade the Florentyns, that much lesse that he had anie such thought, seeing all that he desired of that common wealth was, that they would according to the example of other Christian Princes, acknowledge him for Pope, and that in causes particular they would forbear to persecute such as depended vpon him, or deface or reuerse the armes and ornaments proper to his house. To these ends and with such commissions, he sent to Florence as his Embassadour when he was deliuered, a Florentine prelate: and for that the estate of Florence would not giue him audience, he forgot not, the better to cloake his dissimulation, to recontinue a new instance by the solicitation of the French king, that they would send to him an Embassadour, seeking by these simplicities and offers, to haue them familiar with him, and to draw them with more facilitie into the ambushes he had dressed against them: but when he saw these deuises and labours sort to none effect, he began to perswade Monsieur Lamtrech, that whereas such as gouerned the estate of Sienna were dependants and deuote to the Emperour, it were conuenient for the better course of his affaires there, to refer to that government Fabio Petruccio. Neuerthelesse

Neuerthelesse albeit Lawtrech law reason and conueniencie in the deuise, yet in regard of the contradiction of the Florentins he forbore either to follow it or to effect it: and when the Pope saw he could worke none of these to his drifts, and hauing no inclination to dissolue or leaue off the practise which his ambition kept entertained in him, he wrought secretly in such sort, that Pirrhus di Castello vnder pretence that the inhabitants of Sienna had done him wrong, made himselfe Lord of Chiusa with a strength of eight hundred footmen, and by the good diligence and office of certaine exiles of that towne. The Popes reason to raise this man to the iurisdiction of Chiusa, was to make him an instrument vnder that oportunitie, to trauell and trouble the gouernment of Sienna: but the Florentins discerning deeply into the Popes drifts, complained to the Vicount of Loraine Embassadour to the French king, that the doings of the Pope tended to no other end, then with the commoditie of Sienna to trouble and disorder the affaires of Florence. In which regard the Embassadour procured of the Pope, that the action of Chiusa should cease.

In this meane while the affaires of the kingdome of Naples proceeded diuersely, for that on the one side the Count of Burello was passed from Sicile into Calabria, with a thousand footmen, where he ioyned himself with the residue: and on the other side, Simon Roman had ranged to discretion with the fauour of mines and trenches the Castell of Cosenso, though by a wound he receiued of a harquebuz in the shoulder, the course of the victorie was somewhat hindred: he ioyned his forces afterwards with the Duke of Somma, who with the bands of footmen of the countrey, held besieged Catanzara, a towne strong by fortification, but weake by the want of victuals: in this towne was the sonne in law of Alarson with two hundred horimen and a thousand footmen: and as in taking this towne they stood in good degree to command the whole countrey euen vp to high Calabria: so neuerthelesse necessitie constrained them to turne against the forces vnited with the succours that were come from Sicile who had now made some aduancing. But Simon being abandoned of one part of his footmen leauied of the countrey, was driuen for his safetie to retire within the Castell of Cosenso, and the other part of his footbands not without the slaughter of manie of them, dispersed and went away. The Corfiuays went wandring towards the armie, in so much as not onely the region of Calabria was left in danger, but also it was feared least the victors would aduance and addresse their forces to Naples. On the contrary, the affaires of the Frenchmen drew good successe and issue in Abruzzo by this accident, as the Bishop Colomno was approched within xij. miles of Aquila to stirre vp Abruzzo to commotion, he was ouerthrowne and slaine by the Abbot of Farsa, with whom were put to the sword iiij. hundred bodies of souldiers, and eight hundred taken prisoners. In the confines of Caietta the Spaniards went wandring and retiring, being caried with feare for the arriual of the Prince of Melfe, and the garrison of Manfredonia, through the slender valour and action of the Venetian bands, committed many damages without perill or resistance.

Like as the Pope perseuered still in his resolution to declare himselfe for neither partie: so the French king espying the intelligences and practises which he entertained, began to hold him for suspected, and to the Emperor he was nothing agreeable, though for no other cause, yet for that he had sent as Legate into England Cardinall Campeius to debate there the controuersie delegated to him, & to the Cardinall of Yorke: for, where the king of England solicited vehemently to haue published the inualiditie of the first mariage, the Pope hauing dealt verie liberally in words and promises with his Agents, and also being of litle fidelitie or credit with other Princes, laboured to keep himself vnder his protection: he made at last secretly a Bull decretall, by the which he pronounced the mariage to be of no force, & gaue the Bull to the Cardinall Campeius: he charged him withall, that in shewing it to the king and the Cardinall of Yorke, he should tell them that he had comission to publish it, if in iudgment the knowledge and information of the cause succeeded not well: wherein it seemed the Pope wrought vpon this ground, that both they should be brought with more facilitie to consent to haue the cause iudicially debated, and also indure with better temperance of mind the delaies and longnesse of the iudgement, which he had inioyned his Legate to hold off and prolong to as long a tract of time as he could: and as he should not deliuer the Bull vntill he had receiued new comission from him, so neuerthelesse he should labour to perswade the king by all the meanes he could, that his intention was to deliuer it vp to his hands in the end. Of this embassage in the person of that man, and of the delegation of the cause, the Emperours Embassadours that were within Rome complained not a litle, though with lesse

About Naples manie were the difficulties happening vpon both the one and other partie but such as in all discourse of reason, made more apparant on the French side the hope of the victorie, though it was hindred by the vertue and obliuie of the enemies: within the towne of Naples the wants of victuals grew daily to extremities, especially of wine and flesh; a calamitie without his comfort, for that no prouision could enter the towne by sea for the impediments of the Venetian gallies, being after so long expectation arriued now the x. of Iune in the gulf of Naples, to the number of xxij. And albeit the horsmen of the towne made daily sallies out not towards the face of the armie, but to those quarters of the countrey where they thought to find victuals, by whose industrie some praies of flesh were alwaies brought in, and the whole estate of the towne somewhat releued and refreshed: yet these prouisions and comforts brought in by these aduentures, were not such as being deprived of the commoditie of the sea, they might suffice to nourish and entertaine them long. Besides, they began to grow short in monie, the stroke of the plague afflicted them much, and they had much to do to keepe entertained the Launceknights, whom they could no longer abuse with vaine hopes and promises. In which discontentment many of the went by troupes to the French armie, notwithstanding the authoritie & grace which the Prince of Orange, who by the death of Doff Hugo commanded in the place of Viceroy had with them, was of some force to retaine them: who the better to frame their minds with authoritie and discipline, which he could not range by lenitie and easinesse, he made prisoner Captaine Cattaya Gascon with many of his souldiers, being of the remainders of the regiments of the Duke of Burbon: and afterwards he did the like by suspicion to Fabricio Maramo, whom notwithstanding he set at libertie presently. On the other side diseases increased daily in the French campe, the same being the cause that Lawtrech, to the end not to haue so great a space or circuite to gard, would not suffer to be perfected the last trenches, which neuerthelesse could not easily be finished for the impediment of certaine waters. Besides, the campe suffred want of victuals and nouriture though more for the ill order and gouernement that was vsed, then through anie other occasion. Neuerthelesse Monsieur Lawtrech obseruing his owne rule and counsell, hoped more in the necessities that were within Naples, then he feared or doubted his proper difficulties: and perswading himself of the expedition of the victorie, either for that cause, or for their want of monie, he forbore to make anie new leauies of footmen; a matter which the whole armie desired for the vniuersall diminution which was made by death and diseases, not onely of persons meane and base, but euen of such as sate in places of authoritie, as the Popes Nuncio and Loys Pisano commissarie of the Venetians; who died in the face of the towne the xv. daie. He hoped also to allure to the campe either all or the most part of those bands of Launceknights that were within Naples; a practise wherein the Marquis of Salussa first, and afterwards himself, had reposed of long time great confidence in vaine. So that vpon these grounds, together with certaine hopes that were giuen him to draw to the armie certaine light horsmen that were within Naples, he forbore to make anie new leauies of light horsmen such as had bene most necessarie for the seruice, of whom if he had waged but foure hundred, he had stopped in good time the hurtfull incursions which the souldiers of the towne made so often to his disaduantage. And yet in those actions of pray and bootie, he was not without his felicitie, for that as the horsmen of Naples returned one day with a rich spoile of cattell, they were encountred by the blacke bands, who as they were the sinewes and strength of the armie, so without them there had bene no siege planted before the walles of Naples: by them the bootie was recouered from the Neapolitans with the losse of three score horsmen, notwithstanding the Spaniards issued out of the towne to rescue them. Thus Monsieur Lawtrech was not without hope that the Imperials would be constrained to leaue Naples to discretion: and therefore laying to cut them off from all retraite within Caietta, he gaue order to gard well Capua, and keepe in deuotion the sea towne of Pulturno: and to deprive them also of meane to retire into Calabria, besides that he cut off certaine passages, apt for their purpose, he recontinued the working at the trench begun so often and left off for sundrie accidents, he now raised it so high, that the springs and waters which before gaue impediment, were now beneath the worke: besides, he sought to put in defence certaine houses adioyned neare to Naples, and to haue them garded with a thousand footmen which he meant to leaue to that end, turning also to that seruice the fauour of the Venetian Gallies, which were come vp right over against against the trench: this trench was serued aptly for that resort of victuals to the armie that came from the sea coast, and was no lesse conuenient to cut off the enemies if they returned that way with their booties: for, by reason of the great fitches and waters at Poggio Royall that had bene cut vp, the way from the campe to the sea contained a great and dangerous circuit. The Imperials sought to vex and hinder those that wrught at the trench, and being one day issued out in very strong troupes, the Pioners by the ordnance of Peter Nauarre who solicited the worke, made as though they fled, and the Imperials pursuing them more in rashnesse then in good gouernment of warre, fell vpon an ambush dressed for their destruction, wherein were hurt and slaine an hundred bodies: neuerthelesse the trench was not halfe finished, aswell for want of Pioners as by other accidents, ioined to an ordinary negligence, which oftentimes hindreth the effect of the good directions and ordenances that are giuen. In which good course of direction, if the campe had continued, manie were of opinion that considering the strait termes and condition of Naples, Monsieur Lamirech had honorably caried the towne: and at the same time was offered a faire occasion and of great consequence, if the execution had bene as resolute as the offer was ready: Monsieur Lamirech being informed that the souldiers of Naples were issued out in great troupes to go on forraging and for boote, and for that he would at one blow rid the countrey of those incursions, and open himself a way to the absolute victorie, sent out the xxv. of Iune by night, the regiment of the blacke bands, the horsemen of Florence, and three score French launces, with a band of Swissers and Launceknights, whom he directed to take the way of Belvedere & Pedegrotto, to encounter the forragers, & to vex them in their retire: he appointed Captaine Burio with the Gascon footmen to stand vpon the hill which is aboue Grotta, and vpon the alarme giuen, to descend and cut the enemies from entring into Grotta. The beginning of this exploit was well executed, and drew with it a good issue, for that the companies of Lamirech hauing encountered the Imperials, they charged them & put them to flight, more then three hundred bodies remaining prisoners and slaine, besides an hundred horses of seruice and great store of baggage: and in the encounter Don Ferrand of Gonsagno was stricken from his horse as he fought, and being made prisoner he was esoons recouered by the fury of the Launceknights: but this medley had his imperfection by Captaine Burio, who either through negligence which is ill, or by feare which is worse, appeared not in the place to the which he was appointed, which if he had done according to his direction, they had no doubt giuen an absolute ouerthrow to the Imperials. Monsieur Lamirech had also sent to Caietta six Gallies of the Venetians, and had appointed two to ride at the mouth of Garillan to sauour the Prince of Melfe. And because that notwithstanding the impediments of the Gallies, some reliefe of victuals entred into Naples by the fauour of certaine Frigots, he put out to the sea certaine small Barkes to oppose against the seruice of the Frigots: and lastly he gaue order that all the heards of cattel should be driuen away xv. miles compasse from Naples, to the end the Imperials should not with such facilitie chase the.

But now by reason of a new accident which long time before had disclosed certaine signes & tokens, the French affaires were not a litle intangled: Andrew Dore either by corruption and long working with him, or of his owne proper motion, which in cases of alteration carrieth men not a litle, determined to leaue the French pay, to the which he was bound till the end of Iune; a resolution which he had long time before established in his mind, as was gathered by many arguments and coniectures. In that disposition he retired to Genes, and would not go vp with his Gallies to the kingdome of Naples, no though the French king offered to make him Captaine generall of the armie by sea which he prepared at Marseilles: against which offer he alleaged onely his impotencie of bodie, in which raigned so manie maladies drawne on with yeares and olde age, that he was nowe no more able to beare the trauels of an armie: but the originall and first motion of this change was afterwards attributed aswell by himselfe as others, to diuerse causes: Touching himself, he complained that the French king to whom he had done faithfull seruice for the space of fife yeres, had raised to the place of high Admirall by sea Monsieur Barbesieux, a place which though he had refused once, yet he looked that the king would make a new instance to him to take it. Secondly, that the king had not satisfied him of the twentie thousand duckets due for his payes past, without the which he was not able to entertaine his Gallies: That he would not hearken to his iust petitions to restore to the Genowayes their accustomed iurisdiction of Sanona. And lastly, that because he vrged these petitions with importunitie, the king had debated in his counsell to cut off his head, as one that vsed too arrogantly his authoritie. Others were of opinion, that his ill contentment grew first from the difference & controuersies betwene him and Ranſe de Cere for the enterpriſe of Sardignia. In which contention he conſtrued againſt the king that he had with more partialitie inclined to the reportes of Ranſe, then ſauoured his iuſtifications: That the king had too much importuned him to deliuer vp his priſoners whom he deſired, but eſpecially the Marquis of Guaſt, and Aſkanio Colonna, as a matter of great importance, neuertheſſe offering to pay their ranſome. Theſe were the cauſes coniecturall gathered by ſtrangers: but afterwards it was both beleued and diſcerned manifeſtly, that in this reuolt he was not caried ſo much with diſdaine that the French held not reputation of him according to his merites, or with anie other propertie of ill contentment, as with an ambition and emulation to deliuer Genes, and ſo to make himſelf great vnder colour of the libertie of his countrey; wherein hauing no other meanes to driue his drifts to their true effect, he reſolued to follow no more the French, nor to aide them with his Gallies in the action of Naples, like as alſo it was beleued that to hinder the conqueſt of Sicile, he had aduanced and brought on the enterpriſe of Sardignia: ſo that hauing replenished all the thoughts of his mind with this deuice of ambition, and ſeeking to confirme it with ſome greater authoritie, he ſolicited by the interpoſing of the Marquis of Guaſt, to enter into the pay of the Emperour, notwithstanding the profeſſion of great hatred which for the memorie of the ſacke of Genes he had made manie yeres againſt the Spaniſh nation, accompanied with ſeuere cruelties executed vpon anie particulars of them when ſo euer they fell into his hands. But for that he couered his intention with a cloke of deepe art and diſſimulation, the matter was not yet come to the knowledge of the French king, who in that ignorance had not looked to remedie an euill of ſo great importance, though he was not without ſome ſuſpition of the reuolt by the occaſion of ſurpriſing a Gallie: wherein paſſed as a paſſenger into Spaine a Spaniard ſent vnder the colour to ranſome certaine priſoners, and amongſt other things was found about him a letter of credence from Andrew Dore to the Emperour: and yet ſuch was the ſuſpectie of the Spaniard or compaſſion of ſuch as had him in hand, that they ſuffred him to continue his way without examining him. At laſt Monsieur Barbiſieux being arriued at Sauona with a fleet of fourteene Gallies, Andrew Dore fearing ſome ſtratageme, retired with his Gallies to Genes, and afterwards conueyed his priſoners to Livice; a matter which when the French king vnderſtood by credible relation, and taſting the danger which was now become without remedie, he diſpatched to him Peter Francis Nocere to reduce him to his pay againe: by him the king offered him to ſatiſſie his deſire touching Sauona, to pay in the twentie thouſand duckets that were due before, and to giue him twentie thouſand more for the ranſome of the Prince of Orenge whom he had taken before, and the king ſet him afterwards at libertie at ſuch time as he made peace with the Emperour at Madriſt. Laſtly he offered him that in caſe he would deliuer his priſoners, he would defray their ranſome before they came out of his hands, and yet if he reſuſed to deliuer them, the king promiſed not to impute or charge againſt him his deniall. But Andrew Dore, whoſe reſolution was more conſtant and ſetled, then that the kings offers could remoue it, gaue ſmall care to the ſolicitation, but iuſtified with complaints his going from the king: in ſo much as Monsieur Barbiſieux, to the great preiudice of the affaires of Naples, was conſtrained by the neceſſitie of things, to ſtay at Sauona: and yet paſſing further afterwards, he left for the gard of Genes ſiue hundred footmen, with direction to remaine within ten miles of the Citie, for the rage of the plague that raigned there: and for the ſame ſeruice he put on land thirty miles from Genes twelue hundred Launceknights newly arriued, who as they had receiued their firſt pay of the French men, ſo for that the Venetians had not made good the ſecond according to their bond, Triunſce gouernour of Genes was driuen to leaue it by his meanes.

Vpon this reuolting of Andrew Dore, the Pope being aduertified that he entertained pracliſe with the Emperour, ſignified the ſame to Lawtrech the xxj. of Iune, whom he required to conſent that he might retaine him in his pay, to the end to deprive the Emperour of his ſeruiſe, aſſuring him that Phillip Dore ſhould depart from Naples within ten daies: for which cauſe Monsieur Lawtrech reſtored to Phillip for that he would not kindle or incenſe him, the Secretarie Serenon, whom he had alwaies retained with him, to the end to come by his meane to the knowledge and light of manie things that lay in darknes and ſhadow: and yet for the ſuſpition he had conceiued of the Pope, he interpreted ſiniſterly the aduertisement he had ſent him. At laſt Andrew

Dore, notwithstanding that Barbiseux in passing further with his armie by sea containing nineteene Gallies, two Foystes, and foure Brigantins, assisted with the person of the Prince of Nauarre, had spoken with him: yet forbearing to floake or dissemble any longer the thing he intended to do, he dispatched a gentleman to the Emperour in the company of the generall of Grayfrears, who was now created Cardinall, and was sent to the Emperor from the Pope: there was resolved with this Gentleman a contract bearing these couenants: The liberty of Genes to be vnder the protection of the Emperour: the iurisdiction of Sauona to remaine to the Genowaies: Pardon to Andrew Dore that had bene so great a persecutor of the Spanish name: Entertainement in the Emperours seruice with twelue Gallies, and threescore thousand duckets by the yeare, with manie other articles verie honorable. In regard of this league, Phillip departed the fourth day of Iulie from before Naples with all his Gallies: whose going away was nothing prejudiciall to the French but onely in reputation, for that he had of late not only made ill gard, but also had suffered his Brigantins to conuey into Naples by stealth, certaine proportions of reliefe. He had also caried the sonne of Antho. de Lena to Caietta, and was a backe for manie daies to the forraigers to passe victuals into Naples: but if he had followed that seruice with the same fidelitie he shewed in the beginning, his going away had bene very hurtfull to their affaires. Monsieur Lawtrech taking occasion vpon his departing, solicited so much the more the comming of the French armie, which according to the Popes ordinance was stayed with great indiscretion about the action of Ciuitaneccchia.

Couenants between the Emperour & Andrew Dore,

But for the retiring of Phillip with his Gallies, the Venetian armie by sea who had taken the charge of the worke from the sea shore vntill they met with the trenches of Peter Nauarre, was driuen to leaue that action, and apply to the gard and seruice of the sea: which to the end to hold more strait and inclosed, there were appointed certaine armed Frigots to scoure day and night the coast: vsing likewise a greater diligence by land, in opposing against the daily incursions of the Spaniards, whom notwithstanding when they encountred, their valour was turned into feare, and in that feare they fled away without fighting: in so much as Naples was reduced to an extreme necessitie, and the Launceknights protested oftentimes to go away if they had not speedie succours both of monie and victuals. By reason wherof Monsieur Lawtrech, who had reposed a great confidence in those operations, perswaded himself, that for the long practise and intelligence he had holden with them, they would in those disorders and wants passe daily to his army.

But the fifteenth day of Iuly all the Fleet of the Venetian Gallies except those that were about Caietta, returned into Calabria to be reuictualled of Bisket: by whose going away the haueu being laid open, manie Frigots passed into Naples with victuals of all sorts except wine; a reliefe comming in a time apt, for that within Naples there was not so much store of corne as would last till the end of Iuly. And on the other side, in the campe which was filled full of the plague by the infection of such as came out of Naples, maladies and diseases increased greatly: which respecting neither place, authoritie, nor complexion, so touched Monsieur Vaudemont that he bare more likelyhood of death then hope of life, and reduced Monsieur Lawtrech into great maladies: by whose absence and restraining for the sicknesse he suffered, the seruice declined to such disorder, that the Imperials had leasure to execute their incursions without impediment, and with the same facilitie cut off the victuals that came to the armie, reducing the whole campe to great wants of reliefe: and yet much lesse that the French could be brought to leaue new companies of light horsemen, seeing in these disorders Valerio Vrsin being in the pay of the Venetians with an hundred light horsemen, went from the army, for that he was not payed, by whose example manie other companies of light horsemen left the seruice for want of pay, and the residue were made vnprofitable by reason of diseases. The men at armes of the French were bestowed in garrison in the places thereabout: and the bands of the Gascons being dispersed into seuerall places of the countrey, were busie in gathering in of haruest and seeking pray and bootie. Neuerthelesse there was great hope in certaine bandes of footmen which were said to come with the armie by sea, which armie hauing stayed more then twentie daies after they parted from the port of Limorno, arriued at last the eighteenth of Iuly, with manie gentlemen and money to comfort the campe: onely this supply brought to the armie but eight hundred footmen, the residue that marched with it remayning bestowed partly for the gard of Genes; and partly to follow the enterprise of the Castell of Ciuitaneccchia. At the comming of these succours

Monsieur Lawirech hauing sent to the sea side bands of souldiers to receiue the monie that Nas brought, the Gallies could not come to land for the impediment of the sea that was greiv and swelled with waters: and therefore the next day the Marquis of Salussa returned thither againe with his Launces, and with a grosse regiment of Gascons, Swissers, and Launceknights, accompanied with the blacke bands, but in their returning they were encountred by the Imperials being issued out of Naples in great troupes, who gaue so furious a charge vpon the French horsemen, that they turned their backs, and in flying they so shaked and trode their footmen, that they disordered them whom they should haue defended. In this encounter Don Hugo de Popoli succeeding by the death of Horatio Bullento to the gouernment of the Floremine bands, being set on foot with fortie harquebuziers before the elquadron of the blacke bands, became prisoner to the horsemen: yea such was the furie of the Imperials, that if the valour of the blacke bands had not retained them, they had in this medley made a great slaughter, for that they fought with a wonderfull resolution, but chiefly the horsemen: there were left dead of the French men more then an hundred bodies, and no lesse number passed ouer to the calamitie of prisoners, amongst whom were manie of the gentlemen of the sea armie that were set on land: and also Monsieur de Candales nephew to the Marquis of Salussa: onely the monie was preserued, and sent in safetie to the campe. The fault of this disorder was laid vpon the French horsemen, being farre inferiour in valour to the enemies; a matter which did not a litle diminish the vertue of the footmen of the armie, as knowing that now they could not stand assured of rescue in the horsemen: but the matter that most endomaged and weakned the armie, was the sicknesse of Monsieur Lawirech, who albeit laboured with the vertue of his mind and courage to sustaine and beare out the feeblenesse of his bodie, yet being not able with his hand and presence to assist adions, he could not prouide and remedie manie things that went to declination: for the Imperials taking liberty to make rodes abroad, did not only make purueiance of all things they stood in need of except wine which they could carie, but also in that libertie they cut from the armie oftentimes the resort of victuals and nouriture, taking their baggage and forrage euen vpon their ramparts, and winning their horses sometimes as they were led to the watering: in so much as besides the generall diminition of the armie by diseases, euen things necessary began to faile in the campe, which was almost reduced of an armie besieging, to a campe besieged, if they had not seene to the garding of the passages against the footmen that ran away. And of the contrary, within Naples all commodities and hopes increased, the Launceknights mutined no more, and all the other bands of souldiers in glorie and emulation stroue to suffer and endure. With these dangers no lesse manifest then still increasing, the obstinacie of Monsieur Lawirech was at last vanquished, who both had sent into France to be supplied with sixe thousand footmen by sea, and also had dispatched Ranse de Cere being come with the armie by sea, towards Aquila, to leaue foure thousand footmen and sixe hundred horsemen, giuing him assignation for monie to the treasurer of Aquila and Abruzzas: which supplies as Ranse vnderooke by promise to bring to the campe within few daies, so they would haue serued better for the aduancement of the affaires, if they had bene prepared before. By the xxix. day the wayes and straites were so broken, that there was no suretie of passage to Capua which lay vpon the backe of the armie, and wherein almost all sorts of people laboured of diseases and sicknesse: Monsieur Lawirech who somewhat before had bene eased of his feauer, was est soones fallen into it againe, with a more infirmity and danger then before: the men at armes were almost all dispersed in the villages, either for diseases and sicknes indeed, or at least to refresh them vnder such an excuse: the regiments and bands of footmen were almost reduced to nothing: and within the towne of Naples both the plague abating, and other diseases diminishing, by which helps there were as yet 7000. footmen strong, there was feare least they would sally out & inuade the campe. In which regard Monsieur Lawirech caused to tarie the five hundred footmen which Ranse de Cere had sent after the ouerthrow of Simon Roman, to the end to stop that the bands of enemies who were in Calabria, came not vpon towards Naples: he sent also to leaue a thousand footmen in the countrey thereabout: he retayned the Duke of Nola with two hundred light horsemen, and Rinuccio Farnese with an hundred, whome they promised to bring to him soorthwith: he sent for backe againe two hundred Estradiots of the Venetians, who were gone to the enterprise of Tarenta: he reuoked vpon great penalties all the men at armes that were whole and able: he solicited daily the coming coming of Ranſe, and haſtened (albeit very late) with a great vehemency and efficacie all other prouiſions. By the ſecond day of Auguſt there were ſcarcely in the French campe an hundred horſe, by reaſon of which diminution the Imperials made dayly incurſions euen vp to their trenches: they tooke all aduantages of their weakneſſe, and omitted no oportunitie which their diſorders or diſturbation offered to them: they won Somma, performing the exploit by the ayd of ſcaling ladders, and they ſacked it, finding within it a company of men at armes and a cornet of light horſemen. By theſe actions growing on to extremities, Monsieur Lawirech ſeeing himſelfe almoſt beſieged, ſolicited Monsieur Saint Pol to ſend him ſuccours of men by ſea, and called vpon the Florentins to turne to his reſcue the two thouſand footemen whom they had leuiued to ſend to Saint Pol, which they conſented to readily: Monsieur Candales who was let go vpon his faith, was dead in the campe. The Prince of Nauarre, Damdemont, Camillo Triunice, and the olde and new maiſters of campe, were ſicken ſicke: Lawirech was eſtſoones fallen into the pangs of his feuer, all the Embaſſadours were ſicke, all the Secretaries paſſed by maladies; and all perſonages of account were kept ſuppreſſed by the diſeaſes of the campe, except the Marquis of Saluſſa and the Count Guido: yea there was ſcarcely to be found through the whole campe a body who could boaſt of his ſoundneſſe: the hands of footemen periſhed miſerably of hunger, and almoſt all the ceſternes being drawne dry, there was an vniuerſall want of water; ſuch were the diſorders of the campe by theſe afflictions, and much more redoubled by omiſſion and negligence, that all action was taken from the army, other then to ſtand vpon their gards and defend their campe, abiding the comfort of the reſcue. After this, the Spaniards brake vp the water conduit of Poggia Royall, and notwithstanding it was eſtſoones recouered, yet they could make no uſe of it without great daunger. Monsieur Lawirech expected within two dayes the Duke of Somma with fiſteene hundred footmen, and with the ſame expedition he looked for the bands of horſemen and footmen of the Abbot of Farſa, which he had ſent for ſince he had giuen the defeate to the Biſhop of Colomo.

About this time and in theſe extremities returned the gallies of the Venetiens, very ill armed and appointed, and ſo ſlenderly furniſhed with victuals and prouiſions, that to get meate and nouriture conuenient for their feeding, they were driuen to runne all along the ſea ſhores thereabout, and by that occaſion had no care to gard the port of Naples: but the Spaniards in whom was equall their inſolency and their fortune, being returned the eight day to Somma, made pillage of it of new, and tooke away with them all the reſidue of the horſe which Count Guido had there in gariſon: they charged alſo the eſkort or gard of the French victuals, who were two hundred Launceknights, and they flying in their cowardiſe into two houſes, yeelded their liues to diſcretion. By reaſon of theſe incurſions and felicities of the Imperials, the ſouldiers that kept the campe were oftentimes without meate to eate; a calamitie of all others moſt wretched, when is wanting foode to feede the body which ſtands to defend his life. All their incommodities were made greater by the huge circuit of place where the army was incamped, which property of error as it was diſcerned in the beginning, ſo the daunger redoubling by the fauour of the place, their eyes beheld a miſerable conſuming of their ſouldiers euerie day by the neceſſity of too much action: and yet Monsieur Lawirech ſtanding firmly vpon the hope and dayly expectation of ſuccours, could not be brought to reſtraine it or make it leſſe, who albeit in his owne perſon he was not well reſtored, yet in that weakneſſe of body he tooke paine to viſite the whole campe to maintaine due order of watch and ward, fearing to be inuaded. But ſo ſwiftly did things runne to declining, that by the fiſteenth day the great uiſſance and valour of the Imperiall horſemen had cut off all reſort and entercourſe betweene the campe and the gallies, neither could the ſouldiers of the campe, for want of the ſeruice of horſemen, make any incurſion, or do exploits beneficiall. Euerie night the alarme was giuen to the campe twiſe or thrice, in ſo much as the ſouldiers waſted with ſo manie paynes and incommodities, were not able to fend out ſuch eſkort for victuals as was needfull: but the thing that amid ſo many calamities, made them moſt diſcomforted, was the death of Monsieur Lawirech, yeelding vp his life the ſame night, vpon whom The death of authoritie and vertue all the counſels and actions of that ſeruice depended, and in whole Monsieur perſon ſtood repreſented the hope and expectation of that warre. It was thought he Lawirech fell into the relapſe of his diſeaſe, by the continuall paynes he put his bodie vnto before it was well confirmed.

The whole charge and gouvernement of the campe remained now in the person of the Marquis of Saluffa, a man whole weaknesse made him vnable to manage well so great an authoritie: and in this daily increasing of the French disorders, Andrew Dore with twelue gallies arrived at Caietta as souldier to the Emperour, the same reducing the French Navy to such straits, that they began to make no more so good gard as they had wont. At that time also the Count of Sarny with a thousand Spanish footmen, tooke Sarny, expulſing three hundred footmen that were there in garrison: and afterwards marching by night the xxij. of August, with a greater force to Nola, he tooke it, and droue Valerio Vrsin lying there in garrison to retire into the Castell, alleaging for his excuse that he was deceived by the men of the countrey: he sent to demaund rescue of the Marquis of Saluffa, who sent him a strength of two thousand footmen, but carying with them the ordinary infelicity of the campe, they marched towards the place by night, they were set vpon by the bands of Naples, and cut in peeces. The xxij. day the campe being both naked of men and voyd of gouernment, stood enterayned only with hope of the coming of Ranſe, who being as yet in Naples, was not wished to light on for the taking of Naples, nor in hope to be able to make any resistance in that place where they were incamped, but only that by a greater strength they might breake vp and leaue the siege. By this time Monsieur Vandemont was dead, and the Marquis of Saluffa, Count Guido, Count Hugo, and Peter of Nauarre extremely afflicted with sicknesse: in which generall persecution of the French campe, Maramo to the ende to depriue them wholly of foode and victuals, issued out of Naples with foure hundred footmen, and finding Capua almost abandoned, entred into it, by whose coming thither, the Frenchmen forsaking Pozzolo, bestowed the garrison that was there within Auerſa; a place of very speciall importance for the campe. But when Capua and Nola were lost, the army was at a maze where to seeke victuals to containe the bodies which the stroke of diseases had yet left alieue: so that their extremities making them no longer to hold good, and the rage of their necessities carying them necessarily to obey the aduersity of the time, they resolved to embrace their last shift, & brake vp by night to retire to Auerſa: but the Imperials keeping a iealous eye vpon their lodgings, & hauing good informatiō of their dislodging, set vpon them, & ouerthrew them in the way, where being taken Peter Nauarre with many other chieftaines and personages of condition, the Marquis of Saluffa escaped, and retired with one part of the army into Auerſa: but being pursued no lesse by his owne infelicity then by the valor of the Imperials, & being reduced to an estate not to maintaine defence, he sent out of Auerſa Count Guido Rangon to parley with the Prince of Orſe, betweene whom ran these capitulations: That aswell he as the other Captaines should remaine prisoners, except Count Guido, to whom in recompence of the accord, was granted liberty: That the Marquis should do all that he could with the Frenchmen and Venetians for the rending & giuing vp of the whole kingdom: That the souldiers and such as by the accord were to haue liberty, should leaue their Ensignes, their armes, their houses, and their goods, granting only to those that were of greatest quality, the seruice of moyles and curtals: That the Italian souldiers should not beare armes against the Emperour for six moneths. In this sort all bands and regiments were defeated, all Captaines cut off by death, or made prisoners in flying, or at least taken in the accord. Auerſa was sacked by the army Imperial, who afterwards retired to Naples & demanded viij. paies. Ranſe who the day following was drawne neare to Capua with the Prince of Messe & the Abbot of Farfa, hearing of the accident and aduenture of the army, returned into Abruzzza, which countrey only together with certaine peeces in Pomilla and Calabria, held good for the Confederates.

This was the issue and euent of the enterpriſe of the kingdome of Naples, disordered by manie causes, but guided by his last error by two principall reasons: the one, for the maladies and diseases engendred partly by the cutting away of the water conduits of Poggio royall to depriue them within Naples of the meane and vsage of grinding: for, when the waters were disperſed all over the playnes, and hauing no issue, were driuen to stand still and gather mudde, they so corrupted the ayre, that the Frenchmen by nature intemperate and impatient of heate, fell into maladies, and they in time were turned into the nature of the plague, whose contagion was caried into the body of the army by certaine that were infected, who were expelly sent out of Naples. The other error was, that Monsieur Lamirech who had drawne out of Fraunce all the best experienced Captaines of that nation, was too singular in his owne hope and weening: and not remembering what litle honor it brought to him at such time as he lay at the defence of the estate of Millan, to write to his king that he would stay the enemies for passing the riuer of Adda, he had now in the same partiality since the siege of Naples, assured his king by sundry letters, that he would not leaue his campe from before the wals of Naples, till he had honorably caried the victory of the towne. By which property of errour and selfe promise, for that he would not be reprocued of his word and iudgement, he stood obstinate not to leaue the siege, contrary to the counsell of his other Captaines, who seeing the campe full of maladies & infection, perswaded him alwayes to retire in safety to Capua or to some other place of refreshing; the rather for that hauing in his hands & deuotion almost all the kingdome, much lesse that he could haue wanted either victuals or mony, seeing he might with facility haue consumed the Imperials, to who all things were lacking.

During these proceedings in the realme of Naples, the affaires of Lombardy were not without The proceedings of Monsieur Saint Pol in Lombardy. trauell and diuersity of fortune, for that after Monsieur Saint Pol had assembled his forces and made prouision of victuals, he tooke beyond Pau certaine townes and burroughes, commanded before by Anthony de Leua, who the third of August was gone to Torretta, laboring to gather into Millan so great prouisions of victuals as he could, for that thorough the whole estate of Millan, the haruests were so poore and barren, that it was thought there were scarcely sufficient victuals to feede for eight moneths the mouthes that were in the countrey: afterwards he retired to Marignan being not able for want of money to abide long time in that place. At this time the Duke of Urbino was at Brescia, and Saint Pol at Newcastell in Tortono, from whence being come to Plaisance, they met and had conference together at Monticella vpon the riuer of Pau, where it was resolu'd that the armies should vnite and assemble about Loda: from thence Saint Pol passed the riuer of Pau neare to Cremona, they of Plaisance suffering him without resistance to conuert the barkes that were there to the vse of a bridge: and therefore Anthony de Leua who had at his deuotion the bridge of Cassan, Carnaggia, and Treny, brake downe the bridge and abandoned the places of Guaradadda, like as he had before abandoned Nonaro: only he had bestowed within Pania, seuen hundred footmen, and fife hundred within Saint Angeo: Monsieur Saint Pol had in estate and payment foure hundred launces, 500 light horsemen, and fiftene hundred Launceknights, but in number and true muster farre lesse, both through his owne negligence and deceit of his officers: for these forces and other companies of Swissers and Launceknights which were expected, the Venetians had agreed to pay for euery moneth twelue thousand duckats, to Monsieur Saint Pol, who had also at Turea three hundred Swissers entertained and payed for nine hundred, and three thousand footmen French: the Venetians had three hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and six thousand footmen: and with the Duke of Millan were more then two thousand footmen of choise: Anth. de Leua had foure thousand Launceknights, a thousand Spaniards, three thousand Italians, and three hundred light horsemen: the regiments of the confederates passed the riuer of Adda, and ioyned their forces together the two and twentieth of August, Anthony de Leua being yet at Marignan: from that place the Duke of Urbino sent, to Saint Angeo a strength of three thousand footmen, and three hundred light horsemen with six cannons, vnder the conduct of Iohn Naldo, who as he was incamping was slaine with a bullet from the artilleries, for reuenge of whose death the Duke went thither in person & carried the towne. The fife & twentieth of August, the army of the confederates lodged at Saint Zenon vpon the riuer of Ambra, which is within two miles and an halfe of Marignan: the seuen and twentieth day they passed ouer Ambra, and drew neare to Marignan: the Spaniards at their approaching retired within Marignan to an old rampart, & after they had skirmished many howers, they issued and spread themselues at large, making as though they would either giue, or take the battel: but after the artilleries had plaied on both sides the space of an hower, by which time the night drew on, they retired within Marignan and Riozzo, and at the lodging or planting of the campe they assaulted it brauely. The day after Anthony de Leua made his retraite with all his companies to Millan, & the Confederates went to Landriano: there they tooke counsell whether they should attempt to force Millan, and during the action of that consultation, the army marched with intention to enter the towne of Millan by surprize, which enterprize was broken by a great abundance of raine, which making the wayes heauy and troublesome, stopped them for going to the gate of Verceill, where they should haue entred: but seeing that exploit frustrate, and the deuice disappointed, wherein they were more confirmed of the impossibility of the action, by the relation of a Gentleman whom they sent to take a view of Millan, they determined to go incampe before Pania by the way of Biagrasa: both for that there remained no other nature of action for the army, and also for the hope they had to cary it easily, hauing no greater a strength to defend it then two hundred Launc knights and eight hundred Italians. Thus keeping that way they sent out beyond the riuer of Thefin, certaine bands of footmen, which tooke Vigenena: and the ninth of September Monsieur Saint Pol arriued at Saint Alexis within three miles of Pania, where both the armies approching neare together, there came an aduertisement that put them in a greater astonishment: for, the plague being great in Genes, for feare of whose infection the towne being almost left abandoned of inhabitants and souldiers, in which generall confusion Theodor Triunice gouernor of the towne, being retired into the Castell: Andrew Dore tooke the aduantage of that occasion and drew neare the towne with certaine gallies, hauing neuerthelesse a very slender hope to force it, for that he had with him but fise hundred footemen. But as where the feare is generall there the minds & courages are least assured, so the French Nauy that roade in the haven, fearing least their way to returne into Fraunce would be closed vp, left without care or gard the matters of Genes, and hoysed sayle to go to Sauona, the first vessell that arriued there, being the gallee of Monsieur Barbascieux: so that both for the weak forces of souldiers that were within the City, notwithstanding Theodor was returned to keepe the pallace, and for that the people and commons for the iniury of the liberty done to the towne of Sauona, were become enemies to the name of the French, Andrew Dore made his entry into the towne finding made against him no great resistance: such was his ambition and so strong and violent his appetite of dominion, that the plague which forced the naturall inhabitants to leaue their patrimony and place of abiding, had not power to make him timorous to enter, where the others in their feare fled from the infection. But this foule losse of the city hapned chiefly by the negligence and too much securitie of the French king: for, both not looking that the matters of Naples would so speedily fall to ruine, and also being perswaded that in all accidents the retraite of the Nauy to Genes and the neighbourhood of Monsieur Saint Pol, would suffice either to saue or rescue, he omitted to make necessary prouisions: Theodor who was retired within the Castell, demanded succours of Saint Pol, whom he put in hope to reconquer the towne, if there were sent to him forthwith a strength of three thousand footmen: which demand being consulted vpon amongst the Captaines confederate, the Frenchmen shewed a disposition to go thither presently with the whole campe. But the Duke of Urbino proued, that to provide boates to make a bridge vpon Paw, and to leauy necessary proportions of victuals, was a matter which would draw a longer tract of time then the present businesse required: so that according to his counsell it was determined that Monsieur Montlani should turne from Alexandria to Genes, a regiment of three thousand Launc knights and Swissers who were come out of Fraunce to the army of Saint Pol, & were arriued at Alexandria: but in case they would not be led thither, then the resolution bore, that they should be led to the campe, & in their places should be dispatched and bestowed a colony of three thousand others: & that as in the meane while there should be made labor and practise to presse Pania: so the Venetians promised, that if the enterprise of Pania sayled, they would conuert to the succours of Genes all their companies, so farre forth as they might dwell assured of the affaires on that side.

Thus was resolved and continued the siege of Pania, & the better to aduance it to a good end & issue, there were planted the xiiij. day on this side the riuer of Thefin in the plaine there below, nine cannons which executed vpon a bastillion adioyning to the arsenacke or storehouse for munitions, which in few howers was reduced almost to ruine, and beyond the riuer of Thefin were braked three cannons to beate (when the assalt should be giuen) a flanke that answered the arsenacke: and vpon a litle hill side on this side Thefin were bestowed fise cannons which commanded two other bastillions: & vpon the point of the sayd litle hill were bestowed three other cannons which plaied vpon the wal: all which fury of artilleries beloged to the Venetians, reseruing the great shot of M. Saint Pol to beate vpon the defences. By the day following Amyball Captaine of Cremona was come with a trench as far as the ditch of the bastillion on that side of the arsenacke, of which two parts were already so reuerfed to the earth, that the soldiers that were within, had almost abandoned it: this day was slaine with a bullet fro the artilleries, Malatesta Soplano, one of the Captaines of the Venetians: and after the artilleries had plaied with a continuall execution all the day and night following, the army was raunged and prepared to giue the assalt, most part of the wall on all sides of the three bastillions, being made euen with the earth. But when in the morning morning following they went about to draine the water out of the ditches, they found so great a resistance by the foundation of the wall, that they consumed there all that day and the day following, by which occasion the assault was prolonged till the xix. day, when the ditch was almost cleared of all the water. By this the bastillion at the corner being wonne by the first appearing of the day, they began to giue the assault, & deuiding their companies into three, the first action appertained to Anthony de Castello with the Venetian regiments, the second to Monsieur de Loggers, leading the souldiers of Saint Pol, and the last to the Captaine of Cremona, commaunding the regiments of the Duke of Millan, being twelue hundred footemen. The person of the Duke of Vrbino came on foote with two hundred men at armes, and affronted the bastillions, which made a valiant defence for more then two houres, vnder the valour of two hundred Launceknights and eight hundred Italians, with a very few Spaniards, who notwithstanding in the actiō they shewed great courage and resolution, yet for the smallnesse of their numbers they defended their bodies with great hazard and difficultie, the rather for the rage of the artilleries planted beyond Thesin, which alwayes executed vpon the principall part or flower of the ramparts. In the assault Peter Biraguo was hurt in the thigh with a shot of a harquebuz, of which wound albeit he dyed with in few dayes after, yet he would not haue his body removed from the place, to the end his souldiers should not abandon the assault. In like sort was wounded with a harquebuz Peter Boticello, but with more fauour for that he dyed not, and with lesse shew of constancie for that he retired from the assault: they were both Captaines of the Duke of Millan. At last within xxij. houres the assailants by their valour made their entry with smal hurt to themselves, & right great commendation to the Duke of Vrbino. The slaughter of the souldiers within, was about 700 bodies, almost all Launceknights. But whē the army begā to enter the towne, Galeas Biraguo being no longer able to preserue the place which he saw by all properties of destinie to decline frō him, retired into the Castell with all the souldiers that remained of the slaughter of the assault, together with many inhabitants of the towne, which immediatly was deliuered to the sacke & spoiling, though of little profit, by reason it had passed that afflictiō twise before. The castel was receiued by cōpositiō without any assault or exploit of war, both for that there were in the camp no munitiōs to batter it, and also the ditches which were both large & deep were not in so short time to be filled vp, and lastly there were within it a regiment of fise hundred men of warre strong. These were the capitulations between the armie and the castell: That the Spaniards with all those sorts of artilleries and munitions which they could carie in their hands, and with all their trayne of baggage, should go to Millan together with the Launceknights, of whom was left of the general slaughter a verie small number: And that the Italians might go whither they would, except to Millan.

Vpon the taking of Pausia, the Duke of Vrbino gaue out his reasons, that it were not good to force Millan, vnlesse they had an armie sufficient for two batteries: but to the end to vex it and restraine it, he thought it good to take Biagrassa, Saint George, Monce, Coma, and to minister succours to Genes: for, notwithstanding the Launceknights and Swissers had made answer to Monsieur de Millan that they would go to Genes, yet the Launceknights taking the occasiō that they were not payd, went away to Turea, by which alteratiō there was no propertie of succours sent to the castell which Andrew Dore laboured to vndermine with all diligence: for which cause and to apply a remedie so necessarie, Monsieur S. Pol with an hundred Launces and two thousand footmē remaining with him, prepared the xxvij. day to go to the succors of Genes: he passed Pau at Porto Stella in the mouth of the riuer of Thesin, & drew towards Tortono, with promise to turne backe againe, if he saw his succours could not be made profitable to the place: All this while the Duke of Vrbino, stayed for him at Pausia, and with him were foure thousand footemen Venetians, and a thousand of the regiments of the Duke of Millan. At this time Anthoine de Lusa who was retired to Millan, made an order that no mā should keepe or make any meale in their houses, except such as had redeemed & bought the tribute of it; who payed vnto him for the space of nine moneths, three duckats for euery measure of meale. With the money growing of this imposition, he payed for all that time the horsemen, & the footemen Spanish and Launceknights; a contribution which did not onely defend him frō the danger present, but did entertaine him all the winter following, hauing disperfed his regiments of Italian footemen within Nouaro & certaine townes of Lomelino, with other villages of the territories of Millan, in which wretched townes he gaue suffrance to the souldiers during the whole time of the winter, to spoyle & raunfom the miserable inhabitants: the first day of October M. saint Pol arrived at Gany a place within xxv. miles of Genes having for his better expedition, left his artilleries at Nou: the day following he took the rocke of the borough of Fornaro, but passing further towards Genes, & vnderstanding there, was entred a new strength of seuen hundred footmen Corsekays, he returned with bones to the borough of Fornaro: such was his want of monie, that he had not with him, ~~more~~ ^{scarcely} aboute foure thousand footmen aswell of his owne as of the companies of Monti Ian, and a thousand who had bene sent from the campe with Nicholas Dore: and yet of those few that were with him, many troupes passed continually into France, which making him dispaire of the successe of the enterprise, he dispatched Monti Ian with three hundred footmen to Sauona, before which towne the Genowaies were incamped: but there was no meane for them to enter, both for that it was restrained and inuironed with trenches, and all the passages and places of access taken. The x. of October he retired himselfe within Alexandria, and afterwards to Senazzaro betweene Alexandria and Pauia, to haue conference with the Duke of Vrbino: onely he was almost left without souldiers: and there consulting vpon the common affaires, where the Duke declared that there was remaining but foure thousand footmen of all nations and natures, and that Ambo. de Lena had what without and within Millan foure thousand Launceknights strong, fixe hundred Spaniards, and xiiij. hundred Italians. It was resolved that the Duke should retire to Pauia, and Saint Pol to Alexandria; a matter accorded vnto him by the Duke of Millan: there were also occupied speeches and deuises to make new leauies of footmen, and then if the time fauoured, to aduance to execute the enterprise of Biagrasa, Mortaro, and the Castell of Nonaro.

But when the inhabitants of Sauona saw that Monti Ian could not enter for their succours, they agreed amid so many distresses, to render the towne the xxj. of October, if within certaine daies they were not rescued: and therefore Saint Pol who was carefull to relecue it, and not hauing of his owne companies aboute a thousand footmen strong, required a supply of three thousand footmen of the Duke of Vrbino and Millan, who furnished him but with xij. hundred: inso-much as having no assurance to be able to rescue it with so small a number, he suffered it to be lost: and after the Genowaies had it, they shaked the hauen with stones, for that they would make it vnprofitable to seruice: and by the example of that aduersitie, Theoder Triunlce despairing to be succoured, and being without money and comfort, gaue himselfe vp to composition. As soone as the Castell was conquered, it was in a popular furie raised by the Genowaies, who with the authoritie of Andrew Dore established in that citie a new gouernment, such as had bene affore time solicited vnder the name of libertie: this was the substance of it: that by the counsell of foure hundred citizens should be created all the Magistrates and dignities of their citie, but chiefly the Duke and supreme Magistrate, to continue for two yeares: they abrogated the law, by the which the gentlemen were excluded before out of that creation: & seeing the foundation and ground of greatest importance rested in this, to establish their libertie, that they should presently labour to reconcile the factiōs & diuisions of the citizens, which of long time had bene there more great & hurtfull then in anie other citie of Italy, being besides contentions priuate, there had raged for long time the factions of Guelfes and Gebelins: to deface the emulation betweene the gentlemen and populars, which populars were not yet reduced to one vnitie of will amongst themselves: and lastly to reappease the mightie and strong partialitie and controuersie betweene the two families of Adorney and Fregosey. By reason of which diuisions it was likely that their citie, most conuenient to command the sea aswell for the situation as for the science and knowledge of marine matters, had not bene onely at seuerall seasons vexed and depressed, but also for long time had bene kept vnder a crosse of continuall subiection: therefore to cure that euill euen to the root, they proceeded by obscuring the names of all the families and houses of the citie, conferring and retaining onely the memorie and name of xxviij. of the most noble and notable, except the Adorneis and Fregoseis, which they vtterly suppressed and abolished: vnder the name and number of which families, they gathered all those gentlemen and populars who remained without name of their houses: wherein the better to confound the memorie of all factions, they sought to intangle and intermedle the families of the gentlemen with the houses of the populars, and reciprocally the names of the populars with the gentlemen: such as had bene partners with the Adorneys, they coupled with those that had followed the name of the Fregosey, and so of the contrary, establishing vnder that commixtion of houses and names, an equall affinitie betweene both:

both: and as by this law it was ordained that there should be no distinction of power to hinder the one more then the other to aspire to honours and magistracies: so by this confusion of names and men they hoped, that within the course of a few yeares, the poisoned memorie of factions and quarrels would be vtterly defaced and quenched: and in the meane while the authoritie of Andrew Dore remained great amongst them, without whose consent and priuit both for the reputation of the man, and for the authoritie of the Emperours gallies which he commanded, and for his other conditons and parts, they would not passe anie deliberation of things which were of greatest importance: onely the thing which made his puillance and greatnesse lesse troublesome, was, that he would neither suffer the treasure to be administred with his ordenance, nor intrude himselfe into the election of the Duke and other magistrates; and much lesse communicate in causes more particular and lesse: by which maner of behaiour the citizens being reduced to minds peaceable, became more inclined to marchandize then to ambition, and retaining still impressions of their trauels and subiections passed, they had great reason to loue and follow that forme of gouernment. After this the French fleet and the nauie of Andrew Dore buckled together betweene Monaro and Nice, where one of Dore's gallies was sunke.

After the losse of Sauona, the Duke of Vrbino, and Monsieur saint Pol, met together of new at Senaro betweene Alexandria and Pania: where the Duke of Vrbino to the great discontentment of Francis Sforce and Monsieur saint Pol, resolved to repasse on the other side the riuier of Adda, both leauing to the Duke of Millan the gard of Pania, and counselling Monsieur saint Pol to spend the winter in Alexandria: with which alterations the French kings officers were not onely discontented, but also himselfe not taking for payment certaine light excuses which the Venetians made to him, complained bitterly that they had not succoured the Castell of Genes, and the citie of Sauona, which the Genowaies in their rage had vtterly deformed. After this, a supply of a thousand Launceknights were sent to saint Pol, with whome, accompting the thousand footmen, which Villecero had in Lomelyno, remained a strength of foure thousand footmen.

In this time hapned a tumult in the Marquisedome of Salussa: the accident was this. After the death of the Marquis Michael Anthony, Francis his brother hauing taken vpon him the iurisdiction, by reason that Gabriel the second brother to Anthony, euen in the time of his eldest brother by direction of the mother who had managed the gouernment of the children during their minority, had bene kept prisoner in the Rocke of Rauel, vnder colour that he was almost estranged from his vnderstanding: it hapned that the captaine of the rocke deliuered him; by which meane seazing vpon the mother who had holden him prisoner, and being gladfomely embraced of the people, he conquered the whole estate: to which felicitie of the time it seemed his brother gaue place, and fled in his feare to Carmagnola, where, hauing afterwards reassembled his forces, he ouerthrew his brother Gabriel. There passed no more actions of consequence in Lombardy for this yeare, sauing that Count Caezza ran vp euen as farre as Millan, taking aduantage vpon the negligence of the Venetians, who omitted to send to Monsieur saint Pol the forces they had promised for the enterprise of Saranallo, Gauy, and other places of the Genowaies: there was also made an attempt of an exploit of great importance: for, Monti Ian and Vecellero with two thousand footmen and fiftie horsemen, departed in the euening to Vitudo, to surprise Andrew Dore in his pallace, the which standing vpon the sea coast retaineth a verie nere neighbourhood to the wals of Genes. But this plot was vaine in the effect, for that the footmen for the tediousnesse and longnesse of the way containing xxij. miles, could not reach the place where they were to execute their enterprise before the night were wasted, and being discovered by the clearnesse and benefit of the day, the alarme arose, which from hand to hand was brought at last to Andrew Dore, who conuaying himselfe out of the backside, was receiued into a barke, and by her swiftnesse of sailes and oares, he auoyded the danger that was prepared against his life: onely the French men missing by misadventure the person of Andrew Dore, conuerted their rage vpon his pallace, which they sacked; and afterwards returned in safetie. Also Count Caezza hauing laid an ambuist betweene Millan and Monceo, ouerthrew fise hundred Launceknights and an hundred light horsemen who were sent out to eskort or safe-conduct the victuallers: but being afterwards sent to Bergama, he so afflicted that citie with pillage and robbing, that the Senate of Venice, who had established him captaine generall ouer their infanterie, decassed him and depriued him with infamie of their pay, whom in their compassion they could not indure in so great a custome of insolencie and avarice. About this time the Spaniards tooke the towne of Vigentina, and Belioyense who was escaped out of the hands of the French men, being sent by Antio. de Lena with two thousand footmen to surpris Pania, wherein was a garrison of five hundred footmen of the Duke of Millan, presented himselfe one night before the wals, but being discouered he was compelled to retire without anie effect. There arriued in the countrey of Genes a supply of two thousand footmen Spaniards, whom the Emperour sent out of Spaine either to defend Genes, or else to be conuerted to Millan, according to the necessitie and occasion of affaires. Belioyense went out to meete this supply and conduct them: who as they made shew that they would take the way either to Plaisance or of Casa, so Monsieur saint Poi put himselfe in preparation to stop their comming, and sent to sollicite the Venetian bands to make themselves strong at Loda, to the end that the bands of Millan should not come out to backe them: he laboured also to perswade them to execute ioyntly the enterprise of Millan, being therunto induced through the want of victuals and other dispaire of those wretched inhabitants. But the Duke of Urbino was not of that opinion, like as also the Venetians proceeded coldly in the braue actions of that time, wherein both for the report of Andrew Nauager their Embassadour now returned out of Spaine, and in regard of a certaine practise and intelligence which was entertained at Rome with the Emperours Embassadour, the opinions of the Senate were diuerse, manie inclining to haue an accord with the Emperour: and yet it was at last resolved to continue the confederatiō with the French king: at which time Toruello hauing passed the riuer of Thesin with two thousand footmen, tooke Basignan & went towards Lomelina: & the Abbot of Farsa going with his cornets of horsemen to Crescentin a place of the Duke of Sauoy, was defeated by night & taken prisoner: but being afterwards set at libertie by the working of the Marquis Montferat and the Marquis of Mus, he ouerthrew certaine regiments of Antio. de Lena, & tooke their artilleries.

There began to rise a doubt that the Pope inclined to the Emperours side, both for that the Cardinall Saint Crosse being arriued at Naples, caused to be deliuered three Cardinals who were there in ostage, and also according to the rumor that ran, he had commission from the Emperour to cause to be rendred Ostia and Cunitavecchia: and by his meane and working the Pope being also solicited, Andrew Dore restored to the Siemnoys Portochercole: but there were daily more and more arguments & testimonies that the Popes mind was caried with a disposition to new things, for that by his meane though secretly, Braccio Baillon for the interest of the affaires of Perousa, molested Malatesta, notwithstanding he was in his pay: and when he vnderstood that the Duke of Ferrara was come to Modena, he conspired to take him in his returning with an ambush of two hundred horsemen laid by Paule Luzzasquo vpon the confines of Modena: but for that the Duke stirred not out of Modena both the deuiſe was disclosed & the effect disapointed.

About this time the Realme of Naples notwithstanding the ouerthrow of the French was not entirely deliuered of the calamities of the warre: for, as Symon Romain hauing assembled new companies, had taken Nauo, Oriolo, and Amigdalaro, townes standing vpon the sea side at the point of the Appenine: so drawing to him into one strength Federike Carassa whom the Duke of Granino had sent with a thousand footmen, together with manie others of the countrey, he had an armie reasonably well compounded. But after the victorie of the Imperials about Naples, and being abandoned of the companies of the Duke of Granina, he entred into the towne of Barletta by the Castell, and putting it to sacke and pillage, he staid there: at what time the Venetians held Trany garded by Camilla, and Monopoly defended by Iohn Conrado, both captaines of the family of the Urjins. After this Ranse de Cere and the Prince of Melfe came into the kingdome with a thousand footmen: who being reduced betweene Nocero and Gualdo, and afterwards retiring from thence by the commandement of the Pope who would not offend the mindes of the victors, embarked themselves at Simigalo and went by sea to Barletto, with intention to renew the war in Powilla; a matter determined vpon by cōmon consent of the Confederats, to the end to constrain the Imperiall army to make their abode in the kingdome of Naples vntill spring time, at what time they drew to counsell & conference to make new prouisions for their commō safety: for which matter the French king sent to Ranse a reliefe & succors of monie, like as also the Venetians concurring with the king in the same desire, the rather to retaine more easily & keep still by the help of others, the townes which they had takē in Powilla, offered to furnish him of xij. gallies: but whē the king vrged them to arme & appoint those gallies, rescruiſing to defray the charge and and expences vpon the fourescore thousand duckets, whereunto they were bound by the contribution promised to M. Lawirech, they would not hearken to it. The king of England promised not to be behind with his part of the prouisions ordinarie: & the Plorentines had contracted to pay the third part of the companies which Ranse had leauied: the Imperials shewed no great readi-nesse or disposition to quench so great a preparation of trouble, being busied on all parts to exact money to satisfie the souldiers of their duties and payes past: wherein both to leaue those exactions with more facilitie, and the better to assure the kingdome with examples of seueritie: the Prince of Orenge euen in the market place of Naples, where the plague raged most, and in the publike view of the people, caused to be beheaded Federike Caietan sonne to the Duke of Tra- cetto, and Henrie Pandon Duke of Boniano, a discendant of one of the daughters of old Ferdinand king of Naples, together with foure other Neapolitans, extending also the same rigour of punishment vpon other places of the kingdome: with which maner of proceeding, no lesse pitifull in the persons, then dangerous for the example, he reduced into feare and astonishment the mindes of all men, not omitting to proceed against the absent, such as had followed the French faction with confiscation of their goods, which afterwards he suffered to be compounded for with money, & did not forget anie violence or extremitie by the which he might draw greatest summes of mony: all which actions of murder and oppression were supposed to haue their deuce and resolution by the wit of Ierome Moron, to whom was giuen in recompence of his seruices the Duchie of Boni- ano. To these emotions and stirres was added the exploit of Iohn Iacques Franco in Abruzza, who entred for the French king into Matrina, which is neare to Aquila, by whose coming all the parts & people of the countrey drew into commotion, neither was the region of Aquila without suspicion of rising, where lay sicke with fixe hundred footmen Serro Colommo: moreover, the Vene- tians made prouision for the affaires of Powilla, who sending by sea certaine companies of light horsemen to furnish Barletto, one part of the vessels which caried them, perished in the lakes of Barletto & Trany, where their Treasurer was drowned seeking to saue his life in a litle skiffe: the companies of horsemen, who had for their leader Iohn Conrado Ursin, being sore beaten with the rage of the tēpest, fell into the hands of the Imperials: & Iohn Paule de Cere, who made his shipwrack near Gnaß, remained prisoner to the Marquis. In the latter end of the yeare, the regio of A- quila became for the league, by the mean of the Bishop there, & good working of Count Mōiro with others of the exiles, who being hardly vsed by the Imperials, sought their remedy by reuolt.

Executions at Naples.

In the beginning of the yeare 1529 began to appeare on all sides certaine signes and good dispositions to peace, which seemed to carie a generall desire to be solicited and negociated in the Popes court: for, as there was good aduertisement that the Cardinall Saint Crosse (such was the title of the Spanish Generall) was gone vp to Rome with warrant from the Emperour to conclude a peace: so the French king, whose desire to end the warres was nothing inferior, dispatched to the same end a commission to his Embassadors, in which action also the king of England tooke interest, and in the same regard sent Agents to Rome, which matters of negociation and hope of peace ioyned to the trauell and wearinesse of Princes, brought the Confederates to proceede slowly in the prouisions of the warre, for that in Lombardie their greatest thought and care was, whether the Spaniards being come to Genes, could passe to Millan, from whence the Launceknights for want of pay, were almost all retired: & to conduct them thither, Belioyense with a hundred horf-men was gone vp as farre as Casa: and from thence in habite disguised was passed into Genes, frō whence he led the said footbands of Spaniards to Sauōna, with intention to gather together fīue hundred more newly come out of Spaine, and were disbarked at Villafranco.

But in the realme of Naples the Imperials could not but doubt, that the rebellion of Aquila & Matricia, together with the stirres and risings that had bene made in Powilla, would breed and bring forth some matter of farre greater importance: and therefore to cut off & remedie the mis-chiefe afore the ill were come to his fulnesse, they determined to conuert to the expugnation and suppression of those places, the forces they had: & in that resolution the Marquis of Gnaß with his regiment of Spanish footmen, was sent out to recouer the townes of Powilla: and the Prince of Orenge likewise with his Launceknights was dispatched to reconquer Aquila and Matricia: who as soone as he made his approches to Aquila, they that were within issued out, and left the place abandoned: the Prince compounding for the citie and the whole cuntry at a ranfome of an hundred thousand duckets, & tooke away by vertue of his conquest & contract the oblation of siluer which the French king Lewis the tenth had consecrated to S. Bernard: from thence he sent soldiers to Matruia, where lay in garrison Camillo Pardo with foure hundred footmē, who was gone away not manie dayes before with promise to returne againe: but being not without his feares, both for the want of wine, whereof was left no store, the necessitie of waters, which were all cut from them, and for the faction betweene the towne and the souldiers, which was strong and violent; and lastly, for some other reason, which men in their timorousnesse want not, he did not only not returne againe, but also he kept from them some of that reliefe of money which the Florentines had sent to him, for the defending and succouring of that place: by reason of which disorders, both their Leader hauing left them, and their wants without comfort or hope of relieuing, the souldiers went in their aray vpon the walles, and the townes-men rendred the place. The consideration of these good euent and issues, brought a feare least the Prince of Orange would passe into Tuscane, at the instance of the Pope, who being deliuered of a most daungerous, but short disease, ceased not to sollicite & giue hopes to all men: he promised the Frenchmen to sticke to the League, so farre forth as Rauenna and Senus were rendred to him: & he offered to compound vnder reasonable conditions with the Florentines and Duke of Ferrara, who touching the payments of money made before to Monsieur Lawtrech, affirmed that what he did in those paiments, was of his liberalitie, and not by vertue of obligation, for that the Pope had forborne to ratifie. On the other side, now that he had recouered (though at great charges) the Castles of Ostia & Ciuitaueccchia, by vertue of a cōmission which the Cardinall Saint Crosse had brought, he entertained with the Emperour intelligences more secret, and practises more certaine then before; yea, they debated rather vpon their affaires particular (which beganne to be managed in a course more assured and secret) then that there passed betweene them any action or solicitation, tending to the vniuersall peace: only in Barletto the state of affaires was this: Barletto was holden for the French king, within the which was Ranse de Cere, and with him the Prince of Messe, Federike Carassa, Simon Roman, Camillo Pardo, Galeas de Farnese, Iohn Conrard Ursin, and the Prince of Stigliano. The Venetians had Trany, Pulignany, and Monopoly: their forces in those places were two thousand footmen, and sixe hundred horsemen Albanais, whereof two hundred were within Monopoly: they had also at their deuotion the port of Biesiry. Now after the French king had sent in the beginning a small prouision of mony to those cōpanies, he forbore afterwards to relieue them with anie further supplies, nor did not accept the xij. bodies of Gallies offered to him by the Venetians, of which three perished in the lake of Biesiry with a great foist, as they went to reuiuall Trany & Barletto: and of the residue they had lost at sundry times fise more, sauing notwithstanding their artilleries and other furnishments. The Frenchmen held also the mount Saint Angeo, and Nardo in the quarter of Otranto and Castro, wherein was the Count Dugento: the actions of the warre were performed with the bodies & men of the kingdome, and with the forces of the countrey, many rebels to the Emperour were assembled in sundrie places, & many were drawne into companies and strength, who as aduenturers followed the warre for pillage only: so that the condition of the countrey was farre more miserable then any man would haue beleueed, euerie towne and place being laid open to robberies, prayes, ransoms & wretched burnings on all sides: only the extortions and inuasions of Simon Roman were more intollerable then any other, who ouer-running with his light horsemen, and a band of two hundred and fifty footmen all the partes and confines of those countries, brought oftentimes into Barletto great droues of cattell, and great quantity of corne, with other nature of bootie and spoyle: and in that liberty of warre running a race of vexation and crueltie, he would sometimes by surpris, and sometimes with force, inuade townes and places with wretched examples and actions of inhumanity: of which the towne of Canosa was a lamentable experience, where entring by night by the benefit of scaling ladders, he put the towne to sacke, and many of the inhabitants to death, whom he found sleeping in their last rest, he stripped likewise in that exploit manie horsemen of the fortie men at armes that lay in the Castle. At last the Marquis of Gnast forbearing to execute any action vpon Barletto, being a towne strong and fortified, setled his Campe in march before the towne of Monopoly with foure thousand Spaniards footemen, and two thousand Italians: for, the Launce knights being in number two thousand fise hundred, and staying in Abruzzza, refused to go to Pomilla: he encamped himselfe in a small valley so shadowed & couered with the mountaine, that he could not be endomaged with the artilleries of the town: in the towne were Camillo Ursin

Orsin and John Vetturio Treasurer, to whom Ranse sent speedily vpon the gallies three hundred footmen. Monopoly is a towne of small circuit, and hath the sea on three parts of it, and towards the land it beareth a wall of three hundred, or three hundred and fifty pases, with a ditch about it: right against this wall the Marquis caused to be made a bastillion within the shot of harquebutze, and two others vpon the sea shoare, of either side one: they beat the sea, and the gate towards the sea, and gaue impediment that no succours or victuals should enter by the helpe of the gallies: and so hauing made these preparations in the beginning of Aprill, the Marquis gaue the assault to Monopoly, where he lost more then five hundred souldiers, and many pyoners, besides three peeces of artilleries which were broken, retiring with his harmes about a mile and a halfe frō the place, for that he was not able to endure the vexation of the artilleries out of the towne: by reason of which retiring, the Venetians issued out, & ran vpon the bastillions which he had made, making slaughter of more then an hundred bodies, and with the same felicitie they assured the port or hauen by a Mount, which they raised vpon the shoare, right ouer against the bastillion of the enemies: neuerthelesse, though the Marquis was expulsed, yet he could not be made desperate, but making new approches to Monopoly, and returning from whence he was repulsed, he raised two caualliers to beate within the towne: he cast also trenches, to leade him euen vnto their ditches, and filled them with sixe hundred loades of earth rammed in baskets: but not long after that bastillion was burned by the industrie of two hundred footmen, issuing to that end out of Monopoly. Afterwards the Marquis being approached with a trench vpon the right side of the batterie, and hauing driuen another trench on the right side of the lodging of the Spaniards within a hand throwing of the ditch, and also after he had fortified a bastillion behind the same, he planted vpon it his artilleries, and executed threescore fadomes of wall thereabout within foure fadomes of the earth: but vnderstanding that the same night were entred new companies sent by Ranse, he retired his artilleries, and consequently the end of the moneth of May drawing on, he brake vp his campe. During the lying of this Campe before Monopoly, and after it was leauied and retired, there followed diuerse factions and emotions, both for the great harmes and damages done by them of Barletta by spoile and bootie, and also the garrison that was within mount Saint Angeo, hauing for Commaunder Federike Caraffa, tooke Saint Senero, and rescuing the towne of Viro, they compelled the Imperials to leaue their campe from before it. After that Caraffa went by sea with xxvj. sayles to Laciano, where lay an hundred & threescore men at armes, and entring the place by force, he brought away as testimonies of his valour, three hundred horse of service, and a great bootie of other natures of things, without leauing any garrison in the place. There were also many troupes of exiles, who did great harmes in Basillicano, for which difficulties as the Imperials exacted with all their industrie the taxes and impositions: so there is no doubt that if the French king had sent money, and anie reasonable supplie of succours, but new affaires and businesse had growne vpon the Imperials throughout the whole kingdome, which had at least so encombred the Emperours armie, that it would haue intangled the course of their owne affaires. But so disordred were their companies, both vndisciplined and accustomed to tumults, and deliuered vp without any succours or refreshing (for the Florentines ministred onely reliefe to Ranse) that they could not do any action of great consequence, seeing withall that both the Duke of Ferrara refused to send to Ranse by sea foure peeces of artilleries, & also the store of money & corne began to diminish within Barletta. Moreouer, about sixe hundred rebels of the countrie of Calabria, besieged by the Viceroy within Montlion, were driue for want of munition and victuals to render the place, and in that calamitie were led prisoners to Naples. Afterwards the Prince of Melfe with the armie by sea, and Federike Caraffa by land, went to encampe before Malfetta, a place aforesaid belonging to the Prince, where Federike in fighting for the safety of his life, was slaine with a stone: in reuēge of whose death the Prince extended his indignatiō so far vpō the towne, that taking it by force, he put it to a miserable sacke; a like misadueture fell vpō Simō Romā, for that as the Venetia army, which frō the cape of Ostronta vexed all the countrey, was drawne neare to Brūduſo, they set on land certaine cōpanies of soldiers, with whō was Simon Roman, and caried the towne, but in assaulting the rocke Simō was slaine with a bullet.

Whilest the realme of Naples was thus trauelled with diuerse successes, the matters of Lombardie suffered no great trāquillitie: M. Saint Poll about the end of March tooke by force the towne of Senarella, and the castie compounded to stand neuter: but the valour of the enemies recouered again the thing which by his industrie he could not keepe, for that he lost one night the towne, which earst he had wonne by force; the same with other reasons driving him, that he was no longer able to stop the Spaniards the way to Milan: he saw the diminution of the numbers of his campe for want of money, whereof as he received but a little from the king, so of that litle, being a Captaine of litle gouernment, he expended one part for himselfe, and suffered another part to be imbeached and robbed by his officers. The king and Venetians disputed what enterprize were good to take in hand: the king made instance to aduance the exploit of Genes, both for the importance of that Citie, and also for that it began to be a beleeefe amongst them, that the next sommer the Emperour would passe into Italy: and for that the king esteemed that the Venetians had neuer holpen him either to rescue or to recouer that: wherein notwithstanding they excused themselves, by an vniuersall rumour running in Italy of the descending of new Launceknights, yet he could not but doubt that they were ill contented to fauour the victorie of that enterprize. But the Venetians to obscure for the time the memorie of that exploit, brought into deuise the action of Milan, which both they laid out to be verie easie for the small number of souldiers that were with Antho. de Lema, and also they offered, that when the conquest of Milan were perourmed, they would adiminister to the enterprize and besieging of Genes: In which regard the resolution went by the kings consent, to embrace the enterprize of Milan with a campe of sixteene thousand footemen, of whom euerie one to make provision for the moity: This resolution was made in March, and in the absence of the Duke of Urbino, who, for that the Prince of Orenge and the Launceknights were drawne neare the confines of the kingdome, was retired vpon his owne estate, almost against the will of the Venetians: who neuertheless retained him of new into their pay, with the same conditions which aforetime they had passed to Bart. Aluiano and the Count Pesillano, sending him also for his defence three hundred horsemen and three thousand footmen, according to the contract of their obligation, and gaue the title of Gouvernour to Ianus Fregoso: there were in the armie of the Venetians fixe hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and foure thousand footemen, notwithstanding they were bound to maintaine twelue thousand. This armie the sixt of Aprill tooke by force Cassiano, and the rocke rendred to discretion, when Antho. de Lema and Tornuolo being come out of Milan to diuert or draw away the enemies, returned backe without doing any thing. The Spaniards passed from Genes to Milan, notwithstanding to stop them, there had bene made so manie deuices and resolutions: for where M. Saint Pol and the Venetians had supposed that they would make their passage by the parts of Tortona and Alexandria, theyooke at their departure from Vosaggio, and by the direction of Belioyense, the way that was more long by the mountaine of Plaisance, and places subiect to the Church: and being come to Varzy, in the layd mountaine, notwithstanding Saint Pol made to march from thence an hundred and fifty horsemen appointing their way to Loda, and also the companies of the Venetians, who for that they would be before, sent one part of their bands to the Duke of Milan, but both later by one day then they shold, & in lesse numbers then they promised, yet they passed by night the riuer of Paw at Areno, vsing the seruice of the vessels of Plaisance: so that being no more able to stop their vniing with Antho. de Lema, who for the more safetie & facility of their ioyning, was come to Landriano, within twelue miles of Pavia, they met and ioyned with him, and so being conducted to Milan, so poore and naked of all things, that they seemed to beare the resemblance of rogues, they increased the calamities of the inhabitants there, by putting them to spoyle and robbrie, even in the streetes. Thus was litle profitable to the French and Venetians all their actions and doings of the whole winter, which were extended to stop the passage of their souldiers to take Gany, & places enuironing Gonos and Casa; places doing great domages to the whole country. Moreouer Antho. de Lema tooke Binasquo by composition: but where the Spaniards had serued their turnes of the Barks of Plaisance, & that as was beleued, they had not remoued had they not bene assured that in case of necessitie they might retire into that citie, besides many other apparances and tokens, the Confederates began to rise in suspition, that the Pope specially touching the restitution of the Castles, was either entirely accorded, or at least verie neare to accord with the Emperour.

Deuices of the Pope to restore his house in Florence.

Now where the Pope in great secrecie, had disposed all his thoughts to recouer the estate of Florence, wherein albeit to circumuent the French Embassadours, he entertained sundrie practises, and led both them and the other Confederates in diuerse humours of hope to accord with the League:

League: yet being partly moued with feare of the greatnesse of the Emperour & the prosperitie of his affaires, and partly through hope to induce him more easily then he could induce the French King, to restore and reestablish his house in Florence, he inclined much more on the Emperours side then on the French Kings: he had also a vehement desire to make easie his deuice to draw to his deuotion the estate of Perousa, in which action it was beleueed that he entertained Braccio Baillon, who managed euerie day new driftes in those confines: by reason whereof, Malatesta doubting, least whilst he was in his pay, he should be oppressed with his fauour, thought it necessarie for him to seeke to put himselfe in the protection of another: therefore either induced with that reason, or caried with a couetousnesse after greater parties, or pushed on with a passion of ancient hatred, he refused to reenter into his pay, pretending that he was not bound for the whole yeare, but at his election, for that as he alleaged, the contract appeared not by writing, notwithstanding the Pope maintained a further obligation: so that he solicited to enter into the pay of the French and Florentines, complaining bitterly of certaine intelligences and practises entertained against him by the Cardinall of Cortona, and of a letter which he had surpris'd, written by the Cardinall Medici to Braccio Baillon. But the Pope seeking indirectly to stop the effect of his deuice, forbad by Edicts publike, that none of his subjects without his leaue, should take the payes of other Princes, vpon paine of confiscation: neuerthelesse, Malatesta forbore not for that to prosecute his deuice: the Frenchmen bound them to induce him with a charge of two hundred horsemen, two thousand Crownes pension, the order of Saint Michael, and in time of warre with two thousand footmen: and the Florentines gaue him the title of Gouvernour, two thousand Crownes pension, a thousand footmen in time of war, fiftie horsemen for his sonne, and fiftie for the sonne of Horatio, with five hundred Crownes for the pay of them both: they tooke vpon them the protection of his estate of Perousa; and aswell the French king as they made him one ioint allowance in time of peace, of an hundred Crownes the moneth, to entertaine ten Captaines: and the Florentines apart made him a pay for two hundred footmen for the guard of Perousa; and for his part, he was onely bound to this, to go to their seruice with a thousand footemen, when their affaires required; yea, though he should not haue the bands promised from the French king. Of this dealing the Pope complained highly to the French king, as a matter done directly to let him for disposing according to his will, of a citie which was vassall and subiect to the Church, the same making the king, who bare no mind to kindle the Pope, to deferre the action of ratification: and for the same cause, the Pope hoping to be able to alter or retire Malatesta, perswaded him to continue out his yeare; and at the same time he entertained secretly Braccio Baillon, Serro Colonna, and the exiles of Perousa, who hauing assembled and mustered bands of souldiers, lay encamped at Norcio. But all these practises, together with all offers & oblations serued to no purpose, for that Malatesta was resolutely fixed to continue no longer in the Popes pay; & as the Florentines ministred aid to him openly, so he feared so much the lesse those stirres or emotions, by how much they ceased forthwith, the Pope finding they were imperfect and insufficient to leade on his hopes to their effects. Besides, the Pope would not suffer the Duke of Ferrara to dwell in rest, and he was so farre off from obseruing the couenants made with the Duke, in the name of the Colledge of Cardinals, that the Bishopricke of Modena being newly fallen into vacation by the death of Cardinall Gonzaguo, an estate promised to the Dukes sonne by the said couenant, he bestowed it by his authority vpon Ierome Moron, seeking, vnder colour of refusing the possession, occasion to prouoke against him such a personage and minister, bearing great authoritie in the Emperours armie. He entertained also a practise with Ierome Pio, to occupie Reggia, & that by the meane and operation of Hubert de Cambraro, Gouvernour of Bologna: but when the Duke was informed of the state of the practise; and how far it extended, he passed Pio to such propertie of punishment, as his offence deserued: he laid plots also to surprise Ranema, which likewise sorted to none effect. And about this time, inclining dayly by apparant degrees to the Emperors part, & being also wel aduanced in the solicitation of things, he sent vnto him the Bishop of Vasano his steward: he called backe the cause of diuorce of the king of England, which he had done long time before, had not the regard of the Bul which was already in England in the hands of his Legate Campeius retained him: for, as the good fortunes of the Emperour increased in Italy, so he sought not onlie not to offend him further, but also to reuoke the offence he had done him already, being indeed determined before he was sicke,

ruine of the Cardinall of

to reuoke the cause: in which action he sent Francis Compagno into England to the Cardinall Campeius, dissembling to the king, that he was sent for other matters, including notwithstanding matter appertaining to that cause, where indeed he brought commission to Campeius to burne the Bull: & albeit Campeius for a maladie the Rope was fallen into, deferred for a time the execution of that commission, yet when he knew he was recured, he persourmed the thing he was commanded: so that the Pope being thus elucted of that feare, reuoked the cause, though not without great indignation of that king, especially when he required the Bull of the Legat, and vnderstood by him the vnworthie accident of it. These matters made both more seuer, and more readie the ruine and fall of the Cardinall of Yorke, whose authoritie the king supposed to be so great and gracious with the Pope, that if his marriage with the Lady Anne had bene agreeable to him, he might haue obtained of the Pope what dispensation he would. By which occasion, opening his eares to the enuie and malice of his aduersaries, he grew kindled against him, euen to the taking from him his goods and treasure of a wonderfull value, and in his indignation leaving him a small part of the reuenues of his benefices, he restrained him to his bishopricke, with a slender traine of seruants: and so not long after, either by a surprise of letters, which he wrote to the French king, or for some other purpose of malice of his enemies, who gathering by the kings speeches, that he was not without inclination towards him, and therefore feared least he would rise againe into his auncient authoritie, he was conuented to appeare in Counsell to speake for himselfe in matters to be objected against him: for which cause, as he was brought towards the Court as prisoner, he was sodainly taken with a fluxe, engendred either of the humor of disdain, or of the passion of feare, of which he died the second day after he was apprehended with the maladie; an example in our dayes worthie of memorie, touching the power which fortune and enuy hath in the Courts of Princes.

About this time fell out in Florence, to the great preiudice of the gouernment that then was, a new challenge against Nicholas Cappony Gonsalonier, it hapned almost vpon the end of the second yeare of his Magistracie, and was incensed principally by the enuie of some of the chiefe Citizens, who tooke occasion of the vaine suspitions and fond ignorances of the Commons: Nicholas Cappony, during all the time of his Magistracie, hath had these two principall objects, the one to defend himselfe against the fresh enuy of those that had bene honoured of the house of Medicis, suffering the principals amongst them to communicate with the other Citizens in the honours & counsels publike: and the other, not to stirre or make angrie the mind of the Pope in matters which were not of importance, touching the libertie. Of which things both the one and other had bene found profitable to the common wealth: for, like as many, euen of those, who were persecuted as enemies to the gouernment, being assured and embraced, had bene firmly conioyned with the others to preserue the state, knowing withall, that the Pope, for matters hapning in the times when the gouernment changed, was ill contented with them: so touching the Pope, albeit he desired vehemently the returning and restauration of his friends, yet hauing no new prouocation or matter of wrong, he had so much the lesse occasion to burst out, and to complaine, as he did continually with other Princes. But against these matters was opposed the ambition of certaine particulars of them, who knowing well enough, that if such should be admitted to the gouernment as had bene friends to the Medices, being indeed men of most experience & valour, that their estate and authoritie should be made lesse, laboured by all the studies & deuices they could, to keepe the common people full of suspicion, both of the Pope and of them, not sparing to slander the Gonsalonier, as well for those causes, as also to the end to depriue him of his Magistracie for the third yeare, to charge him that he bare not a mind so far estranged from the familie of Medices, as the interest and profite of the common weale required: which imputations and challenges not mouing him at all, and holding it verie necessarie not to haue the Pope incensed, he tooke the more libertie to entertaine him priuately with letters and Embassages, yet such as he had not begun nor prosecuted without the continuall priuie and knowledge of some such as were Principals and chiefe Magistrates, neither did he manage them to other end, then to retaine or retire the Pope from some act of precipitation: but whereas a letter that was sent to him from Rome, fell by misfortune into interception, bearing certaine words to breed suspicion in such as knew not the ground and foundation of those things, and the same letter being passed o-uer into the hands of some of those that sate and managed the supreme function, there were certaine certaine yong men prepared to sedition, who rising into armes, inuaded by force the publike palace, and in their insolencie restrained the Gonsaluer almost vnder guard, and going on to confirme this beginning with acts of manifest rebellion, they summoned together in maner of a tumult, almost all the Magistrates, and many Citizens, where they debated to depriue him of his Magistracie; which being approued in the great Counsell, his cause was afterwards referred to the examination of the law, wherein being absolved by iudgement and sentence, he was led with greater honour into his houses, accompanied with the greatest presence of the Nobility. In his place was preferred Frauncis Carduccio, a personage vnworthie of so great a dignitie, regarding his life passed, his customes, and his wicked ends and intentions.

Now began new stirres to appeare in Lombardy, M. Saint Pol having past the riuer of Paw at Valencia the xxvij. of Aprill, by reason of which proceeding the Imperials abandoned the borough of Balsignana, and the parish of Caira: from thence Saint Pol sent Guido Rangon with one part of the armie to Montaro; a place strong for the double ditches, flankes and waters: and as they had planted by night their artilleries, without prouisions of baskets, without trenches, and other like preparations, they were by day charged by those that were within, such as did the great harmes, and cloyed two peeces of their artilleries, and put the residue in daunger to be lost. At that time, albeit there was within Millan a slender prouision of things necessarie, yet the preparations of the French and Venetians were in no better condition, who complaining one of another, were both negligent to furnish things needfull: in so much, as amongst other difficulties, the Confederates fell into some doubt, that the Duke of Millan, for the litle hope he saw remaining to reconquer that state, either by his owne forces, or with their succours, would make some accord with the Imperials, by the meane and working of Moron. But the thoughts and deuices of the French king tended altogether to peace, for a distrust he had not to be able otherwise to recouer his children: whereunto also the Emperour bearing a manifest inclination, two Gentlemen, whom the Ladie Margaret had sent to him for that effect, were returned from Spaine, bringing to her ample commission to go through with the peace: of which when the French king was aduertised by a Secretarie of his, whom for that matter he had dispatched into Flaunders, he required the Confederates for their parts to adresse commissioners also: and having determined in himselfe to leaue there all the prouisions of the warre, yet seeking to worke some iust colour, he complained that the Venetians had refused to contribute to the money for his passage: who albeit in the beginning (so farre forth as the Emperour passed) they had earnestly solicited him to passe, which also the king had offered to perfourme with two thousand foure hundred Launces, a thousand light horsemen, and twentie thousand footmen, in case the Confederates would giue him money to pay about this, a thousand light horsemen and twentie thousand footmen, and contribute to the moitie of the expences of the artilleries: yet whatsoever was the occasion, they changed counsell, and retired from those offers.

- At this time Monsieur Saint Pol with foure cannons tooke Saint Angeo by force, wherein was a garrison of foure hundred footmen: and in the same expedition he conuerted his strength to Cotimbano, to open to his campe a passage of victuals from Plaisance, and made himselfe master of the place by composition. Afterwards, being informed that there lay a force of foure thousand footmen within Millan, but much weakened with maladies, he thought to assault it. The second of May Moraro rendred to Monsieur Saint Pol at discretion, though after it had suffered so great an execution of the artilleries, that there was no more possibilitie to make defence. Torniello left also the towne of Nonaro, but not the Castle, wherein he put a verie slender strength of footmen, and retired his person to Millan: so that the Imperials held no other peece beyond the riuer of Thezin then Gaya and the rocke of Biagrasa: Monsieur Saint Pol having also gotten the rocke of Vigenena. The tenth day he marched to the bridge of Lucqua to ioine with the Venetians at the borough of S. Martin. Here the Duke of Vrbino came to the armie, and from thence being gone vp to Behoyense to haue conference together, the resolution was in the common counsell to incampe before Millan with two armies on two sides, for which expedition M. Saint Pol passing ouer Thezin should turne to Biagrasa to force it, & the same day the Venetians to go to the borough of Saint Martin, which is within fife miles of Millan, the Venetians assuring that their campe contained 12000 footmen, & M. Saint Pol 8000, to whom was to be ioined the bands of footmen of the Duke of Millan. By this direction M. Saint Pol passed the riuer of Thezin, & finding the towne of Biagrasa abandoned, he carried the castle by accord: & so encamping at Gazzano, about viij. miles from Millan, he conferred of new with the Duke of Urbino at Imasquo the third of June: in which place they were credibly certified that the Venetians had not in their campe the one half of 12000 footmen according to the capitulation of the contract; a matter which for that M. saint Pol complained greatly upon, it was set downe that Millan should be approached with one campe. Only on that side of Lazzaretto, notwithstanding the protestation of Count Guido, who alleged that Anth. de Lena, at whose deuotion remained only Millan & Coma, was wont to say, that Millan could not be forced but with two camps: but not many dayes after, those opinions & counsels being changed, the Chieftaines of both the armies being assembled within Loda, the Dukes of Millan and Urbino notwithstanding they solicited before to haue the campe go to Millan, and were flatly against the expedition of Genes, yet they were now of a contrarie aduise, the Duke of Urbino alleging many reasons to iustifie that new counsell: but principally he insisted upon this, that seeing the Emperor made preparation to passe into Italie, for whose conduct Andrew Dore was departed from Genes with his gallies the eight of June: and withall seeing in Germany there was intention to send new companies of Launceknights into Italy vnder Captaine Felix, he stood indifferent, and in his reason and experience could not finde out whether it were better to take Millan, or not to take it: these were the reasons he inferred, but it was beleueed, that for an opinion he had of the succeeding of the peace which was negotiated in Flaunders, he had signified to the Senate of Venice, that it was a matter vnprofitable to put themselves in expences for the recovery of Millan: the summe & conclusion of his counsell was, that the regiments of the Venetians should tarry at Cassiana, the companies of the Duke of Millan to keepe within Paui, and M. saint Pol to lie at Biagrasa: & they, by the seruice of their horsemen, to stop that there entred no reliefe of victuals into Millan; where it was supposed they wold within short time fall into want of food, for that a very small portion of the countie was conuerted to tillage and sowing. This opinion could not be altered in him by any reasons or inducements of M. saint Pol, neither did he approue the abiding of him and his armie at Biagrasa, alleging, that to pine and hunger Millan, it was enough that the Venetian regiments remained at Moncio, and the bands of the Duke of Millan at Paui, and at Vigena, he said also that the king pressed him, that in case he went not up to incampe before Millan, then to execute the enterprise of Genes, which he had in intention to attempt with a great celerity; hoping that in the absence of Andrew Dore, Cesar Fregosa, to whom the French king had made a graunt to be Gouverneur & not his father, would reduce that state to alteration with a very small strength of footmen. But these proceedings and expeditions, together with an information how much was diminished in footmen the armie of the Confederates, did so assure Anth. de Lena of all daungers for Millan, that he sent out Torniello with a verie slender strength of horsemen, and three hundred footmen to recouer Nonaro, obseruing the oportunitie, whilest the French and Venetians were wandering betwene the riuer of Tesin and Millan: he made his entrie by the castle, which was holden for the Imperials, by which commoditie he recouered Nonaro, and afterwards sallied out with his forces to pill the countrey, and get victuals. But this conquest was not without his contrarie accidents, for that as the Captaine of Nonaro was issued out of the Castle, & walked into the towne, two souldiers of the Duke of Millan, and three inhabitants of Nonaro that were prisoners in the Castle, fell upon the Captaine, and slue him, with the aide of certaine others that wrought at the Castle: & in the same fortune making prisoners certaine Spanish footmen, their valour made them Lords of the place, hoping after so great an aduerture to be succored by their friends, they tooke the reason of their hope upon this, that the Duke of Millan as soone as he vnderstood that Torniello was gone out, hauing a feare and ielousie of Nonaro, had dispatched into those quarters his brother Iohn Paule with a good strength of horsemen and footmen, and he in that expedition was already gone up and arrived at Vigena: but Torniello was no sooner aduertised of the accident of the Castle, then he returned with speed to Nonaro, where what with threats, which preuaileth much where the hope is lesse then the perill, and what with preparations to giue the assault, which cannot but make timorous such as haue no remedie in their danger, he so astonished the said souldiers of the Duke of Millan, that compounding only for the safetie of their persons, they rendred the Castle without caring for the liues of the inhabitants of Nonaro, by whose valor they executed the exploit of the Castle. It was determined to vex Millan as much as might be with the forces of the Venetians & regiments of the Duke of Millan, notwithstanding withstanding the Duke of Millā alleged that because he wold be more neare the lands of the Venetiās, he wold not abide at Monceto, but at Cassiano: & M. Saint Pol, who lay encamped at the Abbey of Bibaldono, determined to returne beyond the riuier of Pau to draw towards Genes. According to which resolution he marched vpon lodge at Landriano, which is twelue miles from Millan betweene the wayes of Loda and Paula: and minding the day following, which was the xxj. of Iune, to encampe at Lardiragno vpon the way of Pania, he sent before his artilleries, his carriage and the auantgard, and departed himselfe somewhat later with the battell and the reregard. But when Anthony de Lena was aduertised by his espials where he made his abiding, and how the auantgard was gone before, he issued out of Millan with his souldiers all couered for their vppermost garments with white shirts: and because of long time his bodie had bene reduced to debility by dolors and griefes, he caused his owne person to be armed in a chaire which foure men bare: and by that time he was come within two miles of Landriano without sound of drumme, he vnderstood by his espials that Saint Pol was not yet departed from Landriano: so that ioyning celeritie to the fauours which the time and occasion offered, he hastened his march & charged vpon them before they were aware of his comming. The first esquadron of the Frenchmen commannded by Iohn Thomas de Gallera, was so farre marchēd away, that he could not in time be at the succours of the residue. And albeit Monsieur S. Pol reposing much in a regiment of two thousand Launceknights, was descended on foot and fought valiantly, yet after they had maintained a light defence, he saw the begin to retire, in whose valour he had layed vp his chiefest confidence. And albeit they were sustained and rescued by Iohn Ieronimo de Castillon and Claudo Rangon, Commanders ouer two thousand Italians, who expressed great effects of their valour: yet in the end both the horsemen and Launceknights not able to stand against the furie and fortune of their enemies, turned their backs, leauing a wretched effect of the hope that was conceiued of them. By their example the Italians did the like: and Monsieur Saint Pol despairing to find by fighting the safetie which the residue could not find by flying, was estoones remounted vpon his horse, and as he would haue passed ouer a great ditch, he fell into the calamitie of a prisoner, hauing partaking with him in that fortune, Iohn Ieronimo de Castillon, Claudo Rangon, Liquacke, Carbon, with other leaders of importance. All the companies were defeated, many horsemen taken prisoners, and all the baggage and traine of the armie and the artilleries rifled. Almost all the men at armes found safetie in the swiftnesse and running of their horses, together with Count Guido leading the auantgard with whom he retired into Pania, and from thence in the beginning of the night, the same feare following them now being free and at large, which they saw in the extremitie of their perill, they went to Loda, but so perplexed with astonishment, that they were almost at point to breake and disorder of themselves. Many of the souldiers remained in the wayes; their horses hauing no forces to carie them whither their feare would chase them; and the Captaines excused their running away, for that their companies were not payed, of whom the French bands returned all into Fraunce.

Thus armes and warre being almost layed aside through all Italy, by reason of the hard euents and aduersities of the Frenchmen, the cogitations of the greatest Princes were conuerted and disposed to accord: the first accord that succeeded, was betweene the Pope and the Emperour, which was concluded at Barcelona to the Popes great aduantage: wherein the Emperour had the one of these two reasons, either for that hauing a great desire to passe into Italy, he sought to take away all impediments to his voyage, accounting it in that regard verie necessarie to haue the Popes amitie: or else for that he would with verie large and ample capitulations giue the Pope a greater occasion to forget the wrongs and offences which he had receiued of his Agents and his armie. The substance of the accord was this: That betweene the Pope and the Emperour should be a perpetuall peace and confederation: That the Pope should giue passage to the Emperours armie through the dominions of the Church; in case it should depart out of the kingdom of Naples: That the Emperour in contemplation of the newe mariage, and for the tranquillitie of Italy, should restore in Florence the sonne of Lawrence de Medici, to the same estate of greatnesse, wherein were his predecessors before they were expulsed, hauing notwithstanding regard to the expenses which were to be defrayed for the said restitution, according to the arbitration to be made as well by him as the Pope: That the Emperour should assay as soone as he could, either by armes or some other way more comely, to reestablishe the Pope in the possession of

Cernia, Ravenna, Modena, Reggia, and Rubiero, without prejudice to the rights of the Empire and the sea Apostolike: That the Pope hauing recovered the townes aboue said, should accord to the Emperour the inuestiture of the Realme of Naples in remuneration of that benefit, and should reduce the tribute of the last inuestiture to a white horse for a fine or acknowledgement of chiefe: That he should accord to him the nomination of xxiiij. Cathedrall Churches, for the which they were in difference, remaining to the Pope the disposition of the Churches which should not be in patronage, & of other benefices: That when the Emperour should be passed into Italy, the Pope and he should meete and commune together, to consult of the particular quiet of Italy, and the vniuersall peace of Christendome, receiuing one another with ceremonies and honors due and accustomed: That the Emperour, in case the Pope required the aide of the arme secular to conquer Ferrara, should assist him euen to the end as Advocate, Protector, and eldest sonne of the sea Apostolike, and that with all the good meanes, which at that time should be in his power: and that they should agree of the expences, proceedings, and formes to be vsed according to the qualitie of times and accidents: That the Pope and Emperour with a common counsell should deuise some meanes to draw lawfully into iustice and examination of the law by Iudges not suspected, the cause of Francis Sforce, to the end he might be restored if he were found innocent: That otherwise the Emperour offered (notwithstanding the disposing of the Duchie of Milan appertained to him) to dispose of it with the counsell and priuite of the Pope, and to inuest in it no person which should not be agreeable to him, nor otherwise to transferre it, but in sort as he shall thinke most expedient for the tranquillitie of Italy: That the Emperour promised to make to consent Ferdinand king of Hungaria his brother, that for the time of the Popes life and two yeares after, the Duchie of Milan should be furnished of saltes from Cernia, according to the confederation made betweene the Emperour and Pope Leo, confirmed in the last inuestiture of the kingdome of Naples, not approuing neuerthelesse the couenant that had bene made with the French king, and without prejudice to the rightes of the Empire and the king of Hungaria: That neither of them apart, to the prejudice of this confederation, should make touching matters of Italy, new leagues, nor obserue such as were made to the contrarie of this: and yet neuerthelesse the Venetians might enter this league, so farre forth as they left all that they possessed in the Realme of Naples, and accomplished all their obligations to the Emperour and Ferdinand by vertue of the last confederation made betweene them, and also to restore Ravenna and Cernia, reseruing the rights of the domages and interests suffred in regard of these matters: That the Emperour and Ferdinand should do all that they could to haue the Heretikes reduced and brought home to the true way, wherein as the Pope should vse spirituall remedies, so in case they would stand obstinate, the Emperour and Ferdinand should force them by armes, and the Pope to labour other Christian Princes to assist them according to their seuerall meanes: That the Pope and the Emperour should not receiue the protection of the subiectes, vassals, and feodatories of one another, but for the regard of the iurisdiction direct which they had of anie one, without extending anie further: And that all protections taken in other forme should be interpreted void and derogate within one moneth: That to make this amitie and coniunction more firme and stable, they were to confirme it with the strait knots of parentage, the Emperour promising to giue for wife Margaret his bastard daughter with a dowrie of twentie thousand duckets of yearly reuenue, to Alexander Medici sonne to Lawrence late Duke of Vrbino, vpon whose person the Pope determined to conuert and bestow the temporall greatnesse of his house, hauing at such time as he was in danger of death created Cardinall, Hipolito sonne of Julian. They contracted at the same time in articles seperate: That the Pope should accord to the Emperour and to his brother to resist the Turke, the fourth part of the reuenues of benefices Ecclesiastike, in the same maner that his Predecessor Adrian had done: That the Pope should giue absolutio to all those, who within Rome & other places had offended against the sea Apostolike, & to all such as had ministred any property of aid, counsell or fauor, or that any way participated, or secretly approued, or expressly allowed, or directly had consented, to the actioes that had bin done: That where the Emperour had not published the Croissade granted by the Pope, which was lesse ample then others that had bene before times granted, that the Pope (the first being reuoked) should passe another of more full & ample forme according to the scope of those that had bin granted by the late Popes Julio & Leo. Before this accord was passed, & after all the difficulties were were resolved, advertisement came to the Emperour of the ouerthrow of Monsieur Saint Pol: in regard of which successe, so honorable for the reputation of his armies there, and no lesse profitable for the generall estate of his affaires, albeit it was doubted, that to helpe his conditions, he would haue chaunged some branch or article of matters agreed vpon, yet he confirmed them all both in substance and circumstance, and with a singular readinesse ratified them the same day, which was the xxix. of Iune, accomplishing with solemne oath before the high Altar of the Cathedrall Church of Barcelona.

But the negotiations of peace betweene the Emperour and the French king were not pursued with lesse deuotion and diligence: and the better to aduance them to some good successe and issue, after the commissions on all sides were come, the towne of Cambray was indifferently appointed for the assembly and meeting; a place fatall for so great conclusions, and where were to conferre together, the Ladie Margaret of Austria & the Ladie Regent mother to the French king. The French king labored with all his meanes and diligence (though he meant not in him selfe to performe it) which also he confirmed by promises to the Confederate Embassadors of Italy (hauing therein the consent & priuie of the king of England) not to make any accord with the Emperour without the consent and satisfaction of the Confederates: for, he feared least they entring into a ielousie and suspicion of his will, would preuent him, & be the first that would compound with the Emperour, and by that meane to leaue him excluded out of the amitie of both sides. In which respect he sought to perswade them not to hope in the peace, but rather to keepe their thoughts disposed and turned to the prouisions of the warre: wherein to establish some good order & forme of proceeding, not ceasing to sollicite continually, he had sent into Italy the Bishop of Tarby with commission to go to the states of Venice, the Dukes of Milla, Ferrara & Florence, both to sollicite prouisions appertaining to the warre, and to promise that if the Emperour passed into Italy, he would also descend at the same time with a mightie armie, so far soorth as the other Confederats would contribute for their part touching the preparations needfull. Neuerthelesse the negotiations of accord continued more and more; in so much as the seuenth day of Iuly both the Ladies made their entries into Cambray by seuerall gates with a great pompe, and being lodged in two houses adioyning, hauing an entrie the one within the other, they spake together the same day, & gaue order to their agents to treat of the articles: wherein because the king wold be neare at hand to resoluue all difficulties occurring, he was gone vp to Compiequo, to whom the Venerians, hauing feare of the issue of that coniunction, had made many large and great offers. And for the more absolute negociation of this peace, there were sent to Cambray as interposers in the action, the Bishop of London and the Duke of Suffolke Embassadors for the king of England, with whose consent and participation that assembly was made. The Pope sent thither the Archbishop of Capua. There was also a presence of Embassadors from all the Confederates: to whom the Frenchmen made relation of things farre otherwise then was the truth of that that was debated: wherein the king either retained so great an impietie, or else had so simple and sole a thought of his interest particular, which consisted wholly in the recouerie of his children, that where the Florentines made great instance to him, that according to the example of king Lewis his father in law and his predecessour, in the yeare a thousand five hundred and twelue, he would consent that they might accord with the Emperour for their safetie: he refused it, vnder this promise, that he would neuer make anie accord without comprehending them in it, assuring them also that he was most readie to follow the warre, and promised no lesse to all the others, euen in the greatest heate of solicitation for peace. About the three & twentieth day of Iuly came advertisement of the capitulations made betweene the Pope and the Emperour, at what time albeit the present negociation was wel aduanced, yet it was so troubled and hindered for some difficulties touching certaine townes of Franche Comte, that the Ladie Regent gaue order to prepare to depart. Neuerthelesse by the working of the Popes Legat, and principally by the operation and good office of the Archbishop of Capua, the conclusion was established, the French king not leauing to promise to the Confederates the same things he had offered before. At last, being the fift day of August, the peace was solemne published in the great Church of Cambray, whereof the first article contained: That the kings sonnes should be redeliuered, so farre soorth as their father payed to the Emperour for their ranfome, twelue hundred thousand crownes in readie money, and to the king of England for him two hundred thousand: That the king should render to the Emperour within six weekes after the ratification, all that he possessed in the Duchie of Milhan: That he should leaue vnto him Asi with resignation of the rights appertaining: That he should leaue as soone as he could, Barletto, with all those peeces which he held in the Realme of Naples: That he should require the Venetians that according to the forme of the capitulations of Cognar, they should render the towne of Powilla: That in case they would not, he should declare himselfe their enemy, and aide the Emperour to recouer them with a monthly contribution of thirtie thousand crownes, and with twelue gallies, foure shippes, and foure gallions payed for sixe moneths: That he should restore as much as was in his power of the price of the gallies taken at Portofino, or else to answere the value, deducting and defalking so much as had bene taken since by Andreu Dore or other the Emperours Ministers: That according to the former covenants at Madrik, he should renounce the soveraigntie of Flanders and Artois, and resigne the rights of Tournay and Arras: That he should call in the processe against the Duke of Barbon, and render to him that was dead his honour, and to his heires his goods: and yet the Emperour complained afterwards, that as soone as the king had recouered his children, he tooke them from them: That the goods of whom so euer occupied in regard of the warre, should be restored to their successours: in which point the Emperour tooke occasion also to complaine, for that the king made not restitution of the goods occupied vpon the Prince of Orange: That all bills of defiance and challenge should be suppressed and cancelled, and chiefly that of Robert de la Marche. The Pope was comprehended in this peace as principall, and the Duke of Sauoy was generally included as subiect to the Emperour, and specially brought in by the nomination of the Emperour. It was also set downe that the king should meddle no more in the affaires of Italy nor of Germanie in fauour of any potentate, to the prejudice of the Emperour, notwithstanding the French king in times following maintained that he was not by that defended to recouer that which the Duke of Sauoy vsurped vpon the Realme of France, as also all that he pretended to appertaine vnto him by reason of the rights and claimes of the Ladie Regent his mother. There was also one article which bare that in the peace it was meant, that the Venetians and Florentines should be comprehended so farre forth, as within foure moneths they were at a point with the Emperour for their differences, which was a kind of secret and silent exclusion: That the like should be of the Duke of Ferrara: but touching the Barons and exiles of the Realme of Naples, there was no mention made of them.

As soone as this accord was past to conclusion, the French king went immediatly to Cambray to visite the Ladie Margaret: and being not without some shame for so foule a fact against the confederates, he eschewed for certaine daies with sundrie euasions, either to see or heare their Embassadours: but in the end giuing them audience apart, he excused himselfe vpon the impossibilitie to recouer otherwise his children: onely he gaue them comfort that he would send the Admirall to the Emperour for their benefit: he gaue them also sundrie other sweete and vaine hopes, promising seuerally to the Florentins to lend them for the remedie of their dangers imminent, fortie thousand duckets; a promise performed with the same fidelitie that his other offers were: & he suffred as though it tended to their benefit, Peter Stephen Colonne whose seruice he would accept no more, to go to their pay. But during the action and sollicitation of these things, Antho. de Leua had recouered Biagrasa, and the duke of Vrbino remaining at Cassiano, which he laboured with the hands working of infinit Pioners to fortifie, compelled them of Pavia and S. Angeo to hold good: saying that the lodging of Cassiano was verie apt to minister succours to Loda & Pavia. Afterwards Antho. de Leua went vp to Enzagua, a place within three miles of Cassiano, from whence he sent out continually bands of soldiers to skirmish with the Venetians: & lastly from Enzagua he drew to Vauvy, either for that he meant to run vp vpon the territories of Bargamasquo, or else because the Venetians had cut from him the course & vsage of all water. Vissarino about this time entred into Valencia by the Castell, & cut in peeces a garrison of two hundred footmen that were there: and by this time were arriued by sea at Genes a regiment of two thousand Spaniards to tarie for the comming of the Emperour, who immediatly after he had passed the accord with the Pope, sent direction to the Prince of Orange, to reinforce the armie and inuade at the Popes request the estate of the Florentines: and when the Prince was come to Aquila, and mustred his companies vpon the frontiers of the kingdome, he was solicited vehemently by the Pope to aduaunce and passe further: for which sollicitation he went vp to Rome the last of Iuly without his forces, to resoluue with the Pope vpon the prouisions for the warre: where where after many actions and negociations which sometimes were vpon the point to be broken, for the difficulties which the Pope objected touching the defrayments: it was at last resolved that the Pope should deliuer to him presently thirty thousand duckats, and within a very short time after forty thousand more, to the end that at the Emperours expences he might first reduce to the obedience of the Church the estate of Perousa, by chasing out Malatesta Baillon, and afterwards make inuasion vpon the Florentins, to readdress in that City the family of the Medices; an enterprise which the Pope esteemed of very easie action, for an opinion he had, that being abandoned on all sides, they would according to the custome of their elders, rather giue place to the time, then to bring vpon their countrey a most manifest daunger. Vpon these conditions the Prince of Orenge assembled his forces, which contained 3000 Launceknights, the remainders as well of those companies, which the Viceroy had brought out of Spaine, as of others who had passed out of Germany into Italy vnder George Fronspergh, and foure thousand Italians not payed vnder these Colonels, Peter Lewis de Farnese, the Count Saint Second, Colonel Martio, and Serre Colonna. For their better safety in approching any place, and to execute any peece of force, the Pope caused to be drawne out of the Castell Saint Angeo, and to be caried with them, three Cannons with other peeces of artilleries: and after the Prince of Orenge, was to follow the Marquis of Guast with the bands of Spanish footmen that were in Powilla. But at Florence both the generall deliberation was farre otherwise, and the minds of particular men verie resolute to defend their countrey and their liberty; an euent contrary to that which the Pope expected of that Citie.

Whilest these preparations were managed on all parts, the person of the Emperour departed from Barcelona with a great fleet of ships and gallies, fraughted with a thousand horsemen, and 9000 footmen: and after he had run not without perill and trauell a course of fifteene dayes at sea, he arriued the twelfth of August at Genes, where was brought to him the first aduertisement of the accord made at Cambrai: and at the same time passed for him into the parts of Lombardy, Captaine Felix, whom he had taken into his pay with eight thousand Launceknights. The descending of the Emperour, with such a puissant preparation, made astonished the minds of all the regions of Italy, being now assured that they were left and deliuered vp for pray by the French kings: and therefore the Florentins who in that astonishment were no lesse carefull then apprehended to the charge of good Citizens, vpon the first aduertisements they had of his coming, sent out foure Embassadors of the most principall and chosen of their towne, to congratulate his coming, and to labor to make some composition with him for their affaires. But afterwards either vpon better consideration of things, or vpon the common custome of men to receiue comfort when they know the vttermost of their mishap, they tooke courage, and began to moderate their commissions, restraining their Embassadors to debate only with him of their interests, and not to meddle with the differēces of the Pope: wherein they hoped that both for the memory of things past, and for the litle confidence which is wont to be betweene Popes and Emperours, he would be so much discontented with the Emperours greatness, as to be driuen to desire that the authority and forces of the estate of Florence might be adioyned to the power of the Church. The Venetians were discontented that the Florentins being ioynt Confederates with them, had sent Embassadors to their common enemy without communicating with them. The Duke of Ferrara made also the same complaint, notwithstanding that following their example he dispatched Embassadors to the Emperour as well as they. The Venetians consented that the Duke of Milan should do the like: but he had long time before entertained a secret practise with the Pope, to bring him to compound with the Emperour, which he did so much the more sollicite and aduance, by how much he knew euen before the ouerthrow of S. Pol, that he could lay no good ground of hope in the French king nor in the Venetians.

The Emperour disbarke at Sauona the bands of Spanish footmen which he had brought with him, and conuerted them into Lombardy, to the end Anth. de Lena might issue out strong into the field: he made an offer to disbarke the at Spetio, to the end to send the into Tuscane: but the Pope had an opiniō that so many forces were not necessary, especially seeing he wished (for the preservation of the countrey) not to address without need so great a fury against the towne of Florence: and yet proceeding now openly against that state and against Malatesta, he caused to be stayed, in the toynes of the Church the knight Sperello, who before the capitulation of Cambrai being sent with mony by the French king to Malatesta who had ratified his pay, returned to Perouza. He caused also to be stayed neare to Bracciano, the money sent by the Florentins to the Abbot of Farfa being entertained in their pay with two hundred horsemen, to the ende he might leauy for their seruice a thousand footmen: but he was constrained eftsóones to render to it againe, for that where the Pope had appointed Legates with the Emperour, the Cardinals of Farnese, S. Crosse and Medici, of whom S. Crosse passing by his lands, the Abbot caused him to be stayed, and would not redeliuer him if first he had not restored to him his money. The Florentins continued still in their preparations, and as they had in vaine moued the Emperour for a surceassing of armes vntill he had giuen audience to their Embassadours, so prohibiting for the euill before the mischiefe hapned, they sent to sommon Don Hercules eldest sonne to the Duke of Ferrara, whom six moneths before they had taken into their pay with title of Captaine generall, to come to their succors with his companies according to the Articles of the contract. But notwithstanding he had receiued the money that was sent him for imprest, to wage a thousand footemen allowed for his gard when he marched, yet his father preferring considerations of estate before fidelity, made him refuse to go thither, without that he payed backe againe the money, but sent to their aydes his bands of horsemen: by reason of which dealing the Florentins denied him the election of the second yeare.

By the xix. day of August the Prince of Orenge was come to Terny, and the Launceknights to Fuligno where was mustred the whole army: but it was a matter ridiculous, that notwithstanding the peace was made and published betweene the Emperour and French king, yet the Bishop of Tarba as the kings Embassador at Venice, Florence, Ferrara, and Perouza, did not onely boast of the mighty prouisions his king made for the warre, but also comforted them to do the like. After this the Prince of Orenge with six thousand footmen aswell Launceknights as Italians, came and incamped neare to Spello, where presenting himselfe before the towne accompanied with many horsemen to view the situation, it hapned that Iohn Urbina, a man for his long trayning in the warres of Italy, of the best place & reputation amongst all the Captaines of the Spanish infantry, was hurt with a shot out of the towne in the thigh, of which wound he died within few dayes after, to the great damage of the army, for that almost the whole course of the warre passed by his counsell and gouernement. In reuenge of whose death the artilleries were planted before Spello, wherein was a strength of more then siue hundred footemen and twenty horse, vnder the leading of Lyon Baillon baltard brother to Malatesta. But after there were spent certaine volleys of shot vpon a tower which is without the towne on the wall side, the defendants notwithstanding Lyon had giuen a great hope to Malatesta to preserve the towne, yeelded immediately, vpon condition that the towne and inhabitants should remaine at the discretion of the Prince, & the souldiers with their liues saued & so much goods as they could cary, should go out in safety with their swords only, and not to serue against the Pope nor the Emperour in three moneths. Neuerthelesse contrary to their assurance giuen, which by the law of armes is a warrant sufficient and able, they were almost all stripped & spoyled at their going out: Iohn Baptista Burgeso one of the exiles of Sienna was vehemently charged with this accord, who hauing begun to treat with Fabio Petrucci that was in the army, made perfect the conclusion by the ayde of the other Captaines; a matter which Malatesta referred to disloyalty, but many others attributed it to faintnesse of courage. After the Embassadors of Florence who first presented themselues before the Emperour had congratulated his coming, they began to signifie vnto him, that as their city was not ambitious, but thankfull for benefits receiued, and ready to offer all the offices and commodities they could to whom so euer would professe the protection & preservation of it: so they sought to excuse their action of entring into league with the French king, vpon the will and inclination of the Pope, who then commanded them, and vpon the law of necessity which had hitherto compelled them to continue in it. They said, they could not passe further, for that they were not enabled by commission: only they had expresse commandement from their common-wealth nor to open their eares to any practise with the Pope, and to visite his other Embassadours, but not the Cardinall Medici. The great Chauncellor newly called to the dignity of Cardinall, made them answer, that it was necessary they should satisfie the Pope and reduce him contented both of their doings and of their meanings: and they complaining of the iniustice of that demaund, he eftsóones replied, that seeing their City was confederate with the enemies of the Emperour, and had sent out armed bands hands against him, that it was fallen from her priuiledges & diuolued to the Empire, and therefore it was in the Emperour to dispose of it according to his owne arbitration. But at last it was said vnto them on the Emperours behalfe, that they should procure to be sent to them sufficient commission to compound with the Pope, and that afterwards should be considered the differences that were betweene the Pope and them, which if they were not first resolued and compounded, the Emperour would not commune with them of their poper interests. Whereupon the estate of Florence dispatched a commission very large and ample to compound with the Emperour, but not to accord with the Pope: in so much as the Emperour departing from Genes the xxx. of August and went vp to Plaisance, the Embassadors following his Court were not admitted into Plaisance, for that it was vnderstood that their commission was not such as the Emperour had demanded: by which meane all things suspended and remained without accord. The Emperour caused also to depart from his Court the Embassadors of the Duke of Ferrara, whom he receiued with hard termes: and yet returning afterwards with new conditions, and haply with new fauors, they were admitted & heard. Moreouer the Emperour sent Embassador to the French king, the Count Nansun, to congratulate with him the new accord confirmed with the knot of parentage, & to receiue the ratification. In recompense of which Embassage & for the same expedition, the king sent to him the Admirall of France. The king sent mony to Ranse de Cere, to the end that with all his companies he might retire from Pouilla, and caused to be rigged twelue gallies to be sent thither vnder Philip Dore against the Venetians, against who the Emperour sent out Andrew Dore xxxvij. gallies. Neuerthelesse the king iudging that the recouering of his children would be more certaine, if there remained any difficulty in Italy to the Emperour, he continued to giue diuerse hopes to the Confederates, & promised particularly to the Florentins to send mony to the secretly by the Admirall, not that he had any desire to minister to the wants of them or the others, but to the end they should shew themselves more hard and seuerer to compound with the Emperour.

During all this while there was solicited a continuall practise of accord betweene the Emperour and the Duke of Millan, the action whereof was managed wholly by the Pronotory Caraccioli, whose office was to come and go from Cremona to Plaisance. But where the Emperour held it strange that the Duke reposed lesse confidence in him then he looked for, and the Duke on the other side was hardly brought to trust him at all, there was an ouerture and motion made, that til the Dukes cause were thoroughly examined, Alexandria and Pania should be deposed of trust into the Popes hands. To this the Emperour would not consent, both for that he thought the Duke was not able to resist his forces, and also for that Anth. de Lema was gone vp to Plaisance, who being alwayes an enemy to peace and quietnesse, had incensed the Emperour with many reasons to pursue the war: and therefore the Emperour charged him to go on with the enterprise of Pania, hauing a deuice also, that at the same time Captaine Felix who was come with the new supplies of Almans, as well footmen as horsmen, and with artilleries, and had first passed by Pesquero, and afterwards was entred vpon the lands of Bressia, should make warre on that side vpon the Venetians: of which expedition he had made Captaine generall the Marquis of Manina, newly returned to the deuotion of the Imperials.

All this while the Pope was not idle to labor a pceace betweene the Emperour and the Venetians, with hope to conclude it at his coming to Bologna: for that where he had before solicited to meet the Emperour and confer with him at Genes, they had sithens by comon consent referred the place of their enteruiue to Bologna, chiefly for many apt comodities which that city yeelded to so great an assembly. They were not induced being Princes of the greatest importance to meete together by a common desire only to confirme the league of their new amity & coniunction: but also they had to cary them their further seuerall respects; the Emperour pushed on by necessity, being determined to take the Crowne of the Empire; & the Pope by ambition, hauing a desire to aduance the enterprise of Florence: and in them both indifferently did concur a ioynt deuotion to establish some orderly forme ouer the affaires of Italy, a matter which they could not accomplish without resoluing the affaires of the Venetians and Duke of Millan, and without keeping some good hand vpon the imminent dangers of the Turke, who being entred into Hungary with a puissant armie, came on to inuade Austria & take Vienna. In this time were done no actions of consequence betweene the Emperour & Venetians, for that the Venetians hauing an absolute inclinatio to accord with him, & because they wold not incense him further, had giue order to retire their army by sea from the enterprife of the Castell of Brundusa to Corfu: and seeking only to preferue the townes which they held, they forbore also for that time all exploits in the regions of Lombardy, except certaine light rodes & incursions: and so being only carefull for the gard of their townes, they had put into Bressia the Duke of Vrbino. Touching the Almains, they were reduced to Lunaro, containing a number of a thousand horsmen & eight or ten thousand footemen: they had resolved together with the Marquis of Manina, to execute the enterprife of Cremona, where was the Duke of Millan, who seeing himselfe excluded fro all accord with the Emperor, & that Antb. de Luna was gone to incampe before Pania, & Caracciol gone to Cremona to denounce war to him, contracted with the Venetians to conclude no accord with the Emperor without their consent: and in recompence of that contract they bound themselves to minister to him for the defence of his estates, a regiment of 2000 footmen payed, with contribution of 8000 duckats for euery moneth. They sent also artilleries & men to Cremona, with which proportion of succors & promises, the Duke had confidence to be able to defend Cremona & Loda: for touching Pania, it made a very slender resistance against Antb. de Luna, not only for that it contained not sufficient victuals for two moneths, but also because Captaine Passinard to whom it was committed to keep & gard it, had not many dayes before sent out of the towne foure companies of footmen to S. Angelo, where Antb. de Luna had made as though he would incampe: for which want of victuals & weaknesse of men, of whom the numbers were very small within the towne, & worse furnished for the seruice, there was no confidence in all construction of war & war causes, to be able to defend it, & therefore when he saw the artilleries were planted & bent to execute, not enduring the prooue of one bullet, nor the venture of one assault, he rendred the towne vnder safety of life & goods as well for himselfe as his souldiers. In this action he was charged greatly (which also was a cause to hasten the rendring of the towne) that he was more caried by couetousnes not to lose the wealth & riches he had gathered together vpon so many prayes & pillages, then induced by any desire to preferue the glory he had gotten in so many excellent and braue exploits of war, and chiefly in the seruices of Pania.

Now was the warre very hotly kindled in Tuscane, for that as the Prince of Orange had taken Spello, and the Marquis of Guaft who followed him with the Spanish infantry beginning to draw neare him with his army, so he went on and aduanced by good degrees till he came at the bridge of Saint Iohn neare to Perouza vpon Tyber, where ioyned with him the regiments of Spanish footmen. In this City was a strength of three thousand footmen of the Florentins: and the Prince before he planted his campe before Spello, sent a messenger to Perouza to perswade Malatesta to obey the will of the Pope: who seeking to appropriate to himselfe by what way so euer, the City of Perouza, and to the ende the army might passe further, made this offer to Malatesta, that if he would leaue Perouza, he would preferue his estates and his proper goods, he would consent that he might freely go to the defence of the Florentins, and would be bound that Braccio and Sforce Baillons, nor any other his enemies should reenter into Perouza. And albeit Malatesta assured him that he would not accept any offer without consent of the Florentins, yet he opened more and more his eares to the Embassages of the Prince, who after he had conquered Spello, solicited him more vehemently. Al these offers and deuises Malatesta communicated with the Florentins, being haply inclined to passe the accord, for that both he feared the ende of things, and was no lesse doubtfull that the Florentins would not continue to giue him all the aydes and succors he desired: and when by necessity he should be driuen to accord, he had no hope to find better conditions then those that were offered him, holding it a better way that without offending the Pope, or to giue him occasion to depriue him of the goods and places which he preferred for him, to keepe himselfe possessed of the pay of the Florentins, then in standing to his defence, which by many arguments was fraile and casual, both to put wilfully into danger his whole estate, and also to pull vpon him the hatred of his friends and the towne: so that as he assured dayly and persevered in this, that he would not accord without their priuity, so also he added, that if they would haue him to defend Perouza, they must of necessity supplie him of new with a thousand footmen, and turne the residue of their companies to make head at Orsaino, a place within fiue miles of Cortona vpon the confines of Cortona and Perouza; a matter which they could not do without decaying the garrisons of their other townes. And yet the weaknesse of the towne was such, that by necessity they must retire at euery mouing of the enemies: he perswaded with them also, that in case he did not accord, the Prince leauing the enterprife of Perouza, wold take his way way to Florence, in which case also it was needfull that they left him within Peroufa a thousand footmen of seruice, which yet would not be sufficient, since the Pope had means to vex the Citie with other forces then with the regiments Imperiall: but if he did accord, then the Florentines were to retire to themselves all their bands of footemen, who should be accompanied with two or three hundred men of choice of his training; and for his owne part, his estates and goods being left to him, & his enemies excluded from all expectation to haue Peroufa, he should be reduced to better termes and estate of quietnesse to hearken to their defence. If the election had rested in the Florentines, they could haue bene better contented to continue the warre at Peroufa, but discerning that Malatesta entertained a continuall intelligence with the Prince, and no lesse assured that he had not discontinued to practise with the Pope, they doubted vpon these good grounds, least by the incitation and importunity of his friends and followers, and in compassion of the damages of the citie and cuntry; and lastly, for suspicion of the enemies and instabilitie of the people, he would in the end giue place to the power of time: they interpreted it also to too great a daunger and hazard, to put into Peroufa almost the whole reputation and flower of their forces, exposed to the perill of the fidelity of Malatesta, to the apparant daunger to be forced by the enemies, & to the manifest difficultie to reuoke the againe in case Malatesta should accord: they also brought into consideration that the changing of Peroufa could preiudice the litle, both the friends of Malatesta remaining there still, and he retaining his Castles and Boroughs, & none of his brothers returning thither at all, so that so long as it persevered in this estate, it could not be that the Pope would not be in suspicion of it. Thus they wandred in suspence and incertaintie of mind, & in that perplexitie making their chiefe care of the safety of their men, and hauing no assured confidence in the constancie of Malatesta, they dispatched secretly the sixt of September a man of credence to draw away their bands of souldiers from Peroufa, fearing to be abused, if the accord went on: but being enformed afterwards that they could not get away, for that the enemies were come neare at hand, they sent with diligence to Malatesta their consent, that he might compound: but his necessities and feare of further danger, were swifter then the diligence they made to dispatch to him their consent, for that before the messenger arriued, the Prince of Orenge the ix. of September hauing passed Tyber at the bridge of Saint Iohn, and being drawne into campe, and offering certaines skirmishes, he was driuen to compound the same night. By which composition he bound himselfe to depart from Peroufa, with obligation of sufferance to enioy his goods, to go to the seruice of the Florentines, and to retire their companies in safety; and to giue him the better time to leade them vpon the dominions of Florence, the Prince of Orenge promised not to remoue in two dayes from the place where he lay encamped: so that they issued out of Peroufa the twelfth day, and making verie speedie marches, they went the same day to Cortono by the way of the mountaines, long and troublesome, but free and assured. Thus was the body of the warre reduced vpon the lands of the Florentines, to whom, albeit the Venetians & Duke of Urbino had giuen manie hopes that they would aide the with three thousand footmen; a strength which for suspicion of the Princes comming into those quarters, they had sent vpon the state of Urbino, yet because they would not displease the Pope, that promise sorted to none effect: onely the Venetians gaue money to the Commissarie Castrocaro to wage two hundred footmen, and notwithstanding that state and the Duke of Ferrara entertained continual solicitation to compound with the Emperour, yet they forbore not to comfort the Florentines, & encourage them to stand to their defence, hoping vnder such propertie of difficultie to raunge the Emperour more easily, and to get to themselves better conditions. The Florentines at that instant had principally two actions in hand, the one, to temporize & delay the armie so long as they might haue time to rampart and fortifie their towne, vnder the walles whereof they looked that in the end the war wold be reduced: the other, to labor to appease the mind of the Emperour, yea euen in according with the Pope, so far forth as the forme of their libertie and gouernment popular were not innouated. By reason whereof, being not yet come the exclusion of their Embassadors, they had sent a messenger to the Prince of Orenge, and made a nomination of Embassadors to go to the Pope, desiring him whē they signified vnto him the election, that he wold make a surceance of the army vntill they were arriued, which he refused to do: so that the Prince being aduanced & come on with his forces, he battered and gaue the assault to the suburbs of Cortono which looke to Orsasio, in which citie were seuen hundred footmen strong, he was repulsed from thence, finding both force and valour where he expected but weaknesse or disloyaltie : there was a greater strength of footmen within Aretze : but as Anth. Frauncis Albizi Commissarie, fearing least the Prince ; after the taking of Cortono leauing Aretze behind him, would take the way of Florence , and preuenting the companies that were with him in Aretze, the Citie of Florence in that astonishment would draw to accord for want of the readiest succours that they had, determined to abandon it : so, for those reasons and considerations , without the publike consent of the state , though haply obseruing a secret intention of the Gonfalonnier he went from Aretze with all his companies, leauing onely two hundred footmen within the Castle: but being arriued at Feguna by the counsell of Malatesta that was there, who allowed well that they should reduce all their forces to the defence of Florence, he sent backe againe to Aretze a thousand footmen, to the end it should not be left altogether abandoned. And as in the course of calamities accidents happen by succession, so the xvij. day the towne of Cortono, for whose keeping and defending, a thousand men had bene a strength sufficient, seeing the Florentines vsed not such order as they ought, rendred, notwithstanding it was very litle pressed by the Prince, with whom the towne cōpounded to pay him xx. thousand duckets. By the accident of Cortono, the souldiers that lay within Aretze, doubting of their sufficiencie to defend it, abādoned that Citie, which the xix. day cōpounded also with the Prince, but with capitulations & clauses, rather to rule and gouerne themselves in their liberty vnder shadow of the Emperours protection, then to beare any longer the yoke and subiection of the Florentines, declaring to be false and fained the profession which to this day they had made to be friends to the family of Medicis, and enemies to the gouernment popular. At which time the Emperor refused expressely to giue any more audience to the Florentine Embassadors, vnlesse they restored the house of Medicis , and the Prince of Orenge, notwithstanding the Embassadours that were with him detested, without any regard, the Popes couetousnesse, and the iniquity of that enterprise, had neuerthelessse told them, that without restoring the house of Medices, he must of necessity continue the warre: whereupon calling his army into view & muster, he found that he had strong 300 men at armes, 500 light horsmen, 2500 Launceknights braue bodies, 2000 footmē Spanissh, & 3000 Italians, all disposed vnder the leading of these Capitaines, Serro Colonne, Peter Maria Rossa, Peter Lewis de Farnesa, & Iohn Baptista Saueila, and to them afterwards came Iohn Saffatello, bringing with him the money which he had receiued before of the Florentines, whose pay he had accepted : to them also was adioyned Alexander Vitelly , hauing betweene three and foure thousand footmen : only the Prince had small store of artilleries , and therefore he prayed aide of them of Sienna to furnish him , who standing in case not to refuse to so mighty an armie of the Emperour any thing they demaunded , they gaue order to refurnish him with some proportion of artilleries, but prepared it with as great delays & longnesse as they could, both for the hatred they bare against the Pope, & ialousie they had of his greatnesse, & also for that they were ill contented with the mutation of the gouernment of Florence, with whō by reason of their common hatred against the Pope, they had for certain moneths entertained together a secret peace & intelligence. In this meane while the Pope had giuen audience to the Florentine Embassadors, to whō he answered, that as his intention was not to alter the libertie of the city, so he was not caried into this way of enterprise & armes, so much for the iniuries he had receiued of that gouernment, and necessity to assure his owne estate, as in regard of the capitulations he had made with the Emperour, in which debating now vpon the interest of his honor, he required no other thing of them, then that they would voluntarily referthēselues to his abitrement & power, which being done, he would make to them good declaration & testimony, with what property of zeale & deuotion he desired the benefite and aduancement of their common country : and vnderstanding afterwards that the feare & astonishment was increased at Florence, specially since they were aduertized that the Emperour had refused to heare their Embassadors , and in that regard where they had elected new Embassadors to go to him, which he thought was done to submit and accord to him that he demanded, and desiring that the matter might be suddenly done, to auoyd the destruction of the country, he dispatched in post to army the Archbishop of Capua, who passing by Florence, found thē of the towne otherwise disposed then the Pope was perswaded. But in this meane while the Prince of Orenge aduanced, and was come the xxiiij. day to Montuarch in the vale of Arno, which is within xxv. miles of Florence, abiding there for eight cannons from Sienna, which were sent away the day after , onely they continued to be caried with the same tract and slownesse, with the

which they had bene prepared, in so much as by their want and impediment, the Prince, who the xxvij. had led the armie euen vp to Feguina and Anchisa, was driuen to abide in that place vnto the end of the fourth of October: and from thence proceeded the difficultie of the whole enterprise: for after the losse of Aretze, when the Florentines found that their hopes failed, together with the fauours and promises made from all parts, and also that the fortifications which were made in the Citie on that side towards the mountaine notwithstanding the continuall labour of Pioners and workmen, could not by the iudgement of souldiers be reduced to defence sooner then viij. or tenne daies: and being aduertised on the other side that the army of the enemies aduanced and wonne way, and Ramassotto, who was in armes by the Popes ordinance with three thousand footmen, had sacked Firenfolo, and was entred into the country of Mugello, which was not without daunger that he would go vp to Prato. By these arguments of feare and impediments, the Citizens being reduced to an vniuersall astonishment, began to incline to accord, the rather for that many in their feare were fled from the danger, which in their cowardise they durst not defend, so that at the Counsell board of Diacy, where are debated the affaires of the warre, and in which Councell were present the principall Citizens of the gouernment, the vniuersall consent & aduise was, to dispatch to Rome a free and ample commission, to submit and referre themselves to the Popes will. But when this resolution was related to the supreme Magistrate, without whose consent there could no deliberation passe, the Gonsalonier, who obstinately sustained the contrarie opinion, was against it, who ioyning with him the Magistrate popular of the Colledges (who participated with the authoritie of the Tribunes of the people of Rome) in which office or societie were haply many persons of sinister vnderstanding, and great temerity and insolencie: & hauing also their opinion supported with the boldnesse and threatnings of many young men, he brought to passe, that that day nothing was established: and yet it was a thing manifest, that if the day following, which was the xxviij. of September, the Prince had aduanced and come on one remoue, the faction that impugned and inueighed against the accord, had not bene able to resist the strong inclination of all the others, of so small causes depend oftentimes the moments of right great things. Thus the surceance and temporizing of the armie made by the Prince of Orenge in vaine, which some interpreted to be done expressely to entertaine the war, for that he had not sufficient artilleries to affront the Citie of Florence, was the cause that within the towne many entred into courage and resumed the spirits, which through the former astonishment they had lost: but the thing that confirmed them in this resolution, was, that the fortification continued without any intermission of time, and which the hands of many numbers of men did so raise and aduante, that before the Prince of Orenge removed from the place where he lay encamped, the Captaines iudged that the ramparts were sufficient for defence: so that ceasing now all inclination to accord, the Citizens with a generall resolution stood prepared to defend with their bodies and liues the place, which till then they had laboured to make strong by their industrie and worke of their hands: wherein the better to assure their minds so well induced, they were aduertised that Ramassotto, who led with him without pay or discipline, not souldiers but paynants, raw and vnarmed, and had taken the field, not with intention of fight, but to rob and spoyle: after he had wasted with raking and sacking the whole countrey of Mugello, he retired with the booties he had taken vpon the territories of Bologna, where did dissolue in disorder and disagreement the bands he had leauied and led in insolencie and licenciousnesse, though after they had sold to him their shares and most part of the spoyles. Thus of a warre easie and tractable, and which might haue taken end with a small losse to any partie, was deriued a warre most heauy and hurtfull to all, and such as could not be led to his end, till the whole countrey was wasted, and the principall City in hazard of her latest desolation. The fift of October the Prince of Orenge departed fro Feguino, but he ordered his marching so slowly, to tarie for the artilleries of Sienna, which now drew neare, that he could not before the xx. day range all his companies & artilleries into the plaine of Ripoly, which is within two miles of Florence: he encamped all his armie the xxiiij. day vpon the litle hilles neare the ramparts, obseruing with the safety of his owne, the places that most helped him to annoy his enemies: and of this armie as one part occupied all the litle hils eminent to the Citie, which stretch from the gate Saint Minato to the gate S. George: so the other part from the said gate S. Minato was extended euen to the way of the gate S. Nicholai. There were within Florence eight thousand footmen, all bodies of seruice, and their chiefe resolution was to defend Prato, Pistoia, Empoli, Pisa and Liorna, which places they had strengthened and fortified with sufficient garrisons, leauing all other places and peeces rather to the fidelity and discretion of the peuples, and the fortresses to the benefite of their situation, then to bestow great bands of souldiers to guard them: but now the warre rising by burning degrees into his heate, all the countrey was filled full of combustion, of incurfions, and bands of licentious souldiers: and the Siennes, notwithstanding their former profession of league and amitie with the state of Florence, did not onely rise vpto make pillage in euerie place, but also in that libertie of warre they sent bands of souldiers to occupie Montpulson, hoping that afterwards the Prince would consent that they might retain it: neuerthelesse, finding it defended by a garrison of the Florentines, their ambition was easly stopped, and their aspiring inuentions presently defeated, the rather for that not long after Napoleon Vrsin arriued there; a souldier of the Florentines, with three hundred horsmen, who would not depart from Rome before the Pope were vpon his way to go to Bologna. The Prince of Orenge, when he had bestowed his armie, and stretched it out at large vpon the hilles of Monticio, Gullo, & Giramont, and after he had brought to him from Lucqua both pyoners and certaine peeces of artilleries, he caused to cast a rampart, to the end to make it profitable to giue an assault to the Bastillion of Saint Miniato: but on the other side to hinder the vse and seruice of it, were planted in the garden of Saint Miniato, foure Cannons vpon a cauallier. The townes of Collo and Saint Gimignano rendred immediatly to the Prince, they were places of importance to make easie and safe the resort of victuals that came from Sienna. The xxix. day the Prince planted vpon the bastillion of Giramont foure Cannons to beate the steeple of Saint Miniato, for that a Saker which the defendants of the towne had mounted there, played with great hurt vpon the armie: two of those cannons were broken and reduced not seruiceable within few houres: to recompence which default, the day following another cannon being brought to the place, after they had executed in vaine about an hundred and fiftie shot of bullet, and yet could not dismount the Saker, they forbore to shoot any more, where so litle good was done by their labour. By which resistance and other difficulties and impediments concurring, euerie one interpreting it to a hard matter to carie Florence, specially with one onely anny, the actions and exploits afterwards beganne to proceed slowly, and rather in maner of skirmishes then in forme of assault. The second of Nouember was perfourmed a great skirmish against the Bastillion of Saint George; another vpon the Bastillion of Saint Nicholas, and a third vpon the way that goeth to Rome. The fourth day was planted vpon Giramont a Culuerin, right against the pallace of the Lords, which set open the gates at the first shot: but at this time the horsmen that were within Florence ran vp to Valdiieso, and made pray of an hundred horse, most part horses of seruice: and in the same fortune certaine horsmen and harquebuziers of the Florentines, issuing out of Pondadero, tooke threescore horse betweene the cabans and the towre of Saint Romaine.

at Bologna.

By this time the Pope was arriued at Bologna, after whom the Emperour followed according to the ceremonie and custome of great Princes, for that when two Princes are to enteruiew and meete together, the tradition beareth that he that representeth the greatest dignitie shall come first to the place appointed, seeing it is both iudged and taken for a gerat signe of reuerence that he that is inferiour shall shew office and go to the other: and there being receiued of the Pope with great shewes and testimonies of honour, and lodged in the same pallace with him, ioyning one to the other, it seemed by the demonstrations of office & familiaritie passing betweene the, that they had alwayes liued in an indissoluble league of amitie and good will. There the Emperour receiued aduertisements, which cleared him of all suspition of inuasion by the Turkes, whose armie, together with the person of their Lord and Priuce being presented before Vienna, wherein was a great garrison of Launceknights, they had not onely giuen in vaine manie assaults to the place, but also had bene so repulled with so great a slaughter, that with the small confidence they had to carie it, and what with the want of great artilleries to batter it, & what by the compulsion of the time, which in that region is verie sharpe, being in the moneth of October, they brake vp & went their wayes, not retiring vnto any other place neare to it, but tooke the way of Constantinople, which is a march of three moneths: so that the Emperour being cleared and assured of that suspition, which before had not onely made him inclined (notwithstanding the conquest of Pania) to accord with the Duke of Mullan, but also had induced him to deale with the Pope

Pope to thinke vpon a meane to compound with the Florentines, to the end that being eased and dispatched of the affaires of Italy, he might passe with all his forces into Almany, to the succours of Vienna and his brother. According to which perswasion, as the Pope and he began to debate vpon the affaires of Italy, so the thing that most concerned the Pope, and lay nearest his heart, was the enterprize against the Florentines, whereunto also the Emperour seemed to beare a manifest inclination, as well to satisfie the Pope touching the matter of capitulation at Barfello-ma, as also for that the Citie of Florence being alwayes caried with a deuotion to the Crowne of Fraunce, it could not be but the embasing of his greatnesse was verie agreeable to them: therefore when the Florentines had chosen foure Embassadours to go to the Pope at Bologna, and making also petition to speake to the Emperour, he would neuer giue them audience but one time, and that when it pleased the Pope, from whom also he drew the substance of the answer he made them. Thus they concluded to continue the enterprize, and because it fell out more hard and entangled then the Pope expected, there was a determination to employ in this action all the bands and companies of souldiers that were in Lombardy, in case there hapned occasion of accord with the Venetians and Frauncis Sforce: which companies, as they were to be paid by the Emperour, so also the Pope was to contribute monethly to the Prince of Orenge (who was gone vp to Bologna to sollicite those matters) three score thousand duckets, to the end, that where the Emperour found the burthen too heauie to beare out so great expences, he might be shared to defray all those regiments that were already about Florence. After this, was brought in question and conference, the other interest of the Pope, which was concerning the matters of Modena & Reggia: wherein the Pope, to auoid the note of obstinacie and selfe-will, making shew to continue in the same inclination he had professed many times before, that as if the interest of those two townes only were brought into question, he would make no difficultie to dispose of them according to the will of the Emperour: so neuertheless he protested that in that case of alienation of Modena and Reggia, Parma and Plaisance would so remaine separate & cut off from the estate Ecclesiastike, that in consequence they would seeme to be more then halfe aliened. The Emperour answered him, that it was a regard and consideration both iust and reasonable: but for his part he could do no more then vse his authority, whilst his forces were occupied in the enterprize of Florence: neuertheless in secret he could haue wished, that with the good satisfaction of the Pope, those townes had remained to the Duke of Ferrara, with whom in his way to Bologna he had had conference, and giuen him great hope and comfort to worke with the Pope what he could for the benefite of his affaires; so much had that Duke by his good industrie and working made insinuation into the Emperours grace and fauour, and also made such impressions of compassion in the minds of those that gouerned him most, that he wanted not in his Court the operations of great personages, to make his cause fauoured and recommended. There remained now the two articles of most importance and difficultie, concerning the Venetians and Frauncis Sforce, with whom as touching to accord and compound, the Emperour seemed now nothing so seuer and hard as he had bene before: which as it was altogether contrariety to the inclination with the which he was come into Italy, so he tooke his reason both vpon the difficultie of things, appearing greater then he imagined in Spaine, and also for that he found by reason of the new coniunction which Frauncis Sforce had made with the Venetians, that the conquest of the estate of Milan would not be a matter of easie action: he saw also how far he was imbarcked into expences and charges, by so great a traine of souldiers & followers which he had brought with him, and caused to come after him, as well out of Spaine as Germany: but the chiefe cause was the importunitie of his brother, who for the tumults of the Lutherans, and other signes appearing of innouation, solicited him to passe into Almany, whither it was credible that within a short time the power of the Turkes would estoones returne; a matter which he gathered vpon the protestation which Solyman made, who in his passion of spite and ignominy, had sworne at his breaking vp frō before Vienna, that he would estoones recontinue the quarrell with an armie more mighty and prepared. In these regards were equallie concurring the interests of his honor and safety: for that the Emperour, to whom it seemed that if he should go out of Italy and leaue things vnperfect, he could neither carie away assurance for himselfe, nor reputation to his name, began to giue out many signes and tokens of a mind inclined not only to come to accord with the Venetians, but also to pardon Frauncis Sforce. In which good disposition the Pope omitted no good office of perswasion and inducement both to sollicite and confirme him, no lesse mouing him a deuout desire to haue an vniuersall tranquillity, then for that the Emperour standing no more restrained and intangled with other enterprises, he might with better oportunitie draw him to conuert all his forces against Florence: only the Emperour seemed most of all to be detained by this reason, that it could not but be against his dignitie, to giue occasion to the world to beleaue, that necessitie had almost induced him to pardon the crime of Frauncis Sforce: and Ant. de Leua being with him at Bologna, solicited vehemently that he would make an other resolution and disposing of that estate, sometimes presenting the memorie of Alexander the Popes nephew, and sometimes naming others, meet to receiue such a preferment. Neuerthelesse for that there could not easily be found out to gouern that estate, a personage with whom Italy would be contented, and the Pope hauing no inclination to conuert it to any of his, not that he wanted ambition to embrace so great a thing, but because he saw he could not accomplish it without new warres and new troubles: the Emperour at last was brought to consent to graunt safeconduct to Frauncis Sforce, vnder colour to haue accesse to him to submit and iustifie himselfe, but in true meaning, that libertie of recess was graunted, to the end things might be reduced to some composition. The Venetians were not ill contented with his going to the Emperour, for that they hoped that at one time would be introduced some forme of accord to their affaires.

Neuerthelesse the course of armes and warre ceased not for all this in the regions of Lombardy, for that Beloyense, who in the absence of Ant. de Leua was chiefe Commander at Millan, went out with seven thousand footmen, to encampe before Saint Angelo, wherein were remaining for the strength and garrison of the towne, foure companies of footmen of the Venetians and the Duke of Apillan: and after he had vsed vpon it the seruice of his great artilleries, and that by reason of certaine raines and showers that fell from aboue, the harquebuzes that manned and defended the walles vncovered, were made vnprofitable: he brought neare his souldiers couered with their shields, and being armed with their swords and pikes, he gaue the assault, in which he presented in his owne person no lesse valour and resolution then was leene in anie of the others: but when the defendants were no longer able to keepe fire in their matches, by reason they stood open to the raine, and in that regard being driuen to fight with other weapons, they began to abandon the walles, no lesse through the valour of their enemies, who pressed on with a furie equall to the fortune that fauoured them, then for their owne astonishment, which was made so much the greater, by how much they were made lesse apt to do seruice by the wretched accident of raine that tooke away the vse of their peeces. As soone as the Imperials saw the walles abandoned of bodies to defend them, the same fiercenesse that led them to giue the assault, brought them on to enter the place: where, in the rage of their victorie, all such wretched creatures as they found, they made them either passe by the edge of the sword, or at least put them vnder the sentence of bitter captiuitie. After this, he determined to passe ouer to the other side of the riuer of Adda, and by that time he had put ouer one part of his armie at the bridge of Casiano, he saw certaine bands of Spaniards of a new leaue, departing to go to Millan, but preuenting them, he caused the souldiers that were left in the towne to take armes, by which impediment being stopped and denied to enter, they returned againe to the armie. But notwithstanding all these ieuents, and that the armie of Launceknights was already vpon the lands of the Venetians, the negotiations of the peace were so farre aduanced, and in so good tearmes, that all counsels and studies of the warre beganne to vanish and grow cold: for, when Frauncis Sforce was brought to the presence of the Emperour at Bologna, and hauing with humility and submission praised his benignity, in admitting him to his presence: he told him, that so much did he repose for himselfe in his owne iustice and equitie, that for all things hapned before the Marquis of Perquiera restrained him within the Castle of Millan, he desired no other propertie of surety or support then his owne innocencie: and that therefore he renounced frankly the safeconduct, the bill or script whereof the Duke holding in his hand, he layd it at his feete; a matter which much pleased the Emperour. There was a moneth spent in debating of the difficulties as well concerning his accord, as the composition with the Venetians: but at last by the continuall working and interposing of the Pope, both the one and the other were concluded the xxij. of December, Frauncis Sforce being bound to pay to the Emperour within one year, foure hundred thousand ducats, and fise hundred more within ten yeares, that is, fifty thousand euery yeare : and for the pawne and assuring of these payments, the Emperour to keepe in his hands Coma and the Castell of Millan, which he bound himselfe to render and redeliuer vp to Francis Sforce as soone as the payment of the first yeare were furnished: he gaue him also the inuestiture of the Duchy, or rather confirmed that which had bin giuen to him before. But to furnish three payments and to performe the gifts and bribes which he promised to those that gouerned the Emperour, he imposed great taxes vpon the towne of Millan, and through the whole Duchy, notwithstanding the people had bin miserably wasted and consumed, both by the cruelty of their long warres, and also by the rage of hunger and pestilence. Touching the Venetians they accorded: That they should render to the Pope Ravenna and Cervia with their territories, sauing their rights, & also the Pope to pardon all such as had conspired or done any thing against him: That they should giue vp to the Emperor by the end of the next Ianuary, all that they possessed in the realme of Naples, & to pay him the residue of the two hundred thousand duckats due vpon the third article of the last peace contracted with them: that is to say, xxv. thousand within one moneth next following, & 15000 at the yeares end, but vpon condition that their peeces should be rendred to them within one yeare, if either they were not rendred already according to the tenor of the sayd peace, or at last the controuersies and differences iudged by common arbitrators: That they should pay to the exiles 5000 duckats for euery yeare for the reuenues of their goods, according to the disposition of the treatise of the same peace: That ouer and besides this, they should pay to the Emperor an hundred thousand duckats, the one moiety within ten moneths, and the other halfe within a yeare after. It was further accorded, that the rights of the Patriarch of Aquilea, which had bin reserved to him in the capitulation of Wormes against the king of Hungary, should be decided: That the Duke of Vrbis should be comprehended in this peace and confederation, because he was an adherent & in the protection of the Venetians: That the Venetians should pardon the Count Brunoro de Gambaro: That the trafficke and entercourse should be free amongst all their subiects; and that there should be giuen no place of retraite to the corsaires or rouers, who would trouble either party: That it should be lawfull to the Venetians to continue peaceably in the possession of all those things which they held: That all those that had bin published rebels, for folowing the faction of Maximilian the Emperor and the king of Hungary since the yeare 1523, should be restored: only the restitution should not extend to the goods that had bene brought to their fiske: That betweene the said parties there should not only be a peace, but also a perpetuall league defensible for their estates of Italy against all Christian Princes. The Emperor promised, that the Duke of Millan should keepe and hold in his estate, a strength of five hundred men at armes, five hundred light horsmen, six thousand footmen, and a good band of artilleries, for the defence of the Venetians: and the Venetians to maintaine the like strength for the defence of the Duke of Millan. In which article was set down, that when either of their estates were molested, the other through their countries should giue no passage of victuals, munitions, curriers, nor Embassadors, restraining all natures of aid in their estates, & all passage or sufferance of succors whatsoever: That if any Christian Prince though he were of supreme dignity, should inuade the realme of Naples, the Venetians to bring to the defending of it xv. light gallies wel armed: That in this present accord should be comprehended, all such as the afore named and to name, held in their protectiō, though without other obligation of the Venetians, then for their defence: That in case the Duke of Ferrara accorded with the Pope and with the Emperor, it was meant he should be comprehended in this confederation. For the execution of which accords and compositions, the Emperour rendred to Francis Sforce Millan and all the Duke dome, and reuoked all the souldiers except such as were thought necessary for the gard of the Castell and of Coma, which places he rendred afterwards according to the time couenanted: The Venetians restored to the Pope the townes of Romagnia, and to the Emperour the peeces which they held in Powilla.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Emperor taketh the Imperiall Crowne at Bologna, and from thence passeth into Almanie. The family of Medicis by the ayd of the Emperors army returne to Florence. Ferdinand is chosen king of Romaines. The Pope will not hearken to a Councell. The French king stirreth up the Turke against the Emperor, and hath conference with the Pope at Marseilles.

It seemed that the conclusion of this peace and confederation had reduced to their last end the warres of Italy, which for their continuance and longnesse, had drawne a space of eight or ten yeares, and for their horrible accidents, had left to all the regions of that climate, matter of lamentable and iust compassion: onely the Citie of Florence, either more wretched in destinie, or lesse worthie of so good participation, was not dispensed from tumults & dangers of armes, seeing that as she was a meane and helpe to reduce others to peace, so of the contrarie, in the tranquillitie of others, was wrought to her selfe matter of a more heauie and dangerous warre: for, where it was supposed that all natures of difficulties were so resolved and digested, that there was no further doubt nor impediment to detain the accord from his perfection, the Emperor leauying his companies and bands of men of warre from the estate of the Venetians, sent out to make war against the Florentins, an army of foure thousand Launceknights, two thousand five hundred Spanish footemen, eight hundred Italians, and more then three hundred light horsemen with five and twenty peeces of artilleries. But in this warre either for the ill direction of the Captaines, or worse order of the souldiers, much lesse that there was done any exploit notable, seeing there was performed no actiō worthy the exercise of a pen to write it, the assaillants lacking hart to inuade the towne, and the defendants hauing no deuotion to assay the fortune of a battell, they saw in the accompt of their prouisions, that they had meanes sufficient to make defence for many moneths: and in the reckening of the minds and inclinations of men, they doubted not of an auersall resolution of the City to resist the quarrell inflicted against their common liberty. In which regards they hoped by temporising so to make weary the campe of the enemies, that either for want of mony which maketh the souldier mutinous, or for some other accidents which ordinarily ensue a campe, they would driue the enemies through difficulties to dissolue the war which they could not resist by their valour. Neuerthelesse either to auoid these difficulties or to prepare a remedy, the Prince of Orenge had sent out fifteene hundred footemen, and foure hundred horsemen with foure peeces of artilleries, to take Lastra wherein were three Ensignes of footmen, of whom was passed to the sword two hundred bodies and the towne taken before the rescues of Florence could arriue. It hapned also that in the night of the xj. of December, Stephen Colunno with a thousand harquebuziers and foure hundred halberdiers and partisanes, all armed with corselets and cassakins after the maner of Camisado of Spaine, set vpon the regiment of Serro Colunno lying in the houses neare to the Church of Saint Margaret de Monticio, and in that surprise they slue and wounded many souldiers without the losse of one person of theirs. About that time were slaine with the bullet within the garden of Saint Mimato, Maria Vrsin and Iulio saint Crosse: and in like fortune, Pirrhus going to Saint Peters borough to take Montopoli which is a towne of the countrey of Pisa, he was cut off by the footmen that were within Empoly, and being defeated in the way betweene Palasia and Montopoli, many of his companies fell into the fortune of prisoners. The Florentins sent to the borough of Saint Sepulchro, Napoleon Vrsin with an hundred and and fiftie horsemen, to encounter Alexander Vnelly who was sent to destroy the countrey all along the sayd borough and Anguaro.

But now the war beginning to fall into actiō of terror & astonishment: after the regimēts newly sent by the Emperor were passed the Alpes, the townes of Pistoia and Prato being abandoned of the Florentin garrisons, were yeelded vp to the Pope: by reason whereof, the army that had left behind them no impediment, marched not to pyne with the others, but remaining incamped on the other side of Arno, they went to lodge at Peretola neare the wals of the city, vnder the authority & gouernment of the Marquis of Guaft, though the Prince of Orenge was alwayes superior & absolute aboue all. By which disposing of the army apart & separate, things were rather reduced to the forme of a siege, then to an action of oppugnation. At this time also Pietrasanta was rendred to the Pope: and as the Pope labored with a perpetuall study and care of mind, to leade to perfection the purposes he had pretended to reestabliſh and set vp his house in Florence, so towards the end of this year, partly at the request of Malatesta Baillon who gaue him hope of accord, he sent to Florence directly to him Rodolfo Pio Bishop of Faenza, with whom were debated diuerſe and sundry things, some with the priuity of the city and for the profit, and some in ſecrecy by Malatesta againſt the weale of the city; matters which much leſſe that they ſorted to any effect, ſeeing it was diſcerned that Malatesta, who was now come to the expiration and full time of his pay, had entertained them with art & cunning, to the end that the Florentins fearing to be abandoned of him, would eſtſoones retaine him into their pay, with title of Captaine generall of the war, which in the end he obtained. This enterpriſe of Florence continued alſo the yere 1530: and albeit the Prince of Orenge in beginning to make new caualliers & caſt new trenches, made demonſtratiō to batter vehemently the baſtiliōs, but chiefly the baſtilion of S. George which was very ſtrōg: yet what thorough his ignorance which could not be without his ignominy, and what for the difficulty in the action, wherein his error was nothing leſſe, not one deuice was put in execution, the gard of the whole Mount appertaining to Stephen Colonna.

In the beginning of this year, the Florentins taking hope in the matters of negociation with the Bishop of Faenza, ſent of new other Embaſſadors to the Pope, and to the Emperor, but with expreſſe cōmiſſion to innouate nothing, nor hearken to any motion by the which the gouernment might be altered, or the generall iuriſdiction diminiſhed. So that as they were repugnant in the principal article, ſo they could neuer obtaine audience of the Emperor, but according to the vanitie of their cōmiſſion, they returned to Florence without any conſluſion.

There were within Florence nine or ten thouſand footmen ſtrong, but payed according to the number of ſourteene thouſand: and as the ſouldiers were reſolute to defend the city with a great affection and readineſſe of faith, ſo to confirme them the more, all the Captaines being aſſembled in the Church of Saint Nicholas, after the celebration of the Maſſe, and in the preſence of Malatesta, they made a ſolemne oath to ſtand againſt the iniuries and inuaſions offered againſt the City vntill the laſt man: onely in this vniuerſall conſtancy, was found vnconſtant Napoleon Vriſin, who withſtanding he profeſſed himſelfe aſſured to the Florentins by receiuing their mony and inuice, yet he became a reuolt, and returning to Bracciano, compounded his affaires with the Emperor and the Pope, and reuoked from the ſeruiſe of Florence certaine Captaines whom he had ſent thither before.

But the Pope omitted no diligence wherein he thought was any mean to aduance his intention, wherein he ſo wrought with the French king, that he ſent M. Cleremont to excuſe the accord he had made by neceſſity to redeeme his children: and where he alleaged how impoſſible it was to comprehend the ſtate in that accord, he counſelled them with reaſons & inducements to lay themſelues downe to the neceſſity of the time, and take ſuch conditions as they might, ſo farre forth as they were conducible to the profit and conuerſation of their liberty. In which good inclination, & to helpe to raunge the iſſue of things to their weale and benefit, he offered as it were to interpoſe in the action: he alſo commanded by publike proteſtation Malatesta and Stephen Colonna being of the kings creation and dependancy, to depart from Florence, notwithstanding apart and ſeuerally he gaue them comfort to the contrary. But the thing that imported moſt to ſtay his reputation and aſtoniſh the people, was, that to ſatiſfie the Pope and the Emperor, he retired his ordinary Embaſſador reſidēt at Florence, leauing there notwithstanding as a perſon priuate Emilio Ferrier, by whom for that he would not ytterly leaue them deſperate, he made ſecret promiſe to ayd them as soone as he had recouered his children. Such was the Popes ambition in this action, and so subtle was his humor to serue his turne of all meanes that either art or industry could insinuate, that he had almost brought the French king to make retire from his Court his Embassadeur resident for Florence: wherein to draw better fauour to his purposes, he sent by the Bishop of Tarby the Cardinals Hat to the Lord Chancellour, and not long after he gratified him with the legation of the realme of Fraunce: and by him he solicited a new enteruiew and conference at Thurin betweene the Emperor, the French king, and himselfe. But he was answered in the full Councell of the king sitting, that it was enough that the children of the Crowne of Fraunce were vnder captivity, without that the person of the king should seeke to intrude himselfe into that calamity.

The Emperor
taketh the
lognia.

The Pope and the Emperor did now determine to go to Sienna, to be more ready and apt to fauor the enterprise of Florence, and afterwards to draw to Rome for the coronation of the Emperor: but whether it was a true or false deliberation, as they were vpon the point prepared to depart, the Emperor receiued letters out of Germany soliciting him to return thither, the Electors making instance for regard of the diots, and Ferdinand standing to be chosen king of Romains, and others in respect to celebrate the Councell. By these new instances, whether more effectually for their suddenesse or for their conformity to the Emperours will, all deuises and counsels to passe further were dashed, in which variation the Emperour was contented to receite the Imperiall Crowne within Bologna, being assisted with a great affluence of people, but sustaining a very slender pompe and expences: he was crowned vpon Saint Matthewes day; a day of many happie predictions, for that one that day was he borne, in that day was the French king taken prisoner, and during that day was he celebrated with the Ensignes and ornaments of the Imperiall dignitie.

But before the Emperour departed to returne into Germany, he laboured to accord with the Pope the Duke of Ferrara, who the seuenth day of March came to Bologna vnder safe conduct: and because there was no other meane to issue or end betweene them, they referred to the person of the Emperour the arbitration and Compromise of right and action touching all their controuerfies. To the which the Pope was induced by the generality of the Cōpromise, such as comprehended also the quarrell and title of Ferrara, which the Pope doubting that according to termes of right, it would not diuolue to the sea Apostolike, he thought the Emperour had an easie meane in vsing silence for Ferrara, to bring him to render Modena and Reggia. The Pope also was induced by the word and promise which the Emperour made to him, that if he found that he had right to those two Cities, he would pronounce iudgement of his side, but if by examination it appeared otherwise, he would suffer to expire and determine the time of the Compromise. And to assure the obseruation of the sentence and resolution of the Compromise, there went a couenant, that the Duke should depose Modena into the hands of the Emperour, at whose instance he had reuoked before his Embassadors from Florence, and ayded the army with a proportion of pioners. After this the Emperour departed from Bologna the xxij. day, the Pope hauing left him satisfied that his intention was to consent to the Councell, if he thought it might any way auaille for the extirpation of the heresies of the Lutherans. The Cardinall Campeius went with him as Legate, and so he passed by Mantua, where after he had receiued threescore thousand ducats for the Duke of Ferrara, he gaue to him in chiefe for euer the towne of Carpy: after whom the Pope the xxxj. day tooke his way to Rome leauing the matters of Florence in the same estate of difficulties they were before.

The Imperials made many signes and braueries as though they would assault the City, for which cause they had begun a trench before the bastillion of Saint George, where being performed a hote skirmish the one and twentieth of March, they without receiued great harmes. The xxv. day the Prince of Orenge finding his campe much vexed by a tower adioyning to the side of the bastillion of Saint George towards the gate of Rome, battered it with his artilleries; but finding it very strong and well appointed, after certaine vollies of Cannon, he forbore any further execution. There arriued daily at the campe new companies and bands of souldiers, by whose insolencie and licentiousnesse, for that there was no warres in any other part of Italy, the harmes and ruines of the countrey of Florence increased continually. The City of Volterro was rendred to the Pope, but the Castell holding good for the Florentins, suffered great executions with two Cannons of the Imperials, and two Culuerines brought from Genes. And the Florentins

Florentins desiring to succour it, sent out to Empoly an hundred and fiftie horsemen and five Enginies of footmen, who making their march by night, passed by the campe neare the Mount Olynus, and being discouered, there were sent out after them certaine guidons of horsemen, who ouertooke them, but being skirmished withall by the harquebuziers, they retired with some losse: and the horsemen that were issued out of Florence by an other way behind the campe, saued themselves at the same time with the footmen within Empoly, where they were receiued by Francis Feruccio commaunder of that place: this man being sent in the beginning of the warre by the Florentins to Empoly as commaunder ouer a very small company of horsemen, and with a very little authority, had, what with the obseruation of the warre, and with the oportunity of that seate, and with the occasion of prayes and ordinarie incursions, assembled together a good crew of souldiers of choyse, with whom both by his valour which he had well expressed, and also by his liberality which was infinite in him, he was risen to so good estate of reputation, that the Florentins had no small expectation of him. Feruccio then departed from Empoly with two thousand footmen and five hundred horse, with which army marching with great celerity, he entered within the Castell of Volterro the fixe and twentieth day of Aprill earely in the morning, where hauing well refreshed his souldiers, he assaulted presently the towne which was garded by Iohn Baptista Borgueso with a very slender strength of footmen, and winning before night two of their trenches, he had the towne the next morning, together with the artilleries that were come from Genes. The first action he managed after he was Lord of the towne, was by extortions and wayes compulsiue, to exact money of the inhabitants of Volterro, and no lesse by that good helpe then by his valour and industry, he constrained to reuolt Gimignana and Collo, and cutting off the trafficke of victuals that came from Sienna by that way, he had reduced the army of the enemies to great difficulties, whose Captaines thinking of no other expedition then of the siege, the Marquis of Guaft retired the artilleries within Prato. But (so sudden and vncertaine are the things of warre) there hapned into those quarters vnlooked for, Captaine Maramis leading a regiment of two thousand five hundred footmen without pay: by reason of which succour being come against the Popes will, he kept on his course, for that Maramis went to incampe with his people at the suburbs of Volterro. The ninth of May was executed a great skirmish without the gate called Rome gate, wherein remained dead and wounded of them within the towne an hundred and thirtie persons, and of the souldiers without, more then two hundred bodies, amongst whom was Captaine Baragnino a Spaniard. Amid these enterchaunges of skirmishes and factions of warre, the Florentins forbare not to hope continually for some succours from the French king, who accordingly fayled not to entertaine their hope with promise of a sufficient rescue when so euer he had recouered his children. Wherein the better to assure and confirme them, he gaue assignation to the Florentine Marchants for twentie thousand duckats due to them long time before, which summe being lent by them to the City, was brought to Pisa by Lewis Alaman, but by such parcels and driblets, that it did little comfort the warre. Moreouer Iohn Pauls de Cere whom the Florentins had taken into their pay for the gard of that City, came away to Pisa. But by the conquering of Volterro was bred to the Florentins a damage of farre greater importance: for that where Feruccio both contrary to the commission giuen to him, and also because he would go the stronger to the action of Volterro, and hauing withall too secure a confidence in the fortresse of Empoly, had left for the defence of it so small a garrison, that the Imperials vsing the occasion that was offered, went to incampe about it vnder the conduct and leading of the Marquis of Guaft: and as for the weaknesse of the defendantes and garrison, they tooke it without any resistance and with many harmes put it to sacke: so in the losse of that was brought to the Florentins more matter of affliction then in any other thing during the warre, for that hauing determined to assenble in that place new companies and regiments, they hoped by the oportunitie of the situation which importeth much, both to reduce into distresse and difficulties the army that lay on that side of Arno; and also to open the commoditie and way for victuals to passe that Citie, which began already to feele the want of nouriture and comfort. To this also was added a new occasion to depriue them more of the hopes they had conceiued: for after the French king had deliuered ouer his money which he was to pay to the Emperour, and retired his children which was in the beginning of Iune: in place of so manie aydes and succours which by his promises he had reserued till that time, he sent into Italy at the instance of the Pope (who to haue wholly at his deuotion the kings Agents, created Cardinall the Bishop of Tarbie, Embassadour resident in his Court) one Peter Francis Pontremolie, a man of great confidence with him, to square some motions and practise of accord with the Florentines, who by that manner of dealing discerned no further hope to be succoured by the king; wherein they beloued the more by this inducement, that both he and the king of England ioyning together, did all that they could so to allure and gouerne the Pope, as they might hope to separate him from the Emperour: and in that regard the French king laboured to haue some participation and interest to reduce and conuert the Florentins to the Popes amitie. After the Marquis of Guaft had taken Empoly, he went with the bands of souldiers whom he led, to ioine with Maramus in the suburbs of Volterro: where hauing in one strength almost six thousand footemen, they beganne to batter the towne, and when they saw they had brought to the earth more then fortie sadomes of wall, they followed the execution of the artilleries and three furious assaults, but with worse effect then their valour deserued, since in the action they lost more then foure hundred men. They made afterwards a new battery, and with certaine chosen bands of Spaniards and Italians consoorted together, they gaue another very braue and resolute assault, but with greater damage and harmes then the former assaults: in which regard the campe brake vp, rather with great prayse then good effect of their doings. The same morning about an hower before day, Stephen Colonne issuing out of the gate of Faenza, and Malatesta by the posterne that leadeth to Prato, went to giue the Camifado with three thousand footemen to the Launceknights that were lodged in the Monastery of Saint Donat, where they had fortified themselves: Stephen passed the trenches and slue many of them, but the alarme being giuen to the residue, they put themselves in order, with resolution to defend their place to the last man: so that after Stephen had receiued a light hurt in the mouth, he retired for feare of greater rescues, complaining much that Malatesta had not followed him.

But in Florence were entred no nature of victuals nor nouriture from any part, albeit their wants of comforts went on increasing dayly, yet so resolute were they to defend their liberty, that there could be discerned no diminution of that constancy and fidelity that at first armed them to so holy an action. And where Feruccio was gone from Volterro to Pisa, and laboured by his authority and industrie to assemble as great a strength as he could, all the hopes of the Florentins were reduced to his comming: for they had signified to him to aduance and come on, and not to forbear for any way or other daunger to ioine himselfe to the defence of the City, being resolved to giue battell to the enemies as soone as he had ioyned his forces with the maine army that was within Florence. Of which deuice the successe and issue was not so good and happie, as was great and manifest the rashnesse of the resolution, if I may terme those counsels rash which are drawne or deriued from a last necessitie: for in this rested the error of that counsell, that they were to passe thorough the countries of the enemies, such as were occupied and commingled by a very strong army though dispersed into many seuerall places. The Prince of Orange who had aduertisement of this deuise, thought to go before with one part of the army, whereof he made his greatest assembly of the Italian footemen: and Malatesta Baslon with whom he had many secret and strait intelligences, hauing haply assured him in secret, that the Florentins suspected, least in his absence he would assaile the armie, went out to meete him; and finding him neare to Cusimiano in the Mountaine of Pistoia, a way which he tooke passing from Pisa towards Lucquay, in regard of confidence reposed in the Chauncellours faction well affected to the popular gouernement, he gaue him the skirmish with a very small company of men: at the first shooke the Prince, whose rashnesse was greater then his conduct, and in whom was lesse the humour of counsell and discretion then appertayned to the place he managed, was slaine, doing rather the office of a priuate souldier then of a Captaine or commaunder. Neuerthelesse his souldiers got the victorie, and made prisoners together with many others, Iohn Paule de Cere, and Feruccio, whom Maramus slue being prisoner, in reuenge as he confessed of a Trumpet, whom he had caused to be hanged, being sent to him at the siege of Volterro to declare a messlage.

Thus the Florentins seemed deliuered vp to a condition abandoned of all succours both diuine and humane, in whom also increased dayly afflictions of famine, without hope of further remedy remedie or comfort : and yet albeit their extremities for their nature were no lesse heauie & grieuous then their remedies desperate, yet the obstinacie of those that opposed against the accord was nothing abated, but was augmented by the same degrees which multiplied their wants and extremities. Those men being induced by a last dispaire not to pull on them their own ruine without the destruction of the country, & standing now no more wilfully resolu'd to die for the safety of the countrey, but that their common countrey and their liues should take end together, were also followed of many, who flattered themselves with this impressiō, that the succors of the great God of wonders would not appeare before things were reduced to such termes, as there remained no further expectation in humane helpe : and as the Magistrates and almost all such as managed any publike authoritie, were concurant in this obstinacie, and no place left to impugne it, for that greater was the awe of the Magistrates and threats of armes, then the reasons or perswasions of those that were of the contrarie opinion : so there had bene daunger that the warre wold haue ended with the last destruction of that Citie, had it not bene for the industrie of Malatesta, who seeing the aduersitie of the Citie & be without remedie, did as it were constraîne them to encline to accord. Wherein haply he was caried by pitie and compassion, to see wholly perishe through the rage of her citizens, a Citie so ancient & flourishing : and haply he was moued by the dishonor and domage that might come to him to be present at so great a ruine : but the principall cause of his induction was, that he hoped to obtaine of the Pope by the meane of that accord, sufferance to returne to Perouza. So that whilest the Magistrates and such as were most furious and forward, were consulting to make issue out of the Citie the soldiers to giue battel to the enemies, who both exceeded them in numbers and aduantage and strength of place, & that he refused to go out with them, they suffered their passion to carie them so farre, that they decaied him, and deposed him from his charge of Capitaine, and sent certaine of the most disordered amongst them to denounce against him a commaundement to go out of the towne with his companies ; a matter which both for the suddennesse comming vnlooked for, & for the proprietie of iniurie being not deferred, did so enflame and kindle him, that striking at one of them with his dagger, the assistants that were by him had much a do to deliuer him with his life out of his handes. By which accident the present company being astonish'd, and the whole Citie beginning to rise, those that were not so farre incensed with passion and furie, began in better temperance to reprehend the rashnesse of the Gon-falonier, who though he went to arme himselfe, protesting sometimes that he would set vpon Malatega, and sometimes that he would issue out to fight with the enemies, at last things were qualified to this moderation, that the desperate obstinacie of many gaue place to the extreme neces-sitie of the whole. Insomuch as in those moods they sent out foure Embassadors the ninth of August to capitulate with Don Ferrand Gonzalues, who for the death of the Prince of Orange commaunded in the armie, the Marquis of Gnast being retired before with whom the day following the conclusion was made, of which these were the principall articles : That the Citie within verie few dayes should pay 80000 duckets for the withdrawing of the armie : That the Pope and the Emperour should giue authoritie to the Emperour to declare within three moneths what should be the state of the government, alwayes reseruing and sauing their libertie : That there was generally pardoned all manner of iniuries done against the Pope, his friends, and his seruants : That till the Iudgement and sentence of the Emperour were passed, Malatesta Baillon should remaine within the Citie in garrison with 2000 footmen. As soone as this accord was made, and whilest the money was collected for the armie, whereof there was need of a farre greater summe, for that in the Pope was found litle readinesse to releue the Citie with money in so great a daunger, the Popes Commisarie called Bart. Valory joyning with Malatega, who aspired altogether to returne to Perouza, made a conuocation of the people in the publike place, according to the ancient customes of that Citie to the which the Magistrates & multitudes agreed through feare : and in that Parliament they introduced a new forme of government, by the which was giuen authoritie to twelue Citizens of the faction of the Medices, to dispose as they thought good of the pollicie of the Citie ; who reduced it to that forme which it was wont to carrie before the yeare 1527. After this the armie dislodged and brake vp, and hauing receiued mony for the orderly pay and satisfying of the vniuersall hands, the Italian Captaines conuerting to their owne priuate vsage (to the great igno-minie of their discipline) that which should haue run amongst the soldiers by share, retired into Florence loden with the money which was appointed to pay the armie. They contented with a like the regiments of footmen, and dismissed them, who remaining without leaders or commanders went dispersed into diuerse places of the countrey: but for the Spaniards & Lances, being fully answered of all their payes, they went out of the townes and iurisdiction of Florence, and drew to the countrey of Sienna to reorder the gouernement of that City. And as Malatesta Paulon, whom the Pope suffered to returne to Perugia, without tarying for the declaration of the Emperour, left the city wholly to the arbitration and will of the Pope: so, after the souldiers were gone out of it, the persecutions and punishments of the Citizens began, the end of one calamity being the beginning of another: for, those into whose power and administration was diuolued the gouernement and authority, partly to assure better the state, and partly by malice conceiued against the authors of so many euils, & partly for memory of iniuries particularly receiued, but principally to satisfie the intention and ends of the Pope, though he made small manifestation thereof; those I say (observing haply the superfluous and outward declaration of the words, but wresting & perverting the inward sense) interpreted, that the chapter or article, by the which pardon was promised to such as had iniured the Pope and his friends, extended not to deface and wipe out the wrongs and crimes which by them were committed in matters that concerned the commonweale. In which inclination to reuenge the information, things being preferred vp to the Magistrates, six of the principals were beheaded, many imprisoned, and a great number bound ouer according to the traditions and statutes of the City: inasmuch as the City being so much the more made weake and feeble, by how much she was shaken in her pillars and chiefe foundations, and withall those that had pertaked in these reuenges and punishments being reduced into greater necessities and difficulties, the power of the Medices returned more free and more absolute, yea almost royally into that City, which had for so long & great a warre, remained much impouerished of money, made naked both within and without of many inhabitants, and spoiled both of dwellings and goods abroad, and lastly stood now more then euer deuided in it selfe; a calamity which yet was made so much the more great and heauy, by how much had bin more lamentable for many yeares their vniuersall necessity and difficulty to make prouision of victuals in forein countries for the generall scarcity and dearth which the whole countrey endured: for as for that yeare by reason of the afflictions and impediments of the war, they made neither seede time nor haruest, so it was so seuer a calamity continued to the yeares succeeding, that the City being raked and dreynd, had issued out more money to make prouision of corne from forreine regions and cattell without the limits of their owne dominions, then had bene defrayed for the expences of so great a warre, full of heauy burthens and charges.

In this meane while the Emperour assembling the diot at Ausperge, had caused to be elected king of Romaine Ferdinand his brother: and calling into question the cause of the Lutherans, both suspected touching the power of Princes, and for the multitude and ambition of their followers deuided into diuerse heresies, and euen the life and example of Martin Luther the originall author of that opinion, being now almost of no consideration, the Princes of Germany could deuise of no better remedy, then to assemble and celebrate a Councell: for, both the Lutherans seeking to couer their cause with the authority of religion, solicited vehemently to haue their cause disputed in a publike and free Councell: and on the other part it was beleueed, that the decrees which the Councell should set downe, would beare authority sufficient, if not to reduce & remove the minds of the heretikes from their errors, at least to retire and recover to a more sound opinion one part of the multitudes infected. But in Germany euen those that followed the factions and opinions of the Catholikes desired the conuocation of a Councell, to the end to reforme the excessive charges and abuses of the Court of Rome: where, what with the authority of indulgences, and with the profit of dispensations, and lastly with the annates or yearly fruits of benefices that were giuen, together with the allowances that in the expedition of them reuered to the offices infinitely multiplied in that Court, it seemed there was no other study or care then to exact by those corruptions a huge masse of treasure throughout all Christendome, without regarding the health and true comforting of soules, nor that matters Ecclesiastike were rightly administered and gouerned: for, both many benefices incompatible were transferred and heaped vpon one person, and also without respecting the merits & worthinesse of men, they were either bestowed by partiality and fauor, or at least such persons were introduced, who for their age were incapable, or for their doctrine insufficient, or (which worse is) for their life and example most slanderous.

The Emperour was very forward to satisfie this vniuersall instance and solicitation of the parts of the states of Germany, and held it also not out of purpose for his affaires, to appease in those prouinces the causes of the tumults and contumacie of the peoples. In which regards he vr-ged the Pope by reducing to his memory the conference they had together at Bologna, to call a Councell, promising him (least he feared his authority & dignity should fall into danger) to be there in person to take particularly care of him. But for the Pope, albeit there was nothing in the world that could be offered more to his displeasing or discontentment then the assembly of a Councell, yet, to nourish the opinion that men had of his good intention, he dissembled that inclination or rather cause of feare: and yet in effect he had many deepe and settled feares: one was, least the Councell, to moderate the abuses of the Court and the indiscreete permissions of many Popes, would not too much diminish and restrain the power of the sea Apostolike: another was (which was no small impressio in him) that albeit when he was called to be Cardinal, he had proued by witnesses that he was borne in lawfull mariage, yet in truth he knew it was contrary, and albeit there could be found no law writtē that forbade any man (not lawfully borne) to ascend to the Papacy, yet there was entertaigned amongst them an ancient and common opinion, that no man, vpon whom could be proued illegitimation, could be capable of a Cardinals place: thirdly he reduced to remorse and conscience, that he was raised to the sea Apostolike not without some suspition of synony practised with the Cardinall Colomo: and lastly he feared least for the seuerities and rudenesse which he had vsed towards his naturall countrey, accompanied with so many tumults and aduersities of war, he should be made perpetually infamous in the generall Councell, the rather for that it had appeared vpon the effects that he was moued not to reduce that City to a good and moderate gouernement, but was induced with ambition and enuy, to put it estsoones vnder the yoke and seruitude of his house. In regard of these causes and feares, like as he abhorred the name of a Councell, and could not accompt the fidelity of the Emperour a sufficient surety to him: so, after he had communicated the whole matter with some Cardinals deputed to the discussion of a cause of so great waight, who also stood in feare to be corrected by the Councell: he answered that there were many reasons against the calling of a Councell in that time, both for that there was no assured stability of peace amongst the Princes of Christendome, and also the feare was no lesse that the Prince of Turkes would recontinue the warre, in which case it were not good that he found the regions of Christendome encombred with the disputations and contentions of the Councell. Neuerthelesse making shew to referre the resolution of it to the Emperour, he concluded, that he was contented that he should promise in the diot, the induction of the Councell with these obseruations: That it might be celebrated in Italy: That a reasonable time were assigned for the calling of it: That it be assigned with the person and presence of the Emperour: And that the Lutherans and other heretikes promising to referre themselves to the determination of the Councell, should in the meane while desist from the practise of their corruptions, and rendering to the sea Apostolike their due obedience, they should returne to their former conuersation of Christian Catholikes. This article made more hard the whole practise and negotiation of the Councell: for, the Lutherans were not onely not to desist from their opinions and ceremonies before the celebration of the Councell, but also it was beleueed, that they had no inclination of the Councell, where they could expect no other matter, then a reprobation of their doctrine, the rather for that their principall opinions had bene many times refuted as hereticall by the former Councells: yea it was thought they insisted vpon the conuocation of this Councell, for that knowing it was a matter fearefull to Popes to stand in presence of a Councell, they were of opinion that the Court of Rome would not accord to it, and so by that meane, they should support their cause with the nations of the world with a greater authoritie.

With these actions and intentions determined the yeare a thousand five hundred and thirty, and successiue followed the yeare 1531, wherein was wrought no great matter of emotion and stirre: for, notwithstanding it was comprehended by many signes, that the French king was not onely ill contented with the accords and contracts made with the Emperour, but also stood very desirous to innouate things to new tumults, with whom the king of England bare the same inclination, especially against the Emperour, for that standing in defence of the cause of the sister of his mother, he impugned the matter of his diuorce: yet the French king being both impo-uerished of money, and little leasure to respire from the trauels of so long wars, he ~~for~~ the time was not yet apt to kindle matters of innouation: neuerthelesse he omitted not in the meane while to conspire aswell in Germany with such Princes as bare minds estranged from the Emperour, in Italy with the Pope, to whom the better to assure his amity, he made an ouerture of mariage betweene his second sonne and the Popes Neece. In which practises and conspiracies he suffered himselfe to be so much ouercaried with malice and reuenge, that to the great offence of God, and perpetuall infamy to the Crowne of Fraunce, which alwayes made principall profession to defend Christian religion, and for those merits was honored with the title of Christianissimus, he entertayned practises with the Prince of Turkes, to stirre him vp against the Emperour, towards whom the Turkes were ordinarily ill disposed, no lesse for a naturall hatred they bare to the name of Christians, then for the matter of controuersies they had with his brother tending to questions, for the realme of Hungary with the Vaynode whom he had taken into his protection: the Turkes also began with much ieaiousie to suspect and enuy the greatnesse of the Emperour.

The Pope hol-
offended with

By this time the Imperial Captains leauied their forces from the territories of Sienna, to leade them to Piemont: but before they departed, to satisfie the Pope, they reestablished within Sienna the family of Montenouo, repossessing them of their countrey & goods, & yet altered not the forme of the gouernement: and to assure them in their estate, they left them a gard of 300 Spaniards depending vpon the Duke of Malfy, vnder whom, being not able to keepe his authority things so reuerted forthwith to their old disorders, that such as had bin reestablished and restored, left for feare the things they could not hold by force. Moreouer the Emperour pronounced the forme of gouernement for Florence, dissembling that part of the authority giuen to him, which limited their liberty sauied: for that according to the very instructions which the Pope had sent to him, he expressed that the City should be gouerned with the same Magistrate & in the same maner, it was wont in the times when the Medices ruled it: he declared also for chiefe of the gouernement Alexander the Popes nephew, and his son in law: and that in case of him & his issue extinct, there should succeed from hand to hand, the children, the descendants, and the next procreated of the same family: he restored to the city all the priuiledges agreed vnto before times by him & by his predecessors, but with this condition annexed, to be depofed from them as often as the city should attempt anie thing against the greatnesse of the family of Medicis, inserting through all the decree, words which shewed that he tooke not his ground & inducement only vpon the power that had bin giuen to him by the parties, but also vpon the authority & dignity Imperial. In which maner of dealing, where he haply satisfied the Pope more then was extended by the faculty giuen him by the writ of compromise, he offended him as much immediatly after in a matter which was no lesse grievous to him then the other was agreeable: for, after the Doctours especially assigned, had heard and examined the controuersie betweene the Pope and the Duke of Ferrara, before whom both the parties had produced many testimonies and inscriptions, with a long course of proceffe and pleading, he pronounced sentence according to their counsell and relation, that as Modena and Reggia attained of right to the Duke of Ferrara, so the Pope in receiuing of him an hundred thousand ducats, and reducing the tributes to the auncient maner, he should inuest him of new in the iurisdiction of Ferrara. Wherein the Emperour labored to insinuate into the Pope, that where contrary to his promise made in Bolognia, not to pronouce in case he found his cause not to be iust, he had giuen sentence, That he was not to complaine against him, but rather to blame the Bishop of Vascona his Nuncio, to whom he alwayes gaue signification that he would not pronounce sentence, for that he would not be constrained to passe iudgement against the Pope: but he perswading the contrary, and interpreting those significations for a discharge of the promise he had made to giue sentence, if the right were in him, had pressed so much the publication of the sentence, that he was halfe constrained to it for the regard of his honour; an excuse which the Pope would sooner haue admitted, if the sentence and iudgement had not bin in the same sort and maner, wherein the Emperour had many times assayed to reduce the matter by accord. But the point wherein the Pope was most offended, was, that the Emperour in pronouncing vpon the matters of Modena and Reggia, had followed a way and taken a course of a Iudge most rigorous, but in the action of Ferrara wherein the rigour was manifestly for him, he had done the office of a friendlie Arbitratour and Compromittour: therefore though he would neither ratifie the sentence sentence pronounced, nor accept the payment of the money wherein the Duke was condemned, neither did he at the next feast of S. Peter accept the tribute which was publickly offered to him according to ancient custome: yet the Emperour forbore not for all that to consigne to the Duke of Ferrara Modena, which he had detayned in deputation till that day, leauing them to decide afterwards the differences betweene them. So that by reason of that dealing, there was not for manie moneths betweene the Pope and the Duke of Ferrara, neither an open war nor an assured peace, the Pope lying alwayes in watch to oppress him with conspiracies and surprize, or else to expect the occasion to heape against him an open war with the supportation of greater Princes.

This yeare of 1531 brought forth no other accidents, and the tranquillity also went on continuing for the yeare following; a yeare more dangerous for forreign wars, then for the emotions of Italy: for, the Turke being kindled with the ignominy of his repulse at Vienna, and no lesse vnderstanding how the Emperour was intangled in Germany, prepared a right huge and great army, wherein boasting insolently of his forces, he let not to publish, that his intention was to constrain the Emperour to come to battell with him. By the rumor & renoume of which preparations, both the Emperour put himselfe in as good order as he could, reuoking into Germanie the Marquis of Guaft with his Spanish regiments, and a great band of horsemen and footemen Italians: and the Pope promised to contribute to him a defraiment of forty thousand ducats for euery moneth, sending for the same expedition as Legate Apostolike, his nephew the Cardinall of Medicis: and lastly the Princes and free townes of Germany, prepared in fauor of the Emperour and for the common defence of Germany, a very huge and mighty army: but the effects answered nothing the renoume and the feare: for, Soliman who (for the greatnesse of his preparations, and difficulty and distance of the way) could not enter into Hungary but very late, did not draw directly with his armie where the Emperour was, but exhibiting onely a shew of warre, together with certaine bragging Caualcadoes and braueries of horsemen, he returned to Constantinople, leauing the enterprize vnperfect for want of valour, which he had induced and managed with so mighty preparations: neither did the Emperour shew any greater deuotion or readinesse, seeing that when he vnderstood the Turkes drew neare, much lesse that he made out to meete them, seeing vpon their retiring he omitted to pursue with all his forces the faire occasion that was offered him to reconquer Hungary for his brother: onely yeelding to his importunate desire to go into Spaine, he gaue order that certaine bands of Spanish footemen and some regiments of Launceknights should be conuerted to the enterprize of Hungary. But that order was immediatly disordered by the insolent behauiours of the Italians, who pushed on by certaine their Captaines, disdaining that the authority and conduct of the enterprize was giuen to others and not to them, so mutined, that hauing no reason to alleage for their tumult, and the presence of the Emperour who went thither to appease them, being not sufficient to continue them, they tooke resolutely and vniuersally their way into Italy, in which disorder they marched with great hast for feare to be followed, and in their way with minds malicious they burned many villages and houses, in reuenge as they sayd of the burnings and wasting committed in many places in Italy by the Lanceknights. The Emperour also returned by the way of Italy, and where he had set downe in what order and by what places should passe his Court and all his traine, the Cardinall Medicis, caried with humors and passions of youth, would not obey the order generally giuen to all the traine, but in his insolency respecting lesse the Emperours order then his owne ambitious will, he aduanced and got before together with Peter Maria Rossa, vpon whom chiefly was layed that fault of the sedition. This bred no litle indignation in the Emperour, either for that he imputed the beginning and discourse of the matter to the Cardinall, or else he feared least the Cardinall standing ill contented, that Alexander his cousin was preferred to the administration of the estate of Florence, would go after the bands of Italians to leade them to trouble the affaires of Tuscane. In which regard he caused to be apprehended by the way, the Cardinall and with him Peter Maria Rossa: but after he had better considered of the importance of the matter, he wrote letters for the redeliuery of the Cardinall, to whom as well as to the Pope he protested many excuses: only Peter Maria remained prisoner, though not long after he was released, working greatly for him with the Emperour, the iniury which it seemed he had done to the Cardinall.

The retyring of the Turke deliuered the regions of Italy of a great warre that threatned to fall vpon them: for, where the French king and king of England with minds full of emulation against the Emperour, had an enteruiew and conference together betweene Calice and Bulloigne, where king their grounds that the Turke would abide that winter in Hungary, and hold intailed the forces of the Emperour, they consulted that the French king vnder that oportunity should inuade the Duchy of Milhan, and hauing a disposition to draw the Pope to their part by violence and astonishment, whom they could neuer allure by other meanes, they deuised to take from him the obedience of their kingdoms in case he would not consent to that which they desired of him, which was for the action of Milhan for the French king, and for the king of England to giue sentence on his side in the cause of diuorce: and to relate their intentions, they were determined to send to him with sharpe commissions, the Cardinals of Tournon and Tarbes, both which bare no small authority with the French king. But the newes which they receiued of the retiring of the Turke before the time of their enteruiew was determined, did not only well moderate those deuises and their feuerities, but were also the cause that the king of England would not suffer to passe to Calice the Lady Anne Bulleine, to celebrate mariage with her publicly in that assembly, notwithstanding that both the cause was hanging in the Court of Rome, and also he was forbidden by writs Apostolike, vnder paine of very great iudgements, to innouate nothing to the preiudice of the first mariage. But so deepe did the French king dissemble, that albeit to confirme the mind of the king of England that he would be against the Pope, he imposed by his owne authority vpon the Clergie of his realme a taxe of tenths, and dispatched the two Cardinals to the Pope, yet not obseruing the fidelity of his word and promise, he sent them furnished with commissions farre differing from the resolution of the two kings in the beginning.

The Emperour being come into Italy with a desire to speake with the Pope, the place of their meeting and enteruiew was estoones assigned at Bologna; a place which the Pope accepted willingly, the rather for that he would giue no occasion to the Emperour to go to the realme of Naples, and by that occasion to make a longer aboad in Italy; a matter whereunto albeit the Emperour was induced by the reasons and perswasions of many of his Court, yet it was entierly contrary to his principal intention, who desired to make hast into Spaine chiefly for the desire he had to haue sons, his wife remaining there: so that those two personages of that estate and greatnesse, met at the end of the yeare at Bologna, where were obserued betweene the same demonstrations of amity, and the same offices of familiarity, which they vsed before, but there was no more the same correspondency of wils which had bene expressed vpon their negotiations the other time: for the Emperour had a great desire to aduance the Coucell, the better to reduce to rest and contentment the regions & peoples of Germany; he offered to dissolue the army, liuing at a great charge both to him and others, but to the end he might do it with more surety, he insisted to haue renewed the last league made at Bologna, both to comprehend in it all the Italians, & to taxe the quantities & rates of mony which euery particular was to contribute, if the states of Italy were inuaded by the French: he desired also to haue Katherine the Popes Neece married to Francis Sforce, as well to presse the Pope by a greater necessity to looke to the preseruatiō of that state, as also to breake the practise of parētage that was solicited with the French king. Of all these matters not one was acceptable to the Pope, seeing the cōfederation was a motion cōtrary to the desire he had to stand anewter so much as he could between the Princes of Christendome: wherein both he doubted many dangers generally, & especially he feared least the French King, taking his example & instigation by the king of England, would depriue him of the obedience of his kingdom. Touching the conuocation of a Councell, it was no lesse grieuous to him then before, for the ancient causes and impressions: and for parentage with the Duke of Milhan, it pleased him nothing at all, for that he interpreted it to a meane to take an open hatred with the French king, with whose second son he had a vehement desire to conioyne his Neece. These matters were drawne into negociation and counsell, but principally was solicited the point of the cōfederation, in which actiō running many moneths, were deputed for the Emperour, Cronos, the great Commander of Leo, Granuelle, and Prato his chiefe Counsellors: and for the Pope were delegate the Cardinal Medcis, Iames Saluatiō, & Gnecciardin: who as they refused not to go through with the cōfederation, for that it was all one to yncouer the Popes intention, & to giue the Emperour cause to cōceiue iustly a great suspicion of him, so they made instance to haue the Venetiāns sounded & to be drawne to consent to it, alleaging that both without them the defence of Italy would be but weake, and that ioynly with them should be protected with more reputation the common affaires fares if the defence were continued vpon the renoume of the former confederation : where, if there were resolued another without them, it wold deliuer to the world an opiniõ, that betweene the Emperour, the Pope and Venetians, were apparant matter of discord. In this regard the Venetians were solicited to condescend to a new confederation for an vniuersall defence of all the regions of Italy, for that by the first League their obligation extēded no further thē for the affaires of Millan and Naples. The Emperour also wished with great desire, that they might be bound to the defence of Genes, where it was thought, that when the war was on foot, the Frenchmen wold be apt to recontinue their former inuasion; a matter which they might pretend to do lawfully, by reason of their rights & interests particular, without preiudicing the contracts of Madriill & Cambray. But the Senate of Venice refused absolutely to renew the confederation, or to amplifie the obligations contained in the same; a matter which brought no small discontentment to the Emperour, though they affirmed to obserue inuiolably that coniunction: but the Emperour was so much the more importunate, & so refuted all reasons that were alleaged to the contrarie, that the articles of the confederation began to be communed vpon. And for the more effectuall handling of things, there were summoned all the Potentates of Italy, who sent Embassadours to this negotiation: they were required to enter the League, and to contribute in case the war went on, euery one according to his power and possibility, wherein they made no difficulty or resistance, but laboured feuerally to ease the demaund of the contribution: only Alfonso d'Este reasoned with thē that it was not reasonable he should enter into a league to defend the states of others, if first he were not assured of his owne: he alleaged there could no accord be made to warrant him against the Pope, nor to enter league with him, neither could he promise to contribute with his treasure to the defence of Millan & Genes, if necessity compelled him to expend it continually to keepe bands of souldiers within Modena and Reggia, and also for the surety of Ferrara: vpon which reasons was deriued a new practise and labour to accord him with the Pope: who bearing a mind far estranged from that motion, and yet not willing to oppose himselfe so apparantly against the instance of the Emperour, he proponed conditions verie hard and impossible to be obserued, affirming that if he should leaue Modena and Reggia to Alfonso, who otherwayes would not come to accord, he would that Alfonso should reacknowledge and hold them in chiefe of the Sea Apostolike; a matter which for that it could not be done in such sort as to be iudicially available without the consent of the electors & Princes of the Empire, reduced the Emperour to a difficulty which had no issue. This brought the Emperour to intreat the Pope, that at least during the league he wold be bound not to vex the state which Alfonso held: insomuch as after many importunities & disputings, the Pope consented to assure him for xviii. moneths: & so at last was resolued the conclusion of the League, passed & contracted vpon S. Mathewes day; a day alwaies happy to the Emperour. This league & confederation contained an obligation of the Emperour, the king of Romans & all the other Potentates of Italy, except the Venetians, for the defence of Italy: only the Florentines were not otherwise named, thē in the same maner they were expressed in the league of Cognac, & that to the end not to trouble their entercourse & trades in the realme of Fraunce, it was set downe with what proportion of souldiers euery one shold be cōcurrant, & with what quantities of mony to contribute for euery moneth: the Emperours rate was xxx. thousand duckets, the Pope for him & the Florentines was taxed at twenty thousand, the Duke of Millan at xv. thousand, the Duke of Ferrara at ten thousand, the Genowayes at fixe thousand, the state of Sienna at ten thousand, and the Citie of Lucqua at a thousand: and to the end to be found prepared against all so- daine & vnlooked for inuasions, vntill defence might be made with the contributions asorenamed, it was agreed that immediatly should be leauied a loane of a summe of money, almost equall to the taxations, and that not to be expended, vnlesse the preparacions to inuade Italy were manifestly discerned. There was also set downe a small contribution yearely for the entertainment of those Captains that remained in Italy, and to defray certaine pensions to the Swissers, to stop that nation for giuing aide of men to the French king. Ouer this League was declared Capitaine generall by common consent Ant. de Lena, with ordinance that he should remaine in the Duchy of Millan. Touching the generall counsell there was nothing concluded to the liking of the Emperour, who still solicited the Pope to send out present summons for it: but he refused to accomplish the motion, alleaging that as in that ill disposition of the time and mens minds, there would be danger least the kings of England & Fraunce wold not appeare, so if the Council were celebrated without the, much lesse that there could be introduced either vnion or reformation of the Church, seeing it was to be feared least things wold diuolue to a manifest schisme: only he was content to send out Nuncios to all Princes to induce them to do holy a worke: but albeit the Emperour made a question to him what wold be the issue of things, if those two Princes did dissent from the without iust cause, and pressed him in that case to intimate the Councell, yet he could neuer dispose him to it: so that his Nuncios were assigned and sent out with a verie slender hope to bring backe any good conclusion. The Emperour was no better satisfied touching the negociation of the parentage, for that when the two Cardinals which the French king had sent, were come to Bologna, and had euen soones recontinued the negociation of the mariage with the second sonne of Fraunce, the Pope gaue answer to the offer made for the Duke of Milan, and exhibited by the Emperour: that whereas the French king had long time before made an ouerture of mariage for his sonne, and he had hearkened to the motion by the consent of the Emperour, declaring at that time his good consent and liking, he should now do too great a wrong to the French king, if during the negociation he should giue his Neece in mariage to one of his enemies: but he perswaded him, that that practise was artificially introduced by the French king to entertaine him, and not with intention to conclude it, seeing there was betweene the parties so great disagreement and inequality of degree and condition. Lastly, he assured him that he would not commit so great an offence to the king, if he saw not before the practise and solicitation altogether broken: and the Emperour for his part, being not to be perswaded that the French king would adioyne his sonne to a match so farre vnequall to him, encouraged and aduised the Pope, that for the better vncouering of the kings dissimulations, he would presse the Cardinals to send for a procurator to contract them, which accordingly was accomplished in few dayes, and exhibited in very ample forme: by which readinesse and resolute meaning, not onely was lost all hope of affinitie with Frauncis Sforce, but also the sollicitatiō with the French king was pursued with so much the more importunity, and to it was further added, according to the deuise betweene them long before, that the Pope and the French king should contract together at Nice, a Citie of the Duke of Savoy, standing vpon the riuer of Var, and separateth Italy from Prouence. These matters were not a litle discontenting to the Emperour, aswell for a suspicion he had, that betweene the Pope and French king were concluded a greater coniunction to his preiudice, as also for that he was ieaious, that in the Pope remayned some secret memorie and impressiōs of his imprisonment, of the sacke of Rome, of the mutation of Florence, and of other wrongs. To these he adioyned the passion of disdaine, wherein he iudged that the honour which the Pope had done to him in making two iourneyes to Bologna to speake with him, would stand derided and diminished, if he should make a voyage by sea so farre as Nyce, to meete with the French king. But in vaine were these suspicions and the causes of them, though he could not dissemble them, for that in the Popes mind was vehemently nourished and affected the desire of that affinity, being haply moued more with ambition and appetite of glorie, in that being of a house almost simple and private, he had obtained in recompence of a bastard Nephew of his, a bastard Daughter of so mighty an Emperour, and now in exchange of his Neece legitimate, he had honoured his house with the second sonne of Fraunce, lawfully borne and orderly assured. Then that he was induced, which many counselled him, that by the meane of that parentage he might giue colour of right (though more apparant then true) to the French king, to enter for his sonne and for his daughter in law vpon the estate of Florence. To these discontentments of the Emperour, may be added also as a full accomplishment of his disliking, that where he made instance to the Pope to create three Cardinals exhibited by him, he obtained onely (and that with difficulty) the calling of the Archbishop of Bary, the Pope making his excuses vpon the contradiction of the Colledge of Cardinals: the Emperour stood litle appeased in the readinesse which the Pope shewed to make a secret confederation with him, wherein he promised to proceed iudicially to pronounce iudgements and censures, and all other things that might be done by right against the king of England, and against the Lady Anne Bolleyn: & they were bound to make no new confederations or accords with Princes, without reciprocall consent one of another.

Thus the Emperour departed from Bologna the day after the conclusion of the confederatiō, being now no lesse assured in himselfe, that the said mariage would go on, together with the enteruiew betweene the Pope & the French king, then he had reason to doubt some greater coniunctiō: and and being embarked at Genes, he passed into Spain with this resolute intention, that if the marriage of Katherine de Medici were celebrated with the second sonne of Fraunce, he would dissolve and breake the match made betweene his daughter and Alexander de Medici. Not many dayes after the Pope departed to go to Rome, being accompanied with the two French Cardinals, and nothing troubled with the new confederation: for that as he was excellent in simulations and practises, in which he was not surmounted with feare, so he had told them that vpon concluding the League the Spanish armie was to dissolve and decasse; a matter which wold turne more to the benefite of the French king, then the league or confederation could do him hurt, seeing that as well for the obligations it contained, as for the obseruancy and executions of the same, many difficulties might happen, and sundrie impediments arise.

Thus the solicitations and practises begun, were continued betweene them: and as the French king was desirous in regard of his honour, and for ambition more then for other needfull matter, that the person of the Pope might come to Nice, so to allure him the more, he promised not to require of him any confederation, nor to incense him to warre, and much lesse to draw him from termes of iustice in the cause of the king of England, nor to importune him to create new Cardinals: neuertheless he was somewhat pushed on by the incitation of the king of England, who had now solemnly married the Lady Anne Bolckyne, by whom hauing by due order of time procreated a daughter he had, to the preiudice of the daughter of his first wife, declared her Princess of the realme of England; a title which is transferred to such as are most nearest the Crowne: by reason of which action, the Pope notable to dissemble so geat a contempt against the Sea Apostolike, nor refuse to graunt iustice to the Emperour, had with the vowes and iustifications of the Consistorie, published that king guiltie of the crime of contempt; a matter which moued the king of England to desire with more importunitie both the parentage and enteruiew of the Pope with the French king, hoping much in that king to remedie his cause: and that if the Pope were induced to commune vpon new matters against the Emperour, he would desire to restore him, and to draw him to their coniunction, and so almost to constitute a Triumvirate to giue lawes to the things of Italy. At last his going was concluded, but not to Nice; for some difficultie interposed by the Duke of Sauoy, touching the consigning of the Castle to the Pope, hauing in likelihood no inclination to displease the Emperour: but the place was changed to Marfeilles, greatly to the pleasing and appetite of the French king, who interpreted it not a litle to his honour, to reduce the enteruiew into his kingdome, neither was it discontenting to the Pope, as one that desired to satisfie him more with demonstrations to please his ambition, then with effects according to true meaning. The Pope caused to be published a brute, that he went to this enteruiew, principally to sollicite an vniuersall peace: secondly, to perswade an enterprife against the infidels: thirdly, to reduce and call backe to good wayes the king of England: and lastly, and onely for common and generall interests, and to establish some good forme in the vniuersall affaires: but being indeed not able to dissemble the true cause of his iourney, before he departed he sent his Neece to Nice vpon the Galleyes which the French king sent to him, accompanied with the Duke of Albania, Vncle to the young Ladie: which Galleyes after they had deliuered the Lady to Nice, returned to the port Pisan, and tooke in the fourth of October the person of the Pope with a traine of manie Cardinals, whom with a happie nauigation they brought in few dayes to Marfeilles: there he made his sollemne entrie, and after him entred the French king, who had visited him before by night: they were lodged in one Pallace, and exercised reciprocally one vpon another right great offices and demonstrations of amity: and the king, who especially laboured to insinuate into his fauour and to win him, besought him to send for his Neece to come to Marfeilles, which being perfourmed with a willing readinesse in the Pope, who forbore to preuent the king in that motion, to shew that he would first debate of the common affaires. So soone as the Ladie was come, the contracts went on, which were immediatly confirmed and made perfect by the consummation of the mariage, to the incredible gladnesse of the Pope, who albeit with such arte solicited his affaires with the king, that the king reposed a wonderful confidence in his words, and honoured him with a singular affection: yet both contrarie to the opinion of all men, and especially against the expectation of the Emperour, no article or capitulation was passed betweene them: onely the Pope shewed himselfe alwaies well inclined and desirous, that the state of Millean might be conuerted to the Duke of Orleanse husband to his Neece; a matter also vehemently thirsted after by the king, for a hatred and despite he bare to the ~~Emperour~~ and his greatnesse and fortunes, but much more for that the Duke of Orleans hauing to his state a state of that appurance and greatnesse, he thought that thereby would be quenched the occasions of contentions betweene his children after his death, which other wise he feared might all amongst them for the title of the duchie of Brittaine; an estate which the king in the yeare before, contrarie to the couenants made by king Lewis with those people, had annexed and vnitd to the Crowne of Fraunce, wherunto he induced the subiects of that state to consent more by his kingly authority then of their proper inclination and will. Moreouer, in this enteruiew much lesse that the king could obtaine any fauour of the Pope in the cause of the king of England, seeing being discontented with the inciuilities of the Agents of that king, whom he found in the Popes chamber, protesting and appealing from him to the Councell: he told the Pope it should nothing offend him, if he pursued that king and his cause according to the rule of iustice: yea, he was so moderate in his demands and dealings, that in nothing did he offend the mind of the Pope, sauing that more to satisfie others of his Court and Councell, then to content himselfe, he solicited him to create three Cardinals, a matter not a litle discontenting to the Pope, not so much for the instance which the Emperours Embassadour made to the contrarie, as for that he interpreted it to an action of great consequence, both for the election of other Popes hereafter, and for the disobediences which might happen in his life, and after to adde so manie Cardinals to the French nation, being at that time sixe in number: neuerthelesse to preuent a greater euill with satisfying the lesser, he accomplished the kings demand, making to be concurant in the action of that creation, a brother of the Duke of Albany, to whom he had before promised the Cardinals cap. In all other regards they seemed to stand firme and assured in all sorts of fidelity and satisfaction, and in that good estate of inclination and amitie, the French king was not curious to communicate with him manie of his counsels, and especially his determination to stirre vp against the Emperour certaine Princes of Germanie, and chiefly the Lantgrane van Hesse, and the Duke of Wittenberg, who the summer following drew into commotion: and so with these actions and demonstrations of amitie and office, after they had passed a moneth at Marseilles, the Pope returned vpon the same Gallies that brought him: but being with great stormes and tempests of sea arriued at Saona, where reposing no more confidence neither in the prouisions of the Gallies, nor in the industrie and experience of those that gouerned them, he sent backe againe the same Gallies that had deliuered him out of his first perilles, and tooke his course to Ciuitanecchia in the Gallies of Andrew Dore, from whence being returned to Rome, with a right great reputation and wonderfull felicitie, especially to such as had seene him prisoner in the Castle of Saint Angelo, he reioyced, as it were at his will, in the full fauour of fortune, feeling notwithstanding in the secret apprehensions of his spirite and mind, the chaunge that was speedily to happen to him: in which impression he seemed to foresee and discerne his last end: for it is certaine, that alme t as soone as he was returned from his voyage to Marseilles, from whence he seemed to bring certaine predictions and comets of his death, he caused to make the Ring with all other habites accustomed to burie Popes, assuring his familiar with a mind well reposed and resoute, that his latest dayes could not be deferred for anie long time. Neuerthelesse nothing retiring for all those impressions from his cares and studies accustomed, he solicited, as he thought, for the greater loretie of his house, to build a verie strong Cittadell within Florence, not knowing how soone was to end the felicitie of his Nephewes, of whom being mortall enemies one to another, Hippolito the Cardinall died before the end of the yeare of the Popes death, not without suspicion of poison, and Alexander the other Nephew, who commanded at Florence, was (not without a great note of indiscretion) secretly slaine by night in Florence by the hands of Lawrence one of the same familie of Medicis.

The Pope sickened about the beginning of sommer, whose grieve in the first apprehension, was the paines of the stomacke, which drawing with them the passions of a feuer and other accidents, kept him long time vexed and tormented, sometimes seeming to be reduced to the point of death, & sometimes so eased and relieued, that he gaue to others, but not to himselfe a kind of hope of recovering. And during the time of his maladie, the Duke of Wittenberg by the ayde of the Lantgrane Van Hesse & other Princes, cōcurring also the mony of Fraunce, recouered the Duchy of VVittenberg which the king of Romaines possessed: by which occasion fearing a greater combustion bustion, they came to composition with the king of Romains against the will of the French king, who well hoped that the Emperour, in regard of those emotions, would stand entangled with a long and tedious warre, and that haply their armies being victorious, would descend vpon the Duchy of Millan. In like sort about that time Barbarossa Bassa, and Captaine generall to Solyman of all his Nauies and armies by sea, passed to the conquest of the kingdome of Thunis: in his way thither he scoured along the shores of Calabria, and ran vp about Catetta, where setting on land certaine bands of his souldiers, he sacked Fondy, with such a feare and astonishment to the Court and peoples of Rome, that it was supposed that the citie of Rome had bin left abandoned, if in that course of victory they had passed on further. This accident was kept from the knowledge of the Pope, who being no longer able to make resistance against his maladie, exchanged this life for a better the xxv. of September, leauing behind him in the castle of S. Angelo many rich stones and jewels, more then was expected of him, and in the Chamber of the Sea Apostolike infinite offices, contrarie to custome and good order, but in the Treasurie a verie small store of money, wherein he beguiled the opinion of all men: he was raised from base degree to the place of the Popedome with a wonderfull felicity, but in managing the place, he proued a verie great variatio of fortune, wherein if both the properties of fortune be euently ballanced the one with the other, the worse fortune without all comparison was far more familiar with him then the better: for as there could happen to him no greater infelicity then the aduersity of his imprisonmēt, for that with his owne eyes he beheld, with so great a ruine and destruction the sacke of Rome; a desolation which his fortune suffered him to bewaile with pitee & cōpassion, but not to turne away or remedie the harme: so also by him moued the generall desolation of his naturall country, to the which by how much more he was bound by perpetuall obligatiōs, by so much greater was his aduersity to be a chiefe instrument in the ruine of the place where he had taken his first being: he died hated of all the Court, suspected to most Princes, and for the discourse of his life, he left behind him a renoume rather hatefull then acceptable: for he was accounted couetous, of litle fidelity, and naturally far off from doing pleasures to men: and in that humor, albeit during his time of Pope he created xxxj. Cardinals, yet vpon none of them did he impose that dignity to content himselfe, but was drawne as it were by the violent law of necessity, and to please others: yea he called to that dignity the Cardinall of Medicis, not of his proper and free election, but at the contemplation & perswasion of others, & at a time when being oppressed with a dangerous maladie, if he had died, he had left his friends and kindred in the state of beggers, and depriued of all aide: neuertheless he was in counsell verie graue, and in his actions much foreseeing: touching passions & affections, a conquerour of himselfe, and for the facultie of his mind and spirit, of great capacitie and power, if timetousnesse had not oftentimes corrupted his iudgement. Immediately after his death the Cardinals going the same night into the Conclauē, elected in his place with full voyce Alexander, of the familie of Farnese, a Romane by nation, and for his time the most ancient Cardinall of the Court: in which election their voyces seemed conformable to the iudgement and instance that Clement had made, the person elected being more worthie to be preferred before all the others to oueraigne a degree, for that he was both furnished with doctrine and good learning, and replenished with good apparances and customes: and for the Cardinals, they were so much the more forward to passe the election in his person, by how much for the greatnesse of his age, being already vpon the threescore and seuenth yeare, and supposed to beare a weake and vnfound complexion (which opinion he nourished with arte) they hoped he would not sit long in the seate. But touching his actions and operations, whether they answered the expectation conceiued of him, or whether they were worthy of the incredible gladnesse which the people of Rome tooke, to haue after the end of an hundred and three yeares, and after the successiō of thirteene Popes, a Pope of bloud and nation a Romane, and of language and education of one familiaritie with themselves, it standeth in the testimonie and relation of those
